It is not possible to define what is included in the terms 'circumstances' and 'social position', but for the purposes of this case it may be said that the outgoings under the heads referred to above are matters requiring consideration in determining the tax-paying capacity of the appellant. Except in the case of income-tax it cannot be laid down as a rule that in determining the tax paying capacity these items or any of them must be wholly deducted from the salary.

As far as income-tax is concerned that part of the salary which is paid as such is as good as never received and cannot be considered to be at all contributing to the occupier's tax paying capacity. Insurance premia and house rent are items of expense which depend for their extent on the occupier's choice and obviously he cannot, as a matter of principle, be allowed to claim deduction for the whole of the amounts paid by him for these purposes, for he might choose to make them so large as to swallow the greater part of his income. The extent to which allowance should be made in respect of these items is a matter to be decided in connection with each case by the Municipal Committee or the Deputy Commissioner, Commissioner or other officer hearing the appeal and no principle can be laid down on the point.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 115—

Madras District Municipalities Act (V of 1920)—Rules for conduct of Elections, rr. 14, 15, 17—Interpretation of rules by Election Court—Interference by High Court.

Where an election Judge acting under the Madras District Municipalities Act, by interpreting rr. 14, 15 and 17 of the Rules for the conduct of elections, found that certain ballot papers had been improperly rejected by the returning officer:

Held, that the High Court would not interfere in revision even if the finding of the Judge that the ballot papers were improperly rejected was wrong inasmuch as he had jurisdiction to interpret the rules.

Petition, under s. 115 of Act V of 1908 and s. 107 of the Government of India Act, praying the High Court to revise the order of the Court of the District Judge, West Godavari at Ellore, in O. P. No. 53 of 1925.

Sir K. V. Reddi, for the Petitioner.

Mr. P. Venkatarama Rao, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—K. Subbiah, the petitioner here, was declared to be elected as a Municipal Councillor of Ellore as having got 196 votes at the election against 195 for T. Manikkam respondent No. 1. On an election petition presented by T. Manikkam the District Judge found that the result of the election had been materially affected by the improper rejection of 16 ballot papers, which, if accepted would have left each of these candidates with 205 votes. Whether the District Judge's finding that the 16 ballot papers were improperly rejected was right or wrong, he arrived at that finding by interpreting rr. 14, 15 and 17 of the Rules for the conduct of elections of Municipal Councillors. I find no defect in his jurisdiction to interpret those rules as he has done nor any illegality nor material irregularity in his procedure. On his finding his order that a new election would be held was within his jurisdiction.

The petition is dismissed. The petitioner will pay respondent's costs in this Court. Respondent No. 2 will bear his own costs in this Court.

In an impartible Raj the junior members of the family have not the ordinary co-parcenary rights which members of a joint Hindu family have; and a grant of maintenance by the holder of the Raj to the junior members of the Raj cannot and does not amount to a partition and such grants do not by themselves amount to a conveyance of full proprietary rights including rights to minerals and sub-soil rights. JUDGMENT.

Miller, C. J.—This is an appeal on behalf of the plaintiff from a decree of the Subordinate Judge of Ranchi, dated the 4th July, 1925, dismissing the plaintiff's suit for a declaration of his right to the minerals in Pargana Tori.

The main question for determination in the appeal is whether a grant of Pargana Tori made in 1867 by Maharaja Jagannath Sahi Deo of Chota Nagpur to his younger son descendible in the direct male line of the grantee and resumable on failure of lineal male heirs passed not only the surface rights but also the right to the minerals thereunder.

The plaintiff, the present Maharaja of Chota Nagpur, is the elder son of Maharaja Jagannath Sahi Deo the grantor and succeeded to the Raj on his father's death in 1869. The first defendant who may be referred to as the Maharaj Kumar is the plaintiff's younger brother being the son of the same father by a different mother. It was to this defendant that Pargana Tori was granted by way of maintenance by his father in 1867. The second and third defendants are licensees of the Maharaj Kumar under a prospecting license, dated the 27th May, 1921. The defendant No. 5, the Tori Syndicate Limited, claims to be the assignee of the rights of the second and third defendants. This defendant was added on his own application. The fourth defendant, the Tori Coal and Minerals Prospecting Company, Limited, claims under a prospecting license granted by the plaintiff and supports the plaintiff's case. The remaining defendants numbered 6(a) and 6(b) who were also added on their own application claim as licensees of the Maharaj Kumar under a prospecting license granted to their deceased father on the 23rd May, 1924, alleging that the previous license to the second and third defendants had been cancelled.

The plaintiff claimed (a) a declaration of his right to the minerals in Pargana Tori and the right of access thereto for himself, his servants and agents, (b) a permanent injunction against the contesting defendants restraining them from interfering with the exercise of the plaintiff's right, and, (c) a permanent injunction against the said defendants restraining them from working the mines and removing the minerals in Pargana Tori.

The contesting defendants pleaded that the minerals passed to the Maharaj Kumar under the grant of 1867 either by its terms or by custom and, further, that they have acquired title by adverse possession and that the suit is barred by limitation. A further plea was raised that the plaintiff had relinquished his rights, if any, in favour of the Maharaj Kumar by instruments of release and confirmation, dated the 10th March, 1893.

Eleven issues were settled for determination but two of them originally numbered 6 and 9 were struck out before trial by the learned Judge without objection by the Maharaj Kumar as being irrelevant and unnecessary. They raised the question whether the Chota Nagpur Raj bearing Tauzi No. 1 on the revenue roll of the Collector of Ranchi was a permanently settled estate and whether the villages in Pargana Tori appertained to that estate. The defendants Nos. 2 and 3 objected to their deletion but as they admitted that the villages in Pargana Tori appertained to the Chota Nagpur Raj estate the learned Judge did not consider it necessary to determine the nature of that estate. Of the remaining issues re-numbered 1 to 9 the first four were not pressed by the defendants at the trial or in this appeal. The remainder were as follows:—

5. Is the suit barred by limitation?

6. Have the mineral rights in Pargana Tori passed to and vested in the defendant No. 1 either by virtue of custom as alleged by him or by virtue of the alleged lease, dated Magh Sudi 7, 1923, Sambat?

7. Has the plaintiff got any title to the minerals in Pargana Tori and is he entitled to the declaration and injunction prayed for?

8. Did the plaintiff abandon and relinquish his rights, if any, to the mines and minerals in the aforesaid Pargana by the instruments of release and confirmation of the 10th of March, 1893?

9. What relief, if any, is the plaintiff entitled to?

If the grant were merely a lease either for a term or in perpetuity or a maintenance grant for the life of the grantee I consider that the question would be concluded by a series of authorities binding on this Court notwithstanding that there are words of general import in the grant itself which, taken in their widest significance, would be sufficient to pass all rights in the property to the grantee and the heirs male of his body. The learned Subordinate Judge before whom the case came for trial held that none of the decisions upon which reliance was placed by the plaintiff governed the present case. He was further of opinion that the nature of the estate created by the grant bore a close resemblance to what in England would be called an estate in tail male and was in the nature of a freehold estate passing the underground, as well as the surface, rights. He further relied upon evidence of surrounding circumstances when the grant was made as showing the intention of the grantor. He further held that the suit being one for a declaration was barred by Art. 120 of the Schedule to the Limitation Act. He also decided the eighth issue in favour of the defendants holding that the plaintiff had by the transaction of the 10th March, 1893, abandoned and relinquished his rights in the minerals to the Maharaj Kumar.

The translation of the grant of 1867 used in the lower Court and printed with the record was imperfect, certain important words being entered as illegible. We accordingly had a translation made by an official translator of this Court which is as follows:—

The words "four boundaries, all included" are a literal translation of the words "chatur sima sab sudha" and might perhaps be rendered in idiomatic English as "including 'every thing within four boundaries.'" The words "bhandarkhas" refer apparently to the villages or portions of the estate in the direct possession of the proprietor himself and not rented or farmed to others. The Chota Nagpur Raj to which Pargana Tori appertains is admittedly an impartible estate and succession thereto is governed by the rule of male lineal primogeniture, females being excluded. Such an estate according to the decision in the case of Sartaj Kuari v. Deoraj Kuari (1) is alienable at the will of the Maharaja for the time being except in so far as there may be any custom to the contrary and no such custom has been shewn in this case. The younger sons of the family although they have no right to partition or to restrain alienation are entitled by the custom prevailing in the family to a maintenance grant of a portion of the estate which descends in the direct male line of the grantee in the same manner as the parent estate and is resumable on failure of that line. According to the evidence of the defendants' witness No. 3 the third son of the plaintiff, there is no hard and fast rule as to the kind of property to be given in khorphosh. There is no set form for the documents executed in evidence of the grants. The terms of such grants may not be exactly similar but the substance is the same. At the time of making grants calculation is made on the basis of the income derivable from the Pargana concerned. This witness adds that up to now no mines in Chota Nagpur have to his knowledge been worked. Except Chhota Lal none of the khorphoshdars in the Raj has as yet worked any mines in their respective villages and he adds "I do not know in what village or villages the said Chhota Lal has worked mines but I have heard that he has got some mines working". Chhota Lal there referred to is the fourth son of the Maharaja. He was also called as a witness and agrees with his brother that there is no fixed rule as to the extent of khorphosh grants in reference to the parent estate. There is no dastur on the point. If any disputes arise in the matter the same have to be decided either in Court or by arbitration. It does not appear from his evidence that he ever worked any mines within his khorphosh grant but he appears to have excavated clay or earth on his estate for the purpose of making bricks for his house without any opposition from the plaintiff. In fact it may be stated at once that except for the evidence of Lal Jogendra Nath Sahi Deo, a son of the present khorphoshdar of the Jharia Estate, held under the Chota Nagpur Raj, there is no evidence of any of the khorphoshdars having worked the minerals upon their estates. The evidence of this witness is of the vaguest description. He says that some 40 or 50 years ago some iron mines used to be worked on that estate. The operations went on for two or three years. The greatest depth reached was about 15 feet and the excavations were made along a ditch 100 to 150 steps in length. This village is in a remote part of the country 44 or 45 miles from the nearest Railway Station and it does not appear that the Maharaja of Chota Nagpur had any knowledge of the matter. I think that it may safely be assumed that in 1867 when the grant in question in this suit was made the question of mineral rights was not present to the mind of any one.

Several cases have been drawn to our attention of maintenance grants and leases in which it has been held that the mineral rights did not pass except by express words of grant or by necessary implication. In Tituram Mukerji v. Cohen (2) the Judicial Committee held that a khorphosh grant for the lifetime of the grantee could not be presumed to be more than a grant of the rents and profits and did not carry with it the right to open mines and remove minerals which are a portion of the soil. In that case there was no direct evidence as to the terms of the grant. In Hari Narain Singh v. Sri Ram Chakravarti (3) it was held that a perpetual lease to a certain idol at a nominal rental did not pass the mineral rights in the absence of any evidence that the grantor had parted with them. Again the document in this case relied on by the lessees was not produced. In Jyoti Prasad Singh v. Lachipur Coal Co. (4) it was held in the Calcutta High Court that a permanent moghali brahmottar grant which had existed before the Permanent Settlement, nothing being known about the intentions of the parties at the time of the inception of the lease, did not pass the mineral rights. In Durga Prasad Singh v. Braja Nath Bose (5) it was held by the Judicial Committee that a digwari grant in Manbhūm did not pass the mineral rights to the Dighwar the presumption being that they remained with the zemindar in the absence of proof that he parted with them. In Biswa Nath Gorai v. Surendra Mohan Ghose (6) it was held by the Calcutta High Court that the interest of a khorphoshdar heritable in the male line, being a limited interest liable to defeasance by failure of heirs and thereupon resumable by the proprietor for the time being, was not an interest sufficient to carry with it the sub-soil rights. That was a case arising in Chota Nagpur and would appear to be indistinguishable from the present case unless it should appear from the words of the grant now relied on that the mineral rights were transferred. The case of Christian v. Tekaitni-Narbada Keori (7) does not carry the matter any further. It was the case of a maintenance grant for the lifetime of the grantee and as the deed did not contain any express provision authorising the grantee to open new mines and to appropriate the minerals therefrom it was held that the minerals did not pass. The grant, however, was made in 1894 and was governed by s. 108 of the Transfer of Property Act. In Kunja Behari Seal v. Raja Durga Prasad Singh (8) the previous decisions of the same Court in the cases above referred to decided in 1910 and 1911 were followed and it was held that a moghali brahmottar grant of a mauza did not pass the minerals to the grantee. The case of Shashi Bhushan Misra v. Jyoti Prasad Singh Deo (9) was decided by their Lordships of the Privy Council in 1916. It was the case of a permanent mukarrari grant made before the Permanent Settlement to certain Brahmins and the question for determination was whether such a grant carried with it the mineral rights in the soil. The Lord Chancellor in delivering the judgment of the Board pointed out that it was important to avoid giving words used in connection with legal transactions in India the special and technical meaning which they possess in England and added "According to our law, the word 'grant' is strictly applicable to the conveyance at Common Law of remainders, reversions, and incorporeal hereditaments which do not lie in livery, or of which livery could not be given. But, in connection with the present dispute, the word has no such meaning and it is important at the outset to bear this in mind." Previous decisions of their Lordships' Board were referred to and from those decisions a principle was enunciated which in their Lordships' opinion was conclusive of the case before them. The principle so enunciated was "that when a grant is made by a zemindar of a tenure at a fixed rent, although the tenure may be permanent, heritable and transferable, minerals will not be held to have formed part of the grant in the absence of express evidence to that effect. In Girdhari Singh v. Megh Lal Pandey (10) it was held that a mukarrari lease of land of a permanent and heritable character did not pass the minerals unless by the terms thereof there was an express or plainly implied grant of the underground rights. In that case just as in the present the grant contained words of general import. The terms of the grant appear from the report of the case in the Calcutta High Court in Megh Lal Pandey v. Raj Kumar Thakur (11). They are as follows:—

"I settle in mukarrari the whole of Mouza Baramasia with all rights (mai hak hakuk) as per boundaries given below, appertaining to my zemindari, etc."

Their Lordships held that in spite of the wide general terms the minerals did not pass. "It is unavailing to urge" said Lord Shaw in delivering their Lordships' judgment, "that the right granted by the mukarrari patta to the lessee is of a permanent, heritable, and transferable character, as even although this be the case it does not advance the question of whether the lease itself embraced within its scope the mineral rights. On the contrary, unless there be by the terms of the lease an express or plainly implied grant of those rights they remain reserved to the zemindar and are part of his zemindari." Again in Raghunath Roy Marwari v. Raja of Jheria (12) it was held that the principle enunciated in the previous cases applies as well to rent-free grants as to grants of tenures at fixed rates. The grant in that case was of rent-free brahmottar land. Sir John Edge in delivering the judgment of their Lordships said: "The result at which their Lordships have arrived after a consideration of the decisions of the Board is that where a zemindar grants a tenure in lands within his zemindari, and it does not clearly appear by the terms of the grant that a right to the minerals is included, the minerals do not pass to the grantee." In 1920 the case of the Secretary of State for India v. Srinivasa Chariar (13) was decided by the Judicial Committee. In that case a village had been granted as a shrotriyam inam in 1750 by the Nawab of the Carnatic. The grant provided that the grantee having appropriated to his own use the produce of the seasons each year might pray for the prosperity of the Empire and that he should pay a fixed yearly sum to the Sirkar. The inam was enfranchised in 1865 and the inam title-deeds purported to convert the tenure into a permanent free-hold upon payment of a quit-rent. In 1905 the Madras Government imposed upon the successors of the original inamdars royalties in respect of stone which they had quarried in the village. The latter sued for a declaration of their full rights to the rocks and hills within the village and claimed a refund of the royalties already paid. It was held that upon a true construction of the grant the full right to the quarries and minerals did not pass to the grantee and that having regard to Madras Act VIII of 1869 the inam title-deeds could not vest in the inamdars a subject-matter not vested in them by the grant; consequently the Government was entitled to impose royalties on stone quarried in the village. It was further held that the terms of the grant being in evidence neither the inam title-deeds nor certain admissions made by the Government in land acquisition proceedings were evidence as to its effect. At most those proceedings could amount to no more than action taken under a misapprehension of the Government's legal rights and this could not make the law one way or the other, nor could it affect the Government's title. It was further stated by Sir Lawrence Jenkins in delivering the judgment of the Board that the rules of English Law as to real property in England could afford no guidance as to what passed under the grant of a village in inam. This latter point has frequently been insisted upon and I think it may now be said that the feudal laws of England are no guide to the principles affecting land tenures in Bengal. The learned Subordinate Judge has been at some pains to draw an analogy between the present grant and an estate tail in England and because the tenant in tail enjoys the mineral rights he infers that the holder of a putra paustradi tenure can enjoy the same rights. But the analogy is not supported by authority nor would it, in my opinion, bear close inspection. A tenant in tail has a free-hold estate and is for all practical purposes on an equal footing with a tenant in fee simple. Under the present grant—it appears to me that the interest created, although not strictly a lease as defined in the Transfer of Property Act, bears most of the essential features of an interest created between landlord and tenant a rent being reserved and the reversion in the event of failure of lineal male heirs remaining in the landlord. On the face of it the document is a maintenance grant and the presumption upon the authorities quoted must, I think, be that the minerals did not pass without words of express grant or by clear implication. From the terms of the grant itself it would appear that the enjoyment of the rents was the main object of the grant. From the authorities quoted I think the principle emerges that where the reversion remains in the grantor the minerals do not pass without express words. If this is so even in the case of a permanent lease, I think the same principle should apply to the present grant where the interest terminates on the failure of male lineal descendants.

An argument was addressed to us upon the meaning of the words "sab sudha" "all included" or "including everything" which it was contended were sufficient to pass not merely the surface rights but also the subject minerals. But this part of the case appears to me to be concluded by the decision of the Privy Council in the case of Girdhari Singh v. Megh Lal Pandey (10) in which it was held that similar words (mai hak hakuk) (with all rights) in a mukarrari lease did not add to the true scope of the grant or cause minerals to be included within it. In my opinion there is nothing to be gathered from the terms of the grant itself which indicate an intention to pass the mineral rights.

It was argued, however, that the parties being governed by the Mitakshara Law the property of the Raj remained joint family property except in so far as the custom of the family modified the Mitakshara Law. It was, therefore, contended that a khorphosh grant, which the younger sons were entitled to insist on, was analogous to a partition and that they took, under such a grant, the whole of the proprietary rights in the estate within the area of the grant itself and that on the failure of male descendants of the grantee, the estate granted did not revert to the parent estate as in the case of a lease but went back by survivorship. In support of this contention the case of Bairnath Prasad Singh v. Tej Bali Singh (14) was relied on. There the previous decisions including the case of Katama Natchiar v. Rajah of Shrivangana (15) and Sartaj Kuari v. Deoraj Kuari (1) were reviewed and it was held that the successor to an impartible estate which is ancestral property of a joint Hindu family governed by the Mitakshara Law is designated by survivorship subject to the custom of impartibility; the eldest member of the senior branch of the family, therefore, succeeds in preference to the direct lineal senior descendant of the common ancestor if the latter is more remote in degree. It seems to me, however, that the right of the junior members of the family to maintenance out of an impartible estate does not arise out of co-ownership but out of the custom which is a modification of the ordinary Mitakshara Law. In Venkata Mahipathi Gangadhara Rama Rao v. Rajah of Pittapur [The Second Pittapur case] (16) frequently referred to as the second Pittapur case, it was held that in the absence of special custom the grandsons of a deceased zemindar are not entitled to maintenance out of the impartible estate in the hands of his successor. The right to maintenance is a personal and not a real right, otherwise the younger sons would be entitled to a charge upon the property for their maintenance in the hands of a transferee of the proprietor for the time being which is not the case. Moreover, the argument that the khorphosh estate goes back to the parent Raj by survivorship and not by reversion, although it has certain attractions, will not bear examination. Alienability is an incident both of the parent estate and of the khorphosh grant. Suppose a Maharaja should transfer his estate to another the reversion to the khorphosh grant in the event of failure of male descendants of the grantee would pass to the transferee who certainly could not take by survivorship. Again if the khorphosh grant should be alienated the transferee would take subject to defeasance on failure of the direct line of the original khorphoshdar. In this case also it could not be said that the khorphosh grant went back to the parent estate by survivorship.

Reliance was also placed on the fact that the two main junior branches of the family had their gaddis called quarkari gaddi and thakurai gaddi just as the Maharaja has the raj gaddi and from this we were asked to infer that they held some special proprietary interest in the property constituting their horposh grants. This suggestion, however, is discounted by the witness who speaks to it for he says that there is no difference in the rights possessed in their khorphosh grants by the first three sons and those of the junior ones and he adds that the assignment of khorphosh properties to the first three sons does not amount to a partition of the Raj. The word 'gaddi' conveys an idea of superiority in the possession of the holder thereof. He adds:

"The estate in my possession cannot be called gaddi."

This was the evidence of the fourth son of the Maharaja.

A point was also made of the fact that in a previous suit in 1915 the plaintiff in giving evidence had described the second and third sons as the maliks of their gaddis. A chance expression of this sort may be appropriate enough in the context in which it was used but it does not necessarily mean more than that the persons so designated have complete powers of disposal over the interests which they hold. The question of mineral rights was not then under consideration; nor can such an expression afford any guide to the intentions of the grantor expressed in a document made by the deponent's father nearly fifty years earlier.

The learned Subordinate Judge has also been greatly influenced by what he describes as the peculiar circumstances existing when the grant was made. At that time both the plaintiff and the Maharaj Kumar were children under a year old having been born within a month of each other in the previous year. Their father, the Maharaja Jagannath Sahi Deo who was then over sixty years of age and apparently of somewhat weak intellect, had a few years earlier placed his nephew and heir presumptive Upendra Nath Sahi Deo, known as Burra Lal, in charge of his estate as manager but owing to a quarrel between the Maharaja and his nephew in 1863 the latter was dismissed and ill feeling arose between them. In 1865 the Maharaja left his ancestral home at Palkote and settled at Bhanro in another part of his estate and his two sons were born in the following year. The chances of Burra Lal succeeding to the Raj were thus put an end to, but he appears to have circulated rumours to the effect that the plaintiff and his brother were not the sons of the Maharaja and his Ranis, and in 1869 on the death of the Maharaja he sued the Ranis and the Court of Wards, under whose management the estate had been placed, to establish his title thereto on the allegation that the two sons were supposititious children. In this he succeeded in the trial Court but the judgment was reversed on appeal. A copy of the judgment of the trial Court has been put in evidence on behalf of the defendants and marked Ex. F (1). From this document further particulars of this incident may be gathered. I have referred to it merely because the learned Subordinate Judge has attached great weight to it as showing that the Maharaja in 1867 was apprehensive that the Raj might be wrested from his sons by the machinations of his nephew and, therefore, in order to secure some property at least to the family, in case his fears should prove well founded, he made the grant of Tori to his younger son. From this the learned Judge deduces that there could be no room for doubt that the Maharaja intended to convey full rights to the grantee subject to the reservations expressly mentioned. With great respect to the learned Judge I think the intention must be gathered from the language of the grant itself and not from considerations of such a speculative nature. Had it been his intention by this grant to secure the future welfare of both his children, as the learned Judge finds, I hardly think he would have made provision for the younger of his children only. It would have been equally easy to secure the future of his elder son by a similar grant and, had he felt any real apprehension as to the succession being diverted, I think the strong probabilities are that he would have made provision for both. The story told by the defendant as to what he heard from the Ranis concerning the Maharaja's intentions is at most hearsay. It is contradicted by the plaintiff and I do not think any reliance can be placed on it. I presume the evidence was admitted by the learned Judge as evidence of contemporanea expositio. But where the document is produced in evidence and contains no latent ambiguity extrinsic evidence of intention can hardly be admissible.

The learned Judge also found that the plaintiff in 1893 abandoned his right to the minerals. The question as to the right to the minerals does not appear to have received much, if any, attention until the year 1890 when the Maharaj Kumar for a consideration of Rs. 25,000 granted to Mr. Max Anderson of Calcutta by a thika patta, Ex. B (1), dated the 10th November, 1890, a license to prospect for minerals in Pargana Tori for a period of five years with power during that period to dispose of the mineral rights to any person or company for a term of 25 years, the consideration for the lease to be shared between the licensor and licensee in certain proportions. By another document of the same date, Ex. B-1/1, he granted Mr. Anderson for a period of five years the mining rights in three of the villages of the Tori Estate. At that time it would appear that the Maharaj Kumar anticipated that his right to dispose of the minerals might be questioned by the plaintiff, for by the terms of the prospecting license, in case the plaintiff or his successors should dispute the right, the Maharaj Kumar undertook at his own expense to defend any suit that might be brought against the licensee and to hold him harmless against all loss, costs, damages and expenses arising therefrom. Shortly afterwards the plaintiff did dispute his brother's right to deal with the minerals but the dispute between them appears to have been amicably settled by the intercession of their respective mothers. Mr. Anderson was anxious to get an extension of his prospecting license but apparently was not content with a grant from the Maharaj Kumar alone. In the result the plaintiff and his brother in 1893 agreed that Mr. Anderson's license should be extended for a further period of 10 years and that he should have power during the extended period to grant a lease of the mining rights for 50 years. Accordingly two agreements were executed both, dated the 10th March, 1893. These are Ex. B-1/2 and Ex. 10. The former is the extension of the prospecting license in favour of Max Anderson and is signed by both brothers. The latter is a deed of release signed by the plaintiff relinquishing in favour of Max Anderson his rights to the minerals in Pargana Tori during the term created by the prospecting license and the lease, if any, that might be granted thereunder. The recitals in this document are important. After referring to the pattas granted in 1890 by the Maharaj Kumar it contains a recital to the effect that the Maharaja claims that all rights to minerals and metals lying in and under the lands comprised within the Chota Nagpur Raj including Pargana Tori belong to him as Maharaja of the said Raj, and that on failure of the heirs male of the Maharaj Kumar he has the right to resume the said Pargana free of all encumbrances. It then states that Mr. Anderson has applied to the Maharaja to release to him his rights in the minerals in the lands described in the two previous pattas for the purpose of perfecting his title. It then continues "And whereas by an agreement on an eight annas stamp paper, dated the 5th February one thousand eight hundred and ninety-three, it has been mutually agreed between the said Kumar Jagat Mohan Nath Shah Deo and myself for ourselves, our heirs and assigns that from that day henceforth we shall equally enjoy all profits and benefits to be derived from the produce of any mines or minerals in the said Pargana Tori or the sale price or rent or other benefit thereof * * Now I do hereby release to you and your Syndicate and to your and their assigns all my rights whatsoever the same be to the metals and minerals and precious stones of every description and under the surface of all the lands in Pargana Tori." For the term mentioned in the two thika pattas, the learned Judge relied upon these documents of 1893 as showing that the plaintiff, "Expressly and in unmistakable terms admitted that the defendant No. 1 was the sole master of the mines and minerals and as such had every right to deal with the same." I do not think that any such inference can be drawn from the transaction evidenced by these two documents. In the deed of release (Ex. 10) the plaintiff distinctly asserted his exclusive right to the minerals and entered into the transaction because he and his brother had come to an agreement to share equally between them the profits to be derived from the minerals in Pargana Tori under an agreement, dated the 5th February, 1893, and not because the Mahraj Kumar had any other title. There is no admission that the minerals had passed by the grant of 1867. If the agreement of the 5th February, 1893, referred to in the deed of release were valid and enforceable, then the rights of the parties would be governed by that agreement in this case; but neither party is now relying upon it for it appears that it was never registered and cannot be enforced or put in evidence by either party. It may be mentioned here that Mr. Anderson's license expired in 1905 and, as no advantage was taken of the terms to execute a lease of the mineral rights, it has long ceased to be operative. I must hold, therefore, that there was no relinquishment by the plaintiff of his mineral rights in Pargana Tori in favour of his brother.

In 1908 the Tori Estate was being administered by a manager under the Encumbered Estates Act. In order to pay off the debts and get the estate released the Maharaj Kumar obtained a loan from Sirkar Bernard and Company of rather more than a lakh of rupees on mortgage and promised to release the minerals in Pargana Tori to the lender. A prospecting lease was in fact granted to Sirkar Bernard and Company but it was never registered and nothing came of it. The next transaction was in 1921 when the Maharaj Kumar granted a prospecting license to the defendants Nos. 2 and 3, dated the 17th May that year. The present suit was instituted in August, 1922. The learned Subordinate Judge said he was inclined to the view that a suit for a declaration was barred by Art. 120 of the First Schedule to the Limitation Act by reason of the fact that the cause of action arose in 1900, and in 1903 when the Maharaj Kumar asserted a right to lease the minerals to Mr. Anderson and that in any event even if a fresh cause of action arose in 1921 he was of opinion that this was not a case in which the Court would be justified in passing a declaratory decree. I think on both points he was wrong. In 1893 the situation was entirely different. The parties then purported to compromise the dispute existing between them and on the strength of that compromise the plaintiff agreed to grant a prospecting lease in favour of Mr. Anderson and to share the proceeds with his brother. The compromise between the plaintiff and his brother now turns out to be inoperative owing to lack of registration and the Maharaj

Kumar himself is repudiating it and claiming to be exclusively entitled to the mineral rights. Thus, an entirely new situation arose in 1921 and, in my opinion, a fresh cause of action accrued and a suit for a declaration would not be time-barred. Further if the plaintiff can make out his title to the minerals I can see no reason why he should be refused the relief sought in the circumstances of this case, merely because in declaratory suits the Court has, in proper circumstances, a discretion in the matter. That discretion should not be arbitrarily exercised. The discretionary refusal to grant declaratory relief would not determine the question of title and the only effect of exercising a discretion in favour of the defendants would be to involve the parties in additional expense and litigation as soon as the defendants began to work the minerals and deprive the plaintiff of possession. The facts necessary to arrive at a determination have been fully gone into in the present suit and I can see no reason for refusing the relief claimed as a matter of discretion in the present suit if we consider that the plaintiff has established his title.

The only question of limitation raised and determined in the lower Court was that to which I have referred and which is based on Art. 120 of the Schedule to the Limitation Act. No issue as to adverse possession was raised or determined, although the point was taken in para. 5 of the written statement of the second and third defendants, but there is no evidence in the case to support the view that the defendants, or any of them, by working the minerals acquired any adverse title. In my opinion the suit is not barred by limitation.

The learned Judge expressed the view that the mineral rights passed to and vested in the defendant No. 1 by virtue of the immemorial custom obtaining in the family and the grant as evidenced by the deed of 1867. I do not know on what grounds the learned Judge concluded that the mineral rights passed by custom. There can be no instance of the mineral rights passing before 1867 as up to that time the minerals had not been worked and it is difficult to see how there could be any custom one way or the other. The Maharaj Kumar himself when asked in cross-examination whether in Chota Nagpur putra pau tradi grants conveyed minerals stated that he could give no opinion and apart from his own case he did not know of any other.

A cross-objection was filed on behalf of the defendant No. 3 complaining that issues Nos. 6 and 9 as originally framed were improperly deleted by the Subordinate Judge and should be restored for hearing and determination. It was admitted, however, by this defendant when the matter was dealt with by the learned Subordinate Judge on the 17th June, 1925, that the villages comprising Pargana Tori appertained to the Chota Nagpur Raj. The point raised, however, is that unless the Chota Nagpur Raj is a permanently settled estate the minerals do not belong to the plaintiff. The defendants other than those numbered 2 and 3 did not dispute at the trial that the Chota Nagpur Raj was a permanently settled estate and indeed the interest claimed by the principal defendant himself, through whom the others claimed, depends upon the assumption that the plaintiff's father was in possession of the minerals and able to pass them by the grant of 1867. The title of the defendant No. 3 himself also depends upon the right of the first defendant through whom he claims. The plea, therefore, will not avail him unless he can show some title apart from that derived from the Maharaj Kumar. The argument is that the defendant No. 3 is in possession of the minerals and is, therefore, entitled to resist the plaintiff's claim in the absence of proof of the plaintiff's title. There is, however, no evidence on the record to show that the defendants Nos. 2 and 3 or any of the other defendants are in possession of the minerals and the claim asserted by these defendants must stand or fall upon the rights of the defendant No. 1 who does not himself dispute that the Chota Nagpur Raj is a permanently settled estate or that the mineral rights were vested in the plaintiff's predecessor before the grant of 1867.

In my opinion the decree of the trial Court should be reversed and the appeal should be allowed with costs here and in the Court below against the contesting defendants and the cross-objection should be dismissed with costs, the costs to carry interest at 6 per cent. per annum from this date until realisation. The plaintiff is entitled to a declaration of his title to the mines and minerals in Pargana Tori and to an injunction restraining the defendants other than the defendant No. 4 from entering upon, working or removing any mines or minerals within the said Pargana or from interfering with the plaintiff, his servants or agents in doing all acts reasonably incidental to the enjoyment of the plaintiff's right in the mines and minerals in the said pargana.

Kulwant Sahay, J.—The principal questions for determination in this appeal are: First, whether the defendant No. 1 acquired rights to the mines and minerals in Pargana Tori under the grant of February, 1867 or by custom; secondly, if the plaintiff had abandoned or relinquished his rights, if any, to the mines and minerals in Pargana Tori; and thirdly, whether the suit was barred by limitation.

I shall first deal with the question of interpretation of the deed of February, 1867, which has been marked as Ex. 8 in the case.

[His Lordship after satisfying himself that the translation of the deed was correct proceeded as follows:]

It is contended on behalf of the plaintiff that by this grant the rights to the mines and minerals in Pargana Tori did not pass to the defendant No. 1. On the other hand, it is contended on behalf of the respondents that all sub-soil rights including the mines and minerals passed to the defendant No. 1. Reliance was placed on behalf of the plaintiff-appellant on the term of the grant whereby the grantee and "his sons and grandsons and so on" were to realize from the former and present elakadars the rents fixed in respect of the jagirs granted previously and at present, in accordance with the patta;" and also to the term that "so long as the sons and grandsons and so on" of the grantee "will live they shall take possession of bhandar khas at every place and realize rents in respect of the entire Pargana Tori khas bhandar and the elakadari and enjoy the same peacefully," and further on the term that the grantee "shall continue to get all the income from the aforesaid villages." It is contended that these terms clearly show that what was granted was merely the rents and profits of the villages comprised in Pargana Tori and that it was not the intention of the grantor to demise the sub-soil and mineral rights in the Pargana. It is contended that the grant was for the purpose of maintenance of the grantee and maintenance grants have always been held to pass only the surface rights and not the sub-soil rights to such grantees. As regards the generality of the terms used in the document it was contended that they referred only to the surface rights and not to the sub-soil rights.

On behalf of the respondents it is contended that the document makes no reservation whatsoever and that the entirety of the rights possessed by the grantor were transferred to the grantee. Great reliance was placed upon the word "sab sudha" translated as "all included" occurring in the document. It was contended on behalf of the respondent that "sab sudha" meant everything comprised in the land. The contention of the respondent was that the word "sudha" in Sanskrit meant the soil, the earth, and that "sab sudha" meant all the earth, and that, therefore, it included the sub-soil rights. It is true the etymological meaning of the word "sudha" in Sanskrit is earth, but the popular significance of the word "sab sudha" is everything included. The words "sab sudha" follow the words "four boundaries". Now, the grant of "four boundaries" would be meaningless. What was actually intended to convey was everything included within the four boundaries. Reliance has been placed upon the word "darobast" which occurs thrice in the document. "Darobast" is a Persian word and means entire, and the grant was of the darobast Pargana Tori khas bhandar darobast original with dependencies. The word "darobast" does not carry the defendants any further. It merely means that the entire Pargana Tori with the entire khas bhandar was granted. "Bhandar" according to Fallon's Dictionary means villages managed by the Raja or zemindar himself, his own peculiar estate not rented or farmed to others. "Khas Bhandar", therefore, means such villages as were held by the grantor in his own direct possession and were not let out or farmed to others. This was in contradistinction to the villages settled in jagir with the elakadars and the deed expressly says that the grantee was to realize the rents and profits of the villages of the khas bhandar as well as those held by the elakadars under jagirs granted by the grantor.

On a construction of the terms of the deed, therefore, it seems clear that there was nothing in it to indicate that the grant was of the sub-soil or mineral rights. It was a grant of rents and profits of the villages included in Pargana Tori. The grant was a "putra pautradi" grant and such grants mean that the grantee's male descendants in direct line were to hold the Pargana, and that in the event of failure of male descendants in the direct male line the properties were to revert to the grantor. If reversion be left in the grantor, then in the absence of express grant minerals remain with the grantor. The defendants' evidence shows that at the time of making the maintenance grants in the family calculation is made on the basis of the income derivable from the property granted, and the object of the grant is to secure to the grantee sufficient income in order to enable him to maintain himself in accordance with his dignity and this, it appears, is the case even when grants are made to the third and succeeding sons of the Maharaja. At the time the grant was made it was never in contemplation of the grantor to grant the minerals. The generality of the terms used cannot be held to include the corpus in the grant because it gives the grantee only the right to the usufruct and no power is given to him to consume the property itself and the general enumeration must be taken to be ejusdem generis. The word "sab sudha" appears to have the same meaning as the word "hak-hakuk" which was construed by the Privy Council in Girdhari Singh v. Megh Lal Pandey (10), as not to increase the actual corpus of the subject affected by the grant. Having regard, therefore, to the plain meaning of the terms used in the document, I am unable to say that the grant included the minerals or sub-soil rights.

I may here refer to the contention of the appellant to the effect that the grant is really, a lease, and as such the minerals could not pass. In this connection I am disposed to agree with the learned Subordinate Judge that the deed Ex. 8 cannot be held to be a lease. It is not a transfer for a certain time express or implied or in perpetuity. It is contended on behalf of the appellant that the grant was of a tenure and the relationship between the parties is that of a landlord and tenant, and reference was made to three suits for rent instituted by the plaintiff against the defendant No. 1 for rent under the provisions of s. 139 (3) of the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act (VI of 1908 B. C.).

Exhibit 3 is a plaint of a suit for rent against the defendant No. 1 where the rent is claimed in respect of a tenure or jagir in lieu of services for 1970, 1971 and 1972 Sambat. Exhibit 7 is a written statement in that suit, Ex. 4 is the judgment, and Ex. 5 is the decree in that suit. It is argued that in the written statement (Ex. 7) there was no denial of the relationship of landlord and tenant between the parties, or that the suit was not one under s. 139 of the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act. Exhibit 4 (a) is a judgment in another rent suit for the years 1974-76 Sambat. Exhibit 4 (b) is the judgment in a third rent suit. Now, these documents do not go to establish that the deed Ex. 8 was a lease. Section 139 of the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act applies not only to cases of rents properly so-called but also to dues which are recoverable as if they were rents. These suits do not go to establish that the relationship between the parties was that of landlord and tenant and that the defendant No. 1 was holding as a lessee under the plaintiff. It was contended that it was a lease in perpetuity subject to a condition of reversion in the case of failure of male issue. In my opinion, having regard to the terms of the document, it cannot be considered to be a lease in perpetuity. Reference may in this connection be made to the decision of Sir Lawrence Jenkins in the Municipal Corporation of Bombay v. Secretary of State for India (17). I would, therefore, hold that there is no substance in the contention of the appellant that the deed was really a lease. It is a khorphosh grant for a term which is not certain and not a grant in perpetuity.

The learned Subordinate Judge has held that the words used in the deed are ambiguous, and in order to ascertain the intention of the grantor he has considered the circumstances existing at the time the deed was executed and the subsequent conduct of the parties. Mr. Pugh on behalf of the respondent No. 1 has also referred to those circumstances and to the subsequent conduct of the parties. Reliance has been placed by the learned Subordinate Judge upon the fact that the Chota Nagpur Raj forms an impartible estate and the succession thereto is governed by the rule of primogeniture and that no females are entitled to succeed. It is the common case of the parties that according to the custom of the family grants for maintenance of portions of the estate are made either by the Maharaja in his lifetime to his sons, or if no grant is made to the sons by the reigning Maharaja then after his death the eldest son who succeeds to the Raj makes grants of maintenance to his younger brothers. It appears from the evidence that the eldest son of the Maharaja succeeds to the Raj. His second son is called the Kuar, the third son is called the Thakur and other younger sons are called Lals. The eldest son who succeeds to the Raj has the Rajgi gaddi assigned to him. The second and the third sons also appear to have gaddis in this Raj which are called the Kuarkari gaddi and the Thakurai gaddi. It is the case of the defendants that the properties given as maintenance to the second and to the third sons are really portions of the original estate which are severed from the Raj and allotted to the second and the third sons as appertaining to their respective gaddis, and that the maintenance grant is not a grant of the rents and profits of the villages only but it is a complete severance or partition of the villages from the Raj and they belong to the gaddis of the second and the third sons and that the occupiers for the time being of the Kuarkari and the Thakurai gaddis are absolute proprietors of the villages comprised in the grant in the same way as the Maharaja for the time being is the proprietor of the main estate assigned to the Rajgi gaddi. Mr. Pugh contends that such grants to the Kuar and to the Thakur really amount to a partition of the joint family estate under a peculiar custom of the Chota Nagpur Raj family, and that although the Chota Nagpur Raj itself is impartible, yet by custom there is a partition so far as the maintenance grants are concerned. The rules of succession to the Rajgi gaddi and to the Kuarkari and the Thakurai gaddis are the same, i. e., the rule of primogeniture and the exclusion of females applies to all the three gaddis. Reference was made to the deposition of the plaintiff given in a previous suit, a certified copy whereof has been admitted in evidence and marked as Ex. A-(1) and printed at page 58 of Part III of the record, where the Maharaja admits that there are three gaddis in his family, viz., the Maharaja gaddi, the Kuarkari gaddi and the Thakurai gaddi, and that the occupiers for the time being of these gaddis are the maliks of their respective gaddis. Reference was also made to the fact that the Tori Pargana which was granted to the defendant No. 1 was itself a separate Raj at one time subordinate to the Chota Nagpur Raj and it was resumed by the Maharaja sometime in the year 1819 and then re-granted to the defendant No. 1 who holds a very dignified position, is himself the holder of a gaddi and enjoys the privilege of danka and nishan as it appears from the evidence in the case. The history of the Tori Pargana is given in the Final Report of the Survey and Settlement Operations in the District of Palamau by Mr. T. W. Bridge at page 47, para. 19 and the subsequent pages of the report. It is contended that it is not a grant to a petty tenure-holder but the grant of a Pargana which was a Raj in itself, and that, therefore, the grant was an absolute grant conveying the proprietary interests including the sub-soil and the mineral rights in the villages. The Todi Pargana consists of a large number of villages having an area of 665 square miles. Mr. Pugh's contention is that it is settled law that the members of the family of an impartible Raj are governed by the Mitakshara Law as regards succession, that they are members of a joint Hindu family and the succession is governed by the rules of succession obtaining in joint Hindu families, the only difference being that according to the particular custom of the Raj only one member of the family succeeds to the Raj and the others get maintenance allowance, but argues Mr. Pugh, that the maintenance allowance to the junior members of the family in this particular Raj always consists of portions of the estate, and that by such grant the portions allotted are really severed from the parent estate and made over to the junior members of the family, and this rule amounts to a partition of the joint family according to the peculiar custom in the family. The grants are always putra putradi grants and revert to the Raj on the failure of male descendants of the grantee, but this reversion is not really a reversion to the grantor in the true sense of the term but the grantor takes the estate on the failure of the male line of the grantee by right of survivorship in the same way as on the death of the Maharaja for the time being the eldest son of the Maharaja takes it by survivorship according to the rules governing Mitakshara joint Hindu families. Mr. Pugh distinguishes the case of khorphosh grants from the ordinary mukarrari grants in Chota Nagpur and the adjoining estate of Ramgarh, and contends that such grants have no resemblances to thika or mukarrari grants.

Reference is made by Mr. Pugh to the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Bajinath Prasad Singh v. Tej Bali Singh (14). In this case Lord Dunedin reviewed almost all the cases dealing with the subject of succession to impartible estates, and on a review of the cases beginning with the Shivagunga's case (15) which was decided in the year 1863 and ending with the case of Rajah Rup Singh v. Rani Baisni (18) which was decided in the year 1884, his Lordship observed that up to this point the law was all one way and affirmed these propositions:—

(1) The fact that a Raj is impartible does not make it separate or self-acquired property.

(2) A Raj, though impartible, may in fact be self-acquired or it may be family property of a joint undivided family.

(3) If it is the latter, succession will be regulated according to the rule which obtains in an undivided joint family, so far as the selection of the person entitled to succeed is concerned, i. e., the person will be designated by survivorship, although then, according to the custom of impartibility, he will hold the Raj without the others sharing it.

His Lordship then referred to the case of Sartaj Kuari v. Deoraj Kuari (1) which was decided in the year 1888. The question raised in this case was as to whether the holder of an impartible Raj could alienate the properties appertaining to the Raj even when there were no purposes of legal necessity, and it was held that he had the power to alienate. This finding was based on the principle that there was no such co-parcenary in an estate impartible by custom, as, under the law of the Mitakshara governing the descent of ordinary property, attaches to a son on his birth. His Lordship then refers to Rama Krishna Rao v. Court of Wards (18) 7 A. 1; 11 I. A. 149; A. W. N. (1884) 246; 4 Sar. P. O. J. 533; 3 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 902 (P. O.).

[The First Pittapur case] (19) and to the [The Second Pittapur case] (16) and to the other cases subsequent to Sartaj Kuari's case (1) and the conclusion come to was that the zemindari being the ancestral property of the joint family, though impartible, the successor falls to be designated according to the ordinary rule of the Mitakshara Law, and that the respondent in that case being the person who in a joint family would, being the eldest of the senior branch, be the head of the family is the person designated in the impartible Raj to occupy the gaddi.

The contention of Mr. Pugh is that what has been laid down by the Privy Council in the case of Bajinath Prasad Singh v. Tej Bali Singh (14) is that the members of the family of the Maharaja for the time being of an impartible Raj are members of a joint Hindu family, unless there is a separation and partition amongst them, and that the maintenance grants of the nature with which we are concerned in the present case are really allotments of a portion of the estate to the members of the joint family, and that they are absolute conveyances which revert to the Raj not by right of reversion but by right of survivorship as in an ordinary Hindu family.

The argument is ingenious; but, in my opinion, there is no substance in it. It is true that the members of the family of an impartible Raj are governed by the rules of a joint Hindu family, but such rules apply only for the purposes of succession and there is no co-parcenary in an impartible estate such as exists in ordinary Mitakshara families and there is no such co-ownership as to entitle the junior members of the Raj to demand a portion of the estate by partition, as appears to be laid down in Sartaj Kuari's case (1) and as was held by the Calcutta High Court in Protap Chandra Deo v. Jagdish Chandra Deo [Dalbhumi's case (20)]. Lord Dunedin referring to Sartaj Kuari's case (1) observed as follows: "Even, however, if their Lordships thought the decision in Sartaj Kuari's case (1) wrong—an opinion which they do not pronounce—the case has stood too long to be now touched."

The rule of law laid down in Sartaj Kuari's case (1) must be considered to be good law even now; and if Sartaj Kuari's case (1) lays down the correct law then it is clear that in impartible estate there is no real co-ownership in the proper sense amongst the members of the family of the holder of an impartible Raj and in determining the question of succession the right of survivorship is to be presumed, but only for the purposes of succession and for nothing else. The principle of Sartaj Kuari's case (1) was applied to Wills in The First Pittapur's case (19). In Tara Kumari v. Chaturbhuj Singh [Telwa's case] (21) it was found that there had been a complete separation and that, therefore, the widow of the last holder was entitled to succeed to the estate in priority to the next male reversioner. Towards the end of the judgment in that case Sir John Edge observed that the learned Judges of the High Court had overlooked the fact that Bhupat Narayan Singh and his son, who were the junior members of the family, had no co-parcenary rights in the impartible estate and no rights in that estate which entitled them or either of them to a partition of the impartible estate. They could not have prevented Thakur Ranjit Narayan Singh, the holder of the impartible estate, from alienating that estate in such a way as to determine any contingent interest they had in it under the custom, and that their contingent interest under the custom was liable to be defeated by an alienation of the estate of Thakur Ranjit Narayan Singh even if the family had remained joint. I am of opinion that in an impartible Raj the junior members of the family have not the ordinary co-parcenary rights which members of a joint Hindu family have; and the grant of maintenance by the holder of the Raj to the junior members of the Raj cannot and does not amount to a partition and such grants do not by themselves amount to a conveyance of full proprietary rights including rights to minerals and sub-soil rights.

Sir Binode Mitter on behalf of the appellant points out that the contention of Mr. Pugh that on the failure of male descendants in the line of the grantee the holder of the Raj takes the property by survivorship is fallacious, because if there is a separation in the Maharaja for the time being could it take the property by survivorship. If the grantee sells the properties given to him to a stranger then in the case of failure in the main line the Maharaja cannot be held to take it by survivorship but he takes it only in exercise of his right of reversion. If the Maharaja for the time being transfers the entire Raj the transferee could not enforce the right of survivorship but takes it only by right of reversion. The contention of Mr. Pugh must, therefore, fail.

The learned Subordinate Judge observes that the circumstances existing at the time the deed of February, 1867, was executed and the subsequent conduct of the parties go to show that what was granted was an absolute estate and that the sub-soil and the minerals also passed. The circumstances referred to by the learned Subordinate Judge are that there is evidence of a custom in the family that the Maharaja for the time being makes grants to his sons or brothers of portions of the estate for their maintenance, and that this custom is capable of being enforced by arbitration, and, if necessary, by suit. This circumstance does not lend support to the contention that the grants of maintenance include the sub-soil rights in the properties granted. On the other hand the evidence is that an account is taken of the rents and profits of the properties proposed to be granted, and that the extent of the properties granted is such that the income thereof may be sufficient for the maintenance of the grantee. No doubt there is evidence of the fact that there are three gaddis in the Chota Nagpur Raj and that the plaintiff in his evidence in a previous suit (Ex. A-1) has stated that the holders of the Kuarkari and the Thakurai gaddis are the maliks of the properties granted to them; but this to my mind does not take the case further. The evidence on the record is not sufficient to establish a custom that the grants to the holders of these gaddis are absolute grants, and the term "malik" by itself does not indicate that an absolute interest, including the sub-soil rights, is granted to the holders of these gaddis. It is true that the grants are not mere life grants but devolve upon successive male heirs in the main line of the grantees; but this contention also does not go to show that the intention of the grantor was to grant more than the right to enjoy the usufruct of the properties granted. No doubt, the properties granted can be transferred to strangers, but they can do so only so long as the male line of the grantee continues, and on extinction of male line the property reverts to the grantor. The learned Subordinate Judge has held that the estate created by grants like these are peculiar to the family, being the offspring of immemorial custom, and such estates created by such grants are unknown to and not recognized by the ordinary Hindu Law and that they are peculiar estates similar to estates tail of the English Law. The circumstances set forth above, either singly or taken together, do not lend support to the contention that grants such as the one now under consideration pass the mines and minerals in the properties granted.

The other circumstance referred to by the Subordinate Judge as existing at the time of the grant is the fact disclosed by the plaint (Ex. E-1) and the judgment (Ex. F-1) of the suit brought by Opendra Nath Sahi Deo against Rani Luchun Kower and Rani Komal Kower, the widows of the late Maharaja and the mothers of the plaintiffs and the defendant No. 1, respectively. In the first place the judgment (Ex. F-1) is not legal evidence as regards the circumstances alleged to exist at the time of grant. This judgment was admittedly set aside on appeal and a copy of the judgment of the Court of Appeal has not been produced. Moreover, the judgment is of a date subsequent to the date of the grant in question in the present suit and it is not evidence of circumstances contemporaneous with the execution of the deed. There is no evidence that at the time of the grant there was any litigation which would induce the then Maharaja to have recourse to proceedings which would amount to an absolute transfer of a portion of the estate. If this was the intention of the Maharaja in making the grant such intention could have been expressed and given effect to in a much more definite and conclusive manner than the method adopted by the Maharaja in making the grant under the deed (Ex-8). The oral evidence of the circumstances referred to by the learned Subordinate Judge existing at the time of the grant is not such as to enable one to hold that the father of the plaintiff and the defendant No. 1 intended to make provision for the defendant No. 1 and through him for the plaintiff also in case Burra Lal Opendra Nath Sahi Deo succeeded in wresting the Raj from him, and that the object of the grant was that the Maharaja intended to convey full rights thereby to the grantee.

As regards the subsequent conduct of the parties the evidence to my mind is not such as to lead to the conclusion that the intention of the parties to the grant was that full rights, including sub-soil rights, did pass. The letter Ex. D-1 (c) of the Deputy Commissioner to the Manager of the Chota Nagpur Estate and letter Ex. D-1 (d) from the Deputy Commissioner to the defendant No. 1 do not in any way refer to the minerals. It appears that the estate of the plaintiff as well as that of the defendant No. 1 were under the Court of Wards and that the direction given in the letter Ex. D-1 (c) was merely a direction as regards the management of the respective estates. There is nothing in these letters to indicate any conduct of the parties which would go to show that the minerals passed to the defendant No. 1. Moreover, any admission made by the Deputy Commissioner as representing the Court of Wards would not be binding upon the plaintiff. Furthermore, although evidence of subsequent conduct of the grantor or the grantee can in certain cases be taken into account in order to find the intention of the grantor and the grantee, the conduct of other persons is of no value for this purpose.

Reference is then made to the conduct of the defendant No. 1 and the plaintiff in connection with the grants of certain prospecting licenses. Exhibit B (1) is a thika patta, dated the 10th of November, 1890, granted by the defendant No. 1 to one Max Anderson. Under this deed Max Anderson was granted the right to prospect and search for metals and minerals and precious stones of every description in and under the surface of all the lands in Pargana Tori. The defendant No. 1 in this deed claimed to be the sole and absolute owner of the Pargana Tori and of all rights to minerals or metals therein. Exhibit B-1/1 is another patta of the same date by the defendant No. 1 to

Max Anderson in respect of rights to metals, ores, minerals and precious stones in two villages of Pargana Tori. Three years later in the year 1893 the term of the previous lease in favour of Max Anderson was extended. Exhibit B-1/2, dated the 10th March, 1893, is an agreement between the defendant No. 1 and Max Anderson to extend the term. This deed bears the seal of the plaintiff, and, although the executant of the deed is the defendant No. 1 alone, towards the end of the deed it is stated that he undertakes and agrees to execute and register further pattas for the purpose of extension of time as provided for in the previous portion of the deed and to have it sealed and delivered to the said Max Anderson by the defendant No. 1 as well as by Maharaja Uday Pratap Nath Sahi Deo, the plaintiff. The next document is Ex. 10 of the same date (10th of March, 1893) as the agreement Ex. B-1/2. This purports to be an instrument of release and confirmation by the plaintiff in favour of Max Anderson. In this document there is a recital of the fact that an agreement had been executed on the 5th February, 1893, whereby it had been mutually agreed between Kumar Jagat Mohan Nath Sahi Deo, the defendant No. 1, and the Maharaja, plaintiff, that from the date of the said agreement each of them shall equally enjoy all profits and benefits to be derived from the produce of any mines or minerals in the said Pargana Tori or the sale price, or rent or other benefit thereof. The Maharaja, plaintiff, in this document also asserts that although the thika patta of 1890 had been executed by the defendant No. 1 in favour of Max Anderson yet the Maharaja, plaintiff, claimed that all rights to minerals and metals lying in and under all the lands comprised within the Raj or estate of Chota Nagpur including the said Pargana of Tori belong to him as the Maharaja of the said Raj or estate, and that he (the Maharaja) had the right to resume the said Pargana Tori free of all encumbrances in the event of the failure of heirs male of Kumar Jagat Mohan Nath Sahi Deo, the defendant No. 1. The Maharaja by this document purported to release in favour of Max Anderson all rights whatsoever that he may have to the metals and minerals in Pargana Tori and to release and relinquish all claims to demands of rents or royalties in respect of such metals and minerals.

during the term or period of the thika pattas granted by the defendant No. 1. Now, these documents, to my mind, do not constitute evidence of conduct of parties which would go to show that the parties themselves understood that the sub-soil rights and minerals in Pargana Tori passed to the defendant No. 1 under the grant of February, 1867. The two pattas of 1890, no doubt, show an assertion of title to the mines and minerals by the defendant No. 1; but in the document of 1893 (Ex. 10) we have a clear assertion by the plaintiff that he claimed all the sub-soil rights in Pargana Tori. The agreement of the 5th of February, 1893 referred to in Ex. 10 has not been produced and neither party, relies upon it, and it is not possible to say what the nature of the agreement between the parties actually was. It might be that it referred only to the term of the lease granted to Max Anderson. In my opinion the acting of the parties evidenced by the deeds of 1890 and 1893 gives us no assistance in construing the deed of 1867. The lease granted to Max Anderson, however, was not operative and Max Anderson did not work any mines under the lease.

The next set of documents showing the conduct of parties consists of certain pattas and maintenance grants made by the plaintiff. Exhibit C—1/2 is a patta, dated the 24th April, 1891, executed by the plaintiff in favour of Srimati Kuarani Alakh Manjari Koeri, the wife of the defendant No. 1. By this deed the plaintiff granted one mauza to the lady as jagir descendible to children and the mines in the said mauza were expressly excluded. Exhibit G (1) is an indenture made on the 5th of April, 1916, between the Maharaja, plaintiff, and his son Jagat Kishore Nath Sahi Deo. It appears that certain properties had previously been granted by the Maharaja, plaintiff, to his said son by way of maintenance but the income of all those properties was not found to be sufficient and there was a dispute between the parties as regards the amount of income of the villages given as maintenance. The matter appears to have been referred to the Raja of Saraikala, who is the father-in-law of the plaintiff, who made an arbitration between the parties and under this arbitration the plaintiff granted certain other villages to make up the deficiency. This indenture (Ex. 1) evidenced this fact and it acknowledged that the son got certain villages to make up the deficiency in the maintenance grant. In this document there is nothing to show that the mines were excluded as was expressly done in the patta Ex. C—1/2 granted by the plaintiff to the wife of the defendant No. 1. Exhibit O (1) is a khorphosh grant, dated the 13th June, 1917, by the plaintiff to another son of his named Gopeshwar Nath Sahi Deo. In this deed also there is no reservation as regards the mines. Exhibit H (1), dated the 13th June, 1917, is another patta by the Maharaja, plaintiff, to another son of his named Aseswar Nath Sahi Deo granting him certain villages by way of maintenance. Here also the mines, etc., were not excluded. Exhibit C—1/3 is a patta by the defendant No. 1 to Braj Kishore Nath Sahi Deo, one of the sons of the plaintiff. In this document the defendant No. 1 made a grant of Mauza Murpa to the plaintiff's son including mines of all kinds existing in the village. The last document is Ex. C—1/1 a patta, dated the 22nd April, 1921, granted by the plaintiff in favour of his son Gopeshwar Nath Sahi Deo. The son had purchased certain villages which had previously been granted in jagir to certain persons. By this document the plaintiff granted to his said son one of the mauzas purchased by him as jagir descendible to children, and in this document mines of all kinds have been excluded. The argument based on behalf of the respondent upon these documents is that although mines were excluded in the document Ex. C—1/2 granted in favour of the wife of the defendant No. 1, there is no such express reservation of the mines in the maintenance grants executed by the plaintiff in favour of his sons, and that when there was an intention to exclude the mines such intention was expressly expressed in those documents. In the first place these documents are of no help to us in construing the deed of 1867. In the next place we find that in 1890 the defendant No. 1 in his lease to Max Anderson had already made an assertion of title to the mines and minerals, and there is no wonder that when the plaintiff executed the document, Ex. C—1/2, in favour of the wife of the defendant No. 1 on the 24th of April, 1891, he expressly excluded the mines from the patta. The documents G(1), C(1), H(1) and C—1/1 came into existence in the years 1916, 1917 and 1921 respectively after there was some sort of agreement come to between the plaintiff and the defendant No. 1 as evidenced by the release (Ex. 10), dated the 10th March, 1893. In any event, the mere fact of no mention being made as regards the mines, either excluding the same or granting the same, in some of the documents executed by the plaintiff and mention thereof being made in others after the question had become prominent is not sufficient to enable us to construe the deed of 1867 and to hold that the minerals and sub-soil rights passed to the defendant No. 1 under the grant (Ex. 8).

As regards the custom pleaded by the defendant No. 1 the evidence is not sufficient to prove the same. The defendant's witness No. 2, who is the fourth son of the plaintiff, says nothing about the custom in his examination-in-chief. In his cross-examination he admits that the khorphosh grants made to him and to the other junior members of the family are of the same character as the grants made to the Kuar and to the Thakur. He further states that there is no difference in the rights possessed in the khorphosh grants by the first three sons and by the junior sons. It follows, therefore, that the fact of the existence of the three gaddis makes no difference in the character of the grant made to the holders of the Kuarkari and the Thakurai gaddis and to the other junior members of the family. This witness further admits that the assignment of khorphosh properties to the first three sons does not amount to a partition of the Raj. Defendant's witness No. 3 is the third son of the Maharaja, plaintiff. He too does not prove the custom. He states that at the time of making the grants calculation is made on the basis of the income derivable from the Pargana concerned. His deposition shows that up till now no mines in Chota Nagpur have been worked to his knowledge, and excepting Ohhote Lal none of the khorphoshdars under the Raj has yet worked any mines in their respective villages (by Ohhote Lal he means the second witness for the defendant). The fourth witness for the defendant is the holder of an estate granted in khorphosh by one of the ancestors of the present Maharaja. This grant was made long before the Permanent Settlement and the deed is not forthcoming. He states that 40 or 50 years ago some iron mines used to be worked in the Pargana granted to him, but his cross-examination shows that this statement is not supported by any reliable evidence. The next witness is the defendant No. 1 himself. His evidence also does not prove the custom alleged. He, no doubt, asserts that coal and other minerals have been extracted from several mauzas comprised in Pargana Tori granted to him but he is unable to produce any satisfactory evidence, such as the account papers or to call witnesses who worked the mines. The instances he gives are not instances sufficient to prove the working. As regards Max Anderson, we have seen that the Maharaja in confirming the grant made to him by the defendant No. 1 distinctly asserted his claim to the minerals. As regards Sarkar Barnard and Company, it appears that they advanced money on mortgage of defendant No. 1's wife's property and not on a prospecting license granted by the defendant No. 1 to them and that, therefore, this is no evidence as regards the working of the mines. Moreover, even if there was working of the mines by the defendant No. 1 there is nothing to show that this was done with the knowledge of the plaintiff. I am of opinion that the evidence on the record is not sufficient to prove the custom alleged by the defendant No. 1.

The learned Subordinate Judge then observes that the estate granted to the defendant No. 1 resembles estates-tail of the English Law, and that, as the ordinary Hindu Law does not recognize an estate such as that created by the grant under consideration, and as no light can be had in the matter from the provisions of the Hindu Law, and as in all cases for which no specific statutory directions are to be found in the Indian Law, the Courts are to act according to justice, equity and good conscience, and as the principles of justice, equity and good conscience applicable in such circumstances should be identical with the corresponding relevant rules of the Common Law of England and as the nearest approach to the estate created by the grant under consideration is to be found in the estate known as an estate-tail male in the Common Law of England, he proceeds to examine the nature of such an estate under the Common Law of England and to hold that as estates-tail male in England carry the right to work mines and quarries beneath and within the lands, the grant under consideration also included the right to the mines and the sub-soil rights in the villages comprised in Pargana Tori. In this connection I need only observe that it is not safe to apply the principles of the Common Law of England to the grant under consideration. As was observed by Jenkins, J., in Kally Dass Ahiri v. Manmohini Dassee (22) to draw an analogy from the English Law of real property is wholly misleading. There is a fundamental difference between the land tenures in England and India and peculiarities of the feudal system of England are not to be found in India. I would, therefore, not base any decision on the point under consideration on a reference to the law of real property of England.

It has been contended on behalf of the appellant that the decisions of the Privy Council as well as of the High Courts in India show conclusively that the defendant No. 1 cannot under the grant of 1867 claim any right to the mines and minerals in Pargana Tori; and reference has been made to Tituram Mukerji v. Cohen (2), Hari Narayan Singh v. Sri Ram Chakravarti (3), Jyoti Prasad Singh v. Lachipur Coal Co. (4), Durga Prasad Singh v. Braja Nath Bose (5), Biswa Nath Gorai v. Surendra Mohan Ghose (6), Christian v. Tekaitni Narbada Koeri (7), Kunja Behari Seal v. Raja Durga Prasad Singh (8), Sashi Bhushan Misra v. Jyoti Prasad Singh Deo (9), Girdhari Singh v. Megh Lal Pandey (10), Raghunath Roy Marwari v. Raja of Jheria (12), and Secretary of State for India v. Srinivasa Chariar (13). Most of these cases have been considered by the learned Subordinate Judge. These cases mostly relate to mukarrari grants of debottar or brahmottar grants. In Tituram Mukerji v. Cohen (2) the grant itself was not available, but from the circumstances appearing from the evidence it was taken to be a life grant. In Hari Narayan Singh v. Sri Ram Chakravarti (3) the grant was to an idol. In this case also the deed was not produced. In Jyoti Prasad Singh v. Lachipur Coal Co. (4), the grant was of a permanent lease and the deed was not produced. It was to a stranger and not to a member of the family. In Durga Prasad Singh v. Broja Nath Bose (5) the grant was a dighwari grant and made to a stranger. The judgment of the High Court which went up in appeal to the Privy Council is reported as Brojonath Bose v. Durga Prasad Singh (23), and Hari Narayan Singh v. Sri Ram Chakravarti (3) was followed. In Biswa Nath

Gorai v. Surendra Mohan Ghose (6) the case was of a khorphosh grant to a junior member of the family, and in this case it appears the question was raised as to whether the sub-soil rights passed. In Christian v. Tekaitni Narbada Koeri (7) the grant was a maintenance grant to a widow for life. In Kunja Behari Seal v. Raja Durga Prasad Singh (8), the grant was a moglai brahmottar grant. In all these cases it was held that the sub-soil and mineral rights did not pass. In Sashi Bhushan Misra v. Jyoti Prasad Singh Deo (9) the Lord Chancellor after considering some of the cases referred to above observed as follows:

"These decisions, therefore, have laid down a principle, which applies to and concludes the present dispute. They establish that when a grant is made by a zemindar of a tenure at a fixed rent, although the tenure may be permanent, heritable and transferable, minerals will not be held to have formed part of the grant in the absence of express evidence to that effect."

In this case the Lord Chancellor further observed that in considering the question raised in the appeal, viz., as to whether the mukarrari grant in that case carried with it the mineral rights in the soil it is important to avoid giving the words used in connection with legal transactions in India a special and technical meaning that they possess in England, and the meaning of the word "grant" was not the same in India as in England. The grant which was under consideration by the Privy Council in Girdhari Singh v. Megh Lal Pandey (10) is set out in the judgment of the High Court [Brojonath Bose v. Durga Prasad Singh (23)]. It was the case of a mukarrari lease and the expression "mai hak hakuk" was used in the lease, and it was held that unless there be by the terms of the lease an express or plainly implied grant of mineral rights they remain reserved to the zemindar, there being no evidence of his having parted with them. The word "sub sudha" in the document under consideration in the present case has the same significance as the word "hak-hakuk" in the case before their Lordships of the Privy Council in Girdhari Singh v. Megh Lal Pandey (10). The grant under consideration was produced in Raghunath Roy Marwari v. Raja of Jheria (12). The terms were:

"I hereby grant you rent-free brahmottar land in Mauza Qhandkuia in Pargana Jharla

(23) 34 C. 753; 5 C. L. J. 523; 12 C. W. N. 193.

You should enjoy it comfortably by cultivating and by getting the same cultivated by others and to bless me. Hence, this patta is granted to you."

In the present case also there is a direction to realise rents and profits from the elakadars and to enjoy the income. It was held by their Lordships in the Privy Council that where a zemindar grants a tenure of lands within his zemindari and it does not clearly appear by the terms of the grant that a right to the minerals beneath the soil is included the minerals do not pass to the grantee, and that this principle applies as well to rent-free grants as to grants of tenures at fixed rents. In Secretary of State for India v. Srinivasa Chariar (13) the grant under consideration was an "inam" grant by the Government which existed prior to the British Government to a Brahmin and the grantee was to appropriate to his use the produce of the seasons of each year, the grantee in return being expected to be assiduous in offering up prayers for the lasting prosperity of the Empire. It was held that it was not a complete transfer and that the grantee had not the power to consume the subject-matter of the grant by quarrying operations. These cases, therefore, hold that unless there is an express or implied grant of the minerals such grants which formed the subject-matter of consideration in those cases did not pass the minerals. It is noticeable that none of the cases cited is a case of a khorporosh grant similar to the one under consideration, except perhaps the case of Biswanath Gorai v. Surendra Mohan Ghose (6) but there the fact that the khorporoshdars did not possess the sub-soil rights was conceded by all the parties other than defendants Nos. 1 and 2 and they did not very strenuously contest the point. The authorities, therefore, do only go to the extent of showing that it is settled that in mukarrari grants or in grants for life or in debottar or brahmottar grants minerals do not pass without an express provision to that effect. To my mind they are not conclusive so far as the question in the present case is concerned and, as I have observed, with the exception of the case of Biswanath Gorai v. Surendra Mohan Ghose (6) no other case has been cited which deals precisely with the point raised in the present case.

In Satya Niranjan Chakravarti v. Ram

Lal Kaviraj (24) which was a case which went up to the Privy Council from a decision of a Division Bench of this Court, the question turned on the interpretation of a patni lease and on a construction of the lease which contained the words "adha" and "urdha" it was held that the sub-soil rights passed. The High Court had held that patni leases stand on the same footing as mukarrari tenures. Their Lordships of the Privy Council, however, considered the cases which have been cited in the present case and observed that not one of these was a tenure of a patni taluq in the hands of a patnidar and their Lordships were of opinion that the question as to whether patni leases did convey mineral rights was still open and they expressed no opinion on that point. Similarly, the authorities cited in the present case if they do not apply to patni leases they cannot be said to apply to khorporosh grants of the nature we are now concerned with. I would, therefore, hold that the authorities cited, except Biswanath Gorai's case (6), do not directly apply to the present case. On a construction of the deed itself, however, and on the evidence in the case I am of opinion that there was no intention to pass the minerals and the defendant No. 1 did not acquire the right to the minerals under the grant.

On the question as to whether the plaintiff abandoned or relinquished his rights, if any, to the mines and minerals in Pargana Tori, the argument is based upon Ex. B-1/2 and Ex. 10. I have already considered these documents and I am of opinion that it cannot be said that the plaintiff did abandon or relinquish his rights. All that can be said was that the plaintiff agreed to confirm the grant made by the defendant No. 1 to Max Anderson and it related only to the term of the grant to Max Anderson. Max Anderson, however, did not work the mines under the grant and the matter was dropped. There is a clear assertion of title made by the plaintiff in Ex. 10.

The next question is the question of limitation. The Article applicable is Art. 120 of Sch. I to the Indian Limitation Act, and the period of limitation is six years from the time when the right to sue accrues.

It is contended on behalf of the defendant that the right to sue for a declaratory decree and injunction accrued to the plaintiff in 1884, and for this purpose reliance is placed upon the deposition of the defendant No. 1 where he states that when he attained majority in 1884 he commenced working the mines. On the other hand, the cause of action alleged by the plaintiff is the grant of the prospecting license by the defendant No. 1 to the defendants Nos. 2 and 3, which is dated the 17th of May, 1921, and the suit was instituted in August, 1922. In my opinion the cause of action accrued to the plaintiff in 1921 and the suit is not barred by limitation. In the first place the evidence is not sufficient that the defendant No. 1 worked the mines in 1884, nor does it appear that if there was a working of the mines it was of such an open character as to be said that the plaintiff knew about it. In any event the cause of action is a recurring one, and unless it can be shown satisfactorily by evidence that the working of the mines by the defendant No. 1 was of such an open nature as to lead to a presumption that the plaintiff knew about it, or unless there is direct evidence of the fact that the plaintiff had knowledge of the working of the mines by the defendant No. 1 more than six years before they filed the suit, I am of opinion that the present suit cannot be said to be barred by limitation.

The only other point left for consideration is the one raised by the defendants Nos. 2 and 3 in their cross-objection. Issue No. 6 as originally framed was as to whether the estate bearing Tauzi No. 1 on the Revenue Roll of the Ranchi Collectorate, commonly known as the Chota Nagpur Raj, was a permanently settled estate and as to whether it had the legal status of such an estate; if not, has the plaintiff any right to bring the suit. The question raised by this issue arose upon the pleadings. Paragraphs 1—3 of the plaint did make an assertion that the estate commonly known as the Chota Nagpur Raj was a permanently settled estate. Paragraphs 9—11 of the written statement of the defendants Nos. 2 and 3 raised the question that the Chota Nagpur Raj is not a permanently settled estate. Upon the pleadings the issue raised did properly arise. It appears, however, that this issue was cancelled by the learned Subordinate Judge by his order No. 85 in the order-sheet, dated the 16th of June, 1925, the issue was cancelled as being irrelevant and unnecessary. This appears to have been done in the absence of the defendants Nos. 2 and 3. It appears from order No. 89, dated the 17th June, 1925, that the defendants Nos. 2 and 3 filed a petition praying that the original issue No. 6 which was cancelled the previous day might be restored. The learned Subordinate Judge rejected this application with the observation that it was admitted by the learned Vakil for these defendants that the villages making up Pargana Tori do appertain to Tauzi No. 1 of the Ranchi Collectorate as now constituted and that it was not disputed by the said defendants that Pargana Tori concerned in the present suit appertained to the Chota Nagpur Raj estate held by the plaintiff and that it was also not disputed that the defendant No. 1 claimed the said Pargana by virtue of a grant or lease from the last Maharaja as representing that estate. In view of these facts the learned Subordinate Judge was of opinion that the question of the nature of the estate held by the plaintiff did not arise for decision in the present case and he, therefore, did not see any reason why the original issue No. 6 should be restored. In my opinion it cannot be said that the learned Subordinate Judge was in error in striking out issue No. 6. It is argued that if the estate of the plaintiff is not a permanently settled estate the question did arise as to whether he had a right to the minerals in the Chota Nagpur Raj, and unless he proved his right to the minerals in the Chota Nagpur Raj it cannot be said that he was entitled to a declaration that he had the rights in the minerals in Pargana Tori. The defendants, however, have no title or possession. The defendant No. 1 did not dispute the title of the plaintiff apart from the grant of 1857, as in fact he could not do so inasmuch as he claimed title through the predecessor-in-title of the plaintiff. The defendants Nos. 2 and 3 who claim through the defendant No. 1 also cannot raise the question having no title by possession, and, in my opinion, there is no substance in the cross-objection.

In the result, therefore, I would allow this appeal and decree the suit with costs here and in the Court below and dismiss the cross-objection of the defendants Nos. 2 and 3.

Railways Act (IX of 1890); s. 113—Duty of passenger to produce ticket on demand—Failure to produce—Levy of penalty—Subsequent production of ticket—Passenger's right to refund—'With him', meaning of.

A passenger from whom excess fare and penalty are realised by a Railway Administration for failure to produce his ticket on demand is not entitled to a refund of the same on producing the ticket later on. [p. 421, col. 1.]

The words 'with him' in s. 113 of the Railways Act must be construed as meaning that the ticket is on the passenger's person, and under the said section it is the duty of a Railway passenger to have in his possession immediately available throughout the journey, the ticket which entitles him to travel. [ibid.]

Civil revision against a decree of the Judge, Small Cause Court, Nagpur, dated the 7th February, 1925

Mr. K. K. Gandhe, for the Applicant.

Mr. R. W. Date, for the Non-Applicant.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application by the defendant G. I. P. Railway Company for revision of the judgment and decree of the Judge, Small Cause Court, Nagpur, dated the 7th February, 1925, granting a decree for Rs. 21-10-0 in favour of the non-applicant Mahadeo against the said Railway Company. On the 11th May, 1924, the plaintiff with some 34 other people, who constituted a marriage party, had booked from Dhamangaon Railway Station to Nagpur. On arrival at the latter station one of his party was sent out with some 28 tickets and their holders to arrange for tongas in the station yard. The plaintiff meanwhile with 6 others came shortly afterwards to the gate, but he found to his utter surprise that he had not got the 7 tickets in question. He accordingly was charged with excess fare and penalty amounting to Rs. 21-10-0, and obtained a receipt therefor.

Plaintiff's case further was that he no sooner came out into the station yard than, on enquiry from his companions, he found the missing tickets and took them back to the Ticket Collector. The Ticket Collector, however, referred him to the proper authorities for a refund. Various applications therefor to the higher Railway Authorities were rejected.

The defendant Railway Company admitted the realization of the Railway fare and penalty in question and pleaded that, as the plaintiff had not the tickets in his possession when he passed out of the wicket gate, he has rightly been charged as above. It was further denied that the plaintiff non-applicant had returned with the tickets a few minutes later, but, in any event a plea was taken that, even if this were so, this circumstance would not derogate from the right of the Railway Company to have recovered the charges in question and to have refused a refund.

It is, first of all, necessary to determine whether the plaintiff a few minutes later returned with the missing tickets and offered them to the Ticket Collector as alleged. The plaintiff has given prima facie satisfactory evidence on the point and he is confirmed so far by the evidence of P. W. No. 2 Balkrishna, his companion. He (P. W. No. 2) had the tickets in his possession and he had gone in the station yard to procure tongas. Apart from letters from the Chief Traffic Manager and the like containing a denial that the Ticket Collector was shortly afterwards shown the missing tickets by the plaintiff non-applicant, the defendant Railway Company produced no evidence whatever on the point. It is obvious that the fact whether plaintiff did or did not produce the tickets within a few minutes after the original episode, may be an important one. On the question of fact involved, therefore, it is perfectly clear that the oral evidence of plaintiff and Balkrishna, in the absence of any rebutting evidence, establishes the fact that, some 10 minutes after he had to pay the penalties, etc., he returned with the tickets to the Ticket Collector, who in his turn referred the plaintiff to higher authorities for a refund.

The question I have to determine, therefore, is whether, in view of the terms of s. 113 of the Railways Act, the plaintiff is in the circumstances entitled to a refund of the Rs. 21-10-0 in question which was levied from him. Reliance has been placed in this connection on the decision in Hart v. Buskin (1), but that decision is somewhat inapposite in that therein ss. 17 and 31 of the Railways Act of 1879 were concerned whereas, in the present instance, the opposite provision of s. 113 of the Act of 1890 is concerned. In this connection it must be noted that the words "with him" occur in s. 113. These words did not occur in s. 31 of the Act of 1879. I think these words must be construed as meaning that the tickets are on the passenger's person. This avowedly the plaintiff-non-applicant did not have when he attempted to pass from the station premises. The provision of law in s. 113, is one of a very special nature, which was no doubt enacted by the Legislature in view of the difficulties which arise in practice with reference to persons travelling without tickets, and although the case is a somewhat hard one from the point of view of the non-applicant, I feel it my duty, although with regret, to decide that in the circumstances the amount was properly realized from the plaintiff-non applicant, and that the mere fact that he produced or was willing to produce the tickets later does not entitle him to a refund. The risks of fraud upon the Railway Company which arise if tickets were to be allowed to be produced subsequently are too obvious to require emphasis. In those circumstances I am of opinion that the Judge of the Small Cause Court erred in granting the plaintiff the decree he did.

It is important that passengers should realize, with reference to s. 113 of the Indian Railways Act, that they must have in their possession immediately available throughout the journey the tickets, which entitle them to travel. There is no room in the phraseology of the provision in question for a loose interpretation of its terms, and it has obviously been framed, as it has, with a view to preventing the enormous inconvenience and trouble which would otherwise arise in the matter of checking and collecting tickets from passengers by Railway.

The judgment and decree appealed against are accordingly reversed and the plaintiff's suit is dismissed. In the peculiar circumstances of the case, however, the plaintiff has undoubtedly a strong material grievance if not a legal one, and, in view of this fact, I order the parties to bear their own costs both in this Court and in the lower one. It seems to me that the Railway Company might well have made ex gratia without any sacrifice of principle a refund in the peculiar circumstances of the case if on inquiry it was found, as I believe was the case, that the non-applicant produced the tickets a few minutes later.

Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), s. 3—Standing "timber"—Karuvela and velvela trees.

Even if the term "timber" in s. 3, Transfer of Property Act, is taken to mean only such trees as are fit to be used in building and repairing houses, karuvela and velvela trees are "timber" as they are used for building purposes in the Southern Districts of the Madras Presidency.

Obiter.—The term "timber" in s. 3, Transfer of Property Act, cannot be limited to the class of trees the timber of which is used for building purposes. Krishnarao v. Babaji (1), disapproved.

Second appeal against the decree of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Sivaganga, dated the 9th February, 1924, in A. S. No. 18 of 1923, preferred against that of the Court of the District Munsif, Sivaganga, in O. S. No. 78 of 1921.

Mr. T. M. Krishnaswami Iyer, for the Appellants.

Mr. V. Ramaswami Iyer, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—Defendants Nos. 2 to 4 are the appellants in this case. The first contention of Mr. Krishnaswami Iyer for the appellant is that his clients are not liable for damages for breach of contract by the first defendant. The Subordinate Judge has not made the appellants liable for breach of contract by the first defendant but he has made them liable for the value of the number of cart loads of firewood removed by them.

The facts are:—The first defendant sold the trees standing on a piece of land to the plaintiff. Before the plaintiff could cut and remove the trees he seems to have interfered with his possession and defendants Nos. 2 to 4 joined the first defendant and cut and carried away the trees. The allegation that they purchased the trees from the first defendant without the knowledge of the sale to the plaintiff was found against. The simple question, therefore, is whether defendants Nos. 2 to 4 were justified in carrying away timber trees the property in which had already passed to the plaintiff. They, having cut and carried away the trees belonging to the plaintiff, are liable to the extent of the loss caused by them.

It is next urged by Mr. Krishnaswami Iyer that his clients carried away only 50 cart loads of wood and, therefore, they should not be made liable for anything more. The finding of both the Courts is that 300 cart loads were removed by defendants Nos. 2 to 4 as well as by the first defendant. They acted in concert and, therefore, they are liable to the amount of the firewood which was actually removed by them and by the first defendant. It is suggested by Mr. Krishnaswami Iyer that there is nothing to support the finding, but Mr. Rajah Iyer has drawn my attention to the evidence of P. W. No. 1 to the effect that the defendants removed 300 cart loads. The quantity of wood removed being found by both the Courts and there being evidence in support of the finding it cannot be interfered with in second appeal.

Another point was feebly raised by Mr. Krishnaswami Iyer, that the trees being immoveable property, there should have been a registered deed for the sale of them. The Transfer of Property Act specifically says that immoveable property does not include standing timber, growing crops or grass. Mr. Krishnaswami Iyer relies upon Krishna Rao v. Babaji (1), and contends that "by the term 'timber' is meant properly such trees only as are fit to be used in building and repairing houses." Granting that the decision Krishna Rao v. Babaji (1) lays down the correct meaning of the term 'timber', the trees sold to the plaintiff were karuvela trees the timber of which as is well known in Southern Districts is used for building purposes. I hold that karuvela and velvela trees are timber within the meaning of the decision in Krishna Rao v. Babaji (1). But with great respect to the learned Judges I do not think that the term 'timber' can be limited to the class of trees the timber of which is used for building purposes. In that case the learned Judges held that a mango tree did not come within the term 'standing timber' whatever may be the use to which mango wood is put in the Bombay Presidency, in Southern India mango planks are used not only for making doors and windows but also for making boxes, tables benches, etc.

The judgment of the Subordinate Judge is correct. The second appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Bengal Tenancy Act (VIII of 1885), ss. 30 (b), 153.—Enhancement of rent—Rise of price of staple food crops—Land not used for raising such crops—Rent, whether could be enhanced—Question of right to enhance—Second appeal.

No enhancement of rent can be claimed on the ground of rise in the price of staple food crops in respect of land which is used, with the acquiescence of the landlord, in such a way that food crops cannot be raised thereon.

In a suit for enhancement of rent, the plea that no enhancement could be decreed in respect of that portion of the land which is covered by trees and buildings, is a question relating to the right to enhance on which a second appeal lies.

Mr. Lakshmi Narayan Singh, for the Appellants.

Mr. H. B. Mukharji, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal by the defendant in a suit for enhancement of rent on the ground of rise in price of staple food crops. The defence was that the major portion of the land was covered by trees and a house and that consequently the rent was not enhanceable under s. 30, cl. (b) of the Bengal Tenancy Act. The learned Subordinate Judge, without coming to any finding as to whether there was a house on the land, held that because, the tenant paid a fixed rent for a certain land and the price of staple food crops had risen, therefore, he was bound to pay an enhanced rent whether he grew food crops on the land or not and whether he planted trees and raised a house.

It is contended that it is contrary to principle that enhancement on this ground should be allowed for land which is not producing or capable of producing food crops in its present state, a state which has been acquiesced by the landlord as is clear from the fact that he has brought this suit. In reply it is urged that no appeal lies under the provisions of s. 153.

It is argued that the only question at issue is the amount of the enhancement and not the right to enhance. In my opinion this is not a correct way of looking at the defence in this suit. The plea of the defendant is that as regards the land covered by trees and the house there is no right to enhance the rent and that is a question on which a second appeal must lie.

On the main question in the case there seems to be no authority, but it is, in my opinion, clear as a matter of principle that, on the ground that there is a rise in price of staple food crops, no enhancement can be claimed in respect of land which is used in such a way, with the acquiescence of the landlord, that food crops cannot be raised thereon.

The appeal must, therefore, be decreed and the appeal remanded to the District Judge for re-hearing. He must arrive at a finding as to whether there is a house on the land in suit and if so, what area is covered by the house and the trees. The decree for enhancement will be limited to the balance of the land.

Cost will abide the result.

Company Law—Failure of Company to pay debt—Bona fide dispute—Winding up of Company.

The mere failure on the part of a Company to comply with a demand for payment from one of its creditors does not entitle the creditor to come before the Court and ask as a matter of right for winding up of the Company.

Where there is a bona fide dispute as to the Company's liability to pay a debt, the creditor must be referred to a suit and cannot be allowed to force payment of the debt by invoking the assistance of the provisions of the Companies Act.

Application for winding up of the defendant Company.

Mr. A. C. Sampath Ayyangar, for the Petitioner.

JUDGMENT.—The petition for winding up is dismissed. The only ground seriously put forward is that there is a debt owing to the petitioner, the payment of which he has demanded and there has been a failure by the Company to comply with that demand within 21 days, the statutory period, and that entitles the petitioner to come before the Court and ask as a matter of right for the winding up of the Company. It is vague statement made in the petition about the Company being unable to pay its debts. That is not supported by a single figure or by any fact which will enable me to come to the conclusion that the Company is not able to pay beyond its failure to comply with the statutory demand. That is not sufficient. The Company in its affidavit puts forward the defence whilst submitting that the money is with it in fixed deposit that it is entitled to a claim against this money because under the Articles of Association and Rules of the Company, that money is deposited as security as it were for the conduct of the depositor, the Secretary in this case, and that where a Director has negligently recommended clients to the Bank, the Bank is entitled to claim against that Director any loss occasioned by such recommendation. This is denied by the petitioner but there is an issue with regard to that. I cannot say that there is no bona fide dispute as to the Company's liability to pay this debt. Courts will never allow creditors of a Company to invoke the assistance of the Companies Act for getting payment of their debt. If there is a genuine dispute with regard to the debt, then the creditors of the Company must be referred to a suit. In this case, the petitioner will be referred to a suit. As the Company admits having in its possession the money which, subject to its defence, is money belonging to the petitioner, the Company will have to pay that money into this Court within one week after the re-opening of the Court. If the money is not paid into Court within that time, the petitioner is at liberty to come before this Court with a fresh application. No order as to costs.

Section 42 of the Specific Relief Act applies only to vested rights, and not to contingent rights like those of a person who has only a chance of succeeding to the estate of a Hindu after the death of a female heir in possession. [p. 425, col. 1.]

A Court will not grant a declaration which is perfectly useless. [p. 426, col. 1.]

Plaintiffs, alleging that they were presumptive heirs of the last male holder, sued for a declaration that the defendant, a Hindu widow, was in possession of certain properties not as heiress to her husband but as mother and heiress of her son, and that the plaintiffs were the future heirs to the property after the defendant's death. A daughter of the defendant and the daughter's son who were in existence and who would be entitled to succeed the defendant in preference to the plaintiffs if she was holding as heiress to her husband were not impleaded as parties:

Held, that the declaration could not be granted inasmuch as the plaintiffs had no legal right but only a mere spes successionis, and inasmuch as the declaration would further be an entirely useless one as it would not bind those persons who may claim the estate upon the death of the defendant. JUDGMENT.

Das, J.—This was a suit by the respondents for a declaration in the following circumstances.

The properties which are the subject-matter of the suit admittedly belonged to one Garib Sahi. He died on the 29th March, 1912, leaving a widow Pranlachhi Kuer who was the defendant in the action and the appellant before us. It is alleged by the plaintiffs that Garib Sahi also left a son Babuna Sahi and that Babuna Sahi succeeded to the properties which were of Garib Sahi's and that Babuna Sahi died on the 4th October, 1914, leaving Pranlachhi Kuer as his heiress under the Hindu Law. It appears that in the Land Registration proceedings Musammam Pranlachhi Kuer applied to be recorded as the heiress of her husband Garib Sahi. The plaintiffs allege that they are the presumptive heirs of Babuna Sahi and they contend that the assertion of the widow in the Land Registration proceedings has thrown a cloud upon their title and they are accordingly entitled to a declaration that the widow is in possession not as the heiress of Garib Sahi but as the mother of Babuna Sahi. The relief actually claimed by the plaintiffs is as follows:—

"That it may be held by the Court that Garib Sahi, husband of the defendant, died while living joint in family, leaving him surviving his son, Babuna Sahi, and the said Babuna Sahi died during his minority leaving his mother Musammam Pranlachhi Kuer. The properties detailed below constitute the estate of Babuna Sahi. The estate does not belong to Garib Sahi and the defendant in this suit as mother and heiress of the deceased Babuna Sahi holds possession of the properties in suit with limited life-interest".

An objection being taken to the maintainability of the suit under s. 42 of the Specific Relief Act, the plaintiffs applied for and were allowed to amend the relief claimed in the manner following, that is to say, they were allowed to ask for a declaration that "the plaintiffs are the future heirs of the said Babuna Sahi after the death of the defendants".

It will be noticed that the plaintiffs do not dispute that the defendant is properly in possession of the properties. The only controversy between the parties is as to whether Musammam Pranlachhi Kuer is in possession as the widow of Garib Sahi or as the mother of Babuna Sahi. If she is actually in possession as the mother of Babuna Sahi the plaintiffs may have some title to succeed to the properties upon the death of Pranlachhi Kuer if they should survive Pranlachhi Kuer. If, on the other hand, Pranlachhi Kuer is in possession as the widow of Garib Sahi then it appears that her daughter and after her, her daughter's son would succeed to the properties on her death. It is necessary to mention that neither the daughter nor the daughter's son is a party to the suit.

The question at once arises whether the suit is maintainable under s. 42 of the Specific Relief Act. The learned Subordinate Judge thought that it was maintainable and he had made a declaration in favour of the plaintiffs. Section 42 of the Specific Relief Act provides as follows:—

"Any person entitled to any legal character, or to any right as to any property, may institute a suit against any person denying, or interested to deny, his title to such character or right, and the Court may in its discretion make therein a declaration that he is so entitled, and the plaintiff need not in such suit ask for any further relief".

Now the plaintiffs admittedly have no interest in the estate of Garib Sahi or of Babunā Sahi either vested or contingent. It may be that upon the death of the widow they will be entitled to the properties in suit if they should survive the widow but that interest is a spes successionis and is not an interest which would be regarded either as vested or contingent. It follows, therefore, that the plaintiffs are not entitled to any legal character. Are they entitled to any right as to the properties in suit? In my opinion they have no right as to the properties either vested or contingent, and a suit under s. 42 of the Specific Relief Act is not maintainable by them.

The question was debated in the Calcutta High Court in the case of Greeman Singh v. Wahari Lall Singh (1). There the plaintiff claiming to be entitled in reversion to certain property on the death of his grandfather's widow, sued for a declaration that certain alienations made by the widow were void as against him. The Court gave the plaintiff a declaration of his reversionary right and Mr. Justice Mitter, delivering the judgment of the Court, set aside the order of the Court below by which it granted to the plaintiffs the declaration claimed by them in the suit. It will be useful to set out a portion of the judgment of Mr. Justice Mitter in the case:

"It is abundantly clear upon the authorities" said his Lordship "that a person who stands in the position of presumptive heir upon the death of a Hindu widow is not entitled to maintain a suit for a declaration of his so-called reversionary right. We may here cite only one case, which is exactly in point [Dooli Chand v. Brij Bockun Lal Awasti (2)]. Some of these cases were decided before the Specific Relief Act came into operation; but in our opinion the aforesaid Act has made no alteration in the law. Section 42 refers only to existing and vested rights, and not to contingent rights like those of a person who has only a chance of succeeding to the estate of a Hindu after the death of a female heir in possession of the property. That also appears from a consideration of the difference in the language used by the Legislature in the illustrations (d) and (e) of s. 42. Illustration (c) contemplates a case like the present, and the illustration (d) applies to the case of a vested right of reversion. The appellants, therefore, have no sort of interest in the suit which was brought by the plaintiff, because, if the suit was dismissed, they could not have been affected by the result; and if it was decreed, they, after the death of the widow, if they were really persons entitled to succeed to the estate of Bal Gobind in preference to the plaintiff, would have been entitled to claim this property also."

The Judicial Committee in the case of Janaki Ammal v. Narayanasami Aiyar (3) has come exactly to the same conclusion. That was a suit by a plaintiff as the presumptive reversionary heir against a widow in possession of her husband's estate in order to protect the property; and the plaintiff made charges against the widow of waste, misappropriation, and other wrong dealing with the property. The High Court came to the conclusion that there were no acts of waste or misappropriation by the widow but gave the plaintiff a declaration as to his title as the presumptive reversionary heir. The Judicial Committee pointed out that suits by a reversionary heir in those cases where there were alienations by the widow stood entirely on a different footing. In dealing with that point the Judicial Committee said as follows:—

"But a reversionary heir thus appealing to the Court" namely to have the alienations made by the widow set aside "truly for the conservation and just administration of the property does so in a representative capacity, so that the corpus of the estate may pass unimpaired to those entitled to the reversion." The decision of the Judicial Committee in the case to which I have referred entirely supports the argument advanced before us on behalf of the appellant.

It was contended, however, by Mr. Shorishi Charan Mitter that here also the suit is in a representative capacity. According to Mr. Shorishi Charan Mitter, the suit is on behalf of the whole body of reversioners who will be entitled to succeed to the estate, assuming the widow is not holding possession as the heiress of her son, and he claims that he is entitled to have the question of heirship decided in this litigation. It may be pointed out at once that the decision will be wholly futile, for whatever the decision may be, it will bind no person after the death of Musamat Pranalchhi Kuer. In representative actions by the reversioner to prevent waste or alienation the alienees, if alienations have already taken place, are parties, and are concluded by the decisions arrived at in their presence and if alienations have not taken place, the injunction of the Court binds, the widow and preserves the property. But here neither the daughter nor the daughter's son is a party to the suit and the plaintiffs claim no relief against the widow in possession. The decision, therefore, will not bind those persons who may claim the estate, upon the death of the widow, as the reversionary heirs of her husband. That being so, it is perfectly useless for the Court to make a declaration in the plaintiffs' favour.

I would allow the appeal, set aside the judgment and decree of the Court below and dismiss the plaintiffs' suit with costs here and in the Court below.

Kulwant Sahay, J.—I agree.

JUDGMENT.

Kumaraswami Sastri, J.—The plaintiff is the appellant. He filed a suit for a declaration that the khanda bhogiam deed executed by his adoptive father in respect of the lands mentioned in the plaint which are archaka service inam lands is invalid and for possession of the properties. His case was that the lands are archaka service inam lands granted to his ancestors for the purpose of doing service in the Tirumalai Thirupathi Devasthanam, that on the death of his adoptive father the plaintiff succeeded to the hereditary office, that as archaka of the temple he is entitled to hold the lands free from any encumbrance and that his adoptive father purporting to act for himself and as guardian of the plaintiff executed the khanda bhogiam deed, dated the 21st of February, 1913, whereby the 1st defendant was put in possession of the properties for a term of 30 years in consideration of a sum of Rs. 8,225 alleged to have been paid to the father. The plaintiff also states that there was no consideration for the deed, that the debts are not true and binding on him, that the deed is further invalid as having been taken from the plaintiff's father who was an old and orthodox person of weak mind, ignorant of worldly affairs and completely under the influence of the 1st defendant, that the property being service inam is not alienable and that the document even if supported by consideration will not be valid beyond the lifetime of the holder of the office. The defence was that the alienation was valid and supported by consideration, that the lands comprised in the deed are alienable and that the lease deed is valid and binding. It is also alleged that the plaintiff with full knowledge ratified the lease after the death of his father and that he is estopped from disputing its validity. The Subordinate Judge dismissed the plaintiff's suit. He held that the consideration mentioned in the document was paid, that there was no undue influence of fraud in the matter, that though the lands are inam lands, there was a custom of alienability, and that even apart from any such custom the lease of the lands is valid and binding and it is not an alienation prohibited by law. The plaintiff appeals.

It is not disputed that the lands in question are lands granted as inam to the person who holds the office of archaka. It is clear from Ex. B extract from the Inam Register, Exs. C and D as well as Ex. A that service was to be rendered. Exhibits C and D which are as far back as 1822 prohibit alienation even by lease but it is doubtful whether these orders would in law render leases invalid in the absence of anything in the grant and, as a matter of fact, it is not disputed that there have been several dealings with this property, by way of ijar or lease. Exhibit I is the khandabhogiam deed which is impeached. It is dated the 21st of February, 1913. Its genuineness is not disputed. It recites that the amount due by the plaintiff's father was Rs. 8,225 and that he was unable to pay the amount and has no other income except the income got from the village described in the schedule, possession was delivered of the inam village for a period of 30 years from Fasli 1323 to Fasli 1353. This document refers to a previous document of the 12th of April, 1910. As regards the enjoyment and payment of rent the deed runs as follows:—

"Therefore, you shall enjoy the said village from this time forwards and you yourself shall discharge the above mentioned debts. From this time forwards you yourself shall collect all the income that has been collected by us in the said village. We have nothing to do with the profit and loss occurring in the same. You shall have all the rights held by us in the said village for this khanda bhogiam period of 30 years for collecting arrears from the ryots in the said village. You shall pay the cists payable to the Sircar (Government) on the said village and obtain receipts. You should give the said receipts to us after the khanda bhogiam period that is when the said village was delivered possession to us. If you fail to pay the said cists according to instalments, you should pay the loss sustained by us thereby. For the said period of 30 years you shall pay to us at the rate of Rs. 120 (one hundred and twenty rupees) in cash and 24 (twenty-four) putties of paddy either pat-teda sambadu or ganika sannam worth about Rs. 144 every year and it should be given in two instalments on the 30th of Karthika month for Karu and on the 30th of Chitrai Vaisaka produce in every year. If you fail to pay in the said manner you should pay the same to us on demand with interest thereon at the rate of 1 per cent. per mensem from the date of default." It then goes on providing for the supply of straw, etc. It says that accounts should be maintained according to those maintained by the lessor which should be delivered after the khanda bhogiam period is over and that repairs should be executed to the channels by the lessee.

The first question is whether this document is a lease or mortgage. Having regard to the terms of the document, I think it is a lease. It satisfies all the requirements of a lease as defined in the Transfer of Property Act. A premium is taken which premium is to be worked off by the enjoyment of the produce for 30 years and a portion of the produce is to be given to the executants of the document. It is sometimes difficult to draw the line between a mortgage with possession and a lease where a premium is received by the lessor but considering the document as a whole I think it is a lease.

In Nidha Sah v. Murli Dhar (1) there was a document which was said to be a mortgage with possession for a period of

(1) 25 A. 115; 7 C. W. N. 289; 5 Bom. L. R. 111; 30 I. A. 54; 8 Sar. P. C. J. 435 (P. C.).

14 years under which it was provided that on the expiration of the term the mortgagor shall come into possession of the mortgaged properties without settlement of accounts and that on the expiration of the term the mortgagee shall have no power whatever in respect of the estates which after the expiration of the term of the mortgage deed shall be returned to the mortgagor without his paying the mortgaged money secured under the document. It was held by their Lordships of the Privy Council that it was merely a lease. Sir John Bonser who delivered the judgment of their Lordships observed: "This instrument, though it is called a mortgage, and though it will be convenient to follow the nomenclature used in the document itself and in the pleadings and judgments in the Courts below, is not a mortgage in any proper sense of the word. It is not a security for the payment of any money or for the performance of any engagement. No accounts were to be rendered or required. There was no provision for redemption express or implied. It was simply a grant of land for a fixed term free of rent in consideration of a sum made up of past and present advances." These remarks apply to the present case. There is no liability to account for the rents and profits nor is there any question of redemption on payment of any money. All that the document requires is that an account should be kept as regards the payment of the cist and of the various expenses.

So far as consideration is concerned, there can be no doubt that the consideration as set out in the document was due and payable and as regards the plea of undue influence it has not been made out. It is not seriously disputed and argued before us in appeal that the document is invalid for any [other] reason but the inalienability of the land purported to be dealt with by the document. Ex. A as it was land granted for temple service. The only question, therefore, is whether this deed which is, in my opinion, a lease is invalid.

It has now been settled by this Court that alienations of temple service lands by sale, gift or mortgage, are invalid. I need only refer to the decision of the Full Bench in Neti Anjaneyulu v. Venugopal Rice Mill Ltd. (2) where it was held that lands held on swasthivachakam service tenure are not subject to attachment in execution of a decree and that the sale of such lands is opposed to public policy. All the earlier decisions are referred to and discussed.

In Venkata Rao v. Papayya (3) it was held by Devadoss and Wallace, JJ., that the alienation of swasthivachakam inam lands is invalid and that the fact that the alienation was in favour of a member of the family does not validate the transfer.

It is argued by Mr. Muthukrishna Aiyar for the respondents that these decisions only apply to sales, gifts or mortgages and not to leases, and that consequently a lease could be made. In dealing with this question we have to see the nature of the transaction rather than the form. A lease for 99 years or for a long term in consideration of a premium paid down is as much an alienation as a sale or mortgage and I do not think that the mere use of the word 'lease' or the fact that a long term is fixed would, having regard to the mischief which is sought to be guarded against by holding that service inam lands are not alienable make the lease valid. The real question is whether the transaction in effect places the income from the lands, beyond the disposal of the holder of the office and prevents him from enjoying the emoluments which were intended to go to the holder of the office in order to enable him to discharge his duties properly.

In Ayancheri Kōilagath Rama Varmā Tāmbaran v. Acholathil Vanikoli Ramān Nayar (4) there was a kanom for 96 years and Innes and Muthuswami Aiyar, JJ., held that the kanom was invalid. The learned Judges observed: "There seems to be no real distinction between the mischief of such a transfer in perpetuity and a transfer for the long period of 96 years."

In Pālaniappa Chetty v. Deivasikamony Pandara Sannadhi (5) their Lordships of the Privy Council observed that there was no difference in principle in the grant of a lease in perpetuity of debutter lands at a fixed rent and an absolute alienation in perpetuity of the same kind of land in consideration of a premium and set aside a permanent lease at a fixed rent and on payment of a premium of temple lands.

In Rama Reddy v. Ranga Dasan (6) Devadoss, J., observed as follows:

"A permanent lease is as much an alienation as a sale. The mere fact that rent is payable by the permanent lessee does not make 'a permanent' lease anytheless an alienation than a sale."

In Madhavrao Waman v. Raghunath Venkatesh (7) their Lordships of the Privy Council were of opinion that the grant of a permanent lease of service watan lands would, undoubtedly, be an alienation within the Bombay Regulation which prohibited watandars without the sanction of the Government to sell, mortgage or otherwise alienate or assign any watan.

It is thus clear that permanent leases or leases for so long a period as would practically amount to an alienation will be invalid as against the successor in office who will be entitled to the rents and other emoluments arising out of the land which goes with the office.

Where the lease in question is not of this character, I think that it is not absolutely void but only voidable at the instance of the successor-in-office. It cannot be said that the holder of the office is bound to cultivate the lands personally and very often leasing the lands is the usual and beneficial mode of enjoyment, nor will it be possible to fix any hard and fast rule in considering such leases. Where a premium is taken one test will be whether the rent paid is sufficient to maintain the holder of that office in such a way as not to interfere with the due performance of the duties attached to the office.

Having regard to the terms of the lease deed in question I think it is not absolutely void but that it is only voidable at the option of the plaintiff. The holder of the land attached to an office has by the very nature of his tenure no power to lease the property so as to enure beyond his lifetime and the fact that the office is hereditary makes no difference.

The lease, in my opinion, being voidable the next question is whether the plaintiff on succeeding to the office elected to avoid it. On this point there can be little doubt that the plaintiff after he attained majority not only received rent but also filed a suit to recover the rent reserved. I agree with the Subordinate Judge in thinking that the plaintiff is bound by the lease as he did not repudiate it when he assumed office.

As regards the custom of alienation which the Sub-Judge thinks is made out it is difficult to see how there can be a custom which is opposed to the law or how illegal alienations if repeated can convert inalienable into alienable property. There is in this case no question of any bona fide purchaser or mortgagee. Nor are we concerned with the right of the trustees of the temple.

The appeal fails and is dismissed, but under the circumstances without costs.

Devadoss, J.—I agree and I have nothing to add.

proprietary body, liable to pay rent to the vendee or to the lambardar?"

The material facts are as follows. Musammam Bari Bahu the defendant was an eight-anna co-sharer in Mouza Gamharia Puranapani. The other eight-anna share is owned by Ganesh Singh the plaintiff and two others. Ganesh Singh is the lambardar. In 1923 Musammam Bari Bahu sold her share to one Mohan Singh and became occupancy tenant of the sir held by her in severalty. Ganesh Singh sues to recover the rent of the holding from Musammam Bari Bahu. The latter pleads that Mohan Singh is her landlord and that she has paid the rent to him.

Looking to the definitions of "landlord" and "tenant" in the Tenancy Act, s. 2, cls. (7) and (11) it must be held that Mohan Singh is the landlord and Bari Bahu his tenant in respect of the land of which the rent is in dispute. It is Mohan Singh and not the proprietary body represented by Ganesh Singh as the lambardar of whom Bari Bahu holds the land.

Mohan Singh as the landlord has the right to claim the rent from Bari Bahu. It is contended that sub-cl. (a) and (c) of cl. (2) of s. 188, Land Revenue Act, 1917, make the lambardar the landlord within the meaning of the Central Provinces Tenancy Act, 1918, and give him the right to collect the rent from all tenants in the village. The Act makes the lambardar the landlord only in respect of such land as the body of proprietors whom he represents is the landlord of. The body of proprietors is not the landlord in respect of Bari Bahu's holding and the rent of the holding does not form part of the village profits of which an account is renderable to the body of proprietors. Ganesh Singh is, therefore, not entitled to claim the rent.

Our opinion is that the ex-proprietor becoming an occupancy tenant of sir held by him in severalty is the tenant of his vendee and that the vendee is entitled to claim the rent and not the lambardar.

Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act (VI of 1908), ss. 139, 213, 214, 258—Suit to set aside decree and sale for fraud, whether maintainable.

The jurisdiction of a Civil Court to entertain a suit for setting aside an execution sale for fraud in publishing or conducting a sale is barred under s. 258 of the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act. [p. 431, col. 2.]

Section 258 of the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act contemplates that a decree passed under s. 139 can be questioned in a suit on the ground of fraud in obtaining the decree. [ibid.]

Appeal against an order of the Additional Subordinate Judge, Purulia, dated the 2nd September, 1924, setting aside that of the Munsif, Purulia, dated the 31st March, 1924.

Messrs. A. K. Roy and Sashi Sekhar Prasad Singh, for the Appellant.

Messrs. A. B. Mukherji and U. N. Banerji, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

Kulwant Sahay, J.—This is an appeal by the defendant No. 1 and arises out of a suit brought by the plaintiff for setting aside a decree for arrears of rent and a sale in execution of the decree on ground of fraud and collusion.

The facts as alleged in the plaint are shortly these:

Defendants Nos. 2 to 4 are the superior landlords of Mauza Adaidah; defendants Nos. 5 to 16 were mokarraridars under defendants Nos. 2 to 4 and the rental payable by them was Rs. 120 odd and Rs. 13-3 odd was the cess.

It appears that on the 9th May, 1920, the plaintiff purchased a 4 annas 6 gandas out of the 16 annas mokarrari interest from some of the mokarraridar defendants. There was some defect in the deed of sale and fresh deed was executed in favour of the plaintiff on the 19th July, 1921. The landlords, namely, defendants Nos. 2 to 4 brought a suit for arrears of cesses due for the years 1324-1325 B. S. against defendants Nos. 5 to 16 and they obtained a decree on the 2nd April, 1921. In execution of this decree the mokarrari interest was put up for sale and was purchased by defendant No. 1 on the 20th October, 1921. There was a formal delivery of possession to defendant No. 1.

in January, 1922. The plaintiff applied to the Deputy Collector to set aside the sale under the provisions of s. 213 of the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act. This application was rejected and the order was confirmed on appeal by the Deputy Commissioner and the Commissioner. The plaintiff, therefore, brought the present suit for a declaration that the decree was obtained by fraud and that the sale in execution of the decree was also obtained by fraud. The learned Munsif framed various issues, but on the application of the parties he proceeded to try issues Nos. 4 and 5 only which were the issues in bar of the suit. Issue No. 4 ran thus:

"Has this Court jurisdiction to try this suit and is s. 258 of the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act a bar to the maintainability of this suit" and issue No. 5 was. "Is the suit barred by the principle of res judicata?"

The learned Munsif held that the suit was barred under the provisions of s. 258 of the Act and further that the suit was also barred by res judicata. Without deciding the other issues raised in the case the learned Munsif, on his decision of these two issues, dismissed the suit. There was an appeal by the plaintiff which was heard by the Subordinate Judge of Purulia. He has set aside the decree of the Munsif on a finding that the suit was not barred under the provisions of s. 258 of the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act and that it was not barred by the principle of res judicata either. Against this decree the defendant No. 1 has come up in second appeal.

As regards the bar under s. 258 of the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act it is clear that in so far as the plaint asks for setting aside the sale in execution of the decree, the claim is barred by s. 258. Section 213 of the Act provides for setting aside a sale on ground of material irregularity or fraud in publishing or conducting the sale. The learned Munsif appears to be under a misapprehension when he says that fraud is not one of the grounds upon which a sale can be set aside under s. 213. By the Amending Act VI of 1920 B. & O. the words "or fraud" have been inserted in s. 213 so as to make the fraud in publishing and conducting the sale one of the grounds for setting aside a sale. The question of fraud was, therefore, properly raised in the application for setting aside the sale and was decided by the Revenue Officer.

Under s. 214 no suit or application can be entertained in any Court to either set aside or to modify the effect of any sale made under Chap. XVI of the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act except on the ground of fraud or want of jurisdiction. The fraud or want of jurisdiction contemplated in s. 258 is fraud or want of jurisdiction in the order passed under s. 213 refusing to set aside the sale. In my opinion the learned Munsif was right in holding that the claim of the plaintiff, in so far as it asked for setting aside the sale, was barred by s. 258 of the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act. The suit, however, proceeds further and asks for a declaration that the decree obtained in the suit was itself fraudulent and collusive. The suit for realisation of the cesses appears to have been brought under s. 139 of the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act and there are clear allegations in the plaint of the present suit that the decree obtained under s. 139 was by fraud on the part of the plaintiffs in that suit. Section 258 of the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act contemplates that a decree passed under s. 139 can be questioned in a suit on the ground of fraud in obtaining the decree. There are clear allegations in the plaint of fraud and those allegations have to be enquired into. In my opinion the view taken by the learned Subordinate Judge on this point is correct and the order of remand must stand and the suit will be tried on the issues as regards the fraud in obtaining the decree and other issues relating thereto.

The appeal is dismissed with costs.

For a Court to invoke O. XXIII, r. 1, Civil Procedure Code, without giving any reason amounts to a material irregularity in exercising jurisdiction and its order can be set aside in revision.

Civil revision from an order of the Munsif, Jaunpur.

Mr. Shiva Prasad Sinha, for the Applicant.

Mr. Haribans Sahai, for the Opposite Parties.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application in revision against an order of the Munsif of Jaunpur allowing the non-applicant to withdraw his suit with liberty to bring a fresh suit. The order of the Munsif is impugned before us on the ground that the Munsif had no jurisdiction to permit the withdrawal of the suit with liberty to bring a fresh suit unless and until he had decided that there was a formal defect in the suit or some other sufficient ground. The order of the Munsif fails to mention the reason why he granted the plaintiff permission to withdraw the suit with liberty to bring a fresh suit. It is permissible, however, in this circumstance to refer to the application of the non-applicant. In that application two grounds were set out. One was that the success of the suit depended upon proof of a fact which could only be proved by production of a certain cash book, whereas the applicant had only produced a ledger. The second ground was that there were other persons who were necessary parties to the suit. It is unnecessary to decide whether either of these facts would give the lower Court jurisdiction. It is sufficient to say that, in our opinion, the permission, as a matter of discretion should not have been allowed on the grounds stated. We admit that if the lower Court has erred in the exercise of its discretion no application in revision would lie. But as the order of the lower Court does not set forth the reasons for giving the permission, it is possible that the lower Court considered that permission to withdraw with liberty to bring a fresh suit could be granted without any condition precedent rather than that it abused the discretion imposed on it by law. In any case we should hold that for a Court to invoke O. XXIII, r. 1 without giving any reason amounts to a material irregularity in exercising jurisdiction given to the Court by that rule. In the circumstances, we consider it necessary to set aside the order of the lower Court and to direct the lower Court to proceed with the case from the point where the plaintiff had put in the application now impugned. The lower Court must re-consider that application and pass an order on it. If the Court is of the opinion that notwithstanding the opinion expressed above, the application should be granted, it must set forth its reasons for holding that it should be granted, clearly stating whether it is by reason of a formal defect or by reason of other sufficient cause. If the Court rejects the application, it will still be open to the Court to allow the plaintiff to add any necessary party and to produce any necessary evidence, provided, of course, that the Court gives reasons for allowing this and awards appropriate costs. This is not to be construed to mean that the Court must allow parties to be added or evidence to be produced. We are told that circumstances exist, such as the conclusion of the evidence, on both sides and the conclusion of arguments, which would make such an order improper. It will be for the lower Court to consider this aspect of the matter.

Various decisions of this Court have been cited to us in the course of the hearing. We do not consider it necessary to examine them in detail. They appear to us merely to be authority for the proposition that provided a Court finds that the suit must fail by reason of some formal defect or that there are other sufficient grounds for allowing the plaintiff to institute a fresh suit, then in revision the exercise of the discretion of the Court cannot be questioned. In a case like the present one, where the lower Court has given no reasons, it will always be difficult to decide whether the order of the Court is based on an assumption of jurisdiction not vested in it by law, namely, to allow the suit to be withdrawn without satisfying the conditions of O. XXIII, r. 1 or whether it is based on the discretion allowed by the rule. In such cases, then, the correct method seems to be to hold that the Court has exercised its jurisdiction irregularly in failing to record its reason for exercising that jurisdiction. At least this is the view which we take in the present case.

The order of the lower Court will, therefore, be set aside including the order requiring the plaintiff to pay the defendant full costs plus Rs. 15. Those costs, if paid, should be refunded to the plaintiff. The defendant-applicant will get the costs of this application.

Order set aside.

CRIMINAL APPEAL No. 132 OF 1927.

November 8, 1927.

Present:—Mr. Justice Ross and

Mr. Justice Kulwant Sahay.

GAHBAR PANDE—ACQUSED—APPELLANT
versus

EMPEROR—RESPONDENT.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), ss. 300, 302—Murder and culpable homicide, distinction between—Act done with intent to cause bodily injury likely to cause death, whether murder.

Two girls were struggling for the possession of a handful of gram. The elder girl gave a blow with a thin lathi to the younger. The uncle of the latter came running to the place and gave a blow with a lathi on the head of the elder girl and after the girl had fallen gave two more blows on her thigh. The blow on the head caused fracture of the skull and the girl died. The uncle was convicted for murder. On appeal.

Held, that the accused could not be convicted for murder but was guilty only of culpable homicide not amounting to murder. [p. 435, col. 2; p. 436, col. 2.]

A blow on the head with a lathi is certainly likely to cause death and the person who inflicts a lathi blow on the head of another person must be presumed to have the intention of causing such bodily injury as is likely to cause death. But it does not necessarily follow that a lathi blow on the head is always sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. [p. 435, col. 2.]

Per Kulwant Sahay, J.—The essence of the crime of murder under cl. (2) of s. 300 of the Penal Code is that there must be the intention of causing such bodily injury as the offender knows is likely to cause death, and in order to convict a person of the offence of murder under the said clause, it has to be found that he had the intention of causing the injury and also that he had the knowledge that such injury which he intended to inflict was likely to cause death. For a conviction of an offence under cl. (3) of s. 300 it must be shown that the injury which the person intended to cause was such as to be sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. [p. 436, col. 1.]

If a person causes death by doing an act with the intention of causing such bodily injury as is likely to cause death, his offence comes under s. 299, and it is only if the intention was to cause bodily injury, which injury was sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, that the offence would come under s. 300, cl. (3). [ibid.]

Although a man is presumed to intend the natural and inevitable consequence of his own act, the presumption of intention must depend upon the facts of each particular case, and 'knowledge' as used in cl. (2) of the section is a word which imports a certainty and not merely a probability. [ibid.]

The difference between culpable homicide and murder is merely a question of different degrees of probability that death would ensue. [ibid.]

Criminal appeal from the decision of the Sessions Judge, Muzaffarpur, dated the 24th of June, 1927.

Messrs. S. P. Varma and Bindhyachal Prasad, for the Appellant.

The Assistant Government Advocate, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.

Kulwant Sahay, J.—(August 30, 1927).—The appellant Gahbar Pande was tried along with his brother Nathu Pande on a charge under s. 302/34 of the Indian Penal Code for the murder of a girl named Gujari aged about 15 years, the daughter of one Mewak Dusadh. Nathu Pande was acquitted, but the appellant Gahbar Pande was convicted under s. 302 of the Indian Penal Code and sentenced to transportation for life.

The prosecution case shortly stated is that Mewak Dusadh has a field which bears survey plot No. 813 in village Lauria in which gram was growing. On the 27th of March last about two gharis before sunset a little girl named Reshmi aged about 8 or 9 years, the daughter of Nathu Pande, pulled out some gram from the field. Gujari snatched it from Reshmi and there was a struggle between the two for the possession of the gram. Gujari is said to have hit Reshmi with a stick which was in her hand. Gahbar Pande, the uncle of the girl Reshmi, came running from the north with a lathi in his hand followed by his brother Nathu who had also a lathi, and being incited by Nathu to kill the girl for having the audacity to hit a Bhabni girl, Gahbar struck Gujari on the head with his lathi and she fell down. Then both Gahbar and Nathu struck her with a lathi and Gujari died instantaneously. Gajadhar, who is a nephew of Mewak, came running and then Vakil Pande and Babu Lal Pande assaulted him with lathis and he also fell. Mewak who was irrigating his onion field at a short distance from the gram field came running and found his daughter dead. He then went to his nephew Gajadhar, who was lying unconscious, and revived him. He then left the corpse of his daughter in charge of Gajadhar and himself went to the Police Station, where his first information was recorded at 7.30 P.M. The Junior Sub-Inspector who was in charge of the Thana and had recorded the first information, left for the place of occurrence and reached there at 8.30 P.M. He found the corpse not in the gram field but in another field, bearing survey No. 860 which belonged to one Dhani Pande at a distance of about 30 yards to the north-west of the gram field. He held the inquest and examined certain witnesses and ultimately both Nathu Pande and Gahbar Pande were sent up for trial.

The defence of the accused was that they did not assault the girl Gujar and had committed no offence; that there was no quarrel at all in the gram field between Reshmi and Gujar, nor did Reshmi uproot gram from the field of Mewak; that Gujar Dusadhar, who was a young unmarried girl, aged more than 15 years, generally grazed buffaloes on the chaur and parti lands along with Gahbar Pande who is aged 19 or 20; that there was a suspicion of undue intimacy between the two and the castesmen of Mewak held a Panchait and Gujar was forbidden to graze buffaloes with Gahbar Pande; that on the day of occurrence Gahbar Pande was grazing buffaloes in the chaur along with Gujar and that Reshmi was also grazing her goat near about. Gajadhar Dusadh noticed Gahbar Pande and Gujar grazing the buffaloes together and chased Gahbar, whereupon Gahbar ran away. Reshmi abused Gajadhar for this, whereupon Gajadhar struck her with a stick. Gajadhar then took Gujar to her father Mewak who was irrigating his onion field near the field of Dhani Pande and told him about it, whereupon Mewak Dusadh became angry and struck his daughter Gujar with the wooden shovel with which he was irrigating his field on account of which Gujar died, and that in order to save his own life Mewak had brought the false case against the accused persons on wrong allegations.

It might at once be said that there is no evidence on the side of the defence to prove the defence story. Reshmi was examined as a Court witness and she to a certain extent supported the defence version of the occurrence. But having regard to all the circumstances and the evidence on the record, I agree with the learned Sessions Judge in holding that this defence version of the occurrence has not been established. No blood was found in the field where Mewak Dusadh is said to have struck the girl. The nature of the injuries on the girl makes it improbable that Mewak Dusadh inflicted all those injuries. Even if the blow on the head which fractured the skull be assumed to have been caused by the shovel with which Mewak was irrigating his field, the other injuries on the person of the girl were not likely to be caused by the shovel, and it is hard to believe that Mewak went on striking the girl after she had fallen. The defence version does not account for the injuries on the person of Gajadhar. For the reasons given by the learned Sessions Judge, I must hold that the defence version has not been established.

The learned Sessions Judge has disbelieved the prosecution witnesses as regards the part alleged to have been taken by Nathu Pande, and having regard to the statement made by Mewak Dusadh to the Police Officers and to the deposition of Jotik Dusadh, the learned Sessions Judge was right in holding that Nathu came to the place of occurrence after the girl Gujar had been killed.

As regards Gahbar, it is to my mind clearly established that he struck Gujar the lathi blow on the head and after she fell, he gave her two more lathi blows on the right thigh. There are, no doubt, discrepancies in the evidence of the prosecution witnesses, and they have clearly given exaggerated accounts and in some respects false accounts as regards some of the particulars deposed to by them. All of them had stated that Nathu Pande incited Gahbar to kill the girl, because she had dared to strike a Bhabni girl. All of them also say that Nathu Pande struck her along with Gahbar Pande. There are certain discrepancies also as regards the place where Gujar fell. But there can be no doubt about the statement made by each of the witnesses that Gahbar Pande came running with a lathi either on seeing Reshmi assaulted by Gujar or by being told of it by Reshmi herself. There is no reason to doubt the evidence of Mewak, Uttim, Gajadhar and Jotik when they say that Gahbar struck her with a lathi. I, therefore, agree with the learned Sessions Judge in holding that Gahbar did strike Gujar with a lathi on the head and also on the thigh. The blow on the head caused a fracture of the skull and was the cause of the death.

The question is as to what offence Gahbar has committed. All the four assessors were of opinion that the offence did not amount to murder, but to culpable homicide not amounting to murder. The learned Sessions Judge was of opinion that although the case did not fall under the first clause of s. 300, it came under the second clause of the section and also under the third clause, and was covered by the illustration (c) to s. 300. Now, cl. (2) of s. 300 makes culpable homicide, murder if the act by which death is caused is done with the intention of causing such bodily injury as the offender knows to be likely to cause the death of the person to whom the harm is caused; and under cl. (3) it is murder if the act is done with the intention of causing bodily injury to any person and the bodily injury intended to be inflicted is sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. Illustration (c) runs thus: "A intentionally gives Z a sword-cut or club wound sufficient to cause the death of a man in the ordinary course of nature. Z dies in consequence. Here A is guilty of murder, although he may not have intended to cause Z's death." This illustration evidently covers the third clause of s. 300. The question for consideration is whether the appellant Gahbar Pande in giving the blow with the lathi on the head had the intention of causing such bodily injury as he knew to be likely to cause the death of Gujari, or whether he gave the blow with the intention of causing such bodily injury as was sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause her death. The essence of the crime of murder under cl. (2) of the section is that there must be the intention of causing such bodily injury as the offender knows is likely to cause death. In order to convict Gahbar Pande of the offence of murder under cl. (2) of the section, it has to be found that he had the intention of causing the fracture of the skull which was the injury inflicted upon the girl and also that he had the knowledge that such injury which he intended to inflict was likely to cause death. It is conceded that he had no intention of causing death. It is hard to suppose that he intended to cause the injury which was, as a matter of fact, caused by the blow on the head given by him. Two girls were struggling for the possession of a handful of gram; the elder girl had given a lathi blow (although with a thin lathi) to the younger girl; the uncle of the younger girl came running to the place where the two girls were struggling. Is it reasonable to suppose that on account of such a struggle the appellant intended to cause such bodily injury to the elder girl as he knew was likely to cause death? The evidence and circumstances lead me to suppose that he could have no such intention or knowledge. The learned Sessions Judge has disbelieved the statement of the prosecution witnesses as regards Nathu Pande having incited Gahbar to kill the girl. The evidence shows that only one blow was struck on the head and the girl fell and thereafter two more lathi blows were given on the leg. The medical evidence shows two more bruises, one on the right temple 2" x 1" and the other on the left side of the skull 3" x 1", and the Civil Surgeon was of opinion that altogether five blows were struck. The evidence of the witnesses, however, goes to show that Gahbar Pande struck one blow on the head and after the girl had fallen he gave two more blows on the thigh. The first information makes mention of a lathi blow on the head. Before the Committing Magistrate the witnesses had also stated that Gahbar gave a blow with a lathi on the head and she fell. In the Sessions Court, also the evidence goes to show that Gahbar struck her only one blow on the head with the lathi. Now, if he had the intention of causing the fracture of the skull which was the injury caused and he knew that such fracture was likely to cause death, his intention was carried out by the first blow, and there was no reason why he should go on inflicting more blows thereafter. I am of opinion that he had not the intention of causing such bodily injury as he knew likely to cause death, but intended only to chastise her. The third clause of s. 300 also does not, in my opinion, apply. Here also it must be shown that the injury which Gahbar intended to cause was such as to be sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. A blow on the head with a lathi is certainly likely to cause death and the person who inflicts lathi blow on the head of another person must be presumed to have the intention of causing such bodily injury as is likely to cause death. But to my mind it does not necessarily follow that a lathi blow on the head is always sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, and I have already found that he had no intention of causing the bodily injury which was, as a matter of fact, caused, namely, the fracture of the skull which resulted in the death of the girl. Now, if a person causes death by doing an act with the intention of causing such bodily injury as is likely to cause death, his offence comes under s. 299, and it is only, if the intention was to cause bodily injury, which injury was sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, that the offence would come under s. 300, cl. (3). The difference between the two is, no doubt, fine, but there is certainly a difference and it is to my mind not clear upon the evidence that the offence comes under s. 300 of the Code. The difference between culpable homicide amounting to murder and culpable homicide not amounting to murder has been very ably brought out by Melvill, J., in Reg. v. Govinda (1). No doubt, a man is presumed to intend the natural and inevitable consequence of his own act; but the presumption of intention must depend upon the facts of each particular case, and 'knowledge' as used in cl. (2) of the section is a word which imports a certainty and not merely a probability. In the present case the evidence to my mind goes to show that the appellant had not the intention of causing such injury as he knew to be likely to cause death, or as was sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. The difference between culpable homicide and murder is merely a question of different degrees of probability that death would ensue.

Upon the evidence I am of opinion that the injury inflicted upon the girl was inflicted by the appellant with the knowledge that it was likely to cause death but without any intention to cause death, and the case falls under the second paragraph of s. 304 of the Indian Penal Code. I would, therefore, alter the conviction from one under s. 302 to one under the second paragraph of s. 304 of the Indian Penal Code and sentence the appellant to seven years' rigorous imprisonment.

Ross, J.—(November 8, 1927).—I agree with the opinion of Mr. Justice Kulwant Sahay that this case falls under the second paragraph of s. 304 of the Indian Penal Code, and that the conviction should be altered accordingly and that the sentence should be seven years' rigorous imprisonment. It is not necessary for me to discuss the case at length as I am in full agreement with his reasoning. The appellant who is a young man of 19 struck a girl of 15 on the back of the scalp with a lathi and caused a compound fracture of the skull as the result of which she died. The evidence further is that after this blow he struck the girl two blows on the thigh. The cause of the assault was of a trivial character. The deceased who was a Dusadh had snatched away some gram from a Babni girl of 8 or 9 years, who had taken the gram from a Dusadh's field. Neither the circumstances of the assault nor the weapon used necessarily suggest an intention to kill or the only slightly different intentions defined in cls. (2) and (3) of s. 300. On the contrary the fact that two slight blows were given on the thigh after the blow on the head seems to indicate that there was no such intention present to the mind of the appellant when he struck the girl on the head. At the same time, by striking the girl on the head with a lathi, he undoubtedly intended to cause such bodily injury as was likely to cause death and he was, therefore, guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder. The facts of this case do not, in my opinion, warrant any stronger conclusion.

CRIMINAL REVISION No. 1235 of 1927.

FAIZ MOHAMMAD THROUGH EMPEROR—COMPLAINANT—PETITIONER
versus

NABU AND ANOTHER—ACCUSED—
RESPONDENTS.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 256, 257—Re-call of prosecution witnesses for further cross-examination—Expense of witnesses—Order directing complainant to pay costs to accused, legality of.

Where an accused after the framing of the charge demands the re-call of prosecution witnesses for further cross-examination the complainant cannot be made to bear their expenses.

Where a complainant failed to produce his witnesses for cross-examination by the accused after the framing of the charge and the Magistrate ordered the complainant to deposit the process-fee and to pay the accused a certain sum of money as costs:

Held, that the order of the Magistrate directing the complainant to pay costs to the accused was illegal.

Case reported by the Sessions Judge, Karnal, with his No. 300-J of 15th July, 1927.

(1) 1 B. 342; 1 Ind. Jur. 378; 1 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 228.

REPORT—FACTS.—This was a case under s. 323, Indian Penal Code. After the prosecution evidence in the case had been recorded the accused were charged under s. 323 on the 7th of June, 1927. On 8th June they stated that they will further cross-examine all the prosecution witnesses. The Magistrate ordered the complainant to produce his witnesses again on the 7th of June. On that date the complainant filed a petition that his witnesses who were related to the accused had been won over by the other side and so were not willing to come with him and that he will deposit their expenses and will have summons issued to them. On this the Magistrate (Chaudhry Ghasi Ram, Magistrate, Second Class, Thanesar) adjourned the case to 24th of June directing the complainant to pay process fee and costs of the witnesses and also ordered the complainant to pay Rs. 20 as costs to the accused. It is against this order that complainant has applied for revision.

GROUND.—The complainant had given a very plausible reason for the non-attendance of his witnesses. Without inquiring into the truth or falsehood of this allegation the Magistrate should not have ordered him to pay Rs. 20 as costs to the accused.

The complainant is a boy aged 13 or 14 years only. The Magistrate seems to have lost sight of this fact.

It is doubtful whether under the Criminal Procedure Code, it is the duty of the complainant to pay the expenses of his witnesses over again for further cross-examination. There seems to be no provision in the Criminal Procedure Code to justify this procedure.

There is a note to s. 257 in Rama Natha Aiyer's Criminal Procedure Code, Volume 2, page 1016, to the effect that there is nothing in the Code which enables the Magistrate to demand from a complainant the expenses to be incurred by his witnesses for cross-examination in a warrant case. In Amin Chand v. King Emperor (1) it was laid down that under s. 256 of the Criminal Procedure Code it is the duty of the Magistrate to re-call prosecution witnesses for cross-examination if the accused so demands after the charge is framed. The Sessions Judge who forwarded that case for revision to the High Court was of opinion that it was the duty of the Magistrate to re-call such witnesses presumably at the public expense. The language of s. 257 of the Criminal Procedure Code seems to imply that it is the accused who applied for re-calling of prosecution witnesses for cross-examination and it is he who should pay the expenses and not the complainant. It was not, therefore, for the complainant to pay expenses or to produce witnesses in this case. The Magistrate should have called the witnesses either at the expense of the Government or at the expense of the accused. His order, therefore, that complainant should pay Rs. 20 to the other side was not quite justified, the more so because the complainant in this case was willing to deposit the expenses of the witnesses. It is recommended, therefore, that the order of payment of costs Rs. 20 may be set aside.

ORDER.—For the reasons given by the learned Sessions Judge, I set aside the order directing the payment of Rs. 20 by the complainant to the accused.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), s. 215—Offence, nature of—Taking money to find stolen property—Screening offender—Desire to save oneself from vengeance of thieves.

The primary aim of s. 215, Penal Code, is to punish all trafficking in crime, by which a person knowing that property has been obtained by crime, and knowing the criminal, makes a profit out of the crime, while screening the offender from justice. [p. 439, col. 2.]

It is not an offence to take money from another in order to help him to find stolen property and to convict the thief. It is an offence for one who knew of the commission of the crime, and who could at once have informed upon the offender, to wait till a reward is offered, and then to take money from the owner of the property under colour of getting the property back for him. The section is not intended to apply to the actual thief, but to some one who, being in league with the thief, receives some gratification on account of helping the owner to recover stolen property, without at the same time using all the means in his power to cause the thief to be apprehended and convicted of his offence. [p. 440, col. 1.]

The fact that a person undertaking to recover stolen horses says that he will take them, if recovered, either to the cattle-pound or leave them near some place, does not necessarily show that he knows the criminal and wishes to screen him. It may equally be that he intends to save himself from the vengeance of the people from whom he intends to take away the horses if he discovers their whereabouts. [ibid.]

Criminal appeal by the Local Government from an order of the Additional Sessions Judge, Bijnor.

The Government Advocate, for the Crown.
Mr. K. N. Malaviya, for the Accused.

JUDGMENT.—On the 1st of October, 1926, a mare belonging to one Bhagwant Singh of Mauza Patti Tek Chand disappeared and on the same night a mare belonging to one Budhu, Jat, also disappeared from an adjoining mauza, Mauza Ohhajaura. Although there is no evidence that these animals were stolen, we propose for the purposes of this case to assume that they were stolen.

The identity of the thief, or thieves, was not known, but one Mangu was suspected. He is the respondent to a Government appeal to-day, he having been charged, in the events which we shall set out in a few moments, with having committed an offence under s. 215 of the Indian Penal Code. He was tried for that offence by a Bench of First Class Magistrates of Bijnor and sentenced to one year's rigorous imprisonment. From that conviction he appealed, and the learned Additional Sessions Judge on the 18th of February, 1927, allowed the Jail appeal of Mangu and directed his acquittal.

The Local Government believing that acquittal to have been a miscarriage of justice, appealed and that is how the matter comes before us to-day on the Government appeal.

We can dispose of the judgment of the Additional Sessions Judge quite shortly by saying that he disbelieved the evidence given and pointed out one or two small discrepancies. He proceeded entirely on facts, and did not believe in the good faith of the prosecution. He thought it to be a manufactured case, because the prosecution believing Mangu to have been the thief but having no evidence against him, were endeavouring to secure his conviction by means of s. 215. We do not agree with the Sessions Judge in the way in which he approached the case, but that has become a matter of very little importance to-day, because from the early opening of this appeal the learned Government Advocate was asked to consider with us the somewhat intricate nature of that section, and to point to the evidence on the record which would satisfy all the requirements for a conviction under it. We have come to the conclusion that all the requirements for a conviction under s. 215 do not exist, and that, as a matter of law, Mangu is entitled to be acquitted. Section 215 is one which in practice very rarely comes before the Courts, and it is desirable first that we should set out what we believe to be the facts of this case as disclosed by the evidence, and then we should discuss s. 215 and show how the prosecution must, in our opinion, have failed from the outset.

Now, undoubtedly on the discovery of the loss of these horses Mangu was suspected. We think there can be no doubt about that, and we think that there being no evidence whatever against him, it was concluded that the best way to re gain possession of the missing animals was to offer Mangu Rs. 30 if he were able to recover them. We cannot, of course, attach any weight to the statement that Mangu was suspected, and we have got to deal with Mangu entirely upon the evidence as it appears on the record. Now the evidence is this. Bhagwant Singh told the Court how on the night of the 1st of October, 1926, his mare disappeared. He said that he had a suspicion of Mangu and other persons, and he being a zemindar of some importance in the neighbourhood, told the people of his own mauza and of the mauza from which the mare of Budhu had been taken, that they should trace out the animals, and that he was quite willing to defray the expenses. Now there was nothing improper in Bhagwant Singh making an offer to anybody that he would pay for the tracing out of the mares. That being the position, some 5 to 7 days after Mangu, the accused, came into the village. He is a seller of water-nuts. Chhajju Singh spoke to him, and the two phrases which he used show in themselves that he was endeavouring as politely as he could to suggest to Mangu that it might be possible for him (Mangu) to recover the mares without difficulty, really on the hypothesis that Mangu had been one of the offenders. The actual translation of the original is not as it appears at page 10, line 47 onwards in the text. The actual words which Chhajju Singh says that he used are as follows:—"Teri suddh men kahin yah ghorian hon to pattah chala dei." (If you happen to know where these horses are, then furnish a clue to them). Mangu is said to have replied that a clue would, or might, be found but it would require money. Now there was no impropriety in either the request of Ohhajju Singh or in the answer of Mangu that it was possible that a clue might be found but that the tracing would be a matter of money. A few days later Bhagwant Singh provided Rs. 30, and at an interview at which many people were present, Mangu was given Rs. 4, and he was promised the balance of Rs. 26, on the return of the horses, and for the satisfaction of Mangu, the Rs. 26, was at his suggestion placed in the hands of Ohhajju Singh. Some 10 or 12 days after this Mangu returned and told Ohhajju Singh that he wanted some more money, saying that he had to go a long distance and that more money would be spent. That request was refused, and on or about the 1st of December, 1926, Mangu told Ohhajju Singh that he could not find the horses anywhere. Similarly Majid says that Mangu when asked why he had not found the horses said "this disease is beyond my power," meaning that the tracing of them was beyond his power. The Government Advocate relies upon two extracts from the evidence, page 12, line 25 onwards and page 12, line 53 and onwards. Page 12, line 25 and onwards runs as follows; Majid is giving evidence and he says as follows: "This accused said either 'I shall take it to the cattle-pound, or I shall bring it in here and leave it.' The other statement is similar, and is made by Dalu Singh. "Mangu was saying 'I will bring both the horses. Pay Rs. 4 at this time and deposit Rs. 26 with Ohhajju Singh. I will admit them in the cattle-pound or leave them near the village.'" Now the learned Government Advocate does not dissent from the possibility that all that has been read was or might well be taken to be prefaced by 'if I can get hold of the horses'; but he uses those phrases as an argument to show that Mangu's intention in taking them to the cattle-pound or leaving them near the village was a desire or intention to screen the thief. The answer to that seems to be that there is no evidence that Mangu ever knew who was the offender. He may have done so but there is nothing on the record to show that he knew who the thief was. There is nothing on the record to show that he did more than promise to attempt to trace out the horses, which we are willing to accept were stolen horses, and, if successful, to leave them in the pound or in the village, nothing beyond that. Those being the essential circumstances the question is whether what Mangu agreed to do, and did, amounts to an offence under s. 215 of the Indian Penal Code. The section runs as follows: "Whoever takes or agrees or consents to take any gratification under pretence or on account of helping any person to recover any moveable property of which he shall have been deprived by any offence punishable under this Code, shall, unless he uses all means in his power to cause the offender to be apprehended and convicted of the offence, be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine or with both." Now that section has been the subject of two decisions in this Court, and it has also been considered by Mr. Mayne in the 4th Edition of his work on Criminal Law in India at page 271. In his commentary Mr. Mayne says: "The primary aim of the section is to punish all trafficking in crime, by which a person knowing that property has been obtained by crime, and knowing the criminal, makes a profit out of the crime, while screening the offender from justice." Now we pause here for a minute to examine what Mr. Mayne puts forward as the essential ingredients. You must have a person knowing that property has been obtained by crime. In this particular case, as we are going to order the release of Mangu, we are willing to assume that the horses were in fact the subject of a theft on the night of October 1st, and that Mangu having been informed of that believed it to be the fact. We now come to this difficulty in the way of 'the screening' and 'knowing the criminal.' There is as we have said not the least evidence that Mangu knew the criminal; and if we have to take the record, Mangu is entitled to ask us to give weight to the two places in the evidence where the prosecution agrees that he said that he could not find the horses anywhere, and also that the finding of the horses was beyond his power. Therefore, if we take the evidence as it stands, Mangu was a man who had undertaken to endeavour to trace out and to restore the horses to their rightful owners if he was able to do so, and in the event of his being successful he was to be paid Rs. 30. But there is no suggestion in the bargain at any stage of the proceedings, that he intended to screen the offender, and that as will be seen is the third essential spoken of by Mr. Mayne in his commentary. Mr. Mayne continues: "It is not an offence to take money from another in order to help him to find the property and to convict the thief. It is an offence for one who knew of the commission of the crime, and who could at once have informed upon the offender, to wait till a reward is offered, and then to take money from the owner of the property under colour of getting the property back for him. This section is not intended to apply to the actual thief, but to some one who, being in league with the thief, receives some gratification on account of helping the owner to recover stolen property, without at the same time using all the means in his power to cause the thief to be apprehended and convicted of his offence." Now there again being in league with the thief, is a necessary act to be proved. The way in which the Government Advocate puts it is that the intention to leave the horses in the pound had its origin in the desire to screen the offender. It may, of course, bear that complexion but it equally supports this intention, namely, that Mangu, if he ascertained the whereabouts of these animals, was proposing himself to take them away from the unlawful possession in which they were in and quietly and secretly restore them to the owners, Bhagwant Singh and Budhu, by leaving them in the pound or near the village and that in doing this Mangu was not anxious that the part he had taken in the matter should be known and that he made these suggestions that he should put them in the cattle pound, or leave them in the village for his own protection, so that it should not be known by the thieves that his had been the hand that had restored them to the owners. It may have been his intention to screen the original thief, but it may equally have been that he intended to save himself from the vengeance of the people from whom he intended to take away the horses if he discovered their whereabouts.

We are, therefore, of opinion that this prosecution was not started with the necessary facts, which alone could support it, and that it fails because, strictly speaking, there is no evidence that the horses had been stolen, though for the purposes of this case we have been, in this particular instance, willing to accept that they were stolen, but there is certainly no evidence that Mangu knew the criminal, no evidence that he was making any attempt to screen that criminal from justice, or that he failed to use all means in his power to cause the offender to be apprehended. On those grounds we affirm the order whereby the Additional Sessions Judge acquitted Mangu, though, as we have said, we differ from him in the reasons which he has given for such acquittal. Mangu is in Court and may leave the Court at once. The office will make the necessary arrangements to enable him to return to his village.

—Dang blow on head causing death—Skull not fractured—Offence.

In most instances a man who strikes a person on the head with a heavy weapon such as dang must know that such a blow is likely to cause death. But this cannot be said about the case where the blow is not a very violent one and the injured person is able to walk about for a couple of days before he succumbs to the injury. In such a case the offence committed is one under s. 325, Penal Code. [p. 441, col. 2.]

Appeal from an order of the Magistrate, First Class, Multan, exercising enhanced powers under s. 30, Criminal Procedure Code, dated the 25th May, 1927.

Mr. Ganpat Rai, for the Appellant.

Mr. Des Raj Sawhney, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The appellant has been convicted under the provisions of s. 304, Part II, Indian Penal Code, of having caused the death of his wife by striking her a blow without intent to cause death but with a knowledge that the blow would be likely to cause her death. The evidence is of a highly unsatisfactory nature in many ways. In the First Information Report the informant Chiragh Shah stated that a number of persons were beating the deceased and that he could mention them by name and he named Sher Shah, Mehr Shah, Ghulam Shah and Tilla Shah. Of these persons he said that Mehr Shah, the woman's husband, dealt her a dang blow on her head as a result of which she fell down. This witness corroborated his statement made in the First Information Report when he was examined in the box. He there said that on arriving at the scene he was told by the deceased that Sher Shah, Mehr Shah, Ghulam Shah and Tilla Shah were beating her with fists and legs. Then he added that meanwhile Mehr Shah gave her a lathi blow on the head.

Musammât Fateh Bibi, the mother of the deceased, stated that she was present at the time of occurrence, that she arrived at the scene as a result of hearing a noise and on arrival she found Mehr Shah striking her daughter dang blow. She added that Sher Shah, Ghulam Shah and Tilla Shah, were giving her blows with their fists and slapping her, and that Ghulam Shah was saying: "Do not strike her on the head". Mehr Ali (P. W. No. 4) who appears to be a disinterested witness, stated that on hearing a noise he came up to the scene and saw Mehr Shah strike a dang blow on the deceased's head and he added that Sher Shah, Mehr Shah, Tilla Shah and Ghulam Shah were present but he does not attribute any acts of assault to these other persons. Ahmada (P. W. No. 5) says that he saw the incident at a distance of about 3 or 4 karams, that he saw Mehr Shah strike the deceased a dang blow, that she thereupon fell down and became unconscious. He adds that Mehr Ali, Chiragh Shah, Sher Shah, Tilla Shah and Ghulam Shah were present. Three girls and some women also saw the scene. In addition to this evidence there is the statement of the deceased made to the Sub-Assistant Surgeon Ata Ullah Khan when he saw her at the hospital. According to this witness she stated to him that her husband gave her a lathi blow on her head. When he first examined the wound he did not think it was sufficient to cause death. According to this medical witness she remained conscious up to the moment of her death and she attended the hospital from the 28th of March, until the 30th as an outdoor patient and she was then admitted as an indoor patient. She died on the 6th of April.

On the 1st of April, the deceased made a dying declaration which was taken down by the Naib-Tahsildar Gurbachan Singh. In this statement she gives two inconsistent accounts of what occurred. She first says that only her husband, her little daughter Musammât Nizami who was in her lap, her mother-in-law Musammât Rajan, and her husband's sister Musammât Imam Bibi, were present at the time when she received her injuries and that no body else was there. At the instigation of her mother who was present when this dying declaration was being made, she added that Zilla Shah, Gama Shah, and Sher Shah "also gave her kicks and cuffs along with her husband", and she stated in this dying declaration that her husband gave her two blows on her head and other blows on her legs.

The medical evidence is clear that the woman only received one injury and that was a blow on the head. That is consistent with the evidence of the persons who purport to be eye-witnesses, and is also consistent with the statement which she made on going to the hospital. It is, in my opinion, clearly established that this woman only received one blow, which ultimately caused her death. The learned trial Judge has stated in his judgment that "He selected the head of his wife for causing injury and did not remain content with one blow, but in order to be almost sure of dangerous result he gave another blow. He thus in inflicting two blows by a heavy lathi on the head of his wife knew that it will likely cause death or such bodily injury as will likely cause death."

This view is entirely opposed to the weight of evidence. In my opinion as far as I can gather from the whole of the evidence before me, the appellant did not intend to seriously injure his wife. But in a sudden quarrel he picked up a stick lying to hand and struck her with it on the head. There is no doubt that in most instances a man who strikes a person on the head with a heavy weapon such as dang must know that such a blow is likely to cause death; but the blow in the present case does not appear to have been a very violent one, inasmuch as skull was not fractured and the woman was able to attend the hospital and walk about for at least two days.

There is some difference of opinion between the medical men as to whether death was due to hæmorrhage from rupture of the blood vessels of brain or due to erysipelas. The Doctor who conducted the post-mortem examination is satisfied that death was due to hæmorrhage, but the Civil Surgeon (D. W. No. 1) has expressed a decided opinion that it was due to erysipelas as in his judgment paralysis and unconsciousness would in some form precede death if the cause of death were compression of the brain. In the present case paralysis and unconsciousness did not precede death. It is hard to say in this conflict of medical testimony whether death was due to erysipelas or compression of the brain.

Upon the whole of the circumstances of this case I am not satisfied that the appellant knew when he gave the blow in question that it was likely to cause death; nor do I think that he intended to cause grievous hurt; but I am of opinion that when he struck the woman on the head he must have known that he was likely to cause grievous hurt, and in fact grievous hurt was caused. In these circumstances I think that he should have been convicted under the provisions of s. 325, Indian Penal Code, and I would accordingly alter the conviction to one under that section. Having regard to all the circumstances of the case I think the sentence of six years is too severe and I would reduce it to one of two years' rigorous imprisonment.

Criminal trial—Duty of prosecution and trial Judge to see that all material evidence is adduced—Police diary, proper use of—Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 162.

The Prosecuting Inspector, the Government Pleader in the trial Court and the trial Judge do not any of them discharge their duty, if they are merely content with getting recorded and recording such evidence as the Police may put before the Court. It is the duty of all of them to apply some intelligence, all the intelligence they can, to the problems that arise in the case and towards securing all possible evidence on material points. They must examine the motives and relations between the parties and insist upon their actions, where those actions are material, being disclosed. [p. 444, col. 2.]

A confession recorded in a Police diary cannot be used for anything other than to assist the presiding Judge in the enquiry or trial or for the purpose of enabling the defence under certain circumstances to contradict the witnesses for the Crown. But it is the duty of the Judge to bring on record by evidence any material facts that may come to his knowledge and for this purpose a Judge can and should use the diary. [p. 445, col. 1.]

Criminal appeal from an order of the Sessions Judge, Shahjahanpur.

Messrs. P. N. Saprú and M. N. Raina, for the Appellants.

The Government Advocate, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—Four men, Karan Singh, Bahadur, Mulaem Singh and Puran have been convicted under s. 302 for the murder of Gajraj. Karan Singh and Bahadur have been sentenced to death. Mulaem Singh and Puran have been sentenced to transportation for life on the ground that they did not take a principal part in committing the murder. In view of the opinion that we have formed about this case, it is unnecessary to say more in regard to the question of sentence than this, that we cannot find the smallest justification for the Sessions Judge sentencing Mulaem Singh and Puran only to transportation for life if there is in fact truth in the story for the prosecution which the learned Judge has believed. According to that story Mulaem and Puran held Gajraj while Bahadur and Karan forced the life out of him by placing their lathis on his neck. In view of this story, which the learned Judge accepted, it is inconceivable to us how he could justify a view that the two men did not take a principal part in the murder. The story for the prosecution is that Karan Singh hated Gajraj because Gajraj had been one of those responsible, though not tried, for kidnapping Karan Singh's wife about a year before the present murder. Gajraj is also said to have had enmity with one of the other appellants, Bahadur, on account of their both having an intrigue with the same woman Musammat Bitauli. On the night of the 30th March, Karan Singh is said to have persuaded Gajraj to accompany him with a view to beating Bahadur and to have taken Gajraj to his (Karan Singh's) house under this pretext, where the other three appellants were already concealed. Omitting some minor incidents which followed, the four appellants are then said to have murdered Gajraj by pressing a lathi on his neck, to have taken away the corpse and have hidden it in the jungle and to have subsequently, one, or the other of them largely destroyed the corpse by burning it.

Gajraj had four brothers, Munshi, Mahadeo, Nawab and Piare. Mahadeo lived with Gajraj in the village Barehla where also Karan Singh, Mulaem and Paran lived. The fourth appellant, Bahadur, lived in another village, but had been working in a bel in the village Barehla for several months. The other three brothers of Gajraj, Munshi, Nawab and Piare lived about two kos away from Barehla in the village Mundia Bais. Mahadeo is said to have been ill and, therefore, took no steps when he found that his brother did not return. How far this alleged illness is a real fact is at the least uncertain, because Mahadeo was himself well-enough a few days later to go to the place where the body was eventually found. However, Mahadeo says that he sent his son to fetch his brother Piare, who also had been named in the report of the kidnapping case above mentioned. Piare says that he searched for his brother Gajraj in certain villages where Karan Singh said Gajraj might be, but failed to find him and, failing to find him three days later again questioned Karan Singh and as a result of his suspicions got Karan Singh arrested by the Mukhia and others and took him to the Police Station. On the way to the Police station, they were told that the body of Gajraj had been found burnt in the jungle. The Sub-Inspector came to the village Barehla on the 3rd April, and as a result of his investigation sent up the present four appellants for trial. The case for the Crown really rests on the evidence of Ram Kali, the wife of Karan Singh, who was the woman alleged to have been kidnapped in the case that had occurred a year previously. She purports to give eye-witness testimony of the murder. The next fact of importance is that this woman is said not to have been present in the village when the Sub-Inspector came, and was found a long way off on the 7th April, in apparently some small jungle. The story for the Crown is that Karan Singh got her out of the way. The story for the defence is that she had never been in Karan Singh's house at all, since the kidnapping case, but had been under the protection of Piare and that the Police with the assistance of Piare pretended to have found her in the jungle. Further, there is the evidence of Musammât Bitauli, who is said to have met Musammât Ram Kali at a fair at Gola on the 3rd April and to have been told by Musammât Ram Kali that she (Ram-Kali) had seen the murder committed by the four appellants. The remaining portion of the evidence consists of evidence by the Police and other witnesses that Karan Singh pointed out in the jungle where the shoes and lathi of the deceased were to be found, the heap of straw in which the body had first been concealed and the shop of the person from whom the kerosine oil had been purchased with which the body was later burned.

After very anxious consideration of the evidence for the Crown, two facts emerged. Firstly, there was no conceivable explanation on the record as it stood which would render it reasonable conduct on the part of Gajraj to allow himself to be taken away by the very man Karan Singh, whose wife he was alleged to have kidnapped on the pretext of beating Bahadur, his (Gajraj's) enemy. The Crown alleged that this man Bahadur, one of the present appellants, was the friend of Karan Singh and had been having his food in Karan Singh's house for a month past. This fact must have been perfectly well-known to Gajraj and two questions required an answer. What should make Gajraj unsuspecting of the motives of Karan Singh in assisting him at all? Why should Gajraj believe Karan Singh to be willing to assist Gajraj or any body else in beating a man who had been having his food in his (Karan Singh's) house for the past month and with whom he had, as far as the record shows, no enmity whatever? The record, however, discloses that practically all the persons concerned in this case, we do not of course mean without exception, but all the principal persons are bad character. That being so, it is highly improbable that we should find in the evidence a disclosure of the real feelings of the various persons towards each other, and it was just conceivable that Gajraj could be deceived into accompanying Karan Singh.

The second point that emerged was that there seemed no substantial reason to doubt that Musammât Ram Kali was at the time of the murder living with her husband Karan Singh and was, therefore, in a position to know something of the murder, if it took place as she said it did. That Karan Singh should endeavour to get her out of the way while having no real reason to suppose that she would give evidence against him, was not unnatural. It was also not unnatural that the husbands of other women relative should refuse to have her in the house and that she might, therefore, have to leave as best she could; her being kept even in the open air was not in any way impossible in view of the season of the year. The third fact we may also mention about which there can be no dispute, and that is that evidence of the alleged production by Karan Singh of the shoes and lathi and evidence that he pointed out the shop where the oil had been bought and the place where the body had first been concealed, amounted in fact though not in words to giving evidence that Karan Singh had confessed. The Crown was entitled to lead such evidence, though they were not entitled to give evidence of a confession made to a Police Officer. But the conclusion to be drawn from such evidence was inevitable.

We feel it our duty here to note that nobody connected with the presentation of the case to the Court below, including the trial Judge, seems to have had the smallest conception of their duty to really examine the evidence and to secure that all available light on the case should be before the Court. The Prosecuting Inspector in the Court below, the Government Pleader in the Sessions Court and the trial Judge do not any of them discharge their duty, if they are merely content with getting recorded and recording such evidence as the Police may put before the Court. It is the duty of all of them to apply some intelligence, all the intelligence they can, to the problems that arise in the case and towards securing all possible evidence on material points. We find in this case no serious attention whatever directed to get on to the record any detailed evidence of the real relations between Karan Singh on the one hand and Gajraj and Mahadeo on the other. Nor do we find any attempt whatever to extract from Musammam Ram Kali any statement as to how she came to leave the house of her husband on or about the 3rd April. She alleges that she was taken away to a fair by her husband's brother but she tells us nothing and was asked nothing of what occurred during the three days subsequent to the murder and prior to her departure. If there is any truth whatever in her story, she must have had conversations with her husband and with Mulaem as to whether she was to stay in the house or go, as to whether she was to hold her tongue about what she had seen and many other similar points. No attempt was made to extract from her any information as to her living in the jungle, who she was with whom she was content to stay there. It is no case of a simple ignorant woman unaccustomed to the world and to meeting and talking with men. She is avowedly a loose character and there is no suggestion of her being pardah to any body at all. Her evidence is limited to saying that she was concealed in order to keep her away from the Sub-Inspector. She was not asked whether this was with her consent or against her will. If it was with her consent, she was not asked how it came about that she so readily disclosed the whole transaction to Musammam Bitauli, the mistress of Gajraj the murdered man. If it was against her will, she was not asked why she did not disclose it to numbers of other people or why she was willing to live, so far as the evidence goes, unguarded in some jungle. It is not the duty of either the Government Pleader or the trial Judge to assume without giving any thought to it, that the stories told by the prosecution witnesses are necessarily true. It is their duty to apply some intelligence to examination of motives and relations between the parties and to insist upon their actions, where those actions are material, being disclosed.

We were inclined, however, to think that the evidence of Musammam Ram Kali was possibly true in the main.

On the other hand, there was still the unsolved problem of how Karan Singh could have induced Gajraj to go away with him for the purpose alleged.

Thirdly, there was the fact staring us in the face on the record that the Crown really intended the Court to believe that Karan Singh had confessed.

In view of the unsatisfactory way in which the case has been tried, we considered it desirable to look into the diary. It is unnecessary to state again, one of us has frequently stated, the principles which must guide a Court in using the diary. Looking into the diary then we find that Karan Singh is recorded as having made a confession to the Sub-Inspector of Police on the 4th April after the Superintendent of Police had left, while Karan Singh was still refusing to disclose anything. In many particulars that confession details the same story as that which is put before us now for the prosecution, but in one very grave particular it is wholly discrepant. Karan Singh says in that confession that the murder was committed under his supervision, but with the aid of four men, Bahadur and Puran, two of the present appellants, and with the assistance of Bachu and Bhajnu, and does not mention Mulaem. Now it is conceivable that in confessing to the Police Karan Singh might have excluded the name of his brother Mulaem. But there is no possible explanation which occurs to our minds of why he should have put in two other men Bachu and Bhajnu falsely.

The serious question raised by the discovery of this confession is, apart from the legal aspects of it, which of the two statements contains the truth? Supposing that either of them does, Karan Singh's statement or Musammam Ram Kali's, it is manifest that the two are hopelessly contradictory as to the actual murder, and yet both statements are made by persons who were eye-witnesses. If Karan Singh's confession represents the truth, then Musammam Ram Kali's evidence, that of the principal witness for the prosecution, is wholly false.

Now we have referred above to the legal aspects of this confession. It is manifest that it cannot be used against Karan Singh or any of the appellants. It was a confession made to the Police. How then should it have been used in the Court below? The diary cannot be used for anything other than to assist the presiding Judge in the enquiry or trial or for the purpose of enabling the defence under certain circumstances to contradict the witnesses for the Crown. It is the duty of the Judge to bring on record by evidence any material facts that may come to his knowledge and it is for that purpose that he can and should use the diary. Here it is clear that his suspicions ought to have been aroused by the evidence given in Court as to the production of shoes, etc., by Karan Singh that Karan Singh might be supposed to have confessed. If he had looked at the diary to see whether there was anything which would indicate the absence of material facts, he would have come across, as we did, that confession; he would have seen that Karan Singh had told a story there which, if it was true, would shatter the evidence of Musammam Ram Kali. He could not use that confession against the accused, but what he could have done and should have done would have been to question the Investigating Inspector some what as follows. Did you in fact have two persons mentioned to you by Karan Singh as having taken part in the murder, who are not mentioned in any way at all by Musammam Ram Kali who purports to have seen the murder? The Sub-Inspector would have had to admit that he had. The defence could then have used this evidence to rebut the testimony of Musammam Ram Kali and it would further have thrown doubts on the evidence that Karan Singh produced the shoes, etc. A Court is not allowed to use the confession of a person to the Police against the accused, but there is no reason whatever why it should not get on the record facts in connection with that confession of which, if the defence were aware of them, the accused would be entitled to the benefit.

It would be useless for us now to call the Sub-Inspector to give formal evidence to these discrepant statements in the alleged confession. It is manifest that once those facts have come to light it is impossible to place reliance on the evidence of Musammam Ram Kali. It may be true, it may be false, but it is clear that somehow or other the name of Mulaem has become substituted for the names of two other men who were originally the objects of suspicion and rightly so. We do not mean of course by the words "rightly so" that Bachu and Bhajnu were guilty or that there is the smallest reason for believing them to be guilty, but suspicion must have been strongly directed against them at the outset, unless there was something improper in the way this confession was obtained from Karan Singh. No explanation whatever is offered as to how it now comes about that such an important part of Karan Singh's statement is alleged by the Crown to be false and how a new figure Mulaem is inserted in the list of guilty persons. We are of course unable to say whether the case is or is not in fact a true one, but in view of the facts that we have set forth above, it is manifest that no reliance whatever can be placed on the main evidence for the Crown, including the alleged production by Karan Singh of articles belonging to the deceased and other things he is said to have disclosed. A brutal murder has undoubtedly been committed and it is, in our view, owing to the manner in which the case was investigated and tried that the guilty persons have escaped, whether they be the present appellants or others. We have no alternative but to set aside the convictions and sentences and direct the appellants to be released.

ORDER.—These two revision petitions have been filed on behalf of the District Board of Tanjore against the judgments of the Stationary Sub-Magistrate of Mayavaram acquitting the accused in each case of an offence punishable under s. 207 (a) and

Sch. VIII of the Local Boards Act. Under s. 166 (1) of that Act “No person shall, on any public road in a district, ply any motor-vehicle for hire, or use any such vehicle for carrying passengers or goods at separate fares or rates on such road, except on a license obtained from the President of the District Board.” Under the further provisions mentioned above failure to obtain a license is punishable. In C. C. No. 179 to which Cr. R. C. No. 101 relates, the complaint against the accused was that he “committed the offence of plying a motor-car. Tan. 234, for hire in the District Board Road No. 7-A, two trips, from Mayavaram to Tranquebar, without obtaining the license from the President, District Board, Tanjore.” The terms of the complaint in the other case, C. C. No. 200 of 1926, were similar. In the former case the prosecution adduced the evidence of a Local Fund Maistry stationed at Porayur, which we understand is adjacent to Tranquebar, to the effect that the accused’s car used to come and stand in the hired car-stand there and obtain passengers. The Sub-Magistrate, we gather, has not accepted this evidence, but it is unnecessary for us to consider whether he should be supported in this finding because the evidence appears to be clearly inconsistent not only with the terms of the complaint but also with those of the question put to the accused. The case was tried as a summons case and he was asked to show cause why he should not be convicted upon a complaint that he had plied his motor car for hire from Mayavaram to Tanquebar on the 27th, 28th and 29th March 1925 without obtaining a license. Although however the terms of the complaint were not supported by the prosecution evidence, a defence witness was examined who deposed that the accused was in the habit of letting out his car for hire to Vakils, Mirasidars and others wishing to engage a car for a trip from Mayavaram. It may be taken, therefore, that the accused in this case admitted hiring out his car for journeys from Mayavaram. In the other case (C. C. No. 200), the question put to the accused was in similar terms and the evidence was in consonance with it. In both the cases only the first portion of s. 166 (1) would apply because admittedly there is no proof that the vehicles were used for carrying passengers or goods at separate fares or rates. Accordingly the question we have to decide is whether a person, who lets out his car for hire in Mayavaram, which is a Municipality, must obtain a license from the Tanjore District Board if the car travels beyond the Municipal limits and traverses any of the District Board Roads. The argument of Sir K. V. Reddi for the District Board is that a vehicle plies for hire on a public road if it is made use of as a hired vehicle on that road, so that it is not a necessary condition that the actual hiring should take place upon that road. The alternative view is that the plying of a motor vehicle for hire means the act of waiting for soliciting custom, and that, therefore, so soon as any person has hired it the act of plying for hire is complete. If this be so, that act was committed, if at all, within the Municipality of Mayavaram, and not within the District Board area, so that no license would be required from the District Board and these cases would fail.

We have no doubt that the latter is the correct view. The phrase 'to ply for hire' is used in the English as well as in the Indian enactments relating to hackney and stage carriages, and we have been shown no reason why the same significance should not be attached to it in India as in England. Our attention has been drawn to three English cases. In the earliest of these, Clarke v. Stanford (1), the question which arose was whether a carriage which stood on the premises of a Railway Company to await the arrival of trains, with the object of conveying any passenger who chose to hire it, was plying for hire within the meaning of the Metropolitan Public Carriage Act of 1869. The case turned upon whether the Railway premises, not being a public place were a place in which a vehicle could be said to ply for hire, and although that question does not arise here, it is clear from the judgments that 'plying for hire' was taken to mean the act of soliciting custom. This is made clear too in Sales v. Lake (2). Certain persons arranged to run a charabanc from London to Brighton, all seats being booked and tickets paid for beforehand and no other passengers being accepted. The charabanc started from Grosvenor Gardens, where it was joined by passengers with their tickets, and the question was whether it was a stage carriage plying for hire at that place. This question was answered in the negative, Lord Trevethin, C. J., expressing the view that a carriage could not accurately be said to ply for hire unless two conditions were satisfied "(1) There must be a soliciting or waiting to secure passengers by the driver or other person in control without any previous contract with them, and (2) the owner or person in control who is engaged in or authorizes the soliciting or waiting must be in possession of a carriage for which he is soliciting or waiting to obtain passengers." Mr. Justice Avory delivered himself to the same effect. This case is, therefore, authority not only for the view that 'plying for hire' is an act which results in the vehicle being hired and not an act consequential upon the hiring but also for a distinction between plying for hire, that is obtaining passengers on the spot and without any previous arrangement, and merely letting out a car for hire by previous arrangement. The third English case, Leonard v. Western Services Ltd. (3), affords a fairly close parallel with the circumstances now in question. A lady purchased a return ticket by motor omnibus from Newport in Wales to Risca, travelling to Risca by one of the omnibuses of the Company and returning by another. The omnibuses were licensed to ply for hire in Newport but were not so licensed in Risca. The question was whether the return omnibus, in accepting the lady as a passenger on the strength of her return ticket, was plying for hire in Risca. This point was found against, Lord Hewart, C. J., observing "There is no occasion for soliciting passengers within the district (Risca). It is not open to the omnibus driver by diligence or by skill to attract to his employers the customers of other employers. There is, therefore, no plying for hire in the District, the hiring having already been done." And Salter, J., said. "Without attempting any exhaustive definition of the expression, I think that in order to constitute 'plying for hire' within the meaning of the Acts there must be a general invitation by the person in charge of the vehicle to the members of the public to make contracts with him for carriage in the vehicle."

It is quite clear from these decisions that the act of plying for hire can only be done at the place and time that the hiring is effected, in the present instances at Mayavaram—and that is a sufficient finding to dispose of these cases. We do not need to enter into the question as to what precisely the act consists in; but it is clear that not every case of hiring out a vehicle will fall within its meaning. We dismiss the criminal revision cases.

CRIMINAL APPEAL No. 1035 OF 1927.

November 4, 1927.

ALLAH DIN alias DINA—CONVICT—

APPELLANT

EMPEROR—RESPONDENT.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), s. 75—Previous conviction very old—Enhanced sentence.

An enhanced sentence under s. 75, Penal Code, should not be passed where the previous conviction took place as much as 12 years before the subsequent one and there is only one previous offence.

Criminal appeal from an order of the Sessions Judge, Lyallpur, dated the 12th August, 1927.

Mr. Jalal-ud-Din, for the Appellant.

Diwan Ram Lal, Assistant Legal. Remembrancer, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The appellant Dina has been convicted by the learned Sessions Judge under s. 420 of the Indian Penal Code and also under s. 468 of the same Code and, because of a previous conviction under s. 395 more than twelve years before this case, s. 75 of the Indian Penal Code has been applied. He has been sentenced to eight years' rigorous imprisonment and four years' rigorous imprisonment respectively on the two charges, the sentences to run concurrently.

As regards the question of forgery, the story for the prosecution is that Dina, accompanied by one Mahen, persuaded Fateh Ali to part with Rs. 300 on the ground that the niece of Mahen would get a divorce from her husband Chiragh and marry the son of Fateh Ali. Later a forged deed was produced by Dina appellant and handed over to Fateh Ali and the latter was made to part with a further sum of Rs. 250 by way of payment to Mahen with whom the niece was at that time residing. As nothing happened after this Fateh Ali went to the village of Mahen and demanded the woman in marriage. Mahen thereupon denied that Chiragh had divorced the woman and repudiated the divorce deed. After inquiry it appeared that Chiragh had not divorced the woman and Fateh Ali lodged a complaint against Mahen and Dina for cheating and forgery, Mahen has been acquitted. Fateh Ali complainant is undoubtedly an unreliable witness. He first of all made a complaint against Mahen and his wife alone alleging a somewhat different story. But his story does not stand alone and I see no reason, and the learned Sessions Judge saw none, for disbelieving the evidence of Hussain Bakhsh (P. W. No. 7) as to the part played by Dina in the forgery. That the deed is forged is proved beyond all doubt as the thumb-mark purporting to be that of the husband of the woman has been proved to be that of one Fazal Shah and similarly the thumb-mark purporting to be that of Nura has been proved to be that of one Roshan since deceased. Moreover there is nothing to show why Dina should have been implicated if he had no hand in this matter at all. There is no enmity alleged or proved between Fateh Ali complainant and Dina. The fact that Mahen was acquitted, has nothing to do with the question of the guilt of Dina. I, therefore, consider that Dina has been rightly convicted both under s. 468 and under s. 420 of the Indian Penal Code. I must, however, again repeat, as I have frequently had occasion to, that I deprecate the use of s. 75 of the Indian Penal Code when the previous offence took place as much as twelve years before the present one and there is only one previous offence. I, therefore, consider that s. 75 should not have been used at all in the case, though technically no doubt it could be used. Counsel for the appellant did not argue the point of sentence at all, but I accept the appeal to this extent that I reduce the sentence passed on Dina to one of four years' rigorous imprisonment under s. 420. The sentence under s. 468 of four years' rigorous imprisonment will stand and the sentences will run concurrently.

CRIMINAL APPEAL No. 720 OF 1927.

October 26, 1927.

Present:—Mr. Justice Agha Haidar.KARAM ILAHI—ACCUSED—APPELLANTversusEMPEROR—RESPONDENT.Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860); s 304—Murder—Single blow—Sudden quarrel—Sentence.*

In a quarrel between the accused's wife and his brother's wife, the latter abused the accused's daughters, whereupon the accused hit her a single violent blow with a stick which he picked up there and then. The woman died of her injury the following day. There was no feeling of enmity between the accused and the deceased:

Held, that the quarrel being unpremeditated and the blow having been struck in the heat of passion, a severe sentence was not called for, and that a sentence of three years' rigorous imprisonment would meet the ends of justice. [p 450, col. 1]

Criminal appeal from an order of the Magistrate, First Class, with enhanced powers under s. 30 of the Criminal Procedure Code, Multan, dated the 4th June, 1927.

Mr. N. C. Mehra, for the Appellant.

Mr. B. H. Bevan Petman, for the Government Advocate, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—Karam Ilahi has been convicted under s. 304, Part II of the Indian Penal Code and sentenced to seven years' rigorous imprisonment with four months' solitary confinement. He has come up in appeal to this Court.

The story for the prosecution is very simple. There are two brothers, the appellant and Ali Muhammad. They have got houses in the same enclosure. In that enclosure there is an oven which is used by the village people for baking their bread. There was quarrel over the baking of bread between the wife of the accused, Musammat Begam and Musammat Natho, the deceased woman. In the course of that quarrel there was the inevitable exchange of abuse between these two women. Karam Ilahi happened to be present. He lost his temper when he heard Musammat Natho abusing his daughters and in a fit of passion hit her with a stick which he picked up there and then. The blow unfortunately fell on the woman's head with the result that her skull was fractured and she succumbed to her injuries the following day. This was at about 10 or 11 A.M., on the 4th of May, 1927.

On the following day Ali Muhammad, the husband of the deceased woman, made the First Information Report at the thana.

In that report he narrated the facts stated above and asked the Police to make an investigation. It appears, however, that after the First Information Report had been lodged, the members of the family and their friends put their heads together and tried their best to screen Karam Ilahi. The witnesses for the prosecution tried to save the accused and put forward quite a different story saying that Musammat Natho fell down from the roof of her house while she was plastering it and thus met her death as a result of the injuries caused by the fall.

A number of defence witnesses also have come forward. They say that they saw the woman falling down from the roof of the house. One of them Rahim Bahksh makes an awkward blunder so far as the defence is concerned and puts the occurrence at sometime near the evening which is not the case either for the prosecution or for the defence. One witness, however Musammat Begam the wife of the accused has throughout been consistent and her story is perfectly clear and cogent. She mentions the quarrel and further says that her husband Karam Ilahi, in a fit of ungovernable passion hit a blow on the head of Musammat Natho. Ali Muhammad, the brother of the accused appellant, who appears as a witness for the prosecution, has admitted that there had been some quarrel now and again between Musammat Begam and her husband Karam Ilahi, but this was only after the charge had been framed and then he was recalled for the purpose of cross-examination. It is significant that, in the evidence which he gave earlier, on the 10th of May, 1927, he does not make any mention of any such quarrels between Musammat Begam and her husband, the appellant. Several of the defence witnesses refer to these domestic quarrels between Musammat Begum and the appellant. But, considering the social position of these people and their rough and tumble domestic life, I am not prepared to attach much importance to these bickerings. Certainly I am not prepared to believe that as a result of these quarrels the wife would deliberately perjure herself to get her own husband convicted of a serious offence. The fact of the matter, as already stated is that this woman did not like to perjure herself in order to screen her husband and has given a consistent version of the affair throughout, while the witnesses for the prosecution as well as for the defence have been trying their best to save the appellant. In my opinion the guilt of the accused is proved beyond all reasonable doubt.

The question of sentence is not an easy one to decide. Ali Muhammad, the brother of the appellant and husband of the deceased woman, says that there was no enmity between Karam Ilahi and Musammat Begam, that they had all been living amicably together in the same enclosure and that the appellant had no feelings of enmity towards Musammat Natho. It appears that, as a result of the exchange of abuse between the womanfolk, Karam Ilahi hit the deceased woman with a stick while he was in such a fit of temper that he could not control himself. There was only one blow struck, but it must have been struck with considerable violence according to the medical evidence, seeing that it practically smashed the skull of the deceased woman. There is not the slightest suggestion anywhere that any previous ill-feeling existed between the appellant and the deceased woman. The quarrel certainly was not premeditated and the unfortunate incident happened in the heat of passion.

Without in any way minimizing the seriousness of the offence and having regard to all the circumstances of the case, I think a sentence of three years' rigorous imprisonment would meet the ends of justice. With this modification I dismiss the appeal.

CRIMINAL REVISION CASE No. 1268 OF 1927.

October 7, 1927.

Present:—Sir Shadi Lal, Kt., Chief Justice.

BABU MAL—COMPLAINANT—PETITIONER
versus

GHASI AND OTHERS—ACCUSED—
RESPONDENTS.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 233, 239—Revision—Acquittal, interference in—Practice—Offences of mischief and riot—Joint trial—Misjoinder of charges.

The Court of Revision will not ordinarily interfere with an order of acquittal.

A joint trial for offences of mischief and riot where they do not form part of the same transaction and the persons accused are not the same is bad for misjoinder of charges.

Case reported by the District Magistrate, Gurgaon, with his No. 1150 of 25th July, 1927.

REPORT.—FACTS.—The accused were challaned by the Sub-Inspector of Police under ss. 429, 147 and 325, Indian Penal Code. The facts are that a cow owned by the complainant trespassed into his field of jowar. Accused No. 1, Ghasi killed her by giving her several blows. Net Ram shepherd informed the complainant of it who accompanied by his brother Lachi Ram and his father Tika Ram repaired to the place of occurrence and found the cow dead. Later on they were beaten by the accused very mercilessly when they complained to the accused about the killing of the cow.

GROUND.—The questions are whether there is sufficient cause to report the case under s. 438, Criminal Procedure Code, or to move Government to appeal against the acquittal of Ghasi, accused No. 1, on the charge of mischief for killing the cow, and whether application should be made for enhancement of sentence for the beating of Babu Mal and Lachhi Ram. The facts are clear and fully proved.

Ghasi in a fit of rage killed a cow which trespassed into his field. The owners, Babu Mal and Lachhi Ram, apparently set about Ghasi and Tundlla and inflicted some slight injuries. Ghasi's party then fell upon Babu Mal and Lachhi Ram and Babu Ram received 5 injuries and Lachhi Ram 11 (two head injuries and one neck injury). The lower Court finds that the brutal killing of a cow is not mischief because it is done by a Hindu who cannot intend the death of a cow. This is most mischievous nonsense. Intention is no part of the ingredients of mischief and the idea that all Hindus are perfect followers of their faith is an absurd contention. As for the subsequent assault the owners of the cow fell upon the brutal perpetrator of this gratuitous act of cruelty and this the lower Court finds only the natural thing for them to do. They did not beat the accused much and it is obvious that no right of self-defence arose that could justify the subsequent trouncing which the five convicted persons gave to the owners of the cow. As a matter of fact the two men who were beaten by the owners of the cow have been acquitted and only their friends have been convicted so that the question of self-defence does not arise. They came up afterwards to avenge the injuries of their kinsmen. The lower Court, after convicting five persons under s. 147/323 released them under s. 562, Criminal Procedure Code.

The net result is, therefore, that the man who beat a cow to death goes scot-free and his friends who gave a sound beating to the owners of the cow are bound down under s. 562, Criminal Procedure Code. This sort of thing will only encourage crime and cruelty.

The file of the case is, therefore, forwarded to the High Court with the request that the order of the lower Court be set aside and a re-trial of the case be ordered.

Mr. Ram Lal, for the Petitioner.

Mr. B. A. Cooper, for the Respondent.

ORDER.—The reasons given by the District Magistrate for recommending a re-trial of the case are not sound and cannot be accepted. If an accused has been wrongly acquitted the order of acquittal can be set aside on an appeal by the Local Government under s. 417 of the Criminal Procedure Code. The Court of Revision does not ordinarily interfere with an order of acquittal.]

There is, however, a legal defect in the trial of the case which has not been noticed by the District Magistrate. It appears that the offence of mischief was quite a separate transaction from that of riot, and, as the same persons were not accused in both the transactions, the trial was bad for misjoinder of charges.

I accordingly quash the proceedings and direct that the two offences shall be tried separately.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), ss. 149, 300, 302, 325—Unlawful assembly—Fatal assault by some members—Common intention—Sudden quarrel—Sentence.

The deceased, a village goldsmith, who was obstructing the view of a proprietor in the village at a wrestling match was abused by the latter and returned the abuse. On this the proprietor asked his relations to kill (mar do) "these goldsmith dogs". On this four of his relations stood up, two out of whom belaboured the goldsmith with dangs causing fatal injuries in the heads of which the goldsmith died the next morning. The other two beat a person who tried to stop the assault. The proprietor continued shouting to his relations but did not strike any blow himself.

Held, (1) that when at the behest of the proprietor, the four relations arose for the assault, they intended at least to inflict grievous hurt on the goldsmith, and being five in number including the proprietor, they all were guilty under ss. 325/149, Penal Code; [p. 453, col. 1.]

Criminal appeal from an order of the Additional Sessions Judge, Lahore, dated the 11th November, 1926.

Dr. Nand Lal, Messrs. Saunders and Brij Lal, for the Appellants.

Mr. Des Raj Sawhney, Public Prosecutor, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

Agha Haidar, J.—The five appellants before us are Nihal Singh and his two sons, Teja Singh and Banta Singh, and two other persons, namely, Ram Singh and Banta Singh son of Hira Singh. They have all been convicted under ss. 302/149, Indian Penal Code. Teja Singh and Banta Singh, sons of Nihal Singh, have been sentenced to death and Nihal Singh and Banta Singh sons of Hira Singh have been transported for life under ss. 302/149, Indian Penal Code. Under ss. 325/149, Indian Penal Code, all the five appellants are also sentenced to three years' rigorous imprisonment.

The record is also before us for the confirmation of the death sentences passed upon Teja Singh and Banta Singh under the provisions of s. 374 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

Briefly stated the story for the prosecution is that on the 8th of August, 1926, at about 7 P. M. there was a wrestling match going on between some boys of the village. The match was being watched by a number of people estimated to be between 50 and 60. The deceased Bishan Singh son of Chanda Singh was a Sunar by occupation and, therefore, a kamin. All the appellants are Jats of the village. It happened that Bishan Singh while watching the wrestling match obstructed the view of Nihal Singh who is stated to be an old man of about 80 and who happened to be watching the match. On this Nihal Singh abused Bishan Singh and ordered him to get out of the way. Bishan Singh also retorted and used some abusive language. On this Nihal Singh considering himself insulted and humiliated by a kamin lad stood up and called out to his sons and others to kill (mar do) "these goldsmith dogs." At this Teja Singh and Banta Singh sons of Nihal Singh, Banta Singh son of Hira Singh and Ram Singh stood up and began the assault. Nihal Singh continued shouting to his young followers but did not strike any blow himself. Banta Singh son of Nihal Singh inflicted the first blow on the head of the deceased and was followed by Teja Singh his brother who gave another blow on the left temple of the deceased. Chanda Singh, the father of the lad Bishan Singh, deceased, intervened and tried to keep off the assailants, but finding it of no avail threw himself upon the prostrate body of his son in order to protect him. The assailants, Banta Singh and Teja Singh son of Nihal Singh, according to the evidence, continued striking blows upon the bodies of the father and son as they lay upon the ground. It does not appear, however, that Banta Singh son of Hira Singh and Ram Singh struck any blows either to Bishan Singh deceased or to his father Chanda Singh. At this stage Maghar Singh one of the Jats who was present at the wrestling match, came forward with a view to separate the assailants from Bishan Singh and his father, but Ram Singh and Banta Singh son of Hira Singh belaboured him also with dangs.

The result of this savage assault was that the deceased Bishan Singh received three serious injuries; one of the injuries left a contusion mark in front of the head measuring 4" x 3", as a result of which the skull had a fracture of right side of frontal bone extending into right temporal bone. According to the evidence of the Civil Surgeon death was due to fracture of the skull. Chanda Singh also received no less than eight injuries, and, according to the medical evidence; two of these injuries, that is to say Nos. 1 and 2, were dangerous to life and grievous. Maghar Singh's injuries were also very serious, as according to the medical evidence among other injuries he received a contusion mark 3" x 1" with much swelling on the left forearm, the radius bone under this contusion being broken. The medical evidence is, therefore, clear that Chanda Singh and Maghar Singh received grievous hurts.

After this fight Bishan Singh's friends and relations took him and his father Chanda Singh to their house in the village. Bishan Singh lingered on during the night and expired on the following day at about 8 A. M. It was a wet night and it had been raining also in the morning so that the First Information Report was made at 2 P. M. on the 9th of August, 1926, at the Police Station of Barki which is at a distance of six miles from the village Thehpura, the scene of the occurrence. It is stated on behalf of the appellants that the First Inform ation Report was unduly delayed. Having regard to the atmospheric condition it cannot be said that it was belated and that the friends and relations of Bishan Singh were free to go to the Police Station, leaving him in this critical condition during the night. We have also the evidence of Tara Singh, an uncle of Bishan Singh, deceased, who states that they tried to take Bishan Singh to the Hospital, or to go out at night to lodge the First Information Report, but the accused threatened them with their dangs and would not let them leave the village.

These facts have been established by the evidence of the eye-witnesses, Tara Singh, Maghar Singh and Chanda Singh. There is another witness also named Deva Singh who professes to be an eye-witness to the occurrence, but having regard to the fact that his statement was recorded somewhat late and he has failed to account satisfactorily for the delay of five or six days which occurred before his statement was recorded by the Police, it would not be safe to place any reliance upon his evidence. Chanda Singh and Maghar Singh received injuries and there can be no manner of doubt that they were present on the spot. Tara Singh also was present on the spot although he was fortunate in not receiving any injuries.

The evidence of these eye-witnesses is sufficient to prove the story as put forward by the prosecution. It may be mentioned here that the evidence of alibi is worthless. Now, the question before the Court is as to what offence or offences the appellants have committed. The appellants are all Jats and, as stated above, Bishan Singh and his father are goldsmiths and, therefore, kamins of the village. Bishan Singh was a lad of 18 only and it is not at all difficult to believe that the fact of his using abusive language towards an old Jat of 80 in the presence of a large assembly must have caused very considerable resentment and annoyance to Nihal Singh and his adherents who are all Jats. When, at the behest of Nihal Singh the appellants rose and made ready for the assault there cannot be any doubt that they all intended at least to inflict grievous hurt upon Bishan Singh deceased and being five in number including Nihal Singh the case comes under ss. 325/149, Indian Penal Code.

But the case of the two sons of Nihal Singh, i. e., Banta Singh and Teja Singh, stands upon a different footing. They struck blows with lathis on the head of a defenceless youth of 18. Even when he fell down they continued hitting him. How reckless and violent was the attack can be judged from the fact that when the father of Bishan Singh fell upon him, in order to protect him they continued their assault and inflicted very savage injuries both upon Bishan Singh as well as on his father Chanda Singh. Their case clearly comes under s. 300, Indian Penal Code in that the attack upon Bishan Singh which resulted in his death was committed either with the intention of causing death or such bodily injury as they knew to be likely to cause death. No exception under s. 300 applies to the facts of the case, so far as Teja Singh and Banta Singh sons of Nihal Singh are concerned.

The quarrel which ended so fatally was begun by Nihal Singh who used abusive language and ordered his sons and others to kill the deceased. There is no evidence whatsoever on the record to show that either Bishan Singh or any one of his party had even an ordinary stick in his hand. The appellants did not receive any injury whatsoever. Thus it appears from the record that the fight was throughout a one-sided affair. The appellants were the aggressors and Bishan Singh and his father and afterwards Maghar Singh were the victims of the appellants' attack.

The question now is what punishment should be awarded to the five appellants. Teja Singh and Banta Singh who struck dangs on the head of the deceased which resulted in his death are undoubtedly guilty of murder under s. 302, but, having regard to the fact that the elements of preparation and premeditation are absent, the ends of justice would be met if the sentence of death is altered to that of transportation for life. Nihal Singh who was at the root of the whole trouble and ordered the fatal assault, deserves no sympathy. He is an old man of 80 and ought to have known better. He let loose his sons and friends upon an unarmed lad of 18 and must, therefore, take the consequence. I, therefore, maintain his conviction and sentence him to seven years' rigorous imprisonment under ss. 325/149 of the Indian Penal Code, as he must have at least contemplated an offence under s. 325 when he gave his word of command.

The appeal of Banta Singh son of Hira

Singh and Ram Singh is allowed to this extent that the sentence of transportation for life passed upon them is set aside and in place thereof they are convicted and sentenced to seven years' rigorous imprisonment under ss. 325/149 of the Indian Penal Code, along with Nihal Singh.

Teja Singh and Banta Singh sons of Nihal Singh are also guilty under ss. 325/149 of the Indian Penal Code. They also deserve punishment under that section. I, therefore, convict them under ss. 325/149 and sentence them to seven years' rigorous imprisonment. This sentence, however, would run concurrently with the sentence of transportation for life.

The result is that Nihal Singh's appeal is allowed to this extent that the sentence of transportation for life passed upon him by the learned Sessions Judge under ss. 302/149, Indian Penal Code is set aside and his conviction under ss. 325/149, Indian Penal Code, is maintained and he is hereby ordered to suffer seven years' rigorous imprisonment under those sections. Teja Singh and Banta Singh, sons of Nihal Singh's appeal is allowed to this extent that instead of the sentence of death passed upon them under s. 302, Indian Penal Code, by the learned Sessions Judge, they are sentenced to transportation for life. Under ss. 325/149, Indian Penal Code they are also guilty and are sentenced hereby to seven years' rigorous imprisonment. This sentence is to run concurrently with the sentence of transportation for life. Banta Singh son of Hira Singh and Ram Singh's appeal is allowed to this extent that the sentence of transportation for life passed upon them by the learned Sessions Judge is set aside and they are hereby convicted under ss. 325/149, Indian Penal Code, and sentenced to seven years' rigorous imprisonment.

Broadway, J.—I concur in the above order.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 250, 562—Accused released under s. 562—Order of compensation, legality of.

A person released under s. 562, Criminal Procedure Code, cannot be ordered to pay compensation to the complainant.

Case reported by the District Magistrate, Attock District, Campbellpur, with his No. 3919-G of 1927.

REPORT.—FACTS.—Abbas Khan complainant was taking away the animals of the accused for the purpose of impounding them because they had trespassed into his lands. The accused interfered, in the way, beat Abbas Khan and rescued the animals. One of the injuries inflicted was of a grievous nature. The complainant remained in the Hospital for 20 days. The accused was challaned under s. 325, Indian Penal Code. Rahim Ali was acquitted and two others convicted and ordered to execute bonds with sureties under s. 562, Criminal Procedure Code, and also to pay Rs. 25 as compensation to the complainant.

GROUND.—The order of the Magistrate is obviously illegal as regards the accused who were convicted. It appears that the compensation awarded to complainant must have been intended as a fine to be recovered from the accused. If that is so then it would appear that the accused were punished by fine in addition to being bound down under s. 562, Criminal Procedure Code. This is illegal as that section of the Criminal Procedure Code can only be applied when no punishment is inflicted.

Inasmuch as the order of the Magistrate is not legal the file is, therefore, submitted to High Court with a view to the said order being set aside by the Hon'ble Judges in so far as it relates to the paying of compensation.

Mr. Farrukh Hussain, for the Complainant-Respondent.

ORDER.—The convicts, who were released by the trial Magistrate under s. 562, Criminal Procedure Code, could not be directed to pay compensation to the complainant. The order is obviously illegal and must be set aside.

It appears that the complainant made an application to the District Magistrate praying that the order under s. 562, Criminal Procedure Code, be set aside and that suitable sentences be awarded to the convicts. But the District Magistrate has not dealt with that application. My order shall not preclude him from adjudicating upon that application.

JUDGMENT.—A complaint under ss. 392, 347/348 and 477, Indian Penal Code, was instituted by certain persons against the petitioners. The Magistrate decided to make an enquiry before issuing process and took action under s. 202, Criminal Procedure Code. At the same time notice was issued to the petitioners to be present although it does not appear that they were allowed to do more than act as spectators of the proceedings. After examining the witnesses produced by the complainants the Magistrate recorded a detailed and reasonable order holding that no prima facie case had been made out against the petitioners and dismissed the complaint. The complainant then moved the Sessions Court on the revision side, and the Additional Sessions Judge ordered a further enquiry, as after a review of the evidence he came to a conclusion different from that arrived at by the learned Magistrate.

Against this order the petitioners have come up to this Court under s. 439, Criminal Procedure Code, and on their behalf I have heard Counsel at length while the complainants' Advocate have addressed me in support of the order for further enquiry.

Most of the authorities cited afford no assistance and need not be discussed. It has been strongly urged that the Magistrate acted against law in issuing notice to the petitioners and allowing them to be present at the enquiry. This procedure is certainly unusual. In re Tukaram Udaram (1) the Bombay High Court held it was not illegal to call on the person complained against to show cause. The Calcutta High Court has, however, taken a different view in Chandi Charan Mitra v. Manindra Chandra Roy (2) a view that found favour with Fford, J., in Joginder Singh v. Agha Safdar Ali Khan (Cr. R. No. 1563 of 1926), and it appears to me a little incongruous to call on a person accused of an offence to show cause against process being issued against him when proceedings under s. 202, Criminal Procedure Code, are in contemplation. At the same time this alone would not induce me to interfere on revision unless there was reason to believe that it had occasioned a miscarriage of justice.

In the present case I am unable to see that the mere presence of the petitioners could have affected the evidence led by the complainants. The Magistrate recorded a detailed order showing that he had considered and weighed all the evidence recorded by him and giving reasons for his being unable to accept it as correct or true.

The learned Additional Sessions Judge has also examined the evidence and as he thought the evidence worthy of credence, ordered a further enquiry. It has been argued that the Additional Sessions Judge acted legally and reliance was placed on Pearey Lal v. Sagar Mal (3) which no doubt is to the point. At the same time it was laid down in Emperor v. Kiru (4) by a Full Bench of the Chief Court that "generally speaking further enquiry after discharge is improper unless the order of discharge was manifestly perverse or foolish or was based upon a record of evidence which was obviously incomplete."

This has been followed consistently by this Court, see for instance Dani v. Emperor (5), Nabi Bakhsh v. Emperor (6) and Karam Chand v. Mathra Das (7) and I am unable to see any reason for refusing to accept that as laying down the rule to be followed by this Court. The order of the Magistrate is not, and has not been called, perverse or foolish and it was not suggested that the record of the evidence was incomplete. The mere fact that the Additional Sessions Judge was prepared to place a different value on the testimony of the witnesses would not warrant the order passed by him. I, therefore, accept this petition and setting aside the order of the Additional Sessions Judge restore that of the Magistrate, dismissing the complaint.

EMPEROR—RESPONDENT.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 476, 526—Prosecution of witness for perjury—Transfer of case—Reasonable apprehension—Impartiality of Magistrate.

The proper time for taking action against a witness under s. 476, Criminal Procedure Code, is the time of delivering the judgment in the case.

Ordering prosecution of a defence witness under s. 476, Criminal Procedure Code, for an offence under s. 193, Penal Code, at the time his evidence is recorded is bound to strike terror in the heart of defence witnesses and is, therefore, a sufficient ground for transfer of the case.

Where the action of the Magistrate is such as to create a reasonable apprehension in the mind of the accused that the Magistrate has made up his mind against him, the case would be transferred even though the Magistrate may have acted with perfect impartiality.

Petition, under s. 526 of the Criminal Procedure Code, for transfer of the case from the Court of the District Magistrate, Lyallpur, to some other Court of competent jurisdiction in some other District.

Mr. Mukand Lal Puri, for the Petitioner

ORDER.—This is an application for the transfer of a case. A lengthy affidavit has been filed on behalf of the applicant and it contains a lot of verbiage. There are number of other allegations too, which have been met by the learned Magistrate who has submitted his explanation. There is one matter however on which, I am afraid, I cannot agree with the view of the learned District Magistrate. A certain witness named Ganesh Das was being examined and at the conclusion of the evidence of this witness, the learned District Magistrate ordered his prosecution under s. 193, Indian Penal Code. The Magistrate further ordered that the witness may be detained in Court until the end of the hearing to show cause why he should not be prosecuted. As a matter of fact at the conclusion of the hearing of the case on that date he did formally order his prosecution, acting apparently under the provisions of s. 476, Criminal Procedure Code. The Magistrate in his explanation submits as follows:—

"The whole attitude and expression of the witness showed so obviously that he was telling a lie that the dignity of a Court of Law required that immediate notice should be taken of the matter and I accordingly recorded the note referred to".

The 'Note' here refers to the Magistrate's decision ordering action being taken under s. 193, Indian Penal Code. In my opinion, this action of the learned Magistrate, however well-intended it may be, was to say the least of it precipitate, the proper time, if he was inclined to take action against any witness under s. 476, Criminal Procedure Code, would have been at the time of delivering judgment in the main case. My own view is that such a step as the Magistrate took in the present case is bound to strike terror into the heart of the defence witnesses and under the circumstances they would be most unwilling to give evidence. This would be very prejudicial to the defence in the case. In a sense the step taken by the learned Magistrate is tantamount to condemning the testimony of one witness at least as false, before the trial of the case had concluded. This alone is sufficient to justify the transfer applied for [Golam Bari Gazi v. Yar Ali Khan (1)].

Having regard to all the circumstances of the case, in my opinion, it would be better if the case were to be transferred to the neighbouring District of Sheikhupura. I feel certain, in my mind, that the learned Magistrate would have decided the case with perfect impartiality and according to his own lights, but the action taken by him against this particular witness was such as to create a reasonable apprehension in the mind of the accused person that the Magistrate had made up his mind against him. The case may be transferred to the neighbouring District of Sheikhupura but it is distinctly understood that the evidence so far as it has been recorded in the case would stand good and only fresh evidence would be produced on behalf of the defence if the accused persons so wish. The case has been dragged on for a long time, which is regrettable, and I trust that the Magistrate before whom the case now goes, would see to it that there are no adjournments and the case is disposed of as soon as possible.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), s. 302—Murder—Provocation—Sentence.

A person who was trusted and treated with hospitality by another seduced the latter's wife and persisted in remaining in his house after having been requested to leave. The injured man killed the seducer. There was no evidence to indicate the circumstances which led to the commission of the murder:

Held, that the conduct of the deceased was certainly provoking, and, in the absence of evidence to indicate the circumstances of the crime, it was

Criminal appeal from an order of the Additional Session Judge, Multan at Dera Ghazi Khan, dated the 26th May, 1927.

Mr. Bihari Lal, for the Appellant.

Mr. Des Raj Sawhny, Public Prosecutor, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—Khandu appellant has been convicted by the Additional Sessions Judge of Multan under s. 302, Indian Penal Code, for having caused the death of Yar Muhammad and has been sentenced to death. He has appealed against his conviction and the case is also before us for confirmation of the capital sentence.

It seems that the deceased met the accused in a fair about six months before his death and both became friendly. In consequence, Yar Muhammad continued to visit Khandu at his house in village Ganga in the District of Muzaffargarh, and finally he began to reside in the house of the appellant. It also appears that shortly before his death the deceased made advance to Musammât Aisha, the wife of the prisoner and after some perseverance succeeded in seducing her. The appellant was informed of this by Ahmad Yar, his servant and, therefore, asked the deceased to leave his house but the latter persisted in staying on for a few days more.

The case for the prosecution is that owing to the conduct of the deceased, the prisoner with the help of one Ali strangled him to death on the night between the 11th and 12th of January, 1927 and after having separated the head from the trunk threw the body in a nalâh near the village and buried the head in the nalâh at a place where there was no water. Ali, it may be mentioned, was sent up for trial but has been acquitted by the Sessions Judge for want of sufficient evidence against him.

On the 12th of January, a headless body was seen floating in the nalâh by Sadda (P. W. No. 2) who informed Ghulam chaukidar (P. W. No. 3). The latter went and reported the discovery at the thana. Muhammad Arif, Head Constable, took charge of the body and sent it for post mortem examination at Muzaffargarh and Sultan Khan, Sub-Inspector on arrival took up the investigation and learnt that Yar Muhammad, who used to live with Khandu appellant had been missing from the village. He also learnt that Khandu suddenly disappeared from the village when the body was discovered by Sadda. Khandu was consequently fetched from the house of his brother-in-law in another village. His house was searched and three reels of silk thread, one of gold thread and the handle of an awl were recovered therefrom. It may be mentioned that Yar Muhammad deceased was a cobbler and these articles pertained to his profession. The same evening as a result of information given by Khandu the head of the deceased was recovered from the place where it had been buried in the nalah, and the next morning he pointed out the place in the roof of his house from where a blood-stained knife was recovered. It is alleged that this knife was used for the purpose of severing the head of the deceased from the trunk. There is ample evidence on the record to prove that the head recovered, was that of Yar Muhammad, and the medical evidence shows that the head and the trunk were of the same person. There is, therefore, no doubt that Yar Muhammad was done to death.

The appellant was produced before a Magistrate of the First Class on the 18th of January, who recorded his statement under s. 164, Criminal Procedure Code. In that statement the accused confessed that he had killed the deceased but we are not prepared to place any reliance on this confession. In the first instance, the facts stated therein are contradicted by the medical evidence in some details and secondly in the course of this statement the appellant disclosed the fact that "the Police took him in custody and told him that he would be set off on a promise of pardon." This presumably means that he was told that, if he confessed, he would be pardoned. This confession must, therefore, be excluded from consideration in determining the guilt of the appellant. The following circumstances have, however, been proved against the accused.

(a) The deceased lived in his house and suddenly disappeared and was next found murdered. Before the discovery of the body the accused stated to Karim Bakhsh (P. W. No. 19), the brother of the deceased, in the presence of Wasaya (P. W. No. 14) that the deceased had left his house and gone back to his own village. This information was obviously false, because the deceased had not gone to his house, and he could not have left the appellant's house, with the intention of returning to his home because his goods were found in the house of the appellant.

(b) He confessed to Khuda Bakhsh (P. W. No. 7) that he had killed Yar Muhammad when the former fetched him from the house of his brother-in-law Musa to his own village after the arrival of the Sub-Inspector.

(c) The head of the deceased was recovered in pursuance of the information supplied by the prisoner.

(d) The recovery of the blood-stained knife was also made in consequence of the information supplied by him.

(e) The tracks of two men were noticed in the nalah where the body was seen floating and on comparison one set of the tracks was found by Ramzan (P. W. No. 8) to correspond with the footprints of the appellant.

(f) Immediately after the recovery of the corpse the appellant disappeared from the village.

The circumstances stated above taken with the motive for the crime, which has been established by the testimony of Wasaya (P. W. No. 14) and Ahmad Yar (P. W. No. 16) leave no doubt that it was the appellant who killed Yar Muhammad. We hold, therefore, that he has been rightly convicted of the murder of Yar Muhammad.

We have next to consider the question of sentence. It is apparent that the deceased who was trusted and treated with hospitality by the appellant seduced his wife and persisted in remaining in the appellant's house after he had been requested to leave. His conduct was certainly provoking and, there is no evidence to indicate the circumstances which led the appellant to commit the crime. We consider that this is not a case in which the extreme penalty of the law should be inflicted on the convict. We are of opinion that a sentence of transportation or life will meet the ends of justice. While maintaining the conviction we accept the appeal so far as to reduce the sentence to one of transportation for life.

secutor.Mr. V. L. Ethiraj, for the Accused.JUDGMENT.*Jackson, J.—Appeal by Government against the acquittal of accused in C. C.
No. 48 of 1926 Joint Magistrate, Tiruppattur.

Accused holds a license to possess 500 gallons of petrol at Katpadi. On the evening of 28th November, 1926, he took delivery of 1000 gallons at Katpadi Railway Station.
At 10 a. m. on 29th November, 1926, his premises were visited by the Police and he was found to be in possession of 900 gallons. His brother who was examined on his behalf (D. W. No. 1) explained that 500 gallons were to be retained at Katpadi, and 400 gallons were for despatch to Vellore and Madanapalli.

The learned Magistrate acquitted the accused on the ground that "the quantity in excess of the amount allowed by his license, 400 gallons were really intended for distribution and not for possession, and was, therefore, covered by his transport license.

His temporary possession of the excess quantity for a few hours was inevitable in the circumstances and does not amount to the possession contemplated in s. 15 (a),
Act VIII of 1899.

If a licensee is found to be keeping quantity of petrol upon his premises in excess of the licensed amount he infringes
s. 5 (1) of the Act.

"No quantity of dangerous petroleum exceeding 40 gallons shall be...kept by any one person or on the same premises except under...a license etc." It is no excuse in such circumstances to plead that the petrol thus kept is "for distribution".
Petrol is always kept for distribution, and if it were held that s. 5 does not cover petrol kept for distribution, no one need ever take out a license.

When he says that the possession is, therefore, covered by the transport license, the learned Magistrate does not appear to be referring to any specific document.
Nothing of the sort was exhibited by the accused and though this Court adjourned the case for this purpose nothing is forthcoming. He seems to mean that the accused had power to license the transport of the petrol from Katpadi to Vellore and to Madanapalli. Strictly speaking, the accused should have issued a transport license to remove the 1000 gallons from Katpadi Railway Station to his Katpadi
Depôt, and then he should have issued a license for 200 gallons to be removed north to Madanapalli and for 200 gallons to be removed south to Vellore. As the Police intervened before these supplies were despatched to either place probably no licenses were actually issued.

The reference to the license, or rather the power to license, is all part of the Magistrate's argument that possession with the intention to distribute is not possession under s. 5 of the Act. The accused in his opinion intended to license consignments to Vellore and to Madanapalli, and had the power to do so; and from the time that he took delivery at the Railway Station until he removed the petrol respectively to Vellore and to Madanapalli there was merely the act of transport and not the act of possession. In answer to this contention it is only necessary to repeat that if taking from the Railway Station, keeping at the depot and removing to the market, are all mere incidents in the act of transport, there would be no need for any one to take out a license for keeping.

But the Magistrate may intend his theory only to apply to "the temporary possession of the excess quantity for a few hours." He may mean, that is to say, that the 'intention to distribute' by itself is not enough to excuse the keeping of an excess quantity, it must be intention to distribute coupled with the fact that the period of keeping is short. If the argument proceeds upon these lines, it is difficult to determine what periods may be said to be short enough or too long. If a man may keep petrol in excess for 16 hours, may he for 32, or for 64, it may be said that a mere halt in the process of transport cannot be counted as keeping, but whatever force that idea may have at any rate it has no applicability to the present case.

A period from sun-down till 10 o'clock next morning is not the ordinary halt of a Bandyman. The true solution of the difficulty is to hold that under the Statute a man who possesses petrol and is not removing it, is keeping it.

But in certain circumstances as for example way-side halts, the infringement would be so entirely technical as to be nugatory and no authority would think of directing a prosecution. But there is obviously a very great difference between a way-side halt, and keeping petrol in a depôt for sixteen hours. In the latter case the heinousness of the offence may be arguable, but that the offence has been committed seems to admit of no doubt.

As a further plea the Magistrate holds that the possession besides being only for a few hours, was inevitable in the circumstances. There is nothing in the terms of the license to excuse "inevitable" breaches. Nor as to what exactly the circumstances were is there any finding and without a finding the term inevitable is meaningless. A firm which has a depôt licensed only to contain 500 gallons can avoid keeping an excess quantity in that depot by confining its consignments to 500 gallons, provided that the depôt is empty. And an agent who takes delivery of more gallons than it may lawfully keep in his depôt can avoid the infringement of his license by despatching the petrol direct to the outlying markets from the Railway Station. In the present case no more than 500 gallons need have been consigned and as 1000 were consigned the accused might have despatched 500 straight to Vellore and Madanapalli. The infringement so far from being inevitable was eminently avoidable. I should not consider that we were bound by this finding of inevitability because, on the evidence, it is perverse, nor do I consider that it has any force in law.

To sum up. If a person licensed to keep 500 gallons keeps 900 gallons of petrol in his depôt he commits an offence under ss. 5 and 15, Act VIII of 1899.

He may plead that he had not kept the excess quantity very long, and had not intended to keep it much longer, but this is only a plea of extenuation which cannot be regarded as a plea of acquittal.

The case on which the learned Magistrate relies, In re Swaminatha Iyer (1), does not traverse this view. In that case a person who had no depôt dumped the petrol upon the Railway platform and there and then sold it to customers. It was held that the accused would be guilty of unlawful keeping, if he had kept the petrol on the Railway premises for a length of time which would not be required in the ordinary course of business for the purposes of distribution. But apparently in that case the accused dealt out the cans to the various purchasers so promptly that the whole transaction was entirely one of removal. I do not think that this ruling would cover circumstances in which a longer period was occupied.

Suppose, for instance, a man set up a sort of petrol shop on the platform, and spent 16 hours distributing petrol to customers, he would be held, I think, to be keeping petrol within the mischief of the Act.

I would allow the appeal. The Public Prosecutor is only concerned with the interpretation of the law and does not press for a penalty. I would, therefore, inflict a nominal sentence of a fine one rupee. But since the case will have to go before a third Judge, this is a mere expression of opinion.

Madhavan Nair, J.—I have had the advantage of reading the judgment prepared by my learned brother. I regret I cannot agree with his view.

(1) 39 Ind. Cas. 995; (1917) M. W. N. 720; 13 Cr. L. J. 627.

The facts in the case are admitted; and the learned Public Prosecutor has argued the question of law on the findings of fact arrived at by the learned Joint Magistrate.

The accused was found on the 29th November, 1926, to be in possession of 900 gallons of petrol of which he was admittedly entitled to keep 500 gallons as per license. The remaining 400 gallons contained in 200 cans were received by him as sub-agent of the B. O. C. under a transport license for despatching them to Vellore and Madanapalli. It is not denied that this transport license entitled him to receive the petrol sent to him by the Burma Oil Company and to despatch it to various places. The 200 cans which were received on the evening of the 28th November were ready for despatch and were kept loaded in bandies for the purpose at 10 A. M. on the 29th, when the Police made their surprise visit. It had been found that this excess quantity was really intended for distribution and its possession for few hours was inevitable in the circumstances. The correctness of the latter finding has not been questioned before us. Nothing has been suggested against the bona fide of the accused in this case. What is suggested in argument is that if, for purposes of legitimately transporting petrol covered by a transport license, it is inevitable that the agent should keep petrol with him temporarily for a few hours, then, unless he protects himself by a special license for such purpose, he will be guilty of possessing petrol in contravention of the Indian Petroleum Act and will be liable for prosecution under s. 15 (a). Neither the Act nor the Rules provide for any temporary storage license.

The question for consideration is whether temporary possession of petroleum, which is inevitable in the circumstances and which is covered by a transport license, amounts to 'possession' in contravention of the Indian Petroleum Act VIII of 1899, within the meaning of s. 15 (a). That section says, "Whoever in contravention of this Act or of any of the rules thereunder, imports, possesses or transports any petroleum" shall be liable to certain penalties. Section 5 (1) of the Act which refers to dangerous petroleum says "No quantity of dangerous petroleum exceeding forty gallons shall be imported or transported or kept by any one person or on the same premises, except under, and in accordance with the conditions (if any) of, a license from the Local Government." Section 11 which refers to the possession or transport of petroleum which is not dangerous states that "No quantity of petroleum exceeding 500 gallons shall be kept by any one person or on the same premises, or shall be transported, except under, and in accordance with the conditions of, a license granted under this Act." In In re Swaminatha Iyer (1), in circumstances very similar to the present, it was held by Abdur Rahim and Napier, JJ, that for a prosecution under s. 15 (a) for "possession" of petroleum in contravention of the Act the possession of the same must be such as to amount to 'keeping' within the meaning of s. 11, and that a person cannot be said to 'keep' petroleum if he distributed the same within a reasonable time of taking delivery by him. Thus laying down the law, the learned Judge stated that "It has to be found whether upon the evidence as produced at the trial, there was 'possession' or 'keeping,' within the meaning of ss. 11 and 15 (a) on the part of the accused, of more than 500 gallons of petroleum" and for this purpose they remitted the appeal to the Sessions Judge. In the same case the learned Judges also point out that, if the agent had induced the Railway Authorities to allow him to keep the consignment exceeding 500 gallons on the premises for a length of time which would not be required, in the ordinary course of business, for the purposes of distribution, it would be 'keeping' or 'possession' within the meaning of ss. 11 and 15 of the Act. These observations clearly show that the question whether there was possession in contravention of the Act of the excess petroleum within the meaning of s. 15 (a) is really one of fact and has to be decided with reference to the facts of each particular case. As I have said, it has been found here that the possession of the excess petroleum was inevitable in the circumstances of the case and this finding has not in any way been attacked. We should not attempt to minimise its effect by suggesting that the accused could have transported the petrol in a shorter time or more satisfactorily by following any other method or by finding now that in the present case there was no compelling circumstance. I am not dealing with the case on the assumption that the 'delay' in this case was avoidable because that plea has not been put forward by the Public Prosecutor. I think the finding amounts to this, that the accused was about to remove the excess petrol for purposes of distribution within a reasonable time after its receipt when the Police made a surprise visit. I think the keeping of petroleum received under a transport license, for a short period which is incidental to, and necessary for, the distribution of it cannot amount to 'keeping' or 'possession' within the meaning of ss. 5, 11 and 15 (a). The question whether the period of time is short enough to be considered reasonable or too long to be considered reasonable will have to be decided with reference to the particular facts of each case and this is precisely what it laid down in In re Swaminatha Iyer (1). If this is not the correct view, I think transportation of petrol from one place to another for distribution to customers, which is perfectly legal under the Act, will become well-nigh impossible and the distributing agent unless he is always on the move will be liable to prosecution. Sections 5 and 11 of the Act should not be construed as if they stood alone in the Act. We must give a reasonable interpretation to the provisions of the Act.

In my view, this case is governed by the principle of the decision in In re Swaminatha Iyer (1). I would, therefore, uphold the order of acquittal passed by the learned Joint Magistrate and dismiss the appeal by the Government.

By the Court.—Owing to the difference of opinion between us, the case will be posted before the Chief Justice for passing orders under s. 429, Criminal Procedure Code.

JUDGMENT.

Wallace, J.—This appeal has been posted before me owing to a difference of opinion between Jackson, J., and Madhavan Nair, J. It is an appeal by Government against the acquittal of the accused by the Joint Magistrate of Tiruppattur. The charge against him was illegal possession of petrol in excess of the quantity covered by his license to 'keep' petrol.

The facts not disputed are that the accused holds a license for storage of 500 gallons of petrol and has a store for that quantity at Katpadi. He is the agent of the Burma Oil Company and as their agent also holds a transport license for transport of petrol without limit of quantity. On 28th November, 1926, evening he took delivery at the Katpadi Railway Station of 1000 gallons. He carried these to his premises, put 500 in store, disposed of another 100 before dark, and kept the remaining 400 in bandies on his premises over-night with a view to transporting them in the morning to Vellore and Madanapalli for which places he had booked orders. At 10 A. M. on the 29th morning the Police visited the premises and found the 400 gallons in excess. The case was argued before me, and I think also before the learned Judges of the Bench, on the footing that these 400 gallons were really intended for transport and would have been transported on that morning if the Police had not paid their visit. The question, therefore, resolves itself into this: Does a transport license covers a halt over-night, say from sun-down till 10 A. M. next morning, so that the possession of petrol during that halt is not the 'keeping' of petrol within the meaning of s. 5 (1) of the Act?

Now a license for the transport of petrol must obviously include permission to be in possession of the petrol for the purpose of and during the process of transportation. It would be absurd to hold that in addition to the license to transport, the transporter, e.g., the Bandyman, must be in possession of a license to keep petrol on his 'premises' or that every place at which he halts on his way must also possess a license to 'keep' petrol. A license to 'keep' petrol lays down stringent conditions as to the nature of the building etc. and these cannot by any stretch of imagination be held applicable to a country cart or a motor lorry or a Railway waggon. Also so long as Government does not lay down rules regarding the issue of temporary licenses to cover such temporary possession if they consider such possession illegal without a license of that nature or regarding the provision of licensed halting places which transporters must use, it is unreasonable to hold that the transporter cannot except on peril of prosecution halt his consignment for a few hours over-night in places which are not formally licensed to keep petrol. The transport of petrol during the night time obviously has its own dangers. Therefore, it must be taken to be the law, and also is common sense, that a license to transport includes permission to possess or keep for the process of and during the transport.

Now if the transporter, the accused in the case, had halted at any other place on his journey from the Railway Station to his destination from sun down to 10 A. M. with his consignment of petrol, I would not hold that this was such an unreasonable halt that it cannot be said to have been in the process of transport or can be said to constitute the possession of petrol during that halt a keeping of it within the meaning of s. 5 (1) of the Act. If then such a halt would not be an offence in regard to any other place, it cannot be an offence because the place at which the bandies were kept was the accused's own premises. The fact that he has a store for petrol there makes no difference. If a halt just outside his premises is no offence, it does not become an offence if the halt is within the premises. The halt was during and in the process of transportation and the possession of petrol during that period is, therefore, not an offence.

I, therefore, agree with Madhavan Nair, J., and hold that no offence has been committed and I, therefore, dismiss this appeal.

LAHORE HIGH COURT.

CRIMINAL REVISION CASE No. 1466 OF 1927.

November 11, 1927.

Present:—Sir Shadi Lal, Kt., Chief Justice.

PHUMAN SINGH—ACCUSED—PETITIONER
versus

EMPEROR THROUGH ATTAR SINGH—COMPLAINANT—RESPONDENT.

Practice—Stay of criminal proceedings during pendency of civil suit.

When the subject-matter for adjudication before a Civil Court is the same as before a Magistrate, the Magistrate would be exercising a wise discretion in staying criminal proceedings pending the decision of the Civil Court even though the civil suit is filed during the pendency of the criminal proceedings. [P. 464, col. 1.]

Emperor v. Bishen Das (1), followed.

Case reported by the District Magistrate, Lyallpur under s. 438 of the Criminal Procedure Code.

REPORT.—FACTS.—Attar Singh respondent is a lamardar through whom Phuman Singh the applicant was to pay his revenue. Phuman Singh presented an application to the Tehsildar that he had paid Rs. 200 to Attar Singh asking him to pay out of it the revenue due from him (Phuman Singh) and from his brother and to pay back the balance. This application was apparently filed in connection with proceedings being taken by the Tehsildar to recover revenue from Phuman Singh and the lamardar Attar Singh having reported him as not having paid. On this application the Tehsildar remarked that Phuman Singh must take action through the Civil Courts to establish that he had paid Attar Singh, and proceeded to recover the revenue due from Phuman Singh by revenue process. Attar Singh lamardar then came forward and stated that the application which Phuman Singh had presented to the Tehsildar amounted to an accusation of fraud, and was, therefore, defamatory and he put in a complaint of defamation under s. 500 accordingly. That complaint is proceeding in the Court of Sardar Bahadur Sardar Dilbagh Singh, Honorary Magistrate. Phuman Singh has now apparently sued Attar Singh for the Rs. 200 and asks that as the Civil Court will now be called upon to adjudicate on the question of the payment of Rs. 200 the criminal proceedings should be stayed because if the Civil Court finds that Phuman Singh did in fact pay the money to Attar Singh and that, therefore, the application to the Tehsildar was true no case of defamation could lie.

My attention has been drawn to Emperor v. Bishen Das (1) where the circumstances seem very similar.

GROUND.—I have heard Counsel for both parties to-day. On behalf of the respondent it is argued that this case is very different to the one referred to as Emperor v. Bishen Das (1) inasmuch as in that case a Civil Court had reached a decision prior to the institution of the criminal case. In the present case at the time the complainant presented his complaint in Court the matter was not pending before a Civil Court nor was it one which the complainant could take to a Civil Court. Since the institution of the criminal case, however, applicant has taken the case into a Civil Court, which has now been called upon to adjudicate definitely on the question as to whether or not Phuman Singh paid Rs. 200 to Attar Singh. The allegation in the criminal case is that Phuman Singh had falsely stated that he had paid Rs. 200 to Attar Singh and that this false statement amounted to defamation. It is obvious that if the Civil Court holds that Rs. 200 were in fact paid, the whole defamation case must fall to the ground. The Chief Court, in the order in the criminal judgment referred to, laid down that the Magistrate in that case would have exercised a wise discretion if he had of his own motion stayed the proceedings in his Court pending the decision of the Civil Court. Those words appear to apply equally forcibly to the present case now that the dispute has definitely been taken into a Civil Court. Accordingly, under s. 438, Criminal Procedure Code, I forward the proceedings to the High Court of Judicature at Lahore, with the recommendation that in the present case the Magistrate be directed to stay proceedings in the defamation case pending the decision of the Civil Court.

Mr. Lakhpat Rai, for the Respondent.

ORDER.—For the reasons recorded by the learned District Magistrate I stay proceedings in the criminal case pending the decision of the civil suit.

*Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 262—
Complaint—Magistrate calling for counter-evidence—Dismissal of complaint without giving complainant opportunity to meet such evidence, legality of.*

Where a Magistrate holding an inquiry under s. 202, Criminal Procedure Code, has before him evidence opposed to the complainant's allegations, he should give opportunity to the complainant to explain or meet such evidence.

It is not open to a Magistrate to reject a complaint holding that the accused acted under a bona fide claim of right and that, therefore, no offence was committed by him, merely on a perusal of records sent for by him from the Police or a private individual.

Petition, under ss. 435 and 439 of the Code of the Criminal Procedure, 1898, praying the High Court to revise the order of the Court of Session of Coimbatore Division, in Criminal Revision Petition No. 41 of 1926, presented to revise the order of the Court of the District Magistrate, Nilgiris, dated the 22nd September, 1926, and passed in C. C. No. 3 of 1926.

Mr. V. L. Ethiraj, for the Petitioner.

The Public Prosecutor, for the Crown.

Mr. Sidney Smith instructed by Messrs. Moresby & Co., for the Respondent.

ORDER.—This is an application by the complainant to revise the order of the District Magistrate of the Nilgiris dismissing his complaint of robbery. The contention of the complainant is that he was the owner of a car and he was in possession of it for over two years and that the counter-petitioner forcibly took the car from his possession and thereby committed robbery. The learned District Magistrate after examining the complainant on oath sent for some records from the Police and some records from a private individual, perused them and came to the conclusion that the counter-petitioner acted under a bona fide claim of right and, therefore, no offence was committed by him. It does not appear from the records nor is it suggested by Mr. Smith who appears for the counter-petitioner, that the complainant was given an opportunity to meet the evidence that was available before the Magistrate to disprove the statements made in the complaint. It is open to a Magistrate to hold a preliminary enquiry under s. 202, Criminal Procedure Code, but in holding such enquiry if evidence which is opposed to the complainant's allegations is brought before him he should give opportunity to the complainant to explain or to meet such evidence. In this case such a procedure was not adopted. The District Magistrate satisfied himself by looking at certain records that the counter-petitioner acted bona fide. At this stage of the case, I decline to discuss the question of law whether an act which is done under colour of right would or would not come within the purview of s. 379, Indian Penal Code, for that depends on fact and as any observation of mine on facts might prejudice one side or other I carefully refrain from doing so. The District Magistrate not having disbelieved the complainant's version and the sworn statement he should have given him an opportunity to prove his case. This he has not done. On this sole ground I think the order of the District Magistrate should be set aside. I, therefore, set aside the order of the District Magistrate and direct that the case be enquired into by a Magistrate outside the Nilgiris. The District Magistrate of Coimbatore to whose file it is transferred will enquire into and dispose of it according to law.

KASHINATH CHIMNAJI—PLAINTIFF—
RESPONDENT.Workmen's Compensation Act (VIII of 1923), ss. 3, 10—Accident to workmen—Employer, liability of—Notice to employer.

To bring a case under the Workmen's Compensation Act, two conditions must be satisfied; the accident must be one arising out of the employment, and it must also be in the course of the employment, [p. 465, col. 2.]

A Railway coolie was returning by an electric train from some place where he had been sent to do some work. He was standing near a carriage door which was left open by the Company. The train while going up a bridge received a jerk and the coolie fell out of the train and died. In a suit for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act:

Held, that if the carriage with the open door was a dangerous place, it was a dangerous place provided by the masters of the coolie, the Railway Company, and they were liable to pay compensation as the accident was in the course of and arose out of the employment of the coolie. [p. 468, col. 1.]

A notice given by the family of a deceased workman after six days of the accident cannot be said not to have been given as soon as practicable after the accident. [p. 466, col. 1.]

First appeal from the decision of the Commissioner for Workmen's Compensation.

Mr. Kanga, Advocate-General, for the Appellant.

Mr. S. R. Bakhale for Mr. P. S. Bakhale, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—We understand that this is the first case to be brought before the High Court under the new Workmen's Compensation Act, 1923. I only hope that it is not going to be the forerunner of a large number of other cases, for, as we know, the English Workmen's Compensation Act has given rise to more litigation and more differences of opinion between various Judges than any legislation of modern times; and with our present over-crowded list we are not in a position to stand any substantial increase of litigation.

The present case is an appeal by the G. I. P. Railway Company under s. 30 of the Act, against an award of a sum of Rs. 750 by the Commissioner as lump compensation to the father and other relatives of the deceased. The question before us is whether the accident arose out of and in the course of the workman's employment within the meaning of s. 3 of the Act. As has been clearly laid down in the English cases dealing with the same words, both those conditions must be satisfied, viz., the accident must be one arising out of the employment. It must also be in the course of the employment. And unless both those conditions are satisfied, the workman cannot bring his case within the Act.

Now in the present case the Company admits before us that the accident arose in the course of the workman's employment. But it is denied by them that it arose out of his employment. It is further contended by the Company that the workman acted in wilful disobedience of a rule expressly framed for the purpose of securing the safety of workmen within proviso (b) (ii) to s. 3. It was also originally contended that he had no right to travel in the particular manner he did, and also that notice was not given as soon as practicable after the happening of the event as required by the Act.

The short facts are these. The workman was in the employ of the Company on Rs. 25 a month, and was employed at Kalyan. He was sent on a message by one of the Company's Officers from Kalyan to Bombay. In Bombay he was directed by another of the Company's Officers to return to Kalyan. On his way back he was travelling in an electric train as far as Kurla. While so travelling he, to follow the language of the plaint, being "a coolie under the engineering department, on January 16, 1926, received personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment at the Sandhurst Road new bridge. The cause of injury is that while he was standing (at about 12-52 P.M. on the day mentioned at the entrance of the carriage of a train on the Harbour branch supporting himself on the vertical iron bar, the train while going up the bridge received a jerk, and as a result of that Ganpat fell down on the lines and died consequently." In their written statement the Company do not deny the facts as stated in the claim, except that they do deny that the accident arose out of and in the course of his employment.

Now taking the points one by one, first of all, as regards notice under s. 10, the accident occurred on January 16, 1926, and notice was given on January 22, 1926. It was contended that this was not given as soon as practicable after the happening of the accident. But in my judgment, that suggestion is entirely unfounded, when one considers the condition the man's family would be in after an accident such as this. Moreover, to give a notice under the Act, the family would, no doubt, have to consult some lawyer, for a layman cannot be expected to be familiar with his precise rights under this particular Act. I need not, however, pursue this point.

Then as regards the proviso to s. 3 of the Act, that arises in this way. The Company have apparently issued certain warning notices in connection with these electric trains, which state, amongst other things, "Do not stand near the door." It is contended that this is a rule expressly framed for the purpose of securing the safety of workmen within s. 3. In our opinion that is not a fair construction of s. 3. The notice in question, if it is a rule at all, is one expressly framed for the purpose of securing the safety of passengers in general, and not for that of workmen. No doubt, what s. 3 primarily contemplates are certain rules or regulations in a factory for preventing, for instance, workmen coming within particular dangerous area in the factory. And there are many other instances one can think of. Accordingly, we do not think that the Company are protected by this proviso in the present case.

Then I may get rid of another argument they urged in the Court below. They said they had got another rule which prevented workmen going by the electric trains at all. It seems somewhat inconsistent with the point I have just dealt with, but at any rate it is a point which they made in the Court below, and which they have abandoned before us. There is, therefore, nothing in that point because they conceded that the workman was entitled to travel on the return journey by this particular electric train.

We, therefore, come to the question, which is really the crux of the case, as to whether in acting as he did, the workman's accident arose out of his employment. Now in the first place, one has to see exactly what is the admitted evidence in the case. It was at first suggested to us—so I understood—that the learned Commissioner had acted without taking any evidence, and that this was an irregular procedure. But when one comes to look at the plaint and the written statement, it is clear that on those two documents—at any rate if one treats them as pleadings—there was no dispute as to how the accident arose. I have already read out what may be described as the plaint. I have already referred to what is called the written statement. So we may take it that the cause of injury was that while the workman was standing at the entrance of the carriage of this train supporting himself on the vertical iron bar, the train, while going up the bridge, received a jerk, and as a result of that Ganpat fell down on the lines and died consequently.

Why then did he fall out of the train in this way? The answer is that the door was open. In reply to certain questions put to him by the Bench, the learned Advocate-General produced a rough sketch of the carriages used on these electric trains, which show that there were six doors in all, three on each side, and that in the middle of each door there was a place called "vertical iron stanchion." The learned Advocate General stated (this of course is not in evidence) that the stanchion is not used for the purpose of shutting the doors or holding them in any way when they are shut, but that the stanchion comes inside the carriage when the doors are shut. He further stated that in practice these trains all run with the doors open, because it is not practicable for the Railway Company to find porters to shut the doors. It was at first further suggested that this was in accordance with the regulations of the Railway Board or other proper authorities. But when we asked for the regulation to be produced, it was subsequently admitted that this procedure could not be justified under the regulations. Indeed I rather gather that in ordinary trains to travel deliberately with open doors is a matter which is prohibited under the regulations.

But later on in the case the learned Advocate-General said that though he had made these statements, they were not in evidence and accordingly we must go by the evidence in the case. But taking the evidence as it stands, it is a reasonable inference that the door was open. That being so, I do not think we ought to infer that the workman opened that door. Still less ought we to do so after what we were told by Counsel, who has made statements quite frankly to assist the Court, which cannot be entirely ignored.

Now that being so, was there evidence before the Commissioner on which he could find that this accident arose out of the employment of the workman? We have here a case where the Company in effect invite passengers to use these carriages on the electric line. This particular carriage was left with the door in question, if not other doors, open. Presumably the passengers were entitled to consider that that was a safe mode in which to travel, if it was done deliberately by the Railway Company. There was a jerk in the train, and the traveller was thrown out. What added risk then did he expose himself to beyond what would be so in the case of an ordinary traveller. This class of case is naturally near the line. But on the facts of the present case, I think there was evidence before the learned Commissioner on which he could properly find that the traveller in question, viz., the workman, did not take any greater risk than an ordinary traveller would do while travelling at the present time on one of these electric trains. I lay some stress on the fact that that door was left open. I think this has a material bearing on the circumstances of the present case.

We were referred to certain English authorities which have been naturally of great value to us in arriving at our conclusion, because they clearly bring out what is described as an added peril. For instance, in Lancashire and Yorkshire Ry. v. Highley (1), there the workman in the course of his employment crossed the Railway by an unauthorised way, and exposed himself to an added peril by going under the trucks of a standing goods train. The train moved and he was killed. It was held that although it was proper for him to cross the line at a particular place, he was exposing himself to an added peril by attempting to pass under the trucks in the way he did. But that was not entirely an accident arising out of his employment and was not an ordinary risk of his employment, and consequently the Act did not apply.

(2) (1903) 2 K. B. 718; 72 L. J. K. B. 729; 52 W. R. 66; 89 L. T. 176; 19 T. L. R. 649.

in the course of his employment fell out of the train. The question arose as to whether the mere fact of his falling out of the train was sufficient to prove that it had arisen out of his employment. In other words, was he merely doing what an ordinary passenger might do? At the first hearing before the Court of Appeal their Lordships differed; Lord Justice Mathew took the view that the learned County Court Judge had (page 723*) drawn the inference that the deceased did no more than an ordinary passenger in the train might do. But on the evidence in that particular case the other two Judges, viz., Collins, M. R., and Lord Justice Stirling were not prepared to go as far as that on the then evidence, and accordingly the whole Court agreed in sending the case back to the County Court Judge. On remand—certain further evidence was taken of the passengers in the train, and the County Court Judge said he could draw no other inference than that the accident occurred when the deceased was acting as an ordinary passenger would do. On that further finding the Court of Appeal came to the conclusion that there was evidence on which he could so find, and accordingly they refused to disturb the finding of the County Court Judge. But even then the accident itself was left in a condition of some doubt, for the Court only arrived at this rather tentative conclusion (page 726*):

"The evidence rather suggests that while the deceased was still standing up and was putting his basket in the rack the train began to move, and as it travelled rather unsteadily at starting the deceased lost his balance and fell against the window in the upper part of the door, and so fell out of the train."

Of course we have not got here, I take it, a door or a window like an ordinary English railway carriage. We have here a carriage with large openings and sliding doors such as are found in many electric trains in England.

Then another case cited was Jibb v. Chadwick (3). There the workman tried to enter the train whilst in motion, and it was held that "the risk attaching to the attempt to enter a train in motion was not a risk reasonably incidental to the deceased's employment. He had exposed himself to an added risk by doing an unauthorised and illegal act, and the accident did not, therefore, arise out of the employment within s. 1, sub-s. 1, of the Act." In that action it was pointed out by Lord Justice Swinfen Eady in his judgment, quoting also a Scottish case to the same effect, that (page 99*) "the risk of entering a train in motion, which is prohibited by Act of Parliament, cannot be included or regarded as one of the risks of Railway travelling."

Then Brice v. Lloyd (4) was a case where a workman employed at certain works climbed on to a hot water tank in the building to eat his supper. The tank was only partially covered in. On returning to his work the man fell into the tank and was scalded to death. The workmen were not allowed on the tank. There Lord Justice Kennedy said (page 810†):

"But where, as here, a man chooses to go to a dangerous place where he has no business to go, incurring a danger of his own choosing and one altogether outside any reasonable exercise of his employment, in my opinion, if he meets with an accident, it cannot be said that the accident arose out of his employment."

Here, if the carriage was a dangerous place, it was a dangerous place provided by his masters the Railway Company, viz., an electric coach on which the door in question, if not the other doors, were not properly shut. The fact that the man leaned against the stanchion for protection did not necessarily involve that he was negligent. He may have thought that that stanchion was put there expressly for the protection of passengers, and that he was safer in holding on to it than if he stood on some other part of the carriage without having anything to hold on to at all.

As regards the point whether the carriage at the time was crowded or not, as may often be the case, we have no evidence. But as it was in the middle of the day probably it was not.

Taking however the facts as we find them, we think there was evidence on which the Commissioner could arrive at the finding, which he did, viz., in effect that the applicants had discharged the onus of proof which lay upon them. It was contended that the learned Commissioner had misapprehended the onus of proof, and really put the onus on the Railway Company to show that they were not liable. With all respect I do not think that that suggestion is justified by the judgment of the learned Commissioner. It is quite clear from the cases to which allusion has already been made, and which only state the ordinary well-accepted procedure under this type of legislation, that the onus of proof is on the applicants to allege that they are entitled to the benefit of the Act.

Under these circumstances the appeal will be dismissed with costs.

T. S. FIRM—PLAINTIFFS—RESPONDENTS.

Contract Act (IX of 1872), s. 72—"Coercion," meaning of—Satisfaction of decree to save interference with business—Suit to recover, whether lies.

The word "coercion" in s. 72, Contract Act, is used in its general sense, and if a third person is coerced into paying the money in satisfaction of a decree against another, and is not himself liable for the money, a suit does lie to recover that money. [p. 469, col. 1.]

Kanhaya Lal v. National Bank of India, Ltd. (1), followed.

A payment to save a serious interference with one's business is a payment under coercion. [p. 469 col. 2.]

Mr. Janab Ali, for the Appellant.

Mr. Ekambaram, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The respondent T. S. Firm in Civil Regular No. 122 of 1924 of the Township Court, Pyapon, filed a suit against two persons, Maung Sit Pin and Ah Kwin, whom they called in the plaint managing partners of the Firm of Ho Ho Company, Pyapon, for money due on a promissory note. The defendants admitted the execution of the promissory note and a decree was passed against them. Nothing was said in the decree as to their being partners of the Ho Ho Firm. The decree was passed on the 20th May, 1924. On the 4th June the Chettyar firm applied for warrant of attachment of property in execution of the decree and the property attached was the property in the possession of the present appellant, Ah Choon, who was carrying on the business in the shop. The Deputy Bailiff claimed to effect the warrant of attachment. Ah Choon, in order to prevent all the goods in his shop being seized, paid the decretal amount Rs. 894 to the Deputy Bailiff. The next day he made an application in the Court to the effect that the goods were his and were not liable to attachment and asked for the removal of the attachment. But this application was unsuccessful and the money was paid to the decree-holder. Ah Choon then brought a suit out of which this appeal has arisen for recovery of the money which he alleges was paid by him under coercion to the Deputy Bailiff. The trial Court held that the money was paid under coercion and gave Ah Choon a decree. The District Court in appeal set aside this decree on the ground that whatever the motive of the payment it was clear that the Deputy Bailiff had no power to accept security for the decretal amount; that the money must have been held to have been paid in satisfaction of the decree and that Ah Choon's remedy, if any, was against the judgment-debtors. It is against this decree of the District Court that the present appeal has been filed, and I think that the view of the law taken by the learned Judge of the District Court was wrong.

It was held by their Lordships of the Privy Council in the case of Kanhaya Lal v. National Bank of India, Limited (1) that the word "coercion" in s. 72 of the Indian Contract Act is used in its general sense and that if a third party was coerced into paying the money in satisfaction of a decree against a judgment-debtor and was not himself liable for the money, the money was paid by him under coercion within the meaning of s. 72 of the Contract Act, and a suit did lie to recover that money.

The question then for consideration is whether the appellant was acting under coercion when he paid the money and whether he was liable to pay.

It is quite clear that when the Deputy Bailiff went to execute the warrant of attachment there was no decree at all against the appellant under which he could be held liable. It is contended that this is simply due to a mistake which was rectified later. But, even if this were so, it seems to me clear that the attachment was illegal.

The Chettyar's case is that Ah Choon, Sit Pin and Ah Kwin were the three partners in the Firm of Ho Ho & Co.; that it was the Firm of Ho Ho & Co. who borrowed the money and that it was against that firm that they got the decree. Admittedly no personal decree has been passed against Ah Choon. The property of the partnership, therefore, can only be attached under the provisions of r. 50 of O. XXI if the decree were against the partnership; and if the property in the shop were the partnership property, then the attachment was perfectly legal. But it is clear that the property said to be attached was not the property of the partnership of these three men, as it has been abundantly proved that this partnership was dissolved long before the decree was executed; and if the decree-holder wished to proceed against Ah Choon personally it was incumbent on him to take action under sub-r. 2 of r. 50. This he clearly did not do. The attachment was, therefore, an illegal attachment. The respondent Chettyar alleges however that even if the attachment were illegal Ah Choon paid up the money perfectly willingly.

Karapaya Pillay in his evidence says that when the Deputy Bailiff was going to attach the property Ah Choon said he was liable and paid the money. He is supported in this by Muthu Raman Servai. But I think that the trial Judge was perfectly correct in holding that these witnesses were not speaking the truth.

Ah Choon's witnesses state that it was only after considerable persuasion and in order to prevent his business being closed that he consented to pay the money. And the Deputy Bailiff who was called as a witness by the Chettyar says that plaintiff, that is, Ah Choon, said that he did not know the decretal amount and that he was never sued before, and then he (the Bailiff) directed the plaintiff to go to Court. He further says that he was first of all asked to take security and finally that it was only after about an hour of speaking that the money was paid. His evidence alone makes it fairly clear that the payment was not freely and willingly made; and Ah Choon's action in going to the Court the very next day and complaining about the matter confirms his story that he paid only under compulsion and in order to prevent a very serious interference with his business.

In such a case he can justly claim that he was induced by coercion to pay the money, and, on the authority of Seth Kan-haya Lall's case (1) he is entitled to recover that money unless he himself is liable for the debt. I do not consider that the Chettyar has satisfactorily proved his liability. The Chettyar claims that the money was advanced to the partnership. That is entirely denied by Ah Choon himself and also by one of the executants of the note, Sit Pin. Sit Pin says that the money was borrowed by him and Ah Kwin personally and that the money was used by Ah Kwin on his own personal account. The note itself reads "We, Maung Sit Pin and Ah Kwin, of Ho Ho & Co., 1st Street, Pyapon, promise to re-pay the Rs. 650." It does mention Ho Ho & Co. but the persons who promised to pay are Maung Sit Pin and Ah Kwin, and I do not think it is possible, on the face of the note, to say definitely that the money was borrowed on behalf of the partnership or that the promise was made to re-pay on behalf of the partnership. It is true that there is the seal of the partnership on the document, but, Sit Pin denies that this was put on at the time and denies that the seal was the one ordinarily used on such promissory notes taken out for the partnership. And Suit No. 122 was not really filed against the partnership at all. It was filed against Maung Sit Pin and Ah Kwin as managing partners of the firm. It was not filed against the firm by their managing partners and there is no mention at all in the proceedings of Ah Choon.

At the time this suit was filed it would appear that the partnership had been dissolved and that the assets and liabilities of the partnership had been made over to Ah Choon. In these circumstances it is very curious that Ah Choon's name should have been left entirely out of the plaint if the plaintiff did really mean to sue the partnership. Ah Choon has shown that at the time of the dissolution a number of debts owed by the partnership were shown including a debt to the T. S. Firm, but the debt now in dispute was not included. Of course an agreement of this kind between the partners would not be binding on the Chettyar, but it does lend corroboration to the story of Maung Sit Pin and Ah Kwin that this money was never borrowed for or on behalf of the firm at all.

In these circumstances I am not satisfied that it has been shown that Ah Choon was liable for this debt and, as in my opinion, the attachment was clearly illegal he is entitled to recover the sum paid by him.

I accordingly set aside the decree of the District Court and restore that of the trial Court for payment by the T. S. Firm of the sum of Rs. 894 to the plaintiff Ah Choon. The Chettyar respondent will pay the costs of the appellant throughout.

A consignee claiming goods under a Bill of Lading is bound by the terms in the Bill protecting the Shipping Company from loss in respect to those goods. It is not necessary that he should have expressly authorised the consignor to accept the terms in the Bill of Lading. [p. 471, col. 2.]

The Contract Act does not apply to carriage by sea, excluding inland navigation. [p. 472, col. 2.]

It is competent to a shipowner to protect himself by express contract from liability for the negligence of himself or his servants. [ibid.]

The very wide powers of revision of the Bombay High Court under Bombay Regulation II of 1827 have been saved in spite of the repeal of the Regulation, by ss. 106 and 130 of the Government of India Act. But they should be exercised only in special cases. [p. 473, col. 2.]

JUDGMENT.

Marten, C. J.—This is one of those cases which, though petty in amount, involve legal points of importance and some difficulty. The subject-matter of the dispute is a humble cask of iron nails. The plaintiff who is a merchant at Honawar had a dalal at Bombay. The latter sent this case of nails together with other cases and some other goods by the ss. Indravati of the defendant Company for being delivered to the plaintiff at Honawar harbour. The Company's Bill of Lading was sent by the plaintiff's dalal to the plaintiff. The plaintiff presented it to the Company at Honawar, and got delivery of all the goods except the suit cask of nails. The plaintiff then called on the Company to deliver the suit cask. The answer was: "it was lost overboard in unloading through an accident due to the ship rolling, and we are not liable under the terms of our contract contained in the Bill of Lading."

The plaintiff nevertheless brought his suit. The trial Court held that the loss was due rather to an incident of the sea than to an accident of the sea, and that accordingly one particular clause in the Bill of Lading did not protect the defendants. But it was held that another clause applied which protected the Company from the negligence of its stevedores and servants, and that in fact the accident was caused by such negligence, and that consequently the suit failed and must be dismissed.

The plaintiff, however, was not content. He appealed, and a somewhat surprising result happened. The view the learned District Judge took was that it was not proved that the plaintiff in any way by himself or by his broker accepted the conditions in the Bill of Lading. Therefore it was not binding on him, and the shipping Company were liable. The shipping company now apply in revision.

At the outset we must bear in mind that in the plaint itself the plaintiff had pleaded that on October 3 the plaintiff's dalal at Bombay had sent some goods to be delivered to the plaintiff at Honawar harbour, and para. 3 stated that the defendant Company was to give delivery of the suit cask of iron nails to the plaintiff at Honawar harbour. The plaintiff had also stated in his evidence that he had received an invoice from his Commission Agent from Bombay. In cross-examination he said:—

"I get my goods from Kagal Lakshman Anant. He sends me Bill of Lading for the goods sent. I see the Bill of Lading which was received by me and given to the Agent. It is Ex. 19."

Now, as I understand the judgment of the learned trial Judge, he held as a matter of law that even although goods are shipped under a Bill of Lading and the consignee claims the goods under that Bill of Lading, yet unless the shipowners can show that the consignee expressly authorised his shipping agent to accept the terms in the Bill of Lading, the consignee is not bound. In other words, the consignee may accept the carriage of the goods, but he is not bound by the special conditions of carriage unless his broker has been authorised to assent to them, and has in fact assented to them, and the consignee has assented to them.

Now that view is in the teeth not only of mercantile custom, but also of the Statute which has been in force ever since 1856. I refer to the Bills of Lading Act, 1856. There s. 1 provides:—

"Every consignee of goods named in a Bill of Lading...shall have transferred to and vested in him all rights of suit, and be subject to the same liabilities in respect of such goods as if the contract contained in the Bill of Lading had been made with himself." The learned Judge is clearly bound by that Act. He had no jurisdiction to ignore it. I say nothing about mercantile custom, for it is obvious to any one having any familiarity with shipping business, that if the learned Judge's view was correct, the shipping industry would be paralysed, so far as the carriage of cargo is concerned.

Under these circumstances I say nothing as to the blunder, which was apparently made in the trial Court, in not putting in evidence the forwarding note which is referred to as No. 2 of the defendant's list of documents. There is an affidavit of July 6, 1926, by the Agent of the Steamship Company as to that, and he says that the trial Court disallowed it in evidence. That appears to have been the view also taken in the lower Appellate Court. As to this I would only refer to the evidence of Pandurang Narayan, the Agent of the Company, who in his examination-in-chief said:—

"I see the goods forwarding note given by the shipper Lakshman Anant Pai, it is produced to the Company and accordingly the Bill of Lading is written." I should have thought that that document being produced from the proper custody, viz., that of the shipowners' Agent, it would lie upon the plaintiff to prove that it was not authorized or that the signature was a forgery, and nonetheless so because apparently there was no cross-examination. But we decide the case irrespective of that, and solely on the evidence that was actually before the Court. Similarly, we say nothing as to whether the lower Courts were correct in thinking that this was an incident of the sea, and not an accident of the sea, and also in holding that there was any negligence whatever by the Shipping Company in what happened in the present case. Their findings of fact on this point we must, of course, and we do accept.

I must too guard myself against any suggestion that a Shipping Company has only to produce a duplicate of the Bill of Lading to a consignee, and the latter is then bound to accept the Bill of Lading and accept the goods, whether or no he has ever authorised the goods to be sent, or has anything whatever to do with them. That of course is not the case here. Admittedly, the plaintiff authorised the goods to be sent by his Commission Agent and he is in fact claiming the goods under the very Bill of Lading which his Agent sent.

Further, my brother Blackwell reminds me that in his letter before suit the plaintiff writes:—

"I hereby inform you that my goods covered by Bill of Lading No. 26479 dated October 20, 1923, consigned by my Agent, Mr. K. L. Anant Pai at Bombay port to me at Honawar are short of one cask of iron nails."

On the facts then of this particular case we are of opinion that the learned Judge gave his decision in disregard of statutory authority which was binding on him, and that by reason of such disregard of statutory authority he arrived at exactly the contrary result to that which in law he ought to have arrived at.

There is a further point as to whether in any event conditions of the nature relied on in this Bill of Lading are legal having regard to s. 151 of the Indian Contract Act. The plaintiff's argument is that the shipowner is a bailee under the bailment sections of the Indian Contract Act, viz., 148 et seq.; and that under s. 151 he is bound to take as much care of the goods bailed as a man of ordinary prudence would of his own goods; and that there is no clause which permits him to contract himself out of that minimum liability. In this respect there is a marked contrast under s. 152.

But there it is expressly provided that in the absence of any special contract the bailee is not liable for the loss if he has taken the amount of care described in s. 151. As far as the Indian Carriers Act is concerned, that does not, I think, apply to carriage by sea. I exclude of course inland navigation. There is some difference of opinion in certain High Courts as to whether the bailment sections of the Indian Contract Act apply to carriage by sea. But in Sheik Mahamad Ravuther v. British India Steam Navigation Co Ltd., (1) the point now raised was considered, and Sir Arnold White and Mr. Justice Wallis, as he then was, held, that "In England it is competent to a shipowner to protect himself, by express contract, from liability for the negligence of himself or his servants. This is also the law applicable in India". Mr. Justice Sankaran Nair took the contrary view, holding that it was inconsistent with the provisions of the Indian Contract Act and the manifest intention of the Legislature in enacting such provisions.

But we see no adequate reason here to adopt the view of the learned dissenting Judge. Accordingly we do not think that this latter point affords an effective answer to the present revisional application.

If then the conditions of the Bill of Lading are binding on the consignee, then having regard to the findings in both Courts below the Shipping Company is protected. I should have explained that the learned District Judge took the correct course in recording a finding on all points. We have, therefore, the benefit of his judgment on the alternative issues, supposing his decision as to the Bill of Lading being not binding on the consignee is incorrect. Incidentally the learned Judge has adopted the same course with reference to Sheik Mahamad Ravuther v. British India Steam Navigation Co. Ltd. (1) which, as I have indicated, we propose to adopt.

This brings me next to what as regards certain aspects seems to me a difficult question. If the appellant can only rely on s. 115 of the Civil Procedure Code, then, having regard to certain decisions of the Privy Council on the point and to various other decisions, many of which are difficult to reconcile either with the Privy Council decision or as between themselves, it might well be desirable to refer the point to a

(1) 1 Ind. Cas. 977; 32 M. 95; 4 M. L. T. 110; 18 M. L. J. 497.

Full Bench notwithstanding the small amount of money that is involved here. I need only refer to the notes to s. 115 in Mulla's Civil Procedure Code to illustrate what I mean. But in Bombay there are decisions which are binding on this Division Bench to the effect that in the old Bombay Regulation II of 1827, Ch. I, s. 5, sub-s. (2), we have certain supplemental powers which we are entitled to exercise. That sub-section runs: "It shall also be competent to the said Court, to call for the proceedings of any Subordinate Civil Court, and to issue such orders thereon as the case may require." This Regulation was repealed by Act XII of 1873, but there is an express section which provides that it was not, amongst other things, to affect any established jurisdiction; etc.

In Bai Atrani v. Deepsing Baria (2) Mr. Justice Batchelor and Mr. Justice Hayward considered this Regulation and stated the paragraph I have just referred to in the Repealing Act, viz., (page 94*):

"It shall not affect any established jurisdiction, form or procedure or existing usage, custom or privilege notwithstanding that the same respectively may have been in any manner affirmed, recognized or derived, by, in, or from any enactment hereby repealed."

Then the judgment goes on to say (page 94*):—

"It follows, I think, that the jurisdiction established in the Suddur Dewanny Adawlat in 1827 and in the High Court in 1861 was not affected by the repeal of the Regulation in 1873."

So, too, in Secretary of State for India v. Narsibhai Dadabhai (3), which was a decision of Sir Lallubhai Shah and Mr. Justice Coyajee, both the learned Judges arrived at a similar conclusion. Mr. Justice Coyajee at page 55† says:—

"In any event, our powers derived from s. 5 of Bombay Regulation II of 1827 are very wide. The powers thereby conferred on the Suddur Dewanny Adawlat were transferred to this Court by s. 9 of the High Courts Act, 1861, and they continue still in force by virtue of s. 106 of the Government of India Act."

Mr. Justice Shah says (page 59*):—

"Even assuming that the case is not covered by s. 115, I think it would clearly be covered by the words of the second clause of s. 5 of Bombay Regulation II of 1827. Though the Regulation on this point is repealed, this Court still retains the power under the Statutes, which the Suddur Dewanny Adawlat had under the said repealed clause."

Then as regards the Government of India Act, 1915, in addition to s. 106 which Mr. Justice Coyajee referred to, I may mention s. 130 which provides that the repeal was not to affect "the validity of any law, charter, letters patent, rule... order, regulation... under any enactment hereby repealed and in force at the commencement of this Act." That Act repeals, for instance, the Indian High Courts Act, 1861, and the Indian High Courts Act, 1865.

We think, therefore, it is open to us to act under Regulation II of 1827, whether or no s. 115 of the Civil Procedure Code applies. Consequently it is competent for us to issue such orders as the case may require. But I wish it to be clearly understood that it is only in a very exceptional case that I would be prepared to exercise such a power as this, more especially as normally we should act, if at all, under s. 115. I regard, however, this particular case as a very exceptional one and as a very important one to the shipping world, and that consequently it is eminently one where we ought to interfere irrespective of the small amount involved, because to allow the contrary decision to remain might well result in much confusion.

I would, therefore, act under the Regulation, viz., II of 1827, and make the Rule absolute, and discharge the order of the learned District Judge, and restore the decree of the Subordinate Judge, and direct the plaintiff to pay the costs throughout.

LAHORE HIGH COURT.

FIRST CIVIL APPEAL NO. 802 OF 1922.

March 14, 1927.

*Present:—Mr. Justice Fforde and Mr. Justice Tek Chand.SHERA AND OTHERS—PLAINTIFFS—APPELLANTSversusGAHNA AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS—RESPONDENTS.Pleadings—Estoppel—New ground.

A plea of estoppel cannot be upheld on a ground not pleaded in the written statement, and inconsistent with what was stated therein, and with regard to which no issue had been framed. [p. 475, col. 2.]

First appeal from the decree of the Senior Subordinate Judge, Sheikhpura, dated the 4th January, 1922.

Mr. Shambu Lal Puri for Mr. Mukand Lal Puri, for the Appellants.

Messrs. Muhammad Amin and Anant Ram Khosla for Mr. Khurshid Zaman, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

Tek Chand, J.—On the 22nd of February, 1921, the plaintiffs, nine in number, representing themselves to be collaterals in the third degree of one Azmat, instituted a suit for possession of the land measuring 376 kanals and 11 marlas on the allegation that the land was ancestral of the plaintiffs and the alienor, that it had been sold by Azmat to the ancestor of the defendants in 1893 without consideration and necessity, and that though Azmat alienor had died in 1899 he had left a widow Musammât Muradân, who died in 1920 and, therefore, the suit was within time.

The defendants pleaded that the suit was time-barred, that "the plaintiffs' ancestors had brought a declaratory suit before 1893 in respect of this very land and the alienation made by Azmat; but that they relinquished their rights as against the defendants" and, therefore, the plaintiffs were estopped from maintaining the suit and that the sale had been effected for consideration and valid necessity. The defendant, Murad, was examined in Court on the 30th of June, 1921, and stated that before the alienation now sought to be impeached, there had been another sale of the same land to the defendants for Rs. 400, that Kadim and Ismail and other reversioners of Azmat had sued to contest that sale, but ultimately withdrew the suit on a compromise, under which Rs. 200 more was paid to the vendor and a fresh sale-deed for Rs. 600 executed. It was stated that it is this subsequent sale for Rs. 600 which is the subject of the present suit.

On these pleadings the Court framed the following three issues:—

(1) Is the suit barred by time?

(2) Was the sale for consideration and valid necessity?

(3) Was this sale the result of a compromise between the plaintiffs' predecessors and the vendees and are plaintiffs estopped from suing?

It seems that on the 24th of August, 1921, the defendants were permitted to file a better statement of their defence. This better statement, however, has not been printed in the paper-book and is not before us. The learned Judge Mr. Din Muhammad passed an order on that date in the following terms:

"A better statement has been permitted to be filed. The following fresh issues arise. The parties to be examined."

Murad, defendant, and Ziada, plaintiff were accordingly examined the same day and it was noted that it was necessary to send for records of suits decided in 1893 and 1895 before any fresh issues could be framed and an order was passed that the defendants should furnish particulars of these records. The case was again adjourned to the 15th of October, 1921. On that date it was discovered that the records could not be sent for as the requisite particulars had not been furnished by the defendants. They were ordered to do so within a week and the case was adjourned to the 27th of October, 1921. On that date one of the records required was received in the Court but not the other as the particulars filed by the defendants were incorrect. The case had again to be adjourned, but on the next hearing (18th of November, 1921) it was reported that the required record was missing. An enquiry was ordered in this matter and the case adjourned once again to the 14th of December, 1921. In the meantime Mr. Din Muhammad was transferred and Mr. Asad Jan succeeded him. On the 14th of December, 1921, the record which was supposed to have been missing, was received from the record-room. No fresh issues were framed by Mr. Asad Jan and though the defendants' Counsel urged that in order to determine the question of limitation it was necessary to find whether Azmat had left a "legal widow" or not, the learned Judge refused to grant this request, remarking that he did not see its importance. The case was adjourned for arguments to the 19th of December and on the 4th January, 1922, judgment was pronounced dismissing the suit on the ground that the plaintiffs were estopped from maintaining the present suit, "because Khadim and Umar had instituted a suit to contest the sale of 1893 which ended in a compromise effected on the 12th of May, 1893". The learned Judge in support of his finding that the plaintiffs were estopped from suing also referred to another suit between Sakhar and Sakhu as plaintiffs and Azmat and Nawab as defendants, which had been dismissed on the 15th of July, 1895.

Against this judgment and decree a first appeal has been preferred by the plaintiffs and it has been contended on their behalf that the learned Judge was not justified in upholding the plea of estoppel on the ground that Khadim and Umar had instituted a suit to contest the sale in question in 1893 which had resulted in a compromise. It is clear from the written statement of the defendants as well as from the oral statement of Murad defendant and the form in which issue No. 3 was put that the defendants had originally based their plea of estoppel upon a compromise which they alleged had been arrived at between the ancestors of the plaintiffs and Azmat vendor in a suit relating to a sale prior to 1893. Mr. Anant Ram for the defendant-respondents, however, now concedes that as a matter of fact, no such prior sale had been effected nor any suit filed, which was adjusted by a compromise resulting in the sale now in question. He states that the plea of estoppel as raised in the pleadings on which issue No. 3 had been framed was really put forward by his clients in complete ignorance of the real facts. Mr. Anant Ram, however, seeks to support the lower Court's finding on the issue of estoppel on the ground that Khadim and Ismail had filed a suit to contest the sale in question, which suit they had subsequently withdrawn. He states that these facts were pleaded in the better statement with regard to which Mr. Din Muhammad had intended to frame fresh issues. But no such issues were actually framed by Mr. Din Muhammad or by his successor and the plaintiffs had no opportunity of meeting the defendants' case as put in the better statement. Moreover, the compromise dated the 12th of May, 1893, on which the learned Judge has largely relied, had not been incorporated in any judgment and was not proved or exhibited in this case. It is also a question for consideration whether the compromise arrived at in a suit which, according to the defendants' own showing, was instituted by Khadim and Ismail, whose descendants are plaintiffs Nos. 4 to 8, is binding on Shah Muhammad, plaintiff No. 1, Taja, plaintiff No. 2, Allah Ditta, plaintiff No. 3 and Shahbali, plaintiff No. 9, who or whose direct lineal ancestors were not parties to it. The learned Subordinate Judge has not addressed himself to this aspect of the case, nor have all the relevant materials been placed on the record, on which this Court could come to a definite finding.

For the appellants it is, further, urged that the litigation of 1895 can have no bearing on the present suit as the plaintiffs in that suit were Sakhar and Sakhu, who are not mentioned in the pedigree-table printed at page 4 as being related to Azmat, but who were probably collaterals of a very remote degree. It is contended that the plaintiffs did not derive their title through Sakhar and Sakhu and are in no way bound by the dismissal of their suit in 1895.

I do not, however, think it necessary to give a finding on this point, as I am of opinion that this appeal must succeed on the short ground that the learned Judge ought not to have upheld the plea of estoppel on the grounds which were not pleaded in the written statement, but which were inconsistent with what was stated therein and with regard to which no issue had been framed. Issue No. 3 had been struck with reference to allegations which the defendants had abandoned and issues Nos. 1 and 2 have not been decided. Under these circumstances there has been no proper trial of the suit in the lower Court and it is unfortunate that the case has to be remanded for re-trial and fresh decision, after proper issues have been framed and parties given an opportunity to prove their respective contentions.

In order to avoid another possible remand it seems necessary to point out that the question whether Musammât Muradan was or was not the widow of Azmat alienor is of vital importance in this case for the decision of the issues as to limitation, and the learned Subordinate Judge was wholly wrong in supposing that this question was of no importance. If Musammāt Muradan was not the married wife of Azmat, the present suit is obviously time-barred. If, however, Musammāt Muradan did succeed him as his widow, it is a matter for consideration whether time could run against the reversioners during her lifetime.

The attention of the Court below is also drawn to the necessity of having any documents on which the parties wish to rely formerly proved and exhibited and the provisions of O. XIII, r. 4, Civil Procedure Code, complied with.

For the foregoing reasons, I would accept this appeal and setting aside the judgment and decree of the learned Subordinate Judge remand the case under O. XLI, r. 23, Civil Procedure Code, for disposal in accordance with law. Court-fee on appeal will be refunded and costs will be costs in the cause.

Fforde, J.—I agree.

Evidence Act (I of 1872), s. 91—Stamp Act (I of 1879)—Stamp Act (II of 1899), s. 2—Unstamped mortgage-deed—"Execution", what is—Secondary evidence.

Under s. 2 of the Stamp Act, 1899, "execution" means signature, and an instrument which becomes chargeable with stamp duty only on being executed is not liable to stamp duty until it is signed. [p. 476, col. 2.]

"Execution" under the old Stamp Act of 1879 ordinarily connoted signature, though there may have been special instances where a document was executed other than by signature. [p. 477, col. 1.]

Mi Ta v. Nga Sein (3), dissented from.

Secondary evidence of the contents of a formal unstamped mortgage-deed is admissible if it was not signed by the mortgagor. If the deed was executed by signing, then secondary evidence is inadmissible for lack of stamping. [ibid.]

In re the application of Chet Po (4), followed.

Mr. Sanyal, for the Appellant.

Mr. Mukerjee, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—Plaintiff sued for redemption of certain lands. He asserted that at the time of the mortgage which was in 1891 or 1892, some record had been made on a palm leaf of the original mortgage and subsequent advances. He called upon the 1st defendant in whose custody he alleged it to be to produce the document, but the latter declined to do so and denied its existence.

He produced a copy or precis, it was not clear which, made by him of the original record and subsequent memoranda and asked to be allowed to give secondary evidence of the contents of the document.

Both Courts have held that secondary evidence of an unstamped document is inadmissible and the suit has been dismissed.

In the Upper Burma cases of Ma Ein U v. Maung Aung Hmwe (1) and Maung Net v. Maung Hmo Zan (2), Thirkell White, J. C., undoubtedly held that secondary evidence of a document not produced, which ought to have been stamped, but was not, is inadmissible.

In the later case of Mi Ta v. Nga Sein (3) Shaw, C. J., went further and held that a parabaik mortgage, dated 1894-95, though not signed, was executed within the meaning of the Stamp Act of 1879 then in force, and that secondary evidence of the unstamped parabaik document which defendant was alleged to be withholding was not admissible.

The correctness of this view was not accepted by a Bench on which I sat in Rangoon last year. (Vide, Ma Hla U v. Ma Hta, Letters Patent Appeal No. 131 of 1926).

In In re the application of Chet Po (4) it was held by a Full Bench of the Chief Court that as under s. 2 of the Indian Stamp Act, 1899, 'Execution' means signature, an instrument which becomes chargeable with stamp duty only on being executed is not liable to stamp duty until it is signed.

It was further pointed out that in accordance with universal custom formal documents on palm leaf and parabaik have hitherto been treated by Upper Burma Courts as completed documents and admitted as evidence as such though not signed. The judgment concludes "Our decision that these unsigned documents are not liable to stamp duty does not necessarily imply that they must henceforward be regarded as incomplete. The effect of the present decision is only that the Courts cannot refuse to admit any such document in evidence merely on the ground that it is unstamped."

With this ruling I wholly agree.

At the time of the palm leaf document now in question the Stamp Act of 1879 was in force.

That Act contains no definition of execution, and I am unable to agree with the view taken in Mi Ta's case (3) by the learned Judicial Commissioner that an unsigned parabaik document was liable to stamp duty under the law in force prior to the introduction of the Stamp Act of 1899.

I have no doubt that 'execution' under the old Stamp Act ordinarily connoted signature; though there may have been special instances where a document was executed other than by signature.

From the extract or copy taken from the palm leaf document in the suit under appeal, however, it does not appear to have been an instrument of mortgage at all, but merely a note that a mortgage had taken place.

Unless the extract is extremely meagre, it seems clear that the mortgage transaction has not been reduced to the form of a document within the meaning of s. 91 of the Evidence Act.

If that is so, then secondary evidence of the note and oral evidence of the transaction of mortgage, which was itself oral, is admissible.

It will, therefore, be necessary to take evidence for plaintiff as to the actual form of the so-called mortgage document and whether it amounts to an instrument of mortgage.

If there is evidence that a formal deed of mortgage was drawn up on a palm leaf, then secondary evidence of its contents will be admissible, unless it was signed by the mortgagor, which is not alleged.

If it should transpire that a formal deed was drawn up and executed by signing, then secondary evidence will be inadmissible for lack of stamping.

I set aside the finding of the lower Courts on the preliminary issue of law and remand the suit for disposal on its merits in view of these considerations.

Costs to follow final disposal.

Appellant is entitled to a refund of the Court-fees in this and the lower Appellate Court.

Landlord and tenant—Forfeiture of lease—Covenant to repair—Non-payment of rent—Relief against forfeiture—Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), s. 114.

The general rule of law with respect to the construction of covenants to repair is that, where the covenant to repair is in general terms to keep the premises in repair, the covenant will attach to new buildings that subsequently are erected upon the demised premises during the currency of the term. On the other hand, where the covenant to repair refers to certain specific property that is demised, such as "the said buildings" or "the said houses", unless the additional buildings in fact became part of the specific buildings which the tenant covenanted to repair, the covenant will not extend to such new and separate erections. Doe v. Rowlands (3), Cornish v. Cleife (4) and Smith v. Mills (5), relied on.

Whether or not a covenant to repair extends to any particular property depends upon the terms of the covenant and the facts proved in the case under consideration. [p. 480, col. 1.]

The test as to whether any particular renovation amounts to repair or not is whether the act to be done is one which in substance is the renewal or re-placement of defective parts, or the renewal or re-placement of substantially the whole. [p. 480, col. 2.]

Lauratt v. Wakeley (6) and Calthorpe v. McOscar (7), relied on.

Under s. 114 of the Transfer of Property Act, the Court is invested with a discretionary power to grant relief against forfeiture for non-payment of rent which it may or may not exercise in favour of the tenant. [p. 478, col. 2.]

The Courts in India in exercising the discretion entrusted to them under s. 114 of the Transfer of Property Act, in the absence of any special circumstances, should adopt the rule that prevailed in the old Courts of Chancery, and; subject to any equities that may have arisen between the date of the forfeiture and the application for relief, e.g., where the landlord during that period has re-let the premises to other persons, or otherwise has dealt with them, or where the conduct of the tenant qua tenant has been such that it would be unreasonable that the landlord should be compelled to keep him as a tenant, the Court, provided the tenant complies with the conditions laid down in s. 114, ought to exercise its discretion in the tenant's favour, and grant him relief. [p. 479, cols. 1 & 2.]

Messrs. A. N. Chaudhuri and Sudhis Ray, for the Plaintiff.

Messrs. A. K. Ray and B. C. Ghose, for the Defendant.

JUDGMENT.—This is a suit brought to recover possession of a block of buildings lying at the corner of Wellington Street and Dhurumtolla Street in Calcutta. I shall refer to the buildings generally as No. 149-1, Dhurumtolla Street, the parcels being set out in the lease in suit.

On the 3rd August, 1906, the predecessor of the plaintiff let the said premises to one Sassoon Ezra Cohen (through whom the defendant claims title) for a term of 50 years. The rent reserved was Rs. 416-10-8, payable on the 25th day of each month succeeding the month for which it became due. The lessee covenanted inter alia that he "will at all times during the said term keep the said premises in good and substantial repair, and the same in good and substantial repair deliver up to the lessor his heirs or assigns at the expiration or sooner determination of the said term". The lessee further covenanted that he would repair the said premises within two months after a notice in writing of the necessary repairs was served upon him by the landlord. No such notice was given, but it was conceded by the defendant that the covenant to carry out specific repairs after notice was an independent covenant, and did not restrict or affect the defendant's liability under the general covenant to repair. It was further provided that "If the said monthly rent, Rs. 416-10-8 or any part thereof, shall be in arrear for the space of three months next after any of the days whenever the same ought to be paid as aforesaid, whether the same shall or shall not have been legally demanded, or if there shall be any breach or non-observance by the said lessee, his executors, administrators, or assigns, of any of the covenants hereinbefore on his or their part contained, or the lessee becoming insolvent, then, and in any of the said cases, it shall be lawful for the said lessor, his heirs or assigns, at any time thereafter, into or upon the said demised premises or any part thereof, in the name of the whole to re-enter and the same to have, re-possess and enjoy as in his or their former estate, and to hold the same free and discharged from the covenants and agreements herein contained and to hold the said lessee liable for all loss and damages that may be sustained by the said lessor for such breach of covenant on the part of the said lessee".

The plaintiff based his cause of action in ejectment upon a breach of (i) the covenant to pay rent, (ii) the general covenant to repair.

It was conceded by the defendant that before action was brought he had committed a breach of the covenant to pay rent, and that, although on the 16th June, 1925, the Official Receiver of the High Court (who was then in possession of the premises pursuant to a decree which had been obtained in a mortgage suit against the defendant) sent to the Solicitor of the plaintiff a cheque for Rs. 2,500 in payment of arrears of rent from August, 1924, to January, 1925, the full rent that was in arrear prior to the filing of the suit on the 17th June, 1925, was not tendered until the 23rd June, 1925. The plaintiff refused to accept the rent tendered on the 16th June, 1925, and also that tendered on the 23rd June, 1925, upon the ground that he had given notice to the defendant on the 15th June, 1925, that the tenancy stood determined, and that he required possession of the premises to be delivered to him.

In these circumstances the defendant admitted that a forfeiture of the lease for non-payment of rent had occurred. He seeks relief from the forfeiture, however, under s. 114 of the Transfer of Property Act of 1882, and he has deposited in Court the amount of the rent due up to the date of the written statement which was filed on the 4th August, 1925, and has offered to pay interest upon the rent in arrear, and the full costs of this suit. The defendant has not paid or tendered formally to the lessor "at the hearing of the suit" the sum fixed under s. 114, but I will assume for the purpose of my judgment that he has brought himself within s. 114, and that the Court is at liberty to grant the defendant relief according to the terms of that section.

Now, it is to be observed that under s. 114 the Court is invested with a discretionary power to grant relief which it may or may not exercise in favour of the tenant. Learned Counsel for the defendant has urged that if the sum required under the section has been paid or tendered to the lessor at the hearing of the suit the Court has no discretion in the matter, and must grant relief to the tenant. The old rule in equity is stated concisely by Lord Esher, Master of the Rolls, and Rigby, L. J., in Newbolt v. Bingham (1). Lord Esher in that case observed that:

"If, at the time relief is asked for, the position has been altered, so that relief could not be given without causing injury to third parties, I think that the case that was cited to us [Stanhope v. Haworth (2)] applies. But if, at the time of the application, the position is not altered, so that no injustice will be done, I think, if the conditions mentioned in the section are complied with, that, according to the settled practice in equity, there is no longer a discretion in the Judge, but that he ought to make the order. It does not matter whether it is called discretionary or not, if the discretion ought always to be exercised in one way. If the conditions are complied with, and no interests of third parties have intervened there is no longer any real discretion in the matter."

And Lord Justice Rigby added that:—

"It was the settled practice of a Court of Equity to grant relief against forfeiture for non-payment of rent on payment of all rent in arrear and costs. Of course, the Court was not absolutely bound by its practice where it would not do justice, and if some new interest had been created before the application, the Court would refuse to interfere. That was not done to put the landlord in a better position, but because rights of third parties had intervened."

Now, in exercising the discretion with which it is invested under s. 114 a Court in India is not bound by the practice of a Court of Chancery in England, and I am not disposed to limit the discretion that it possesses. "Those who seek equity must do equity", and I do not think merely because a tenant complies with the conditions laid down in s. 114 that he becomes entitled as of right to relief. But, in my opinion, the Courts in India in exercising the discretion entrusted to them under s. 114, in the absence of any special circumstances, should adopt the rule that prevailed in the old Courts of Chancery, and, subject to any equities that may have arisen between the date of the forfeiture and the application for relief, e.g., where the landlord during that period has re-let the premises to other persons, or otherwise has dealt with them, or where the conduct of the tenant qua tenant has been such that it would be unreasonable that the landlord should be compelled to keep him as a tenant, the Court, provided the tenant complies with the conditions laid down in s. 114, ought to exercise its discretion in the tenant's favour, and grant him relief.

I now proceed to consider the position of the tenant under the general covenant to repair into which he has entered. At the time when the premises in suit were demised to Sassoon Cohen the premises consisted of—

"All that upper room brickbuilt house and messuage together with the piece or parcel of land thereunto belonging containing by estimation rent free one bigha be the same a little, more or less, and situate between the boundaries thereafter set out in the lease".

After Sassoon Cohen had obtained possession under the lease he proceeded to erect the buildings in respect of which it is now contended that a breach of the covenant to repair has been committed upon the parcel of land adjoining the two-storied brick house. The new buildings that were erected facing Dhurrumtolla Street were one-storied structures contiguous and joined to the original house, and I am satisfied from the evidence of Sassoon Cohen that the effect of the additional work of construction that he carried out on the premises was merely to increase the area of the two-storied building that was upon the premises at the time when the lease was granted. With reference to the additional structures that he erected Mr. Cohen was asked certain questions in the course of his examination:

How long did it take you to construct this building?—6, 7 or 8 months.

The new rooms which you allege you built they were all made part of the premises of the two-storied building?—Joined to it.

And made part of the same premises?—Yes.

Sassoon Cohen further stated:—

Did you have to bond these new buildings on to the old buildings?—Yes.

You made them part of the old building?—I joined them together.

After you completed the building, the buildings became one whole building?—Yes, the front portion.

Now, the general rule of law with respect to the construction of covenants to repair is that where the covenant to repair is in general terms to keep the premises in repair, the covenant will attach to new buildings that subsequently are erected upon the demised premises during the currency of the term. On the other hand, where the covenant to repair refers to certain specific property that is demised, such as "the said buildings" or "the said houses", unless the additional buildings in fact became part of the specific buildings which the tenant covenanted to repair, the covenant will not extend to such new and separate erections: Doe v. Rowlands (3), Cornish v. Cleife (4), Smith v. Mills (5).

Upon the evidence in this case I am clearly of opinion that the new buildings fall within the ambit of the covenant to repair, both because of the general terms in which the covenant is couched, and also because, even if the covenant to repair was restricted to the upper room brickbuilt house, the new structures were an addition to and became part of the building that was specifically demised, and to which the covenant to repair attached. Whether or not a covenant to repair extends to any particular property depends upon the terms of the covenant and the facts proved in the case under consideration. Notwithstanding the general terms of the covenant to repair learned Counsel for the defendant has contended, however, that upon a true construction of the lease the additional erections were not within the covenant to repair; and in support of his argument he relied upon the provisions in the lease that gave permission to the tenant to make such additions and alterations to the demised premises.

In my opinion, the provisions in the lease to which he refers were not introduced for the purpose for which he cited them. If a tenant makes additions or improvements upon the premises it is provided under s. 108 of the Transfer of Property Act that he is entitled to remove them during the currency of the term. In my opinion, the special provisions introduced into this lease with respect to the additions and alterations which the tenant was at liberty to make to the premises were inserted for two purposes: (i) in order to avoid the provisions of s. 108 of the Transfer of Property Act, and (ii) in order that it should not be open to the defendant, in the event of some part of any additional premises that he might erect being destroyed in the manner set out in the lease, to escape a proportionate payment of rent so long as the additional structures were not re-built or repaired. In my opinion, therefore, the general covenant to repair extended to the whole of the block including the additions thereto carried out by Sassoon Cohen.

The issue, therefore, that remains to be considered is one of fact: did the defendants at all times during the term keep the premises in good and substantial repair? Now, the test as to whether any particular renovation amounts to repair or not, in my opinion, is "whether the act to be done is one which in substance is the renewal or re-placement of defective parts, or the renewal or re-placement of substantially the whole" per Buckley, L. J. in Laurcatt v. Wakeley (6). See also Calthorpe v. McOscar (7).

[After discussing the evidence his Lordship proceeded:—] The defendant elected to call no evidence in rebuttal, and as the result of the evidence I am disposed to accept the somewhat picturesque phrase in which Mr. Shrosbree depicted the state of the premises by saying that "they were starved"; by which he meant, and I find, that for years they have not been kept in such repair as would comply with the conditions of the covenant to repair contained in the lease.

Under these circumstances, in my opinion, there was such a breach of the general covenant to repair as entitled the plaintiff to the relief which he claims and there will be a decree in his favour. There will be a declaration that the lease has been determined. There will be a decree for possession. There will be a decree for arrears of rent up to the date when the lease was determined, that is the 15th June, 1925; and thereafter until possession is given a decree for mesne profits at the rate at which rent is payable, and costs on scale No. 2.

MRS. NAN GREENWOOD—PETITIONER

MAJOR L. V. GREENWOOD—

RESPONDENT.

Divorce Act (IV of 1869), s. 2—Parties not domiciled in British India—Residence and adultery within British India—Jurisdiction of Courts of India to grant divorce—Indian and Colonial Divorce Jurisdiction Act, 1926 (16 & 17 Geo. V, Ch. 40), applicability of.

Courts in India have jurisdiction under the Divorce Act to grant a divorce which will be valid for all purposes throughout British India in any case where the parties are resident within the jurisdiction of the Court and the adultery complained of has been committed in British India. The fact that the parties are not domiciled in British India and that the decree will not be binding for international purposes, is no bar to the granting of a petition for divorce. The Indian and Colonial Divorce Act, 1927, has no application to a marriage celebrated in the Irish Free State.

Petition under s. 10 of the Indian Divorce Act (IV of 1869) for dissolution of marriage.

Mr. Moti Lal Saksena, for the Applicant.

JUDGMENT.—Mrs. Nan Greenwood has applied in this Court under s. 10 of the Indian Divorce Act for dissolution of her marriage with Sergeant Major L. V. Greenwood of the Gloucestershire Regiment. The petition is not contested and a letter has been filed by the petitioner written, as she states on oath, by her husband which gives ample ground for divorce. It appears from this letter that he left his wife more than two years ago in order to live with another woman, a certain Mrs. Pearl Cottrell, who is mentioned in the petition. In this letter the respondent definitely refuses to make any provision for the petitioner or to leave the woman with whom he is living. There is, therefore, prima facie a case entitling the petitioner to a decree for divorce on the ground of adultery and desertion.

The petitioner states and there is no reason to doubt her statement that there is no collusion between herself and her husband, and it is not necessary for her to prove cruelty on his part in view of his admission of adultery and desertion.

The only question which gives rise to any difficulty is that of jurisdiction. Neither of the parties are proved to be domiciled in India. The petitioner is an Irish woman and the respondent is an Englishman. They were married in a Roman Catholic Church in Cork in South Ireland in the year 1915. They have been living in India since the year 1921. They are still resident in India and the petitioner states that she has no intention of leaving the country and that her husband before deserting her also expressed his intention of remaining in India when he obtains a discharge from the Army. But at present he is a Sergeant Major in a British regiment and cannot as such acquire Indian domicile. Thus for purposes of international law no divorce can be granted to the petitioner, but the Indian Courts are authorised under the Indian Divorce Act to grant a petition, which will be valid for all purposes throughout British India, in any case where the parties are resident within the jurisdiction of the Court and the adultery complained of has been committed in India. I opine that the recent English enactment, the Indian and Colonial Divorce Act, 1926, has no application to a marriage celebrated in what is now the Irish Free State. Both the required conditions are present in this case and I, therefore, decree this petition ex parte and grant the petitioner a divorce from her husband Sergeant Major L. V. Greenwood. She will be at liberty to apply to this Court after expiry of six months from to-day to have her decree made absolute. At present no application is made for alimony, but the petitioner claims her costs. I allow the costs of the petitioner which amount to:—Rs. 20 for the stamp, Re. 1 for process fee, Rs. 2 vakalatnama and Rs. 100 Pleader's fees according to the certificate filed.

ALLAH DITTA AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS—

RESPONDENTS.

Contract Act (IX of 1872), s. 134—Principal and surety—Abatement of suit against principal debtor—Discharge of surety.

Where a suit against the principal debtor abates in consequence of his death and failure of the plaintiff to bring his legal representative on the record in time, the sureties are discharged under s. 134, Contract Act.

Second appeal from the decree of the Additional District Judge, Lahore, dated the 12th November, 1926, reversing that of the Subordinate Judge, Fourth Class, Lahore, dated the 15th May, 1926.

Mr. Badri Nath, for the Appellant.

Mr. M. R. Wali, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—According to the bond sued one Charagh Din was the principal debtor and Nur Ilahi and Allah Ditta were his sureties. One of the sureties died and the olige brought a suit against the principal debtor and the surety who was alive, and the sons of the other, to recover his bond debt. The principal debtor also died during the pendency of the suit but his death was not brought to the notice of the trial Court and that Court eventually passed a decree against all the defendants. On appeal by one of them it was argued that the decree against the principal debtor was a nullity, having been passed after his death without bringing his legal representatives on the record that as the suit has abated against the principal debtor by the omission of the plaintiff the sureties were discharged. The learned Additional District Judge, who heard the appeal accepted this contention and dismissed the suit.

The plaintiff has come up to this Court in second appeal and it is argued on his behalf that though the suit had abated as against the principal debtor the sureties were not discharged. The principle of law applicable to the case is embodied in s. 134 of the Indian Contract Act (IX of 1872). The relevant portion of the section runs thus: "The surety is discharged * * by any act or omission of the creditor, the legal consequence of which is the discharge of the principal debtor". Now the legal consequence of the omission on the part of the creditor to bring the legal representatives of the principal debtor on the record was that he (the creditor) had no remedy left against his representatives, that is, to say they were discharged. The section is so clear that no other interpretation can be placed upon it.

I, therefore, dismiss the appeal with costs.

No. 1—RESPONDENTS.

Sale of goods—Payment of advance, whether constitutes deposit—Right of vendor to retain amount on default by purchaser.

In mercantile contracts for sale of goods, when a seller accepts an "advance" from the purchaser, he cannot be held to take the amount, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, as a deposit with all its implications under the Common Law, so as to entitle him to retain the money in case of default by the purchaser in the performance of the contract. [p. 483, col. 2.]

Collins v. Stimson (1) and Howe v. Smith (2), relied on.

Second appeal against the decree of the Court of the Additional Subordinate Judge, Bezwada, in A. S. No. 36 of 1924, presented against that of the Court of the District Munsif, Bezwada, in O. S. No. 158 of 1922.

Mr. C. Rama Rao, for the Appellant.

Mr. L. S. Veeraraghava Ayyar, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

Jackson, J.—Plaintiff sued for recovery of Rs. 1,497-5 advance made by him as purchaser to defendants as vendors in respect of a sale of gunnies, and damages. The lower Courts have found that the transaction fell through owing to plaintiff's default. Therefore, there is no question of damages, but the lower Appellate Court has decreed the return of plaintiff's advance of Rs. 750, though without interest, except from date of suit. The 2nd defendant appeals. First respondent files a memorandum of objections.

The question for determination is, strictly speaking, one of fact, whether there was an implied contract between the parties that the money paid in advance should be treated as security for plaintiff's fulfilment of the bargain, and as such liable to be forfeited on plaintiff's default. There can only be an implied contract because no express stipulation is to be found in the agreement itself Ex. A, which merely runs "you have paid advance Rs. 750 at Rs. 15 per bale. Hence the same has been received."

Looking at the language of this instrument, can it be inferred that the advance was made as a guarantee for the performance of the contract?

In the English cases it has usually been so inferred that a deposit is paid as guarantee. In Collins v. Stimson (1) and Howe v. Smith (2) the word 'deposit' has been held to carry that inference. Lord Bowen in the latter case observes: "It is a deposit.....and the special clause in the contract does not deprive the deposit of the character which it would bear if there were no special clause.....a deposit is in the ordinary parlance of business man a security for the completion of the purchase." Then Lord Fry explains how that common understanding has grown up deriving this idea of security from Phœnician and Roman sources. So that it may be said that if the money paid in advance is intended to be a deposit of this character, and the buyer is unwilling to pay the goods, the seller may retain the deposit cf. Halsbury's Laws of England, Vol. XXV, page 237. Benjamin on Sales is equally clear as regards an undoubted deposit. A deposit is no doubt not recoverable. Exhibit VI, page 1084. But "where part of the price has been paid otherwise than as a deposit and, as in this case there is no question of damages, the buyer may perhaps be entitled to recover the part of the price paid," page 1090.

That in sales of goods apart from conveyances of real property it is not customary to give money paid in advance the peculiar characteristics of a deposit, is laid down by the learned Chief Justice of this Court in Manepalli Satanarayana-murthi v. Thommandra Erikalappa (3): "I can content myself with saying that it is never the practice in mercantile contracts, to hold that whatever be the damage suffered or not suffered the seller is to be entitled to keep the deposit." This, of course, is not, as was suggested, a ruling running counter to the established English cases, but a statement that in mercantile contracts in England, as a matter of fact, it is not inferred that money paid in advance is in the absence of words to that effect, a deposit by way of security.

That being so it would be indeed hazardous to infer that is in the Kistna District when a vendor accepts what he calls "advance" he is taking a deposit clothed with all the implications which that term has acquired in the west, through the course of the European civilization. Far safer is the finding of the learned Subordinate Judge that as the defendants neither alleged nor proved that the advance was earnest money, and as it was treated merely as part payment of purchase-money in the account books of the defendants it is not a deposit in the strict sense of the word. Even if that finding can be canvassed in second appeal, there is no reason why it should be reversed.

In a case of this sort which turns on the interpretation of a particular contract, little is to be gained by considering how Courts have interpreted other contracts. In Manian Patter v. Madras Railway Co. (4) and Natesa Aiyar v. Appavu Padayachi (5) there was a clause of forfeiture; in Vellore Taluq Board v. Gopalsami Naidu (6) the deposit was in terms by way of security; it was a deposit as earnest money in Roshan Lal v. Delhi Cloth and General Mills Co. Ltd., (7) and also in Mohammad Habib-ul-lah v. Mohammad Shafi (8). In Bishan Chand v. Radha Kishan Das (9) it is also found that the money was paid as a guarantee for the ruling is based on Ex parte Barrell, In re Parnell (10) which proceeds on that assumption.

Therefore, the finding of the lower Court in this matter is confirmed and the appeal is dismissed with costs.

The 1st respondent in a memorandum of objections claims interest on the advance ordered to be returned and also damages. It is stipulated in Ex. A that the advance should bear interest at $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per mensem. "The lower Appellate Court disallows interest because it was not claimed apart from damages. The mere fact that damages were also wrongfully claimed can hardly invalidate a legitimate claim for interest. So far the memorandum of objections must be allowed. First respondent is entitled to interest at the contract rate. But there is no reason for holding, nor was it pressed in argument, that the lower Courts have erred in disallowing damages. So far the memorandum of objections fails. Therefore, the 1st respondent will not have the costs of this memorandum.

Estoppel—Party taking particular position in previous litigation—Change of position in subsequent litigation, whether permissible.

It is a well-known rule of law that where a party has asserted a certain position in a previous litigation he cannot re-agitate the matter on the assumption of fresh fact against persons who were parties whether as plaintiffs or defendants in the previous suit. [p. 485, col. 1.]

Second appeal under s. 41 of the Punjab Courts Act VI of 1918, against the decree of the Senior Sub-Judge, Rohtak, dated the 12th October, 1926, reversing that of the Fourth Class Sub-Judge, Jhajjar, District Rohtak, dated the 29th March, 1926.

Mr. Shamair Chand, for the Appellant.

Mr. Mehr Chand Mahajan, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—In this case the plaintiffs sued for a declaration to the effect that 3 bighas 10 biwas of land belonged to them and were not liable to partition on the application of all the proprietors of Pana Harsa in Mauza Matan Hel. The facts are that one Har Dayal was a proprietor of the land along with some other land 16 bighas odd in all. After his death Musammatt Nanhi, who was either his widow or his mother, succeeded to a life-estate. After the death of Musammatt Nanhi, Musammatt Ladho, who is either the daughter or sister of Har Dayal, was in possession of the whole of the property of Har Dayal. On the 8th of January, 1914, Musammatt Ladho sold the land in dispute to the plaintiffs and mutation was attested on the 23rd of February, 1915, and according to this mutation possession had been delivered to the vendees. At the mutation some of the proprietors protested against the mutation on the ground that Musammatt Ladho had no title. On the 3rd of April, 1914, Shadi and Mathra two of the proprietors brought a suit as representatives of the proprietary body against Musammatt Ladho only on the ground that after the death of Har Dayal his land reverted to the proprietary body. The present plaintiffs who are also members of the proprietary body were plaintiffs in that suit and the suit included the whole of the property of Har Dayal including the 3 bighas 10 biwas now in dispute. The suit was decreed on the 14th of April, 1915, and Musammatt Ladho's appeal was dismissed on the 6th of January, 1916. Some proceedings were taken in execution and symbolical possession was delivered to one Ram Karan on behalf of the proprietary body on the 25th of March, 1918, and on the 29th of April, 1918, the execution proceedings were filed in full satisfaction of the decree. Actual possession seems to have remained all along with the present plaintiffs. The proprietors next applied for partition of the shamilat including the land in suit and the plaintiffs have brought the present suit for a declaration that they are the sole owners of the land in dispute and that it is not liable to partition.

The trial Court held that the plaintiffs were bound by the findings given in the previous case and were estopped from contesting the title of the proprietary body. It accordingly dismissed the suit. On appeal the learned Senior Sub-Judge held that the suit brought by Shadi and Mathra in a representative capacity was brought without giving notice of the case to all the proprietors and the plaintiffs were not, therefore, bound by the judgment in the previous case. He next held that there was no complete delivery of possession because only symbolical possession and not actual possession was delivered and the present defendants, i. e., the proprietors, decree for possession was now, time barred. He further held that under O. II, r. 2, sub-cl. (3) of the Civil Procedure Code as the defendants had not impleaded the present plaintiffs in the previous suit as defendants the defendants had, therefore, now no right to disturb the plaintiffs' possession. He, therefore, accepted the appeal and decreed the plaintiffs' suit with costs.

On appeal it has been urged that the learned Judge is wrong in holding that there was no notice to the plaintiffs. I find on the plaint in the previous suit that the Court ordered notice to issue to all the then plaintiffs according to the terms of O. I, r. 8 and presumably this order was complied with. The present plaintiffs, therefore, had notice of the suit.

It is argued next that the plaintiffs are bound by the decree in favour of the proprietary body either because it is res judicata or because the plaintiffs are estopped from denying the position that they took up as plaintiffs in the previous suit. I do not consider it necessary to decide whether the matter is res judicata for I certainly consider that the plaintiffs are now estopped from taking any position contrary to what they alleged in the previous plaint. They had full knowledge of the fact of the suit and it seems to me clear that the only possible inference from their conduct is that they allowed the other proprietary body to sue for possession of the whole land including the 3 bighas 10 biswas which had already been sold to them and of which they were in possession because they wished to share in the total property which had been left by Har Dayal and which amounted as previously stated to nearly 16 bighas. It seems clear, therefore, that they waived their exclusive title, if any, to 3 bighas 10 biswas and they are estopped from now alleging the contrary. It is a well-known rule of law that where a party has asserted a certain position in a previous litigation he cannot re-agitate the matter on the assumption of fresh fact against persons who were parties whether as plaintiffs or defendants in the previous suit. In this view of the case it is unnecessary to go into the other points that were raised by Counsel on either side.

I accept the appeal and dismiss the plaintiffs' suit with costs throughout.

An unstamped execution application is not necessarily invalid. Where action is taken on the application and properties are attached it will save a subsequent execution application from limitation.

The assignment of a personal decree does not require registration under O. XXI, r. 16, Civil Procedure Code.

Appeal against the order of the Court of Godavari at Rajahmundry, dated the 4th of July, 1925, in I. A. No. 271 of 1924, in O. S. No. 34 of 1917.

Mr. K. Venkatramana Raju, for the Appellant.

Mr. G. Lakshmanan, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—Two arguments have been urged before us: (1) That the execution petition dated 3rd September, 1920, is not a proper execution petition as it was not stamped at the time of presentation and, therefore, the petition dated 10th August, 1923, is barred by limitation. (2) That the assignment application under O. XXI, r. 16, of the Civil Procedure Code, is bad as it has not been registered. Both these arguments must be overruled. As regards the first, it has not been shown that, if an execution application is not stamped, it becomes necessarily invalid. Further, in this case action was taken on this application and properties were attached but no objection seems to have been taken by the appellant at that time. We hold, therefore, that the execution petition dated 10th August, 1923, was not barred by limitation.

There is no substance in the second argument also. There was a personal decree all along against the 1st defendant (the present appellant). It is conceded that the assignment of a personal decree does not require registration. The fact that in the same decree there was also a mortgage-decree against the 2nd defendant does not make it necessary to pass against a personal decree against the 1st defendant after the sale of all the mortgaged properties, however necessary it may be to pass such a decree against the 2nd defendant.

In these circumstances we dismiss this civil miscellaneous appeal with costs.

Interest—Suit on mortgage—Interest from date of suit up to date fixed for payment, duty of Court to award.

First appeal from the preliminary decree of the Senior Subordinate Judge, Sheikhupura, dated the 16th August, 1926.

Mr. Anant Ram Khosla, for the Appellants.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a suit for the recovery of a certain sum of money on the basis of a mortgage-deed; and the question for determination is whether the trial Judge was justified in disallowing interest from the date of institution of the suit to the date of payment. As pointed out in Mulla's Commentary on the Code of Civil Procedure, at page 106, the Court is bound to award to the mortgagee interest on the principal from the date of the suit up to the date fixed by the Court for payment of the mortgage-debt, at the rate stipulated in the mortgage-deed, unless the rate is penal or the rate is excessive and the transaction is substantially unfair. It is not suggested that interest at 12 per cent. per annum can be regarded as penal or that the transaction embodied in the mortgage-deed was unfair. The trial Judge has acted in an arbitrary manner, and the appeal of the mortgagee must succeed.

We accordingly allow the appeal and direct the defendant to pay interest on Rs. 7,070 at 12 per cent. per annum, from the date of the institution of the suit up to the date on which the money was paid by him to the mortgagee. The sum thus calculated, together with the costs of the appeal shall be paid on or before the 1st of February, 1928. A decree in accordance with the terms of O. Under s. 70 of the Provincial Insolvency Act, the Insolvency Court has the alternative of either enquiring into an offence itself or, instead of inquiring into the offence under s. 69, of making a complaint thereof in writing to the nearest Magistrate of the First Class having jurisdiction. [p. 487, col. 1.]

Section 70, cl. (1) does not provide that notice is to be served on the debtor to show cause why a complaint in writing should not be made to the nearest Magistrate of the First Class having jurisdiction. It only requires that a notice shall be served, calling on him to show cause why a charge or charges should not be framed against him by such Magistrate. [ibid.]

Appeal against the order of Mr. Kincaid, Judicial Commissioner, dated the 5th May, 1925, in Insolvency No. 47 of 1923.

Mr. Kalumal Pahlumal, for the Appellant.

Mr. W. Lobo, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal from the order of the learned Judicial Commissioner directing a complaint in writing to be made to the nearest Magistrate of the First Class having jurisdiction against the appellant of certain alleged offences in contravention of s. 69 of the Provincial Insolvency Act V of 1920.

It appears that on a report submitted by the Official Receiver, the Judicial Commissioner ordered a notice to be served on the appellant unders. 70, cl. (1) of the Provincial Insolvency Act calling upon him to show cause why a charge or charges should not be framed against him. The notice was served on the appellant's Pleader on the 9th of April, 1926, and the date of hearing fixed was the 5th of May, 1926. On that day, the appellant's Pleader stated to the Court that his client had suddenly been taken ill. The Court was not satisfied with the explanation of the insolvent's absence, directed a complaint to be filed under s. 70, cl. (5) and forwarded to Mr. Richardson the City Magistrate for enquiry.

Mr. Kalumal for the appellant has produced a certificate from Dr. S. W. Anklesaria of the Epidemic Diseases Hospital to the effect that the appellant was admitted in the Hospital on the 5th of May, 1926, suffering from a mild attack of Diphtheria and was discharged on the 7th of May. He has also put in an affidavit to the effect that he was ill as an indoor-patient in the Karachi Hospital. Mr. Kalumal contends that a reasonable explanation for his client's absence at hearing of the notice was forthcoming and that his client had not had an opportunity of showing cause why action should not be taken against him in respect of the alleged offence and he has appealed that the order of the learned Judicial Commissioner should be set aside.

I am of opinion that no reasonable grounds for interfering with the order complained of are made out. Under s. 70 of the Provincial Insolvency Act, the Court has the alternative of either enquiring into the offence itself or instead of enquiring into the offence under s. 69 of making a complaint thereof in writing to the nearest Magistrate of the First Class having jurisdiction. Section 70, cl. (1) does not provide that notice is to be served on the debtor to show cause why a complaint in writing should not be made to the nearest Magistrate of the First Class having jurisdiction. It only requires that a notice shall be served, calling on him to show cause why a charge or charges should not be framed against him. In cases where the Court instead of itself enquiring into the offence under s. 69 makes a complaint in writing to the nearest Magistrate of the First Class, the need for serving a notice on the accused to show cause why such a complaint should not be made does not exist. In the present case, the Court, no doubt, served a notice on the accused and such a notice would be necessary before the Court framed a charge against him or proceeded with the enquiry itself. But this procedure was not, however adopted. A complaint was filed in the Court of the learned City Magistrate and the appellant's proper course, in my opinion, is to make whatever defence he has in that Court.

Quite apart from these questions of law, it seems to me that there are certain very suspicious circumstances about the alleged illness of the appellant. He appears to have entered the Hospital on the very day when the notice matter was fixed for hearing. The Doctor's certificate shows that it was a mild case and his absence does not seem to me to have been satisfactorily explained.

Taking the circumstances into consideration, we dismiss this appeal.

An ex parte order under s. 78 of the Madras Religious Endowments Act of 1927 directing a trustee to deliver possession without giving him notice or getting his explanation is illegal and is liable to be set aside.

It is an elementary principle of law that no order should be passed which prejudices a person without giving him an opportunity to show cause against it.

Petition, under ss. 115 and 151 of Act V of 1908 and s. 107 of the Government of India Act, praying the High Court to revise the order of the District Court, Tinnevely, dated the 21st March, 1927.

Mr. B. Sitarama Rao, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application by a trustee of Sri Krishnaswami Temple at Ambasamudram to set aside an order of the District Judge of Tinnevely, passed under s. 78 of the Madras Religious Endowments Act of 1927. The first contention raised before me is that the petitioner had no notice of the application and the learned District Judge passed an order ex parte without sending notice to the petitioner or getting any explanation from him. The respondent was only appointed as an additional trustee of the temple and at best he would be only entitled to joint possession with the petitioner. The order as drawn up directs the petitioner to hand over charge of Sree Krishnaswami Temple and other minor temples attached to it with all the properties belonging to them. I consider the order illegal because it was posted without giving notice to the person who was to be bound by it. It is an elementary principle of law that no order should be passed which prejudices a person without giving him an opportunity to show cause against it. I, therefore, set aside the order of the District Judge, direct him to restore the application to his file and dispose of it according to law after notice to the petitioner. The petitioner will have the costs of this application.

Dr. Nand Lal, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The learned District Judge concurring with the trial Judge has held that the suit brought by the plaintiffs for possession of the immoveable property sold to his father by the defendant was within time and the only question for determination is whether the suit was barred by limitation. Now, it is beyond dispute that the defendant sold to the plaintiffs' father a certain share in joint property and the plaintiffs' father became, in pursuance of the sale, a co-sharer in that joint property. It has been frequently pointed out that the possession of one co-sharer is the possession of all the co-sharers and that in the absence of an ouster or overt act amounting to ouster, time does not run against the co-sharer who is not in actual possession of his share. In order to establish his adverse possession the co-sharer in possession must explicitly deny and repudiate the title of the other co-sharers to their knowledge and at least 12 years must expire from the date of the denial and repudiation before his possession matures into ownership. Now the learned District Judge holds that the adverse possession in the present case began only in 1910 and the suit was admittedly brought within 12 years from that date.

The defendant, therefore, has failed to establish the bar of limitation and the appeal preferred by him is dismissed [with costs].

Lord Blanesburgh.—As a result of the opening of this appeal by Mr. Dunne, it is possible for their Lordships to dispose of the case on a very short ground. It has been made clear that this action is in truth and substance a suit for a declaration that a particular adoption was invalid. It is plain that the fact that a claim was being made on the basis of this alleged adoption was known to the plaintiff in the suit more than six years before it was instituted, and that he himself had attained majority nearly nine years before the suit was commenced. The suit being in substance one for a declaration to the effect just stated, their Lordships, on these uncontested facts, are of opinion that it is barred by Art. 118 of the Limitation Act. In these circumstances no useful purpose would be served by any further examination here and now of the matters in controversy, and for the reason that the suit is out of time their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that this appeal by the plaintiff should be dismissed. Under s. 108 of the Evidence Act when the Court has to determine the point whether a particular person ought to be presumed as dead on the ground that he has not been heard of for more than seven years there can be no presumption that he was dead at a particular time. [p. 490, col. 2.]

The mere fact that a tenant leaves a particular village and goes to take residence in another village but retains control over his property situate in the village in which he originally resided, can be no indication of the fact that he intended to leave the village permanently. JUDGMENT.—This is a defendant's appeal arising out of a suit in which the plaintiff as a mortgagee claims possession of the property mortgaged. The facts of the case are: one Waris Ali owned certain trees situate in village Dakkhin Gaon, District Sultanpur. Defendant No. 1 is his wife, and defendant No. 2 his minor son. It was alleged that Waris Ali had left the village some eight years ago for Rangoon and had not been heard of since then. On the 22nd September, 1924, a usufructuary mortgage in respect of the trees in suit was executed by the widow of Waris Ali in favour of the plaintiff. The plaintiff alleged that he had been in possession of the trees but was illegally dispossessed in March, 1926, by defendants Nos. 3 to 5 who are the zemindars of the village. The plaintiff, therefore, claims possession of the trees and also damages. Defendants Nos. 1 and 2 did not put in any defence. The suit was contested only by defendants Nos. 3 to 5. Their defence was to the effect that the mortgage-deed in suit was invalid on the ground that on the date when it was executed Waris Ali was not dead; and consequently defendant No. 1 had no right to mortgage the trees in suit, or in any case, it was contended, she had no right to mortgage more than 2 annas share in the trees in dispute. It was also contended that shortly after Waris Ali had left for Rangoon, defendant No. 1 left the village and began to reside in another village close by and consequently defendants Nos. 3 to 5 being zemindars of the village became entitled to the trees in suit by right of escheat.

The learned Munsif of Musafirkhana at Sultanpur, who tried the suit, held that Waris Ali had not been heard of for more than seven years, and consequently there was a presumption that he was dead, or in any case he must be presumed to be dead at the time when the inquiry was being made, and in that case the mortgage-deed executed in plaintiff's favour would be treated as a valid mortgage under s. 43 of the Transfer of Property Act. He also held that the mere fact that Waris Ali's widow had left the village to reside with her father in a neighbouring village, would not indicate that she had become 'mafrur' and that she had left the village with an intention of permanently abandoning her residence therein. In this view of the case, the learned Munsif decreed the plaintiff's suit.

Defendants Nos. 3 to 5 appealed against the decision of the learned Munsif and the learned Subordinate Judge of Sultanpur, agreeing with the finding of the learned Munsif, dismissed the appeal.

In second appeal the same pleas are again raised on behalf of the defendant-appellant. I do not, however, see that there is any force in any of these contentions, and it appears to me that the decisions of the Courts below are quite correct and must be maintained.

As to the plea that the mortgage-deed in suit is invalid, I agree with the contention raised by the learned Pleader for the appellant that the mere fact that Waris Ali had not been heard of for more than seven years, would not raise any presumption that he was dead at the time when the mortgage-deed was executed in September, 1924. In Lal Chand Marwari v. Ramrup Gir (1) it has been held by their Lordships of the Privy Council that under s. 108 of the Indian Evidence Act when the Court has to determine the point whether a particular person ought to be presumed as dead on the ground that he has not been heard of for more than seven years, there can be no presumption that he was dead at a particular time. The utmost that can be considered is that he was dead at the time when the suit was brought. I cannot, therefore, hold that on the evidence produced in the case it can be presumed that Waris Ali was dead in September, 1924, when the mortgage-deed in suit was executed by his widow in favour of the plaintiff. The only presumption which can justifiably be made, would be that he was dead on the 25th October, 1926, the date when the present suit was brought. It, however, appears to me that the plaintiff's mortgage has become a good mortgage under the provisions of s. 43 of the Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882). Under that section when a transfer is made by an unauthorised person who subsequently acquires interest in the property transferred, the transfer operates on any interest which the transferor subsequently acquires during the time that the contract subsists. I, therefore, hold that the mortgage in suit is valid because Waris Ali must now be deemed as dead at the date of the suit and the mortgage must be considered to be an operative deed at that date.

As to the contention raised on behalf of the appellant that defendant No. 1 could not mortgage more than 2 annas share in the trees in suit, I am of opinion that the mortgage-deed cannot be read in that way. It is admitted that defendant No. 2, the son of Waris Ali, is a minor and lives under the protection of defendant No. 1. She must, therefore, be deemed to have executed the deed in the capacity of the guardian of defendant No. 2. I, therefore, overrule this objection.

As to the plea of escheat, I am of opinion that it has been rightly overruled by the Courts below. The mere fact that a tenant leaves a particular village and goes to take residence in another village but retains control over his property situate in the village in which he originally resided, can be no indication of the fact that he intended to leave the village permanently. In my opinion defendant No. 1 cannot be considered to have abandoned the village to give rise to a right of escheat in favour of the defendant-appellant. This plea, therefore, has no force.

The appeal, therefore, fails and is dismissed with costs.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXI, rr. 97, 98—Obstruction to delivery of possession to decree-holder—Court's power to order possession on Bailiff's report complaining obstruction—Notice to obstructor, necessity of.

A Court has no jurisdiction to pass an order under O. XXI, r. 98, Civil Procedure Code, directing the decree-holder to be put in possession of property upon the report of a Bailiff complaining of obstruction, without giving notice to the party against whom the complaint is made to appear and answer the same.

Petition under s. 44 of Act VI of 1918, for revision of the order of the Subordinate Judge, Third Class, Nakodar, District Jullundur.

Mr. Shamair Chand, for the Petitioners.

Mr. Muhammad Munir, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—In a decree awarding possession of immovable property to the decree-holder a warrant of possession was issued by the Court. The Bailiff was obstructed by certain persons in his attempt to give possession to the decree-holder and a report was made to the Court describing the circumstances under which the possession could not be given to the decree-holder. The Court thereupon sent a notice to the alleged obstructors to show cause why they should not be prosecuted, and, after recording some evidence, held apparently under O. XXI, rr. 97 and 98 of the Civil Procedure Code that the decree-holder was entitled to possession and that the obstructors should be restrained from offering any obstruction to the grant of possession to the decree-holder. This is a petition for revision of that order.

It is contended that no application such as contemplated by O. XXI, r. 97 of the Civil Procedure Code was made by the decree-holder and, secondly, that the Court never gave notice to the petitioners that it would investigate the matter as required by rr. 97 and 98 of O. XXI of the Civil Procedure Code. There is force in this contention. The lower Court under the circumstances had no jurisdiction to proceed with the enquiry which resulted in an order under O. XXI, r. 98, that the decree-holder be put in possession.

I accept this petition, set aside the order complained against and leave the parties to take what further steps they may be advised to take in the matter. The petitioners will have their costs against the respondent.

Provincial Small Cause Courts Act (IX of 1887), Sch. II, Arts. 8, 13—Suit for fees payable to Municipality for permission to sell from sites within Municipal limits—Jurisdiction of Small Cause Court—Suit for rent.

A suit to recover fees payable by a vendor of goods to a Municipality for permission granted to him by the Municipality to sell his goods from a site within the Municipal limits is cognisable by a Small Cause Court. It is neither a suit for rent within Art. 8 of Sch. II of the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act, nor a suit for dues payable by reason of an interest in immovable property within Art. 13 of the said Schedule. [p. 493, col. 1.]

Revision, under s. 25 of the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act (IX of 1887) and s. 115 of the Civil Procedure Code against the judgment of the First Additional Judge, Small Cause Court, Lucknow, dated the 1st August, 1927.

Mr. K. P. Misra, for the Appellant.

Mr. Zahur Ahmad, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—This application involves the decision of several questions. Under the provisions of s. 265 of Local Act II of 1916. (The United Provinces Municipalities Act) a person is not allowed to expose any article for sale, whether upon a stall or booth or in any manner, so as to cause obstruction in any street, and is not allowed to deposit or suffer to be deposited any building materials, box, bale, packages or merchandise in any street without the written permission of the Board and is liable to prosecution and to a fine of Rs. 50 for transgressing these provisions. It is, however, stated at the end of that section, that nothing contained in that section shall apply to any obstruction of a street permitted by the Board under any section of the Act, or any rule or bye-law made, or license granted thereunder. The word 'street' as defined by s. 2 (23) of the Act includes the land up to the defined boundary of any abutting property. Thus in the word "street" is included the patri or side walk. Under the provisions of s. 293 (E) of the same Act, the Board is authorised with the sanction of the Local Government to make bye laws consistent with the Act, and with other rules, permitting, prohibiting, or regulating the use or occupation of any public streets or places by itinerant vendors or by any person for the sale of articles, or for the exercise of any calling, or for the setting up of any booth or stall, and providing for the levy of fees for such use or occupation. The Lucknow Municipal Board has in accordance with the provisions of s. 293 (E) framed bye-laws, which have been sanctioned by the Local Government for the levy of fees from persons selling or exposing for sale any goods otherwise than as hawkers, or setting up any stall or booth, or allowing any cart or animal to stand for business in any public street or place except in certain specified places on payment of fees. Amongst the places which are not excepted are the patri or side walks of all roads within the Municipal limits. The present application is concerned with a portion of the Sitapur road which is within the Municipal limits. The bye-laws in question lay down that persons selling articles on these *patri*s are liable to pay certain fees. These fees are called tahe-bazari fees. The name is unimportant. The questions are what is the authority to charge these fees and what is the nature of the fees charged. I have already stated the authority. The nature of the fees is clear. They are fees for permission to do certain acts, the acts in question being the sale of goods in certain places. The fees are assessed according to the circumstances of the sale. An itinerant vendor selling vegetables loaded on a pony has to pay an anna a day for the privilege if the sale takes place within these limits. A man selling goats has to pay to the Municipality a fee of six pies per goat sold. Amongst these fees are fees for persons selling off stands. Such dealers as prefer to adopt this method are permitted to sell their wares from a site and they pay per day according to the area of land occupied. There are no contracts, no agreements, and no rents. The Municipality has authority to refuse to grant permission to a person to carry on such business, but if that permission is not refused a man selling his goods from a site is permitted to select his own site and to change his site at will. Apparently what happens is that the first comer gets every day his choice of vacant sites, subject to the reservation of certain sites for certain established traders as a matter of good feeling among the traders themselves. This preamble is necessary in order to explain some of the questions raised in the application.

It appears that the Lucknow Municipality, instead of collecting these fees in this particular area of the Sitapur road through their own servants, gave a contract to the plaintiff in these Small Cause Court suits a man of the name of Badal Khan to collect these fees. The Board farmed out the fees to Badal Khan. Badal Khan has instituted a certain number of suits in the Small Cause Court to recover certain of these fees. The application raises the question as to whether such suits as these can be instituted in a Small Cause Court under the provisions of Act IX of 1887. The learned Counsel, who appears against Badal Khan, has argued that these suits which are suits brought against persons who were occupying a certain area of land, are in reality suits for rent, and are thus suits excepted from the cognisance of the Court of Small Causes under the provisions of cl. 8 of the Second Schedule, and in the alternative he argues that they are suits to enforce the payment of dues payable to a person by reason of his interest in immoveable property, and are thus excluded from the cognisance of the Court of Small Causes under cl. 13 of the same Schedule. I do not consider that these suits are for either such relief. They are certainly not suits for rent. In order that a suit can be a suit for rent there must be a lessor and a lessee, and that involves the existence of an agreement to give out the land on one side and to take it on the other side. Here the Municipal Board in no way leases the site. The man takes the site at his own free will, occupies it for a few hours and pays fees, not for the occupation of the site, but for the privilege of selling goods upon the site. There is no real distinction between such a person who sells his goods seated with the goods laid out upon the ground and a person who sells his goods in standing with the goods in a tray. Each pays the fees for the privilege of vend, not for the occupation of the land. It is true that the fees increase according to the extent of the land upon which the vendor has laid his goods, but the suits are not, in my opinion, suits for rent. They are suits for fees. Suits for fees under the provisions of cl. 13 are excepted from the cognisance of a Court of Small Causes only when the fees are of the nature of malikana or haq. The fees in question are not of the nature of malikana or haq. The suits are not suits for dues payable to a person by reason of his interest in immoveable property. They are suits for fees payable for the privilege of doing certain specified acts. In these circumstances I find that the suits were brought rightly in a Small Cause Court. I am unable outside these clauses to find any other clause excepting these suits from the cognisance of the Small Cause Court.

The next point which has been argued by the learned Counsel supporting this application is that the Municipal Board is not the owner of that portion of the patri on which his clients carried on their business but that that portion of the patri had been transferred to a body called the Lucknow Improvement Trust, and that the Municipal Board had no longer any right to collect fees in respect of persons carrying on business in that portion. There is no evidence on the record to support this objection. The applicant's case is that he was wrongfully debarred from producing evidence. I do not find that he was wrongfully debarred from producing evidence. I do not consider that the applicant has any grievance in this matter. The remaining arguments were directed to questions of fact. I see no reason to interfere thereon. I therefore, dismiss this application with costs.

Second appeal from the decree of the District Judge, Sialkot, dated the 24th February, 1927, varying that of the Subordinate Judge, Fourth Class, Narowal, dated the 24th of August, 1926.

Mr. Balkishen Mehra, for the Appellant.
Messrs. Lal Chand and Hazara Singh, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff instituted the suit out of which this second appeal has arisen, for ejectment of the defendant from two houses (Nos. 89 and 90) which he alleged the defendant had mortgaged to him with possession and in respect of which he had executed rent deeds in his favour. The trial Court decreed the suit with regard to house No. 89 but dismissed it with regard to house No. 90 holding that the relationship of landlord and tenant was not proved in respect of that house. On appeal the learned District Judge reversed this finding and held that there was sufficient oral and documentary evidence on the record to prove that the deed (Ex. P.) relating to house No. 90 had been duly executed by the defendant. He accordingly decreed the plaintiff's suit in full. On second appeal the only point argued is that the lower Appellate Court has acted illegally in excluding from consideration the reports of experts from the Finger Print Bureau at Phillaur and Allahabad to the effect that the thumb-impression on the rent-deed in question did not tally with the admitted thumb-impression of the defendant. The learned District Judge held this evidence to be inadmissible because the experts were not examined in Court in respect of their reports. After hearing both Counsel I am of opinion that the learned District Judge acted rightly in excluding this evidence. It is obvious that the reports of the experts are not legal evidence unless they appear in Court as witnesses and are examined by both parties in respect of their opinion.

I, therefore, see no force in this appeal and dismiss it with costs.

Landlord and tenant—Planting of trees by tenant—Ejection of tenant—Mortgagee of trees, rights of.

Second appeal against the decree of the Sub-Judge, Lucknow, dated the 14th March, 1927, allowing the appeal preferred against that of the Munsif, Hawali, Lucknow, dated the 28th October, 1926.

Mr. Mukund Bihari Lal, for the Appellant.

Messrs. Zahur Ahmad and Zaibul Hasan, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a suit brought by the plaintiff-appellant against the defendants-respondents to recover Rs. 150 by way of damages on account of the cutting down of the trees standing in plots Nos. 196, 197 and 198 situate in village Karoni, Pergana Bijnor, District Lucknow. The plaintiff alleged that Chokhey, Nohri, Bhikhari and Dayal, sons of one Nanda were originally the owners of the groves standing on these plots, and that they had mortgaged them to Ganga Ghulam and Ganga Bishan under two usufructuary mortgage-deeds, dated the 20th January, 1900, and 8th August, 1910, respectively. It was further alleged that the plaintiff had obtained a transfer of the mortgagee rights from these persons by means of a sale-deed, dated the 4th December, 1916, and that he had been in possession since that date of the groves in suit as a mortgagee. It was further alleged that the defendant No. 1 had illegally cut dhak trees from the said groves on account of which they were entitled to damages amounting to Rs. 150. Defendant No. 2 was the zemindar of the village; and defendant No. 1 was his ziledar (collecting agent) acting on his behalf. It was for this reason that he was also impleaded as a defendant in the suit.

It was contended by the defendants that Chokhey, Nohri, Bhikhari and Dayal were not the owners of the groves in suit and that they had no right to mortgage the trees standing on the said plots. It was further contended that the persons mentioned above were merely in occupation of the plots in suit as tenants having planted the trees during their tenancy and that Nohri the survivor of them was ejected in execution of a decree from the Rent Court in the year 1923, the effect of which was that whatever rights he had in the trees were lost to him on his ejection; and that the plaintiff also lost all his rights as mortgagee on the extinction of the rights possessed by Nohri.

The learned Munsif of Hawali, Lucknow, who tried the suit, found that Chokhey and his brothers were the owners of the groves in suit and had a right to mortgage the trees; and that the ejection of Nohri the survivor of them from the plots in suit did not affect the rights of the plaintiff to the trees as a mortgagee of the said groves. On these findings he passed a decree for damages to the extent of Rs. 15 in favour of the plaintiff.

On appeal the learned Additional Subordinate Judge of Lucknow, took a different view. On a consideration of the entire evidence on the record he came to the conclusion that Nohri and his brothers were not in occupation of the plots in suit as grove-holders but were in possession as tenants paying rent for the same and had planted trees on those plots while in occupation thereof as tenants. In this view of the case he held that Nohri and his brothers had no right to mortgage the trees and that the decree for ejectment passed against Nohri was, therefore, binding upon the plaintiff. He, therefore, decreed the appeal and dismissed the plaintiff's suit.

In second appeal it is contended before me that the decision of the learned Subordinate Judge is erroneous. It is again contended that Nohri and his brothers were in occupation of the plots in suit as grove-holders and had a right to transfer the trees standing on those plots and, therefore, the plaintiff as a mortgagee from them was entitled to remain in possession of the trees and the defendants were not entitled to cut them down.

It appears to me that the finding of the learned Subordinate Judge is binding upon me as a Court of second appeal. I have gone through the entire evidence on the record and I am of opinion that the finding is correct. Nohri and his brothers were not in possession of these plots as grove-holders but had planted the trees thereon during their tenancy. That being the case, it appears to me to be clear that they had no right to mortgage the trees. They had only a right to enjoy the produce of the trees as long as they were in possession of these plots as tenants but could not have a right of possession over the trees after the ejectment. I am supported in this view by a decision of a Bench of the late Court of the Judicial Commissioner of Oudh in the case of Chandi Singh v. Syed Arjumand Ali (1). It was held in that case that the ejectment of a tenant from his holding extinguished his right in the trees which had been planted in it during the continuance of the tenancy. The question has been exhaustively dealt with by Mr. Spankie, A.J.C., in that judgment, and I am in entire agreement with the view of law taken by him in that case. I, therefore, hold that the mortgages executed by Nohri and his brothers ceased to have any effect in law after the ejectment of Nohri from the plots in suit; and the plaintiff has no right to retain the possession over the trees after the ejectment of the surviving mortgagor.

I, therefore, dismiss this appeal with costs.

ORDER.—The present suit was brought by the Municipal Committee, Nagpur, against the present defendant-applicant for damages for the use and occupation of certain land, and decree was granted by the Judge of the Small Cause Court in favour of the plaintiff.

The first point urged in revision on behalf of the defendant-applicant is that the suit was excluded from the jurisdiction of the Small Cause Court under Art. 1, Sch. II of the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act. I am, however, wholly unable to regard the present suit as one which can properly be described as a suit for the profits derived from immoveable property. It is, on the contrary, a suit against a trespasser for damages for the use and occupation of land: cf. Vira Pillai v. Rangasami Pillai (1) and Krishna Prosad Nag v. Maizuddin Biswas (2).

(1) 22 M. 149; 8 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 106.

(2) 17 C. 707; 8 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 1013.

The only other ground pressed on revision is founded on the notice (A-1) which I have seen cause to admit on revision. It is suggested that it is unlikely that the two rooms in question would have been let out to the present applicant without also some adjoining land, but the plaintiff non-applicant has filed in this Court the office copy of this notice and when this is read along with the resolution of the Municipal Committee, of which page 2 is a copy, it is perfectly clear that, either through collusion with the present applicant or through some misapprehension, the Muharrir Mahebubali issued the notice in question in terms which were entirely unjustified. I, therefore, see no ground whatever for differing from the Judge of the lower Court in holding that the defendant-applicant had encroached on the land and am unable to interfere.

The application is accordingly dismissed. The applicant must bear the non-applicant's costs. Costs in the lower Court as already ordered.

JUDGMENT.

Stuart, C. J.—(7th November, 1927.)—This is an application for a declaration that an appellate decree made by the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Raza sitting as a Single Judge of the Chief Court in second appeal is a fit decree for appeal to a Bench consisting of two other Judges of the Chief Court. The decree in question is dated the 8th of August, 1927. Section 12 (2) of Act IV of 1925 directs that before an appeal can be admitted from an appellate decree made by a Single Judge of the Chief Court to a Bench consisting of two other Judges of the Chief Court, the Judge who made the decree must make a declaration that the case is a fit one for appeal. Act IV of 1925 and the Limitation Act are both silent as to the period within which such an application should be made. Under s. 11 Act IV of 1925 the Chief Court may make rules to provide in such manner as it may think fit for the exercise of any of its powers by a Bench of two or more Judges of the Court. As s. 12 (2) directs that before a Bench of two Judges of the Court is competent to hear such an appeal, the Judge who made the decree must make a declaration that the case is a fit one for appeal, the question as to the period within which an application for such a declaration should be made is a question affecting the exercise of the powers of a Bench of this Court, and the question has to be provided for in rules made by the Court. Under the provisions of s. 122 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Act V of 1908) the Chief Court may from time to time after previous publication make rules regulating their own procedure and the procedure of the Civil Courts subject to their superintendence. Before such rules become authoritative they must be approved by the Local Government and published in the Local Official Gazette. This Court worked after its inception on provisional rules which had been prepared before it came into being. As soon as it came into being on the 2nd November, 1925, the Court commenced framing permanent rules. These rules are not now absolutely complete. The rule to which this application refers is r. 7 in Chap. XII. In the provisional rules it was laid that an application for a declaration could be made within ninety days of the date of the judgment. The Court, however, considered that this period was too long, and in the rule as finally drafted reduced that period to thirty days. The draft rule was published for information in the United Provinces Gazette Part II on the 18th of June, 1927. It was published with other rules. Persons wishing to object were directed to object on or before the 13th July, 1927. No one did object to this draft. The rules in question as published in the Gazette of the 18th of June, 1927, remained unaltered. They received the sanction of Government according to the provisions of s. 126 of the Code of Civil Procedure under G. O. No. 1153 VII-393, dated 8th September, 1927, from the Secretary to Government United Provinces to the Registrar of the Chief Court of Oudh, Lucknow. They were then published in the Gazette of the 24th September, 1927. As the rules stand now the period is thirty days. I have had to go into these matters as the application presented by the learned Counsel questions the validity of the rule upon the ground that the Court had no authority to make the rule. The suggestion is that the action of the Court was ultra vires. The application further suggests that as the Code of Civil Procedure and the Limitation Act have no express provision to cover the case, the limitation must be held to be governed by the provisions of Art. 181 of the First Schedule of Act IX of 1908, which lays down that in the case of applications for which no period of limitation is provided elsewhere in the Schedule or by s. 48 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, the period of limitation is three years from the date when the right to apply accrues. According to the view, any person who wishes to obtain a declaration that an appellate decree made by a Single Judge of the Court is a fit decree to appeal to a Bench would be allowed three years from the date of the judgment within which to make the application. I have no hesitation in repelling this suggestion in limine. It is perfectly clear to me that the Court had authority to fix the period of limitation under the provisions of s. 11 of Local Act IV of 1925. I find that the rule so framed has received all the sanction that it could possibly be expected to receive. It has been approved by the Local Government. It has been published in the Local Official Gazette and it now has the same authority as a rule contained in the First Schedule of the Code of Civil Procedure. The limitation for presentation of an appeal under s. 10 of the Letters Patent of the Allahabad High Court is provided for in a similar rule of the Allahabad High Court contained in r. 6 in Chap. III. The period of limitation is given as ninety days from the date of judgment appealed from. Under this rule the provision of s. 12 (2) and (3) of the Limitation Act (IX of 1908) are not given effect to. The period requisite for obtaining a copy of the decree and the judgment on which the decree is founded are not excluded. This clearly shows that Art. 156 of the First Schedule is not considered to have application and that such an appeal is not considered as an appeal to a High Court. It is, of course, not an appeal to a High Court. It is an appeal from the appellate judgment of a Judge of the High Court sitting singly to a Bench of two Judges which is allowed under the special provisions of s. 10 of the Letters Patent. The rule in question provides, that a memorandum of appeal need not be accompanied by a copy of the decree order or judgment appealed from. In these circumstances there is no doubt in my mind as to the fact that since the publication of that rule a person making an application for such a declaration more than thirty days after the date of the judgment will ordinarily have his application refused on the ground that it is time-barred.

This does not, however, conclude the matter. Rule 7 allows discretion for the admission of such an application by the Judge who has decided the case. The Judge who has passed the appellate decree in question can for good cause shown grant further time for presentation. Whether Mr. Justice Raza will consider that there is good cause in this case, when the applicant overlooked the fact that the proposed rule was published in the Gazette of June, and when it is clear upon the applicant's own statement that he did not even present the application within ninety days, but took the further benefit of a Gazetted holiday and a Sunday and has presented it to-day the 7th November, 1927, will be a matter for Mr. Justice Raza to decide. I send the application to Mr. Justice Raza to decide in the first place whether he will admit it as being within time, and secondly whether he will be ready to grant the declaration desired on the full consideration of the merits of the case.

Raza, J.—(March 16, 1927).—This is an application under s. 12 (2) of the Oudh Courts Act of 1925.

I decided the appeal on the 8th August, 1927. The present application was filed on the 7th November, 1927. This Court worked after its inception, on provisional rules, which had been prepared before it came into existence. As soon as the Court came into being on the 22nd November, 1925 it commenced framing permanent rules. In the provisional rules it was laid down that an application for a declaration under s. 12 (2) of the Oudh Courts Act could be made within 90 days from the date of the judgment. The Court considered that this period was long and reduced that period to 30 days in the rules as finally made. The rules were sanctioned by the Local Government and were finally published in the Government Gazette dated the 24th September, 1927. They came into force from the 1st October, 1927. As the rules stand now the period is 30 days as already observed. I am not prepared to accept the contention that the action of the Court in making the rules was ultra vires. As pointed out by Hon'ble Chief Judge, in his order dated the 7th November, 1927, the Court had authority to fix the period of limitation under the provisions of s. 11 of the Oudh Courts Act of 1925. The rule so framed has received all the sanction that it could possibly be expected to receive. It has now the same authority as a rule contained in the First Schedule of the Code of Civil Procedure. There is no doubt that since the publication of the rule in question a person making an application for declaration under s. 12 (2) of the Oudh Courts Act more than thirty days after the date of the judgment will ordinarily have his application refused on the ground that it is time-barred. The rule under consideration (r. 7, Chap. XII of the Oudh Chief Court Rules) allows discretion for the admission of such an application to grant further time if good cause is shown for its presentation. I have heard the applicant's learned Counsel. I am not satisfied that there is any good cause in this case. The proposed rules were published in the Government Gazette of the 18th June, 1927. The rules were sanctioned by the Local Government on the 8th September, 1927, and were finally published in the Gazette, dated the 24th September, 1927, under this Court's Notification dated the 19th September, 1927. They came into force from the 1st October, 1927. However, the applicant did not think of presenting the application under consideration before the 7th November, 1927. Even granting that the applicant had good cause for not presenting the application before the 7th November, 1927, I am not prepared to grant the declaration desired on the full consideration of the merits of the case. I have considered my judgment of the 8th August, 1927. I have also heard the applicant's learned Counsel at some length. I am not prepared to declare that the case is a fit one for appeal.

Hence I reject this application.

VEDAMBAL AMMAL—PLAINTIFF—

RESPONDENT.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XLI, r. 28—Defective trial by shutting out relevant evidence—Power of Appellate Court to call for revised findings after taking such evidence.

Where the trial of a case is defective by reason of relevant evidence having been shut out or by refusal of an adjournment which should have been granted to enable a party to adduce all the evidence or for any other reason, the Appellate Court can ask the lower Court to take the evidence so shut out or to give the party, who had not the opportunity to adduce all his evidence, an opportunity to adduce evidence, and to record a finding on the evidence so taken. The mere fact that the Appellate Court has not set aside the decree of the lower Court, does not in any way take away the jurisdiction it has to set aside the judgment and direct the lower Court to take evidence and record fresh findings. [p. 499, cols. 1 & 2.]

Second appeal against the decree of the District Court, East Tanjore at Negapatam, in A. S. No. 300 of 1922, preferred against that of the Court of the Additional Subordinate Judge, East Tanjore at Mayavaram, in O. S. No. 8 of 1921.

The Advocate-General and Mr. M. S. Sankara Iyer, for the Appellant.

Messrs. A. C. Sampath Aiyangar and K. S. Venkatarama Aiyar, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The first point raised in this second appeal is that the learned District Judge had no jurisdiction to send the case down to the Sub-Court for sending up revised findings. The Subordinate Judge who tried the case in the first instance refused a short adjournment to the plaintiff and closed the case. On appeal, the District Judge held that the Subordinate Judge could have granted the adjournment prayed for in the circumstances of the case and he sent the case down to the lower Court to take the evidence adduced by the plaintiff and any evidence adduced by the defendants and to submit revised findings. On receipt of the revised findings the District Judge disposed of the case. Mr. Sankara Iyer's contention is that the District Judge had no jurisdiction to call for revised findings in the case and he relies upon a recent decision of a Bench of this Court in Venkatarama Aiyar v. Sundaram Aiyar (1). If the Appellate Court wants additional evidence to be taken it must take the evidence itself or ask the lower Court to take the evidence and send it up. Where a trial is defective by reason of the trial Court excluding relevant evidence or by not giving an opportunity to the one party or the other to adduce all the evidence it can or where the trial Court shuts out evidence improperly and disposes of the case, the question is whether the Appellate Court can ask the trial Court to take the evidence shut out or to give an opportunity to the party which had been deprived of it to adduce all the evidence it wants and then to consider the whole evidence and send up revised findings. I think in a case where the trial is defective by reason of relevant evidence having been shut out or by refusal of an adjournment which should have been granted to enable the party to adduce all the evidence or for any other reason, the Appellate Court can ask the lower Court to take evidence shut out or to give the party, which had not the opportunity to adduce all its evidence, opportunity to adduce evidence and to record a finding on the evidence so taken. The appellant could not complain if the learned Judge in asking for revised findings had at the same time set aside the decree of the lower Court. The mere fact that he has not set aside the decree of the lower Court, I do not think in any way takes away the jurisdiction he has to set aside the judgment and direct the lower Court to take evidence and record fresh findings. Here the learned Judge has practically asked the lower Court to re-try the case. Can it be said that his not setting aside the judgment of the lower Court has in any way taken away his jurisdiction to set aside all the findings of the lower Court and directing a re-trial. In Venkatarama Aiyar v. Sundaram Aiyar (1) the facts were different. As I read the judgment, it appears that the Appellate Court wanted some additional evidence to be taken. The law is that the Appellate Court should take the evidence or direct the Court from whose decree the appeal is preferred or any other Subordinate Court to take such evidence and send it up to the Appellate Court. That is r. 28 of O. XLI. In that case the Subordinate Judge who wanted additional evidence instead of taking the evidence himself or asking the lower Court to take evidence and send it up, called for revised findings in the light of the evidence directed to be taken which he had no power to do. I find this point against the appellant.

The next point urged is that the case found by the Judge is opposed to the averments in para. 8 of the plaint. The real question in this case is whether the suit properties were purchased in the name of the defendant's father benami for the plaintiff's husband? In para. 8 the plaintiff says that if any portion of the consideration came from the defendant's father she is willing to give credit for it. Mr. Sankara Iyer urges that inasmuch as the plaintiff in a way admits that a portion of the consideration came from the defendant's father, the learned Judge ought to have found what the amount was. The defendant's case was that his father paid the whole of the consideration, and he did not place the materials before the learned Judge as to how much of it came from the plaintiff's husband and how much from his father. He was for having the whole of the property or none at all. That being so, he cannot now complain that the learned Judge did not record a finding as to how much came from the defendant's father. The learned Judge has carefully considered the evidence on record and Mr. Sankara Iyer is not able to point out any misstatements of fact or misreading of the evidence. I, therefore, dismiss the second appeal with costs.

PLAINTIFF—APPELLANT

DEFENDANTS—RESPONDENTS.

Inam—Suit for ejectment by plaintiff claiming to be pre-settlement inamdar—Inam found to be darmilla and not pre-settlement—Plaintiff's right to maintain suit in Civil Court.

A landlord claiming to be a pre-settlement inamdar sued to eject the defendants from their holding on the ground that they were tenants-at-will. The only ground on which the plaintiff sought to make out in both the Courts that the tenant was a tenant-at-will was because and only because he, the plaintiff landlord was a pre-settlement inamdar. The Court below found that the inam was a darmilla inam and not a pre-settlement inam, and directed the plaint to be presented to the proper Court:

Held, that it was not open to the plaintiff to contend in second appeal that even on the footing of the inam being darmilla inam the defendants were liable to be ejected in a suit in the Civil Court itself. [p. 501, col. 1.]

Second appeal against the decree of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Cocanada, in A. S. No. 32 of 1923, preferred against that of the Court of the District Munsif, Cocanada, in O. S. No. 322 of 1919.

Mr. C. Rama Rao, for the Appellant.

Mr. P. Somasundram, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This second appeal has been filed by the plaintiff. He sued as landlord to eject the defendants from their holding on the ground that they were tenants-at-will. There is no other allegation in the plaint. The issues framed in the case were as follows:—

“(1) Were the defendants-tenants from year to year under the plaintiff?

(2) Is the plaint land a pre-settlement inam?

(3) Is the 2nd defendant entitled to a permanent right of occupancy apart from the provisions of s. 6 of the Estates Land Act?”

The trial Court dismissed the suit. It is perfectly clear that there was before the trial Court no evidence whatever of any agreement of tenancy from year to year or of anything from which a tenancy from year to year would be the only or necessary inference. In fact, it seems to me to be perfectly clear that the entire contest between the plaintiff on the one side and the defendants on the other both in the Court of first instance and in the lower Appellate Court ranged round the question whether the inam in favour of the plaintiff was or was not darmilla inam, the plaintiff contending that it was not a darmilla inam but was a pre-settlement inam and the defendants contending that it was a darmilla inam. The parties put their contentions in that manner with a view to avoid or secure the rights incidental to a darmilla inam as declared by the decisions of this Court. The Court of first instance having found that the inam was a darmilla inam and there was no evidence whatever that it was a pre-settlement inam, dismissed the suit of the plaintiff.

The lower Appellate Court while coming to the same conclusion with regard to the origin of the inam found that the order dismissing the suit was wrong and the proper order that should have been passed by the Court of first instance was an order merely returning the plaint to be presented to the proper Court and, therefore, the lower Appellate Court passed an order to that effect. This appeal is against that order.

Mr. Rama Rao on behalf of the appellant has drawn my attention to an unreported judgment of two learned Judges of this Court in S. A. No. 752 of 1922. Apart altogether from the inconvenience of such reference to unreported decisions it seems to me that the present case is one with regard to which the observations made by the learned Judges in that case would not apply. If in the present case the plaintiff had sought by any evidence which any Court of Law can regard as material evidence to establish his case of tenancy of the defendants as tenants-at-will apart from the nature of the tenancy of the plaintiff himself, no doubt the questions referred to and discussed by the learned Judges in their judgment in the said second appeal might have some bearing. But when we find, as I do find in this case, that the only ground on which the plaintiff sought to make out in both the Courts that the tenant was a tenant-at-will was because

And only because he, the plaintiff landlord, was a pre-settlement inamdar and in that he has failed and that the finding is that the inam was a darmilla inam, then it follows that it is not open to him now to ask the Court to speculate about any matters which he has not either averred or sought to prove. According to the decision of the learned Judges in this second appeal, as I understand it, even if it should be held that the inam is a darmilla inam, it may still be open to a landlord to show the real nature of the inam and from that to ask the Court to determine the legal incidents and the rights and obligations of the parties. On the analysis made by the learned Judge who delivered the judgment of the Court in that case with regard to the three ways in which the darmilla inam might come to be made and known as such no question could arise in second appeal if the plaintiff did not in the course of the evidence seek to show or establish any facts by reason whereof even though inam might be a darmilla inam he still must be regarded as a darmilla inamdar having rights to treat the tenants as tenants-at-will. If on a fair construction of the contest as it was understood and carried on in both the lower Courts I should come to the conclusion that the point in contest between the parties was merely this and that the parties took their success or failure on the determination of that issue and that issue alone, it seems to me, having regard to the manner in which the lower Appellate Court has found the issue against the plaintiff, the order of the lower Appellate Court directing the return of the plaint cannot be regarded as wrong. In that case no doubt there are certain observations by the learned Judges to the effect that the defendants it was that set up the plea of occupancy right and that every presumption should be made in favour of the plaintiff in such a case such as would make his suit maintainable and that on these considerations the appeal before them should be dismissed. But in this case the plaintiff did not come into Court setting up in the first instance any case of darmilla inam or any other tenure but simply with a case that the defendants were tenants-at-will and that the record made by the Revenue Officer that the inam was a darmilla inam was an erroneous finding. The burden of proving that the finding was erroneous is clearly on the plaintiff. He who comes into Court asking for a declaration to that effect must make it out. The finding so far as that is concerned is against the plaintiff.

The other cause of action, namely, that the defendants are tenants-at-will, has not been sought to be made out independently of any question of tenure and the plaintiff's case having been throughout that the plaintiff was a pre-settlement inamdar and that, therefore, he had the rights claimed by him, and that having been found against, it seems to me that on the matter on which the parties went to trial the finding has been against the plaintiff and it is not now open to him to fall back upon any other speculations. The plaintiff's case having been a general one of the tenants having been merely tenants from year to year, it was open to the plaintiff to establish that not only by seeking to prove, as he did do, by showing that he was a pre-settlement inamdar but also by showing in the alternative if he could have done so that even though the Court should hold that it was a darmilla inam the object of the inam was such that he would still have a right to treat the defendants as merely tenants from year to year. That has not been done. On the decision by the majority of the Full Bench in the case of Jurugumilli Brahmayya v. Chellaghali Achiraju (1), the plaintiff is the land-holder within the meaning of the Estates Land Act and it is on that ground that his plaint has been returned to be presented to the Revenue Court. The learned Vakii for the appellant has also drawn my attention to another unreported decision by Wallace, J. I do not see what bearing the decision in that case has on the present case. There the learned Judge has referred to the allegations specially made in the plaint in that case to the effect that even at the time when the Estates Land Act came into force the plaintiff landlord was in possession of the property and that he let the property to the tenants and it was in respect of these matters that a finding was called for by the learned Judge. In this case there are no such allegations, there is no room for any such contention and there is no necessity for any such finding. I am, therefore, unable to hold that the order passed by the lower Appellate Court was wrong.

In the result the second appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXI, r. 1—Compromise decree—Provision for payment of lesser sum to decree-holder if paid within fixed time—Closing of Court before expiry of time fixed—Payment into Court on re-opening day, whether compliance with terms of decree—Time, whether of the essence.

By the terms of a compromise decree, the appellant was to pay to the respondent a certain sum of money in two months from a specified date. In default, the whole amount claimed in the suit was to be paid with interest and costs. Before the expiry of the two months the Court closed :

Held, that since the party had the option of paying either to the decree-holder or into the Court, a deposit of the amount into Court on the re-opening day, though beyond the period of the two months specified in the decree, was a sufficient compliance with the terms of the decree.

Sankaran Unni v. Raman (1), followed.

Where a person agrees to accept a lesser sum than is due to him in consideration of payment within a fixed period, time is of the essence of the contract.

Appeal against an order of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Sivaganga, in A. S. No. 4 of 1924, preferred against that of the Court of the District Munsif, Sivaganga, dated the 30th August, 1923, in O. M. P. No. 221 of 1923 in O. S. No. 466 of 1921.

Mr. V. Ramaswami Ayyar, for the Appellant.

Mr. K. S. Venkatarama Ayyar, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The respondent sued the appellant to recover a sum of Rs. 2,293-6-3 with interest and costs. The suit was eventually compromised. By the compromise it was agreed that the appellant was to pay to the respondent Rs. 2,100 in two months from 9th March, 1925, that is to say, on or before 9th May, 1925. In default, the whole amount claimed in the suit was to be paid by him with interest and costs. It was, of course, the intention that the money should be paid on or before the due date. Where a litigant agrees to accept a lesser sum than is due to him in consideration of payment within a fixed period, time is of the essence of the contract. In this case, however, the parties overlooked the fact that the Court would be closed for the vacation before 9th May. The appellant took advantage of that fact to delay payment till 11th June, when the Court reopened, thus extending the period of two months by one month and two days. The question is whether he was entitled to this advantage. Both the lower Courts found against him. There is a decision of Krishnan, J., in a case exactly similar to this Sankaran Unni v. Raman (1) which is entirely in favour of the appellant. The learned Judge held that under O. XXI, r. 1 of the Civil Procedure Code, the defendant had the option of paying either to the plaintiff or into Court, and that the deposit made on the re-opening day was sufficient compliance with the terms of the decree. When once it is conceded and we think that it has to be conceded, there being no distinction in this respect between a compromise and any other decree that a party has the option of paying either to the decree-holder or into Court no further argument is possible. We must follow that ruling and allow the appeal. As regards costs, however, we consider that the appellant should not be allowed any. Had he made an attempt to pay the respondent within the time agreed on and failed, the matter would have been different. As it is, he made no such attempt. The order will be that each party shall bear his own costs throughout.

LETTERS PATENT APPEAL No. 62 OF 1926.

July 18, 1927.

Present:—Sir Guy Rutledge, Kt., Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Brown.MAUNG KIN LAY AND ANOTHER—

When a plaintiff sues for redemption alleging that possession of immoveable property was given to the defendant as security for a loan of Rs. 100 or upwards, but without the execution of any registered instrument, his suit would fail, as oral evidence would not be admissible to prove the transaction. [p. 503, col. 2.]

But if the plaintiff instead brings a suit merely for recovery of possession based on title, without alleging the usufructuary mortgage, he would be entitled to succeed if he can show his title, unless the defendant can show that he is in possession under a contract of sale. [p. 504, col. 2.]

The burden of proving such contract of sale would be on the defendant, and on his bringing evidence of such contract of sale, the plaintiff would be entitled to bring rebutting evidence that no such contract was entered into. Such rebutting evidence would in no way contravene the provisions of s. 91 of the Evidence Act. [ibid.]

The pyatpaing or report to the Revenue Authorities is signed not for the purpose of recording the transaction, but for reporting to the Revenue Authorities for revenue purposes what has been done. When all that a pyatpaing suggests is that a certain land is sold for a certain sum, it cannot bar oral evidence of the transaction under s. 91 of the Evidence Act. [p. 505, col. 1.]

Mr. Kyaw Myint, for the Appellants.Mr. S. M. Bose, for the Respondents.JUDGMENT.

Brown, J.—The land in suit was admittedly at one time the property of the respondents. In the year 1917, they made over possession of the land to appellants and received from the appellants the sum of Rs. 500. The transaction was entered in the land revenue registers as a sale, but it is admitted that no registered document was executed. The respondents say that the Rs. 500 was given by way of loan on the understanding that the land would be returned when the loan was re-paid. The appellants say that the land was made over under a contract of sale.

The trial Court held that the respondents' account of the transaction was the true one and decreed the suit, which was a suit for recovery of possession of land on payment of Rs. 500. The trial Court's judgment was confirmed in appeal by the District Court and was subsequently again confirmed by a single Judge of this Court in second appeal. The appellants have been given a certificate under s. 13 of the Letters Patent to file a further appeal before a Bench of this Court and it is this appeal which is now before us.

It is not seriously contended that on the question of fact we can go behind the concurrent finding of all the three Courts which dealt with the case. But this appeal is argued on two grounds: firstly, it is urged that the suit was in fact a suit to redeem a mortgage and must fail because of the want of any registered document; and, secondly, it is contended that even if it be held that the suit should not fail on this ground, the terms of the contract between the parties were reduced to the form of a document in their report to the Revenue Surveyor and, therefore no oral evidence contradicting the terms of that report was admissible.

As regards the first point, reference has been made to the ruling in Maung San Min v. Maung Po Hlaing (1) by a Full Bench of which I was a member. In that case we held that when a plaintiff alleges that possession of immoveable property has been given to a defendant as security for a loan of Rs. 100 or upwards but without the execution of any registered instrument, oral evidence is not admissible to prove the transaction. In that case we were following a previous decision of the late Chief Court of Lower Burma in the case of Ma Htwe v. Maung Lin (2). It had been found by the learned Judge who made the reference to the Bench that the plaint in Maung San Min's case (1) was based on a usufructuary mortgage, and it was on that assumption that we came to our finding in the case. In his judgment the late Chief Justice remarked: "Had the plaintiff brought a suit merely alleging that she was the owner of the land and that the defendant was in wrongful possession thereof and claiming a decree for possession based on her title alone, there would be no objection to such a suit lying." That was, of course, merely an obiter dictum but it was an obiter dictum with which I expressed agreement in my judgment and which still seems to me to be correct. The same view was suggested in Ma Htwe's case (2) also. The question for decision is, therefore, whether the suit in the present case was a suit for recovery of possession based on title; or whether it was, in fact, a suit for redemption of the usufructuary mortgage. The plaint in the suit is headed "Suit for recovery and confirmation of possession of land." It then goes on to recite that the plaintiffs are the owners of the land and that in 1917 they borrowed Rs. 500 from the defendants and delivered possession of the land to them on the condition that they should pay Government revenue and enjoy rents and profits of the same in lieu of interest and that they would deliver possession of the same back to them on payment of the said sum of Rs. 500 but that the transaction was not effected by registered instrument. They finally ask for a decree for possession on payment of Rs. 500. It is true that the giving to them of a decree in the terms they ask would have the same effect as a decree for redemption of a usufructuary mortgage. But it is clear that the plaintiffs do not allege in the plaint the existence of any usufructuary mortgage. They definitely say that there was no registered instrument and it follows from that that no mortgage was effected.

The defence is that the intention of the parties was to effect a sale and that the plaintiffs had agreed to execute a registered instrument of sale. The position on the admitted facts was, therefore, this:—

The plaintiffs were the owners of the land and no title has passed either by way of sale or by way of mortgage because no registered instrument has been effected. The title, therefore, vests in the plaintiffs and ordinarily the person who owns land is entitled to possession thereof. On the facts alleged no mortgage was effected; the plaintiffs could not sue for redemption of the mortgage but they could sue for possession of the land based on title and I do not consider that the mere fact that they stated in their plaint what they allege to be the true facts can debar them from enforcing their title. It may be that they could have sued for possession of the land without any mention as to the claim of Rs. 500 and have treated that sum merely as a personal debt. They have, however, expressed their willingness to pay Rs. 500 as a condition precedent before obtaining their decree. If the present suit is bound to fail then it is difficult to see how any plaintiff who had made over his land to a defendant on similar terms could ever recover possession of that land. In my view of the case, on the pleadings of the parties, the plaintiffs were owners of the land and the defendants were in possession and the plaintiffs were, therefore, entitled to possession unless the defendants could show that they had a good right to resist their claim. The transaction took place only about seven years before the suit was filed, and no question of limitation, therefore, arises. In such a case I consider that the position is as indicated by me in my judgment in Maung San Min's case (1); that is to say, it was open to the defendants to bring evidence to show that they were in possession under a contract of sale. But if they failed to prove this then the plaintiffs would be entitled to a decree.

The District Court in appeal held that the plaintiffs were entitled to plead a contract of mortgage; but, in my opinion, it is quite unnecessary to decide that point. The burden of proof lay on the defendants and on the defendants' bringing evidence of a contract of sale the plaintiffs were clearly entitled to bring rebutting evidence to show that no such contract was entered into. By doing this they would in no way be contravening the provisions of s. 91 of the Evidence Act, as their evidence could not be produced to prove the terms as to a contract of mortgage but simply to negative the evidence produced by the other side as to the existence of a contract of sale. There has been a clear finding by the Courts that the defendants failed to prove their contract of sale and that being so, I am of opinion that the plaintiffs were entitled to a decree.

It remains to consider the second point raised, which is to the effect that the parties having admittedly signed on a pyatpaing that pyatpaing contains the terms of their contract and that no oral evidence is admissible to contravene the written document. This is a somewhat revolutionary doctrine which, if accepted, would have a far reaching effect. These reports to the Revenue Authorities are of almost daily occurrence, but so far as I know, no such claim has been made with regard to them before.

Section 91 provides that when the terms of a contract have been reduced to the form of a document no other evidence shall be given of these terms except the document itself. Now in the first instance what the plaintiffs desired to prove in this case was not a sale—that they cannot possibly prove—but a contract of sale. Looked at in that light it is clear that the pyatpaing relied on is evidence of no such contract. It purports to be a report of an actual sale. Further, I do not consider that in the pyatpaing the terms of the contract have been reduced to the form of a document within the meaning of s. 91. A document is described in s. 3 of the Evidence Act as any matter expressed or described upon any substance by means of letters, figures or marks or by more than one of those means, intended to be used, or which may be used for the purpose of recording that matter. The pyatpaing is signed not for the purpose of recording a contract but for the purpose of reporting to the Revenue Authorities for revenue purposes what has been done. It is true that such documents are referred to as evidence of what actually has taken place. But they do not purport to record in a formal manner the terms of the contract. In the present case all that the pyatpaing suggests is that the land is sold outright for Rs. 500. No terms of a contract beyond this are given in the pyatpaing, and admittedly the statement in the report is not legally correct.

In these circumstances I do not consider that the pyatpaing can be considered as a document recording the terms of the contract. In my opinion the contents of the pyatpaing in the present case do not bar the production of any oral evidence. And if it had debarred such evidence then it would have been fatal to the appellant's case.

I, therefore, think that no good reason has been made out for interference in this appeal and I would dismiss it with costs.

Rutledge, C. J.—I concur. The appeal is dismissed with costs.

Madras Estates Land Act (I of 1908), s. 6—Suit in Revenue Court for patta—Burden of proof of right to sue in special forum—'Kattukuthagai,' meaning of—Kattukuthagai village, whether 'estate'—Construction of documents.

In a suit by a tenant in a Revenue Court for issue of patta, the onus of proving that he is entitled to bring the suit in the Special Revenue Court lies on the plaintiff.

'Kattukuthagai' is in essence a lease or grant of land at a favourable rent. There is nothing in the term itself from which it can be inferred that a kattukuthagaidar is merely a renter or farmer of the melwaram.

It is not open to a Court to infer retrospectively from recent documents that an ancient grant was of melwaram alone.

Petition, under s. 115 of Act V of 1908 and s. 107 of the Government of India Act, to revise the decrees of the District Court, Tinnevely, in A. S. Nos. 278 to 292, 294 to 336 and 395 of 1913, preferred against those of the Court of the Sub-Collector, Tuticorin in S. S. Nos. 3 to 17, 21, 24, 26 to 65 and 23 of 1917.

Messrs. A. Krishnaswamy Iyer, and M. Balasubramania Mudaliar, for the Petitioner.

Mr. K. Bhashyam Iyengar, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The point for decision in these civil revision petitions is whether the village of Yellamaikanpatti of which the petitioner is an inamdar has been shown to be an estate under the Madras Estates Land Act. This is a mixed question of fact and law.

The plaintiffs are tenants of the village and sued in the Revenue Court of the Sub-Collector of Tuticorin for pattas on the footing that they possess occupancy rights. That Court held that the village was not an estate and dismissed the suits. The District Judge on appeal held that the village is an estate and remanded the suits for hearing on the other issues. The defendant comes up in revision. His main contention is that the District Judge has not rightly understood the law on the matter and has passed his judgment not on the evidence but on unfounded surmises of his own.

The onus of showing that they are entitled to bring suits in the Special Revenue Court lies undoubtedly on the plaintiffs. Both the lower Courts have found that the oral evidence is of practically no use in deciding the present point; and the only documents that have been relied upon before me on the one side or the other are Exs. UU, an Olagu Ayacut account of 1803 and Ex. XLIX, an Inam Register of 1805. These are the only early documents which are available to show what was the nature of the inam. The original grant is not available. From Ex. XLIX, column 15 it appears that the inam was granted in 1775 for "populating the village." The natural inference from that entry is that the village was then derelict or waste, and that is the defendant's contention. Plaintiffs contend that the fact that the Olagu account, Ex. UU, mentions tenants is evidence that there probably were tenants also in 1775. I am clear that no such inference can be drawn. The more reasonable inference is that the populating of the village for which the inam was granted in 1775 had been in some measure successful by 1803. The entry in column 8 of Ex. XLIX, 'Description of inam' is 'for subsistence as charity.' This does not carry the case any further. Converting waste land into arable land might without any stretch of language be termed charity. No other form of charity has been suggested by the plaintiffs.

Finally the plaintiffs rely on the description of the village in Ex. XLIX as a kattukuthagai village. The District Judge concludes from that term that the inamdar in 1775 was "a renter or farmer of the melwaram right from Government, failing to see that such a conclusion puts the plaintiffs out of Court for, if the inamdar was merely renting or farming the melwaram, then there was no grant of the melwaram at all and, therefore, the inam is not an estate. Now Wilson's Glossary definition of kattukuthagai is "land held on farm at a permanently fixed money rent which is usually light." The Tinnevely Gazetteer defines it as a form of lease in which a fixed rental is paid in money or in kind. The other authorities quoted in para. 42 of the District Judge's judgment do not alter the essential nature of the term. But when the District Judge concludes from them that the kattukuthagaidar was a renter of the melwaram I am quite unable to follow him. The kattukuthagai was in essence of a lease or grant of land at a favourable rent.

The use of this term in the Inam Register only makes the plaintiffs' case worse, since it implies that the village lands were handed over to the original inamdar at a favourable rent. There is nothing in the term itself from which one is entitled to infer that what was handed over was only the melwaram, and if the village was, as I am inclined to hold, waste at the time of the grant, there would be no melwaram to hand over. I think, so far as one can infer anything from the very meagre records, the correct inference is that the village as a whole was handed over to the inamdar at a favourable rent in order that it might attract cultivators and tenants and that there was no grant of the melwaram only. Plaintiffs in any case have entirely failed to prove that the grant was of the melwaram only.

The existence of tenants with occupancy rights much later on will not help them. It may be remarked incidentally that the Olagu account of 1803 does not describe the tenants as occupancy tenants, or use any word implying occupancy right. It is not till very much later that we meet any evidence from which it is possible to infer the existence of occupancy rights, and no document implying such and emanating from the inamdar; for example, patta or muchilka, has been so far filed.

This appears to me to be a case in which the District Judge has concluded in favour of the plaintiffs on no evidence whatever. The Inam Register and Olagu account afford no support to the plaintiffs' version as to the terms of the original grant, nor will a finding that some of the tenants have for some years past exercised occupancy rights assist in proving that the village is an estate, since it is not open to the Court to infer retrospectively from recent documents, that the original grant in 1775 was of the melwaram only—see the Privy Council case Nainapillai Marakayar v. Ramanathan Chettiar (1).

The District Judge's decision is, therefore, passed on no evidence and cannot be supported. It is hereby set aside. The plaintiffs will pay the defendant's costs in all Courts upto date. A consolidated fee of Rs. 350 for the set, to be distributed among the suits is allowed. I regret the necessity for revising the order of the District Court, since it is now nearly 10 years since the plaints were filed. A great deal of delay occurred before the District Judge, and that will have to be explained on a separate reference.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 47—Decree declaring charge in favour of defendant—Charge, whether can be enforced in execution—Separate suit, maintainability of.

A mere declaration in a decree that the property in respect of which a decree is given to the plaintiff is subject to a charge for a named sum in favour of the defendant by itself would not entitle the parties to work out their mortgage rights in execution. [p. 508, col. 1.]

In a suit for partition by a Hindu co-parcener, to which a purchaser of one of the items in execution of a money decree was a party the Court passed a decree directing that the property should be divided into 3 shares subject to the payment by the plaintiff of a sum of money which the alienee defendant had paid to discharge a binding mortgage on the property. The purchaser resisted delivery of possession except on payment of the amount for which the charge was declared. Thereupon the plaintiff brought a suit for possession on payment of the amount:

Held, that the suit for possession was not barred by s. 47, Civil Procedure Code. [ibid.]

JUDGMENT.—The facts which gave rise to this appeal are simple. The shop in dispute belonged to a Pandaram family. It was mortgaged to one Sardambal in 1905 under Ex. I. It was then attached by a simple money decree-holder in execution of the decree he got against the Pandarams. A decree was obtained by a third person against the Pandarams and that decree was assigned to the 1st defendant in the present suit. He purchased the property in execution of the decree in 1907 and got possession. In 1910 a suit for partition was filed by one of the members of the Pandaram family, O. S. No. 45 of 1910, in the Sub-Court against the other members of the family, and the present 1st defendant was the 10th defendant in that suit. One of the items of property of which the partition was sought for was this shop. The plaintiff's case was that the purchase by the present 1st defendant (10th defendant in that suit) was benami for the family. In the meantime the present 1st defendant discharged the mortgage debt due to Saradambal. In the partition suit it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to a share but as the 10th defendant (the present 1st defendant) had discharged the mortgage he was entitled to Rs. 1,852-3-2 due to him. There was a preliminary decree and a final decree in which it was directed that the property should be divided into 3 shares subject to the payment of Rs. 1,852-8-2 and interest thereon. Then the plaintiff prayed for delivery of possession. This charge was set up as a ground for resisting the delivery. The Judge held that on account of this charge possession could not be given except on payment of Rs. 1,852 and interest. This suit is filed to get possession. The 5th defendant in this suit, a brother of the 1st defendant was not a party to the previous suit, and he raised some objections. A decree has been passed directing delivery of possession on payment of Rs. 1,620 and subsequent interest. It seems to us that on the facts proved in this case and the facts that the 5th defendant was a brother of the 1st defendant there can be no question of adverse possession.

The next point is that the present suit is barred under s. 47 as the matter was one relating to the execution of the partition decree. We find it difficult to see how in the absence of any decree in that suit for payment, a mere declaration that the property is subject to a charge and that possession could not be given until that amount is paid would entitle parties to work out their mortgage rights in execution of that decree. In some partition suits where the property is subject to a charge or mortgage, the parties are not in a position to pay before the final decree is passed. A mere declaration that the property is subject to a charge by itself would not give the right to work out in execution the mortgage rights. We do not think that the present suit is barred by s. 47. We might also state that this objection was not taken when the suit was tried. If it had been taken at that time it would have been open under sub-s. 2 to the Court to treat the suit as a proceeding in execution and work out the rights of the parties if by that time the claim was not barred; so that there was no technical objection to that course having been followed if objection was taken in time. However it is unnecessary to pursue that matter further, for even if we thought that s. 47 applied we would be inclined to send this case back and not dismiss the suit.

The only substantial question that remains is what is the amount due on redemption? The mortgage states that out of the income of the property Rs. 127-8-0 should be appropriated towards interest and that after paying the revenue the balance (michavaram) should be paid to the mortgagors. It has been found by the Subordinate Judge that the revenue is Rs. 20-7-6 which sum would ordinarily be payable every year by the mortgagor. It has also been found that Rs. 352-8-2 was paid in addition to the amount of Rs. 1,500 and in fact in the partition suit the amount was fixed at Rs. 1,852-8-2. It seems to us that the amount payable will be Rs. 1,852 plus taxes paid every year from 1913 upto the date of payment which will be Rs. 259-3-8. The decree of the lower Court will be modified by declaring the amount payable at Rs. 1,928-13-0 within 11th August, 1927, instead of the amount awarded by the Subordinate Judge.

As regards Civil Miscellaneous Appeal No. 48 of 1925 which is an appeal against the order of the Subordinate Judge refusing to extend the time for payment it appears that an interim stay was obtained by the defendant which was dissolved by the High Court on 10th October after the period fixed. We think that this is a fit case for extension of time. But as we have already given time for payment of the money in the appeal we think it is unnecessary to pass any order on this civil miscellaneous appeal.

As regards the appeal the appellant will pay respondent proportionate costs and receive the costs on the difference between the decree amount in lower Court and this Court and in civil miscellaneous appeal. They will bear their own costs. The Vakil's fee and Court-fee will be calculated on Rs. 1,852 in appeal.

The memorandum of objections is not pressed. It is dismissed. No costs.

No order necessary on Civil Revision Petition No. 56 of 1925.

*Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), s. 100—

Provision for execution of mortgage-deed on demand—Charge, creation of, whether prevented,*

The introduction into an instrument of a provision that a demand or request shall be one of the preliminaries to the obligation to execute a deed, does not determine the question whether the instrument creates a present charge or not. If an intention to give a present charge can be collected from the instrument, the introduction of such a provision does not make it the less a present charge.

A prize holder in a kuri-chit in furnishing security according to the rules of the chit executed a deed stamped as a mortgage by which he undertook, when required by the stake-holder, to give him a mortgage on his property; but there was a later clause in the deed which provided that "we and the properties mentioned in the partition deed are liable for any arrears of future subscription".

Held, that the deed created a charge on the immovable properties in respect of such arrears.

United Realization Co. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (1), followed.

Appeal against an order of the District Court, South Malabar at Calicut, dated the 17th February, 1925, in C.M. A. No. 125 of 1924, preferred against that of the Court of the Official Receiver of South Malabar at Calicut, dated the 21st November, 1924, in M. P. No. 62 of 1924, in I. P. No. 25 of 1923 on the file of the District Court.

Mr. C. Unikanda Menon, for the Appellant.

Mr. T. S. Anantha Raman, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The only question in this appeal is whether the bond executed by the insolvents on 26th July, 1911, created a charge on the immoveable property. They subscribed for half a ticket in a kuri and took a prize of Rs. 10,000. By the rules of the kuri a subscriber who took a prize was to furnish security for the payment of future subscriptions and it is significant that the bond given by the insolvents was stamped as if it was a mortgage. It seems to us clear that the intention of the parties was to create a charge. The respondent relied on two features of the deed. The first is that the insolvents undertook, when required by the stake-holder, to give him a mortgage on the property. The second is that the clauses on which the appellant relies were added to the deed as a sort of supplement, though, before it was signed by the insolvents.

The first point would, undoubtedly, be conclusive in favour of the respondent, were it not for the supplementary clause. That clause runs, "We and the properties mentioned in the aforesaid partition deed are liable for any arrears of future subscription mentioned above. The properties in A and B schedules of the said partition deed are situated in Purayiri Amsom, Kannadi Amsom, included in Koyalmannan District and Kallutikode Amsom comprised in Mannarkat Sub-District." We attach no significance to the fact that it is a supplementary clause. It is as much part of the completed deed as the undertaking to give a mortgage when required and we see no reason why it should not be given effect to, if it creates a charge. A number of decisions have been cited before us. That most in point seems to be United Realization Co. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (1) Wills, J., said: "It is plain, I think, from the cases to which the Solicitor-General called our attention, that the introduction into an instrument of a provision that a demand or request shall be one of the preliminaries to the obligation to execute a deed, does not determine the question whether the instrument creates a present charge or not. That question is to be decided upon perfectly different considerations. If an intention to give a present charge can be collected from the instrument, the introduction of such a provision does not make it the less a present charge." As we have already observed, we are satisfied that the intention here was to create a present charge. The rule of the kuri was that security should be furnished for future subscriptions and the document was stamped as if it was a mortgage.

The appeal is allowed with costs throughout. Costs to come out of the estate.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), Sch. II, cl. 1
—Reference to arbitration—Compromise agreement.

The words 'arbitration' and reference to arbitration are used in common parlance. The Code of Civil Procedure uses the same expressions but lays down certain forms and steps for a reference to arbitration and for the award made by the arbitrator to be embodied in the decree of the Court, and unless these forms and steps are followed, there cannot be said to be any valid reference to arbitration. [p. 511, col. 2.]

In a suit by the plaintiff for possession, alleging that defendants Nos. 4 and 5 had sold half of certain plots to him but had subsequently colluded with defendants Nos. 1 to 3 the other co-sharers and allowed the latter to take possession, a compromise petition was filed under which the whole lands in the village were to be divided between the plaintiff and his co-sharers on the one hand and the defendants Nos. 1 to 3 on the other proportionately to the admitted shares they had therein on reference to the last Settlement Survey. A gentleman was appointed as arbitrator to equalise possession as far as possible and it was agreed that after the said arbitrator had made the proposed division, the plaintiff would withdraw from the suit and the defendants would withdraw the allegations they had made with respect to the plaintiff's purchase :

JUDGMENT.

Roy, J.—This appeal is directed against the decree passed by the Subordinate Judge, Second Court, Mymensingh amending the decree passed by his predecessor in the suit brought by the plaintiff. We learn that the plaintiff commenced this action in the Munsif's Court but the valuation of the suit was found to be over Rs. 5,000 and it came eventually before the Subordinate Judge. It is said that the defendants Nos. 4 and 5 were owners of some parcels of land in villages Gangatiya and Saidpur lying within Kharija taluk No. 1760-28 of the Mymensingh Collectorate and that they were in exclusive possession of some of the plots and were in possession of some shares in the other plots with the other defendants Nos. 1—3, who owned the remaining shares. The plaintiff alleged that the defendants Nos. 4 and 5 sold half of what they had in these plots to the plaintiff by a kobala dated the 26th June, 1915, but the said defendants subsequently colluded with defendants Nos. 1—3 and allowed the latter to take possession of these lands.

The plaintiff thereupon brought the present suit (from which this appeal arises) and he sought to establish his title to the lands he purchased and he asked for partition and for khas possession of his share in these lands. The defendants Nos. 1 3 disputed plaintiff's title and that of his vendors and the vendors denied the sale. Issues were drawn up and after protracted proceedings a commission was taken out to examine the plaintiff who resides in Calcutta. Before the Commissioner the parties entered into a compromise and this was embodied in a petition dated the 16th March, 1925.

The decision of the case turns on the terms of this petition of compromise. The plaintiff gave up his claim based on his alleged purchase. It was settled that the lands in these villages Gangatiya and Saidpur appertaining to Taluk 1760/28 were to be divided between the plaintiff and his co-sharers on one side and the defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3 on the other, proportionately to the admitted shares they had therein, on reference to the last Settlement Survey. The plaintiff and his co-sharers and the defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3 appointed Babu Sarat Chandra Bhattacharjee a Pleader to be the arbitrator. The arbitrator was to equalise possession as far as possible and it was agreed that after the said arbitrator had made the proposed division, the plaintiff would withdraw from the suit and the defendants would withdraw the allegations they had made with respect to the plaintiff's purchase. Babu Sarat Chandra declined to arbitrate. Efforts were made to have a joint petition filed agreeing on a partition by some other person or persons but these efforts were unsuccessful. The learned Subordinate Judge thereafter on plaintiff's petition, purporting to act under ss. 5 (3), Sch. II of the Civil Procedure Code called on the defendants Nos. 1—3 to appoint an arbitrator. The defendants objected and protested that there was no reference to arbitration as understood under Sch. II of the Civil Procedure Code, that the petition of compromise dated the 16th March, 1925, was not signed by all the parties and that the compromise did not relate to the subject-matter of the suit and so on, but the learned Subordinate Judge refused to listen to any objection and being of opinion that the defendants were trying to back out of the compromise they had entered into "on flimsy technicalities" he appointed a Pleader Babu Satyaranjan Guha as an arbitrator in place of Babu Sarat Chandra Bhattacharjee and asked him to complete the division. This gentleman filed a so-called award though the defendants objected and protested all throughout that the proceedings were illegal and ultra vires. The award was returned by the learned Subordinate Judge for consideration on a particular point. The Pleader re-filed his award and thereafter the learned Subordinate Judge made a decree in conformity with the said award, the defendants objecting and protesting throughout these proceedings. The defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3 then filed an application for amendment of the decree to bring it in conformity with the judgment of the Subordinate Judge. It came for hearing before his successor and he had no hesitation in deleting the so-called award from the decree. The decree, as it stands, now, merely states that the claim of the plaintiff is treated as withdrawn without liberty to bring a fresh suit and the allegations made by the defendants in their written statements in the kobala of the plaintiff are deleted.

The plaintiff has appealed and the learned Vakil appearing for the plaintiff seeks to restore the previous decree which was achieved and which purported to embody the arbitrator's so-called award. The appeal to say the least is audacious.

Certain preliminary objections were taken by the learned Vakil for the respondents. They are not serious; one was that no appeal lay from a decree which is based on a compromise. The contention of the plaintiff is that the whole compromise has been struck out. The dispute is over the nature of the compromise and the plaintiff has a right in appeal to show what the compromise was. The second ground is that the period of limitation should be counted from the date of the original decree and that counted from that time the appeal is barred. The plaintiff was not aggrieved, however, until the amended decree was passed and he is within time from that point of time, allowance being made for time taken in obtaining a copy. The third ground is that the stamp fee of Rs. 20 is insufficient and ad valorem fees should have been paid. The answer of the plaintiff that so far as the present dispute is concerned it is in respect of partition and that at any rate the relief claimed is not capable of being valued, seems sufficient.

Returning to the merits of the case it may be mentioned that the words 'arbitration' and 'reference to arbitration' are used in common parlance. The Code of Civil Procedure uses the same expressions but lays down certain forms and steps for a reference to arbitration and for the award made by the arbitrator to be embodied in the decree of the Court, and unless these forms and steps are followed it is idle to appeal to s. 5 of the Sch. II of the Civil Procedure Code by which the learned Subordinate Judge purported to have appointed Babu Satyaranjan Guha as arbitrator in place of Babu Sarat Chandra Bhattacharjee who refused to act. Section 1 of Sch. II of the Civil Procedure Code says that where all the parties to a suit agree that any matter in difference between them shall be referred to arbitration, they may, before judgment is pronounced, apply to the Court for an order of reference. Clearly there was no such application before the Court nor did the Court make an order of reference as contemplated by s. 3. Finally the Court has to pronounce judgment according to the award of the arbitrator. The petition of compromise does not contemplate that any award was to be made by the arbitrator and that it should be embodied in the judgment of the Court. The learned Subordinate Judge seems to have realised this for in his judgment he states "a petition of compromise is more appropriate in describing it, rather than a petition of reference to arbitration. For there is no prayer in this petition that the suit would be disposed of in terms of the award filed by the salis (arbitrator) or that the award would be incorporated into a decree." In spite of this conclusion he, however, fell back on r. 5 of the Second Schedule and that this rule has a wide application and could act on it and dispose of the matter by saying that he appointed another gentleman to effect the partition according to the original wishes of the parties. He says this gentleman "has filed his report. Call it an award or anything else. The partition has been effected and as the parties are bound by their petition of 16th March, 1925, the suit will be disposed of on its terms."

On the face of it this was very arbitrary and the learned Subordinate Judge who succeeded could hardly maintain the so-called award of this kind. He held that his predecessor had treated the petition of 16th March, 1925, as a petition of compromise, and he thought that so much of the compromise that the plaintiff would withdraw from suit without liberty to bring a fresh suit and that the defendants would withdraw their imputations against the purchase, could be maintained and he thereupon deleted the award and amended the decree.

The learned Vakil appearing for the plaintiff has referred to O. XXIII, r. 3 and he seeks to justify the action taken by the trial Judge thereunder. All the parties did not join, and all that the petition said was that there will be a partition done by Pleader Sarat Babu and on his doing so the suit would be withdrawn and the imputations against the plaintiff deleted. Sarat Babu declined to make the partition with the result that the compromise was hung up. If it be argued as the trial Judge did, that there was a valid compromise between the parties, viz., that the lands would be divided according to their respective shares it is not clear how the trial Judge could insist on carrying it through in the manner he did. The plaintiff may have his remedy elsewhere but it could not be done in this suit. The plaintiff gave up his claim based on a purchase and the compromise was in respect of something else. The compromise did not relate to the subject-matter of the suit. New parties were again brought in, viz., the principal co sharers. The compromise so far as the suit before us is concerned must be in the circumstances of the case taken to have fallen through and the only order, in my opinion, which the Subordinate Judge could have passed on 3rd April, 1925, was that he should proceed with the trial of the suit.

The amended decree cannot be maintained for the simple reason that the compromise was not completed. The suit was to be withdrawn and the imputations made by the defendants also withdrawn on the happening of a certain event, viz., the division of the lands by Pleader Sarat Babu. That contingency did not happen and the petition of compromise cannot be acted upon—for obviously the two parts are connected and it would not be right to pass a decree on a portion of the compromise ignoring the first part. We do not know of course what the plaintiff wishes to do, viz., to continue the suit from the point the compromise could not be effected or seek his remedy on the settlement that the lands are to be divided according to the admitted shares of the parties. In the present suit we must leave out the compromise. In case the plaintiff wishes to continue the suit, he should be given the chance. As the amended decree stands he cannot and a future suit by him may also be barred as it happened in the case of Gulkāndi Lal v. Manni Lal (1).

The original decree has been superseded. It cannot be restored. The amended decree shall also be set aside. The appeal, therefore, is allowed in part. The parties are relegated to the position they stood on 3rd April, 1925. The learned Judge will now allow the plaintiff to continue his suit from that day and thereafter dispose of it according to law. The contesting respondents will get their costs, the hearing-fee being assessed at 3 gold mohurs.

The plaintiff appellant had an application in revision as an alternative on which a Rule was issued. The Rule is discharged.

Mukerji, J.—I have had the advantage of reading the judgment which my learned brother is about to deliver. I agree in his conclusions and the order which he has proposed to pass, and I desire to add a few words.

The true character of the petition dated the 16th March, 1925, appears to have been very much misconceived by the Court below. Obviously it is not, and cannot be regarded as, an application to file in Court an agreement to refer to arbitration such as is contemplated by cl. 17 of Sch. II, or as an application to file in Court an award made in an arbitration held without the intervention of the Court, as provided for by cl. 20 of Sch. II. Could it be treated as an application to the Court for an order of reference within the meaning of cl. 1 of Sch. II? The Court below treated it as such an application, and made an order under cl. 3 stating that the arbitrator was to do the work mentioned in the petition within two weeks (vide Order No. 74 dated 31st March, 1925); an order appointing a new arbitrator under cl. 5, (vide Orders No. 74 dated 3rd April, 1925, No. 80 dated 18th April, 1925, and No. 81 dated 29th May, 1925, Orders extending the time for filing the award under cl. 8 vide Orders No. 83 dated 30th May, 1925, and No. 84 dated 15th June, 1925) and also an order remitting the award under cl. 14 (vide Order No. 87 dated 29th June, 1925). There are several weighty reasons why the petition cannot be regarded as one made for an order for reference in a pending suit such as cl. 1 contemplates. In the first place the petition does not contain any prayer for such reference, and it does not appear anywhere that it was in the contemplation of the parties that there should be a judgment according to the award. Secondly, the foundation of the jurisdiction of the Court is an agreement between all parties interested. As pointed out by the Judicial Committee in Ghulam Khan v. Muhammad Hassan (2) in dealing with Ch. XXXVII of the Code of 1882 in which the words were "where in any suit all the parties agree," that the agreement to refer and the application to the Court founded upon it must have the concurrence of all parties concerned and the actual reference is the order of the Court, and that large powers are given to the Court with the view of making the award in such cases, complete, operative and final. The word "interested" was added by the Code of 1908 to give effect to the decision in Pitam Mal v. Sadiq Ali (3) which laid down that the words "all the parties to a suit" "would not necessarily include parties who never put in any appearance in the Court, and between whom and any of the parties to the submission there was not in fact any matter in difference in the suit." In the present case the defendants Nos. 4 and 5 were not parties to the agreement. They, no doubt, denied having any interest in the subject-matter of the suit, but the plaintiff claimed relief as against them, and, therefore, it cannot be said that they are not parties interested. Moreover the agreement affected the shares of the plaintiff and his co-sharers but it is not known who these co-sharers are and what their shares are. Thirdly, the expression any matter in difference must mean matter in difference arising in the suit. This is clear from the context, as well as the form prescribed for an Order of Reference, Form No. 2 of the Appendix. That this is so has been explained by the Judicial Committee in the case of Rim Protap Chamria v. Durga Prosad Chamria (4). In the present case what the arbitrator had to do was wholly outside the scope of the pleadings in the suit. The Subordinate Judge, therefore, was clearly wrong in proceeding on the supposition that the petition of the 16th March, 1925, was one which gave him jurisdiction to proceed under paras. 1 to 16 of Sch. II.

The intention of the parties appears clearly from the wording of the petition itself. It stated: "The arbitrator shall within 14 days from this day or as soon as possible, make the division in the aforesaid manner. After the aforesaid arbitrator files his report in Court after effecting the division in the aforesaid manner, the plaintiff shall withdraw the aforesaid Suit No. 269 of 1922 of the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Mymensingh without permission to institute a fresh suit, and after the plaintiff withdraws the aforesaid suit, the defendants shall withdraw the allegations made in their written statement against the truth of the plaintiff's purchase." It was an adjustment by a lawful agreement or compromise which the petition purported to notify to the Court as contemplated by O. XXIII, r. 3, and if the terms were carried out as intended by the arbitrator appointed by the parties, it could have been recorded and the suit allowed to be withdrawn and dismissed, and the objectionable passages in the written statement could have been deleted. If the adjustment had taken place, that is to say if the said arbitrator had not refused to act but had done what was expected, the compromise or agreement would then have been recited in the decree, though the decree would have been confined in its operation to so much of the subject-matter of the suit as was dealt with by the agreement: Hemanta Kumari Debi v. Midnapore Zemindari Co. Ltd. (5). The result of the proceedings before the arbitrator and his award could not have been enforced under O. XXIII, r. 3: Dekari Tea Co. Ltd. v. Assam Bengal Ry Co. (6), Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XLVII, r. 1—Omission to cite decision of High Court, whether ground for review of judgment—'Error apparent on the face of the record,' meaning of.

The mere omission on the part of a Judge to consider a decision, however regrettable and however wrong, cannot possibly be regarded as constituting an error apparent on the face of the record affording a proper and sufficient ground for granting review of a judgment. [p. 516, col. 1.]

Muddapur Morari Rao v. Balwanth Dikshit (3) and Brindaban Chandra Ghosh v. Damodar Prosad Panday (4), doubted and distinguished.

The power of Court to grant review is circumscribed and limited by r. 1 of O. XLVII, Civil Procedure Code. It is only when new material is overlooked by excusable misfortunes, mistake or error apparent on the face of the record that a review can generally be granted and the expression "other sufficient reason" following in the rule must be construed ejusdem generis and the sufficiency required must be of a kind analogous to the two matters already specified in the rule. Second appeal against the decree of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Berhampore, in A. S. No. 206 of 1923 (A. S. No. 56 of 1923, Ganjam District, Court) preferred against that of the Court of the District Munsif, Berhampore, in O. S. No. 519 of 1926.

Mr. Sambasiva Rao, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The defendant in the action from which the second appeal has arisen has now taken the point that the judgment of the Court appealed against was one made on an application for review to the lower Appellate Court. The plaintiff whose suit had been dismissed by the trial Court appealed to the lower Appellate Court. In the first place his appeal was also dismissed. He thereupon applied to the lower Appellate Court for review and the review was granted and in the place of the dismissal of the appeal a decree was made in favour of the plaintiff for possession of the property sued for. This is what the learned Subordinate Judge says with regard to the ground on which he granted the review:

"The only ground urged for review was that the Court failed to note the decision in Subbe Goundan v. Krishnamachari (1) quoted by the appellant's Vakil, and wrongly noted the contention of the appellants in para. 5 of its judgment. After hearing both parties, I have come to the conclusion that the appellant's contentions are correct. The appellants no doubt urged the contention mentioned in para. 5 of this Court's judgment in the lower Court. In appeal they seem to have given up that contention and relied on the decision reported in Subbe Goundan v. Krishnamachari (1). The decision helps the case of the appellants, and if it is followed the judgment of this Court cannot stand. I am of opinion that there are sufficient grounds for allowing review of the judgment, and I accordingly set aside the decree."

As pointed out by their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in the case of Chhajju Ram v. Neki (2), the power of Court to grant review is circumscribed and limited by r. 1 of O. XLVII. It is there pointed out that it is only when new material is overlooked by excusable misfortunes, mistake or error apparent on the face of the record that a review can generally be granted and that the expression "other sufficient reason" following in the rule must be construed ejusdem generis and that the sufficiency required must be of a kind analogous to the two matters already specified in the rule. There is no question in this case of any new evidence.

Then the question is whether the mere fact that the learned Judge in the Court of Appeal failed to take into consideration a decision of this Court cited to him at the Bar could be regarded, as he seems to have thought, as a proper and sufficient ground for granting the review. My attention has been drawn by the learned Counsel for the respondent to two judgments, one of which is of this Court, viz., Muddapur Morari Rao v. Balwanth Dikshit (3). In that case the view was taken by the learned Judges that an error made by a Court in considering that the sister's sons of a deceased Hindu governed by Mitakshara Law were preferential heirs to the nearest agnates was an error apparent on the face of the record. It is possible to doubt the correctness of that decision because though it may be regarded as an error appearing on the record still I fail to see how such an error can be regarded as an error apparent on the face of the record. In a statutory enactment every word used must receive its full and proper connotation in the construction. I doubt very much whether even such an error as the one that was under consideration in that case can properly be regarded as an error apparent on the face of the record. But the learned Judges have said so and it is not necessary for me for the purpose of this second appeal to discuss that further, because it may be possible to regard such an elementary and clear rule of succession in Hindu Law as so well established that the error may even be described as an error apparent on the face of the record. But it cannot possibly be said that the error of law in this case can be regarded at all in the same light as the error which was the subject of consideration in that case or on the same level with a mistake made regarding such an elementary rule of succession. The question that arises for consideration in this case did not depend for its solution on any such elementary rule of succession but depended on various complicated matters of law and equity and after all it is difficult to say that there are not even with regard to the question itself decisions on either side of the line, the same Court taking one view at one time and taking another view at other times. With regard to such a matter it seems to me that an error of law made by a Judge can scarcely be regarded as an error apparent on the face of the record. There can be no doubt that such an error as had been referred to by the learned Subordinate Judge was an error that would in the ordinary course be dealt with and be the subject of consideration in a proper and regular appeal from the decree itself and I refuse to believe that by enacting the new section the Legislature intended the deciding Court itself to sit in appeal over its own judgment and exercise the rights of a Court of Appeal. The other case that was referred to and relied upon by the learned Counsel for the respondent was the case of Brindaban Chandra Ghosh v. Damodar Prosad Panday (4). In that case the learned Judges held that a decision in a second appeal by the High Court, based on an interpretation of an earlier judgment of their Lordships of the Judicial Committee, may be reviewed by the Court on the ground that at the time of the granting of the review the decision of the Judicial Committee, originally relied on by the High Court had come to be explained by their Lordships of the Judicial Committee themselves in a later case. With all respect again it is possible to doubt the correctness even of this decision. In this case also it seems to me that the learned Judges failed to give any effect whatever to the expression "face of the record" appearing in the section and proceeded to hold that a review was competent merely on the ground that they were satisfied that an error of law had been made. But here again I do not think it necessary for me to proceed at present on the doubt I entertain with regard to the correctness of the decision. A misunderstanding of a judgment of the Judicial Committee may conceivably be on a different footing altogether from the mere omission of the Judge at the time of the case to consider one of the decisions cited for consideration before him. The learned Vakil for the appellant has addressed some argument to me with regard to the decision relying upon which the learned Judge came to the conclusion that his original decision was wrong. But it seems to me unnecessary to refer to or consider that question at all. I am at present only called upon to decide whether this granting of the review by the learned Subordinate Judge was or was not proper having ing regard to the terms of the section laying down the rule with regard to the granting of review of judgments. It seems to me sufficient to say that the mere omission on the part of a learned Judge to consider a decision, however regrettable, however wrong, cannot possibly be regarded as constituting an error apparent on the face of the record. Even assuming it to be an error that may be discovered from the record itself, it seems to me to be almost impossible to regard such error as an error apparent on the face of the record. Any other view, it seems to me, would be to fail to give proper significance to the two words 'apparent' and 'face' appearing in the section. I, therefore, come to the conclusion that this appeal should be allowed. The lower Appellate Court was clearly wrong in granting the review. It is unfortunate that the proposal made on behalf of the respondent by the learned Counsel for the respondent that he had no objection even now to the suit being treated as one for partition and the case being proceeded with on the footing that the defendant would on partition be entitled to what may be found to be his proper share, should not have been accepted on behalf of the appellant. The review having been wrongly granted, it follows that the judgment made on review should be set aside. I, therefore, set aside the judgment passed on the review and the decree originally passed in the appeal will, therefore, be restored. The respondent must pay the appellant's costs of this appeal.

In the view that I have taken no orders are necessary with regard to the civil miscellaneous petition put in for the reception of additional evidence and the same, therefore, is dismissed with costs.

JUDGMENT.—The facts which have given rise to the suit and this appeal are that the plaintiff was the owner of an elephant by the name of Lal Bahadur. Defendants Nos. 1 and 3 carried on the business of catching wild elephants and the plaintiff's case is that defendant No. 1 and his servant defendant No. 2 hired from her the elephant for the purpose of employing him in their business. There was an agreement between the plaintiff and the defendants Nos. 1 and 2 of which the material portion was to the following effect: "I remain liable to pay to you Rs. 5,000 as the price of the elephant and Rs 200 as the balance of the hire (money); if during the period the elephant remains in my possession be broken in health or becomes unfit for work or dies and I cannot return it to you at the stipulated time." Under this agreement the defendant No. 1 took possession of the elephant and used it for shikar or catching wild elephants in the Garo Hills up till the 29th December, 1923, when it was found that the animal was ill and it died soon after. The plaintiff thereupon on the basis of the agreement brought the present suit for recovery of Rs. 5,000 from defendants Nos. 1 and 2. The defendant No. 1 in his written statement alleged that defendant No. 3 (the appellant before us) was a partner in the business and should have been made a party and that the suit should not proceed in his absence. Thereafter the plaintiff made an application in which she applied to make the defendant No. 3 a party defendant and said that she was making the application on the objection taken by defendant No. 1 and as defendant No. 3 was an undisclosed partner in the business. The Subordinate Judge before whom the application was made passed the following order: "The plaintiff makes an application to add Mathuranath Choudhury as a party. It occurs thus he is a necessary party. Add him as a party. Issue summons." On the body of the plaint the name of Mathuranath Choudhury, the appellant, was inserted at the heading under the names of the other defendants but no further alteration was made in the plaint either in the body of the plaint or in the prayers alleging facts against defendant No. 3 and seeking particular relief against him. The order adding defendant No. 3 as a party was passed after the settlement of issues in the case. The plaintiff, therefore, applied again to frame fresh issues with reference to defendant No. 3 and the following issues were added: (a) "Was defendant No. 2 an agent of defendant No. 3 Mathuranath Choudhury and was he authorised by defendant No. 3 to enter into the agreement with plaintiff? If not, is defendant No. 3 liable? (b) Was defendant No. 3 a partner of defendant No. 1 in the elephant catching business and as such liable to the plaintiff? The defendant No. 3 in his written statement denied any knowledge of the agreement with the plaintiff and otherwise supported the defendant No. 1 in his contention that no decree could be passed in the suit. The parties went to trial and evidence was adduced on both sides and it appears that it was admitted by defendant No. 3 that he was a partner of defendant No. 1 in the business. The trial Court decreed the suit against all the defendants jointly. On appeal by defendant No. 3 the learned District Judge of the Assam Valley District maintained all the findings of the trial Court and dismissed the appeal. Defendant No. 3 appeals before us and it has been contended on his behalf, firstly, that the suit should not have been decreed as against him as the plaint was not properly amended and no relief was asked against him by the plaintiff in the plaint. This objection was not specifically raised in any of the Courts below nor in the grounds of appeal in this Court. Moreover we do not think that there is any substance in it. The objection is a highly technical one and is fully covered by s. 99, Civil Procedure Code. There has been no failure of justice on account of the omission in asking for a particular relief against defendant No. 3. By the addition of defendant No. 3 as a defendant to the suit the plaintiff intended to claim a decree against him as well, being a partner in the business for the conduct of which the defendant was let out. This objection must, therefore, be overruled.

It is next argued that defendant No. 1 exceeded his authority in entering into an agreement like the present. This objection should also be overruled on the ground that it was not taken in any of the Courts below; and it is an objection which must be decided on the evidence and on the facts of the case. The learned Subordinate Judge in dealing with the liability of the appellant under s. 251 of the Indian Contract Act observed that not a word was said in the written statement to suggest that he was not liable for or was not bound by the act of defendant No. 1 and that the said act was not necessary for the business. The ground upon which this portion of the appellant's case has been placed before us is that the condition to pay the sum of Rs. 5,000 in the event of the elephant being lost was an unusual condition into which the defendant No. 1 entered without obtaining a valid authority from his partners; and he is, therefore personally liable and not the other partners of the business. There is nothing on the record to support this contention except the fact that in some agreements by which elephants were hired for the business defendant No. 1 made different stipulations. There does not seem to be anything unusual in the agreement before us. It has been found upon the evidence that the plaintiff was not willing to let out the elephant, but on the insistence of the defendants she agreed to do so on condition that she must be paid Rs. 5,000 if the elephant died or disappeared. It is also found that the elephant was a trained elephant for the purpose of catching wild elephants.

It has been strenuously argued that on the agreement defendant No. 3 cannot be made liable, firstly on the ground that the agreement was with defendant No. 1; and, secondly, because it has not been proved that it was in the course of the partnership business that this contract was entered into. It is said that the agreement was with the defendant No. 1. (We may leave out of consideration the defendant No. 2 as he was merely a servant of defendant No. 1, though an ex parte decree was passed against him) and for this construction of the agreement reliance has been placed upon the case of Kush Kanta Barkakati v. Chandra Kanta Kakati (1). In that case the law which is so well-known was thus laid down: "The bailee is responsible to the bailor for loss, destruction or deterioration of the bailed property upon his failure to return the same according to contract upon the expiry of the term of bailment; an action of trover is maintainable against a bailee where he fails to re-deliver the bailed property or to deliver it over in accordance with the terms of the contract." On the particular facts of that case it was held that a partner who was not a party to the agreement should not be made liable though the contracting defendant took the elephant and employed it for the purpose of the business of the company and which contract the company refused to execute to the knowledge of the plaintiff. On these circumstances it was held that no other partner of the business besides the contracting defendant might be made liable under the agreement though the hire was for the benefit of the partnership business. That case, therefore, does not support the defendant's contention and if it is carefully scrutinised it goes a great way to help the plaintiff's case. Reliance has also been placed upon the decision in the case of Ram Chandra Sahu v. Kasem Khan (2) the headnote of which is to the following effect: "The liability of the dormant partner extends only to sums borrowed by the active partner in his capacity as a member of the firm. The ultimate use by the firm of money borrowed by one of its members individually on his own credit does not render the firm liable for the loan." In that case, it appears that the borrowing defendant was a partner of the firm and had also other businesses in which he was interested. He borrowed some money on his own account and in his own name. He found subsequently that the defendant firm was in need of pecuniary help and the money he had borrowed he employed for the business of the firm. In these circumstances the learned Judge held that the firm or all the members constituting the firm could not be made liable for the money thus borrowed, as it was not borrowed originally for the purposes of the firm by the borrowing defendant as a partner of it and was not also so borrowed with the knowledge of the plaintiff. The learned Judges also observed that where one member of a partnership borrowed money upon his own credit by giving his own promissory note for the sum so borrowed and subsequently used the proceeds of the notes in the partnership business, of his own free-will, without being under any obligation to or to contract with the lender so to do, the partnership was not liable for the loan. The substance of the matter is whether the firm is liable for the money borrowed by one of its partners is pre-eminently a question of fact and depends upon the circumstances of each particular case.

With regard to the liability of defendant No. 3; if it be conceded that the money was borrowed and spent for the purpose of the business, there can be no question on the law as embodied in the Indian Contract Act and laid down by innumerable cases. Under s. 251 of the Contract Act the appellant is liable if the act of defendant No. 1 was necessary for or usually done in carrying on the business of the partnership of which he was a member. It is not the appellant's case that defendant No. 1 did not act as a partner or his act was one which could be brought under the exemption to s. 251. As to undisclosed or dormant partner the law is clear. The leading case upon this point is the case of Paterson v. Gandasequi (3) where the law is thus laid down: "If the principal be not known at the time of the purchase made by the agent, it seems that when discovered, the principal or the agent may be sued, at the election of the seller"; and it was observed in that case that a dormant agent might be assimilated to a dormant partner where though the party furnishing goods to the ostensible partners intended at the time to give credit only to them, yet he might afterwards pursue his remedy against the dormant partner, when discovered. Section 251 of the Contract Act which contains the law of partnership controls the relation between partners which is similar to the relation between principal and agent; and under s. 251 of the Contract Act the principal is as much liable for the act of the agent as the agent himself. It cannot, therefore, be said that on the contract as it stands and on the findings of fact arrived at the Court below the defendant No. 3 is not liable under the agreement made between the plaintiff and defendant No. 1.

The last point taken by the appellant is that the sum of Rs. 5,000 stipulated to be payable to the plaintiff on the loss of the animal was in the nature of a penalty and the Court should have enquired as to the real value of the elephant and passed a decree accordingly. This point also was not raised in any of the Courts below and consequently there has been no enquiry as to the value of the animal. In the agreement the value of the elephant was given as Rs. 5,000 and it was stipulated that if the defendant failed to return the animal to the plaintiff he would pay Rs. 5,000 as the value of the animal. To the agreement as it stands s. 74 of the Contract Act has no application. It is a simple agreement. The plaintiff said that she would part with her thing if the defendant guaranteed to pay a certain amount if the thing was lost. It was not a case of a breach of contract or the non-performance of any particular agreement by the defendant. It was a sort of contract on hire with the reservation that if the article is not returned the value stipulated in the agreement should be paid to the owner. In our opinion this contention fails.

The result is that all the points urged on behalf of the appellant fail and this appeal is dismissed with costs. The appellant will pay full costs to the plaintiff-respondent Bageswari Rani and half costs to the defendant No. 1 respondent Bhagyamal Bama. We make no order as regards costs in favour of defendant No. 2 respondent.

RULE No. 860 (s) of 1926.

This Rule was obtained from this Court by defendant No. 1 respondent for the purpose of transporting that defendant-respondent to the category of appellant on the ground that he apprehended that the plaintiff and the appellant might collude and did not place the case properly before the Court. Such contingency has not arisen and the learned Advocate for the defendant does not press the application. The Rule is accordingly discharged.

First appeal from a decree of the Subordinate Judge, Saharanpur.

Mr. Akhtar Husain Khan, for the Appellant.

Messrs. Kailas Nath Katju and. Durga Prasad, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is a plaintiff's appeal arising out of a suit for a declaration that certain Revenue Court partition proceedings were fraudulent and are not binding on the plaintiff. The facts of the case are that the plaintiff's father owned a 10 biswas out of 19 biswas share in village Bhat Kheri, and died leaving the present plaintiff as the sole surviving son who was then a minor. The other co-sharer was Hoshyar Singh, the father of defendant No. 1. In 1909 Musammât Jia, the mother of the plaintiff, was appointed the certificated guardian of the plaintiff during his minority by the District Judge. In 1912 Hoshyar Singh, the co-sharer, filed an application for partition of the village in the Revenue Court. The Court, however, did not itself get the lots prepared, but acted upon two lots which were filed in the case signed by Hoshyar Singh and purporting to have the thumb-impression of Musammât Jia. The village was divided into two separate mahals, one of which was allotted to the plaintiff, Shikar Chand, exclusively and was called after his name, and the other was allotted to Hoshyar Singh. Hoshyar Singh subsequently died and his son Jagmandar Das sold the entire Mahal Hoshyar Singh to Mohan Lal and others for a sum of Rs. 30,000 under a deed dated the 30th January, 1921. The plaintiff alleges that in the preparation of the lots fraud was practised by Hoshyar Singh on the plaintiff and his guardian in this way that land of better quality was allotted to Hoshyar Singh's share and that of inferior quality to the plaintiff's share, and that a grossly unequal share of the occupancy holding was put in the plaintiff's lots as well as lands yielding no produce. It is further alleged that Hoshyar Singh showed these lots to Musammât Jia and assured her that these were of equal quality and value and got the same accepted by her. The plaintiff's claim accordingly is that the partition proceedings were fraudulent and are in no way binding on him. The suit was contested mainly by Mohan Lal and others who denied that any fraud had been practised and who pleaded that they were bona fide transferees for value and were protected.

The learned Subordinate Judge has dismissed the suit. On the question whether there was an unequal partition, he has come to a clear finding that it was so and that on a rough estimate the plaintiff has suffered loss from 5 to 10 per cent. of the value of his share. He also was clearly of opinion that the defendants were bona fide transferees for value, who have acquired the property in good faith and were protected. As regards the question of fraud his finding is by no means clear and satisfactory. He began by saying that as regards fraud the plaint did not show the circumstances under which the fraud was committed, and the detail of the fraud. This is rather a surprising statement in view of the facts alleged by the plaintiff in paras. 7 and 8 of his plaint the purport of which we have recited above. He next proceeded to say that the only evidence on the point is the statement of the plaintiff's mother and that believing her statement to be true, there is no conclusive evidence of fraud as to vitiate the partition proceedings. We cannot understand how the learned Subordinate Judge could make this remark when he had himself recorded the evidence of Musammât Jia. If the whole of the evidence of Musammât Jia were to be believed, there would be no doubt that a gross fraud was practised on her and that her thumb-impression was obtained on the application on a misrepresentation and at a time when she had been assured "that the partition had been made, and lots had been prepared". The learned Subordinate Judge has evaded a clear finding as to whether the statement of Musammât Jia should be believed in its entirety. He has at places criticised her evidence without specifically saying that he disbelieves her. It is also curious that at the end of the judgment he wound up by saying that the plaintiff did not claim any relief against defendant No. 1, the representative of Hoshyar Singh, and that there was not sufficient material on the record to ascertain the extent of the liability of this defendant due to his father's conduct. All this suggests in a vague way that the learned Judge was inclined to believe that some fraud was practised though in his opinion that fraud was not sufficient to vitiate the partition proceedings.

We have, therefore, had to examine the evidence of Musammât Jia in some detail as well as the statement of Hoshyar Singh, Mukhtar, who was appearing for Musammât Jia in the partition proceedings. This witness is different from Hoshyar Singh, co-sharer. We agree with the Court below that the partition was unfair. It is clear from a comparison of the two lots that Hoshyar Singh in his 9 biswas share got 153 bighas of non-occupancy land while the plaintiff in his 10 biswas share got only 136 bighas, 19 biswas of non-occupancy lands; on the other hand, 114 bighas 3 biswas of occupancy lands on which enhancement of rents would be difficult, were thrown into the share of the plaintiff while Hoshyar Singh was given only 34 bighas, 9 biswas of occupancy lands in his share. It also appears that double the area of lands recently brought under cultivation were allowed to Hoshyar Singh, though the division of the old cultivated lands was equal. It is also clear that Hoshyar Singh got two pucca wells in his lot and also got a larger share of abadi land. On the other hand, the entire burial ground was thrown into the lot of the plaintiff. All these facts, no doubt, indicate the division was unfair and that the plaintiff has suffered in consequence. The learned Judge has estimated the loss of the plaintiff from 5 to 10 per cent. of the value of his share, but we are unable to say from the evidence whether this is any approximate estimate or not.

We are also satisfied that this unequal partition was brought about by taking some advantage of the position of Musammât Jia who was a purdah nashin lady, the plaintiff then being a minor of tender years. We are also satisfied that but for the carelessness and slackness of Musammât Jia and for her not getting proper advice, she would not have assented to such a division. It also appears that she had relations like Anand Sarup, who was helping her, and there were also other relations whom she might have consulted. Apparently she did nothing of this kind. Although we believe so much of her statement, we find ourselves unable to accept her statement that any active misrepresentation was made to her and that she put so much confidence in her opponent, Hoshyar Singh, as to accept his word that the lands were absolutely equal. She admits that she observes purdah before Hoshyar Singh, and we doubt whether she could have put her thumb-impression on papers brought by Hoshyar Singh without consulting anyone else. We are, therefore, unable to find that there was any active misrepresentation made or any direct fraud practised by Hoshyar Singh on Musammât Jia. At the same time, it is almost certain that Hoshyar Singh did not disclose to Musammât Jia that the lands were unequal.

The position of Mohan Lal and others who are transferees from the son of Hoshyar Singh, is, however, much stronger than that of Hoshyar Singh and his heirs. We agree with the Court below that there is no evidence whatsoever on the record to suggest that the defendants-vendees were not acting in good faith. On the other hand, the evidence of Mohan Lal proves conclusively that he inspected the revenue records and found Jagmandar Das' name recorded, and found him to be in exclusive possession of the entire mahal. He has sworn that he acted throughout in good faith after having made thorough enquiries and that he has not failed to pay the full consideration. There was nothing which could have put Mohan Lal on further enquiry, and to have cast the duty on him to go behind the order of the partition Court, examine and compare the two mahals and ascertain whether they were equal or unequal. We believe that Mohan Lal and others had no knowledge or idea that any fraud had been practised, or any undue advantage taken, by Hoshyar Singh as against the plaintiff's guardian. It is also a noteworthy fact that from 1912, when the partition took place, till the year 1921, Musammât Jia herself made no protest or attempt to get the order revoked. She appears to have acquiesced in the division. It is also a significant fact that as soon as the plaintiff attained majority he executed a deed of transfer of the entire mahal in favour of his mother. The plaintiff apparently did not at that time consider that the partition was a nullity, and that he was still a co-sharer entitled to a 10 biswas share in the undivided village, Bhat Kheri. As a matter of fact he did not transfer any such undivided share, but transferred the whole Mahal Shikar Chand to his mother. This suggests that he himself accepted that the partition had been effected and that he was entitled to deal with the mahal allotted to him as he liked. No doubt, subsequently this deed of gift was set aside under a compromise decree, dated the 19th December, 1923, between the plaintiff and his mother, but that leaves the significance of the transfer untouched.

The last point for consideration that remains is whether, in view of the fact that the contesting defendants were bona fide transferees for value from Hoshyar Singh's heir, even if a fraud had been practised by Hoshyar Singh, their transfer could be affected by it. On this point we are of opinion that a distinction might very well exist between voidable and void transactions. Where property has been transferred under a voidable contract some title passes to the transferee which remains till the contract is avoided. On the other hand, in cases of void transfers no title whatsoever passes to the transferee. If a person who has taken property under a voidable contract transfers it to a stranger who purchases it for consideration and in good faith, it seems to us that such a stranger would be completely protected. We think that the law on this point has been correctly stated by Schwabe, C. J., in the case of Parthasarathy Aiyar v. Subbaroya Gramony (1) when he remarked that a person who has acquired property under a voidable title can himself give a good title to that property to a bona fide purchaser or mortgagee from him, who deals for value and has no notice of the defects in the title. The same principle had been accepted by another Bench of the Madras High Court in the case of Pothane Puthan Vittil v. Adraseri Raru Nair (2). In that case also a transferee from a person who had acquired the property under a voidable conveyance, with intent to defraud creditors, was held to be protected if he was a bona fide transferee. So far as that point is concerned, we entirely agree with that view. It does, however, appear that the learned Judges thought that the case of Basti Begam v. Banarsi Prasad (3) had been wrongly decided and was not supported by the authorities relied upon in the judgment. We think that the case of this Court was somewhat misunderstood and is clearly distinguishable. In that case there was a wholly fictitious mortgage without any consideration whatsoever which was executed with the intention of defeating existing creditors. The mortgage was a totally inoperative document and was never intended to be in any way effective. It was almost a waste paper and passed no title to the ostensible mortgagee.

(1) 72 Ind. Cas. 559; (1923) M. W. N. 763; 45 M. L. J. 175; A. I. R. 1924 Mad. 67; 17 L. W. 763.

(3) 30 A. 297; 5 A. L. J. 305; A. W. N. (1908) 116.

The learned Chief Justice at page 308*, therefore, remarked that the ostensible mortgagee had no interest in the property under the fictitious mortgage made to him and that he had nothing which he could transfer to his wife. He pointed out that the transfer of the fictitious mortgage to his wife, notwithstanding that it was made bona fide and for value and consideration, did not validate the security as against the plaintiff. The lady took the transfer subject to all defects and title of her transferor and could not in equity set up the fictitious document against the bona fide mortgage. The case before the Allahabad High Court was, therefore, entirely different and related to a wholly fictitious document which was void and not merely voidable. This differentiation appears to have been overlooked by the learned Judges of the Madras High Court. The authorities on which they have relied are all on the point that a fraudulent grantee takes the entire estate of the fraudulent grantor and that a bona fide purchaser for value and consideration, whether he purchases from a fraudulent grantor or a fraudulent grantee takes the entire estate even though the deed is voidable at the instance of the creditor. Under the circumstances, it is clear that it is now too late for the plaintiff to get the partition upset when the mahal allotted to Hoshyar Singh has been transferred in its entirety to Mohan Lal and others, who have acted in good faith throughout and have paid full consideration.

The grounds of appeal as regards the dera (collection house) and the grove have, in our opinion, no force. The Court below has found that there is no satisfactory evidence to prove that the collection house and the grove allotted to Hoshyar Singh were the same which had been specifically purchased by the plaintiff's father. Furthermore, they were the subject-matter of partition proceedings. Collection houses and groves frequently pass with the zemin-dari, and there can be no doubt that both the collection house and the grove were the subject-matter of allotment by the Revenue Court. Both these have been transferred to Mohan Lal and others. They would be equally protected. In a partition case even property belonging exclusively to one co-sharer may, under certain circumstances, be allotted to another and compensation paid to the owner. We are, therefore, of opinion that the contesting defendants are protected with regard to their purchases of the collection house and the grove.

We accordingly dismiss the appeal with costs.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXXIX, r. 1—Muhammadan Law—Suit by rival Imams to officiate at mosque and at marriages in houses of Muhammadans—Injunction to restrain defendant from officiating in houses, legality of.

Under the Muhammadan Law the presence of the Kazi is not of absolute necessity for the validity of a marriage.

Pending a suit respecting the right to officiate at a mosque and at marriages of the Muhammadans of the locality, it is open to the Court to grant an interim injunction restraining the defendants from officiating at the mosque; but it is beyond the powers of Court to issue an injunction restraining them from performing ceremonies in the houses of the Muhammadans inasmuch as even if the plaintiffs have the right as against the defendants, the Muhammadan public could not be compelled to take the services of particular persons as Imams.

Petition, under s. 115 of Act V of 1908 and s. 107 of the Government of India Act praying the High Court to revise the order, dated the 1st May, 1927, of the District Court, East Tanjore at Negapatam, in C. M. A. No. 68 of 1926, preferred against that of the Court of the District Munsif, Tiruturaipundi, dated the 12th April, 1926, and made in I. A. No. 113 of 1926 in O. S. No. 48 of 1926.

Mr. S. Ramaswami Iyer, for the Petitioners.

Mr. K. Balasubramania Iyer, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application under s. 115 of the Civil Procedure Code to revise an order of the District Judge of Tanjore East granting a temporary injunction in a suit pending before the District Munsif of Tiruturaipundi. The question relates to the office of Imam in a mosque. The plaintiffs claim to be the Imams of the mosque and the right to officiate in all religious ceremonies in the houses of the Muhammadans of the locality. The defendants' case is that they are the Peish Imams and they have got the right to officiate in the mosque and also at the religious ceremonies in the houses of the Muhammadans. With regard to the office of Imam, it is a well-recognised office and when there is a dispute about it, it is open to the Court to issue a temporary injunction in the interests of the people as well as of the disputants, and in order to avoid breach of any peace. But the injunction that has been issued is too wide in its terms. Even granting that the plaintiffs have a right to be the Imams of the mosque the Muhammadans of the locality cannot be compelled to engage their services at the marriages, and other ceremonies in their houses. In the case of Muhammadan marriages the presence of the Imam or Kazi is not absolutely necessary; the marriage being a civil contract. In order to evidence the contract a Kazi is present but the presence of the Kazi is not of absolute necessity for the validity of a Muhammadan marriage and, therefore, the people of the locality are not bound to call in any man obnoxious to them. Therefore, the injunction restraining the defendants from officiating at the marriage and other ceremonies in the houses of the Muhammadans is clearly illegal and has been passed without jurisdiction. Katil Sheik Ummar Saheb v. Khazi Budan Khan Saheb (1) is an authority for the position that the Kazi has not the exclusive privilege or the right to officiate at the marriage of Muhammadans.

The next question is whether this portion of the injunction can be separated from the other portion which relates to the leading of worship in the mosque. If the plaintiffs as Imams have the right to lead the congregational services in the mosque no other person has the right to interfere with it. I, therefore, set aside the order of the District Judge so far as it relates to the performance of ceremonies in the houses of the Muhammadans as it was passed without jurisdiction. It is open to the Muhammadans of the locality to engage the services of anybody to be present at the marriages and other religious ceremonies in their houses. With regard to the other portion it cannot be said that it was passed without jurisdiction though I must say that some of the Judge's observations as regards the right of the plaintiffs are premature. With this modification the Civil Revision Petition is dismissed but in the circumstances without costs.

The English Law or s. 115, Evidence Act, gives no countenance to the doctrine that in order to create estoppel the person whose acts or declarations induced another to act in a particular way must have been under no mistake himself, or must have acted with an intention to mislead or deceive. What is required is that the position of the person who was induced to act should have been altered; and the principle on which the law and the Statute rest is, that it would be most inequitable and unjust to him that if another by a representation made, or by conduct amounting to a representation, has induced him to act as he would not otherwise have done, the person who made the representation should be allowed to deny or repudiate the effect of his former statement, to the loss and injury of the person who acted on it. Messrs. Haribans Sahai and Shiva Prasad Sinha, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is a plaintiff's appeal arising out of a suit brought for recovery of possession of a 1 anna zemin-dari share and for a declaration that certain sir and khudkasht lands appertain to that share. The plaintiff's case was that the property in dispute belonged to his maternal grandfather, Nand Kishor Lal, on whose death it was inherited by his grandmother, Musammat Shitab Kunwar, for her lifetime; that Musammat Shitab Kunwar had two daughters, Musammat Maharani Kunwar and Musammat Daulat Kunwar, the plaintiff being a son of Musammat Maharani and the defendants grandsons of Musammat Daulat Kunwar. The plaintiff alleged that on the death of the two daughters, he was the sole surviving daughter's son and he became the heir to the estate in preference to the grandsons of Musammat Daulat Kunwar. He referred to the fact that he himself had executed a sale-deed in favour of Lalji Sahai, but that he was not at that time aware of the fact of his legal right. The contesting defendants pleaded that the plaintiff was fully aware of all the circumstances and that he agreed to the transfer. It was further pleaded that under an arrangement arrived at in the lifetime of Musammat Shitab Kunwar, the property had been divided between the two branches represented by the two daughters and that the settlement was binding on the plaintiff. It was further pleaded that the present claim, in view of the previous declarations, acts and conduct of the plaintiff, was barred by the principle of estoppel under s. 115 of the Evidence Act as well as by the provisions of s. 41 of the Transfer of Property Act. The learned Subordinate Judge came to the conclusion that although there was no valid surrender of Hindu widow's estate by Musammat Shitab Kunwar, there must have been some settlement of a dispute and a family arrangement about the year 1890, under which the property was divided between the two branches equally and that the plaintiff is bound by such an arrangement. As regards s. 115, he was of opinion that there was no estoppel, but he was inclined to the view that the claim was barred by s. 41 of the Transfer of Property Act. The question of estoppel, however, was dealt with very summarily by the learned Judge.

The facts appear to be as follows. Nand Kishor Lal died some time about 1869 leaving his widow Musammat Shitab Kunwar and two daughters Musammat Maharani Kunwar and Musammat Daulat Kunwar. Undoubtedly Musammat Shitab Kunwar entered into possession of the estate as a Hindu widow and relinquished her life-interest in favour of the next reversioners.

On the 15th May, 1883, she executed a document called "tamliknama" (deed of settlement) by which she purported to give $\frac{1}{3}$ rd of the estate to Musammāt Dault Kunwar, $\frac{1}{3}$ rd to Musammāt Maharani Kunwar and Kauleshar Dayal, the then living son of Musammāt Dault Kunwar. At that time, however, the property in question was in the possession of certain mortgagees and a provision was made in the deed that the transferees would be entitled to obtain possession on redemption. Musammāt Shitab Kunwar also made provision to retain about 10 bighas of land for her own maintenance. The khewats up to the year 1890 indicate that the usufructuary mortgagees remained in possession of this property till then, and that the property was not redeemed. In the khewat of 1890-91 the entries are as follows:—

"Musammāt Dault Kunwar for self and as guardian of her son Jagat Narain Lal, in equal shares—half, and Musammāt Maharani Kunwar for self and as guardian of her son Gayatri Prasad, in equal shares—half."

There is, with the exception of the statement of a witness, Lachhmi Sahai, no evidence whatsoever on the record to show the circumstances under which these entries came to be made. As regards the evidence of Lachhmi Sahai the learned Judge has characterized him as a liar and has rejected his evidence completely. He has noted that the evidence of this witness made a very poor impression upon him while he was in the witness-box and the learned Judge thought that he had been "well coached and was stumbling at every place." He accordingly had no faith in his statement. The learned Advocate for the respondent has not relied on the evidence of Lachhmi Sahai and it must, therefore, be altogether ignored.

All that remains on the record then is the fact of the entry in the khewat of 1890-91. Obviously that entry was not in pursuance of the provisions of the "tamliknama" inasmuch as it did not follow that disposition of the property strictly. The learned Judge has made a conjecture that the entries of 1890-91 would not have come into existence if there had been no dispute and a settlement of that dispute. We are of opinion that such a conjecture, in the absence of any evidence to prove it, was totally unjustified. Musammāt Shitab Kunwar, without there being any dispute, might very well have liked to hand over possession of the estate in her possession to her daughters and their sons. It is difficult to understand that dispute could have arisen between them as the daughters had no locus standi to claim the property. If there had been no other circumstances in this case, we would have found great difficulty in accepting the view of the Court below that there was a family arrangement in the year 1890-91 which is binding on the plaintiff and prevents him from succeeding.

There are, however, other circumstances which have to be taken into account before the plaintiff can succeed. There can be no doubt that in the lifetime of Musammāt Shitab Kunwar her daughters and daughters' sons obtained possession of the bulk of the property. Musammāt Shitab Kunwar remained alive till 1916 and while she was alive the names of her grandsons were entered. We find that in the khewat for 1909 the name of Musammāt Dault Kunwar was struck off and that of her son Jagat Narain alone entered. Similarly in 1913 the name of Musammāt Maharani Kunwar also disappeared from the khewat and that of her son, Gayatri Prasad alone remained. The plaintiff, Mata Dayal, must, therefore, have been aware that during the lifetime of Musammāt Shitab Kunwar his mother Musammāt Maharani Kunwar and after her death his brother, Gayatri Prasad, were in possession of a half share in the estate. As Musammāt Shitab Kunwar was the widow originally entitled to possession, the plaintiff must have been aware of some arrangement under which the partition of the family property had taken place. This fact could not have been concealed from the plaintiff when he was joined with his elder brother Gayatri Prasad and must have been appropriating the profits and benefiting from the estate.

There is also the fact that a large number of sir and khudkasht plots were joint and the names of the two branches were jointly recorded in the revenue papers. Musammāt Shitab Kunwar died in 1916. Her death was followed by that of Musammāt Dault Kunwar in November, 1916. Later Jagat Narain died in 1917 and then Musammāt Maharani Kunwar in 1918. On the death of Maharani Kunwar, the plaintiff, Mata Dayal, was the sole surviving daughter's son alive, who would be entitled to the estate if there was no other difficulty in his way. The plaintiff, however, admittedly did not assert his right and allowed the names of the sons of Jagat Narain, namely, Shimbhu Nath and Prem Nath, to be entered in the revenue papers as against the share which had been allotted to Musammatt Daulat Kunwar. The plaintiff undoubtedly attained majority some time before 1919. According to the defendant's evidence, in March, 1919, Bhagwan Prasad, who was the husband of Daulat Kunwar and the grandfather of Shimbhu Nath and Prem Nath, approached the vendee's son, Dargahi Lal, with a request that he should purchase the 1-anna share in dispute. Dargahi Lal was shown partition quras and khewats as well as a copy of a mortgage-deed previously executed in favour of B. Durga Dutt, Vakil. Dargahi Lal states that he raised objections on the ground that the sir plots were jointly recorded in the revenue papers and also that there was fear of a claim of pre-emption by co-sharers. According to Dargahi Lal it was at his request and on objections being raised by him that Bhagwan Prasad applied to the District Judge for permission to sell the property belonging to his minor grandsons. It is an undoubted fact that in August, 1919, an application was made to the District Judge for the necessary sanction, which was granted. All this must have taken some time.

We also know as a fact that although in the revenue papers the sir and khudkasht lands were jointly recorded, there is a detailed specification in the sale-deed in dispute of the plots which were expressly assigned to the vendee, Lalji Sahai. The sale-deed further contains a recital that the division has been accepted by Mata Dayal who in token of acceptance has attested the document. In our opinion it is impossible to believe that if Mata Dayal had not, prior to the execution of the sale-deed, agreed to a division of the plots, it could have been entered in the deed and attested by him. As a matter of fact, the evidence of Dargahi Lal is that Mata Dayal had promised early in the year to get the sir lands divided and that later when he came to the village Mata Dayal showed him separate lists of the plots. Under these circumstances, we are utterly unable to accept Mata Dayal's statement that he was not aware of the contents of the document and that it was brought over to him ready written and he blindly attested it.

The recitals in the sale-deed do indicate that precaution was being taken by the vendee to ensure against a possible claim of inheritance. It contains an admission that the property which was re-transferred had been inherited by the father of the minors from his mother's family, and it contains a covenant that in case any dispute arose relating to the inheritance on behalf of anyone of the mother's house, the vendee shall have power to realise all damages with interest at the rate of one per cent. per mensem from the person and the property of the executants. This covenant has been strongly relied upon on behalf of the plaintiff in order to show that the vendee must have been fully aware that Mata Dayal was a claimant to the estate. The deed further shows that the vendee was very keen on obtaining a relinquishment of the ex-proprietary rights in the sir lands which amounted to nearly 12½ bighas of land. There was a condition that the vendee shall have the power not to pay Rs. 4,500 unless there was a relinquishment of the sir lands. The rights in the sir lands could not possibly have passed to the vendee unless there was a relinquishment by the executants as well as a division of the sir plots by Mata Dayal. To our minds it is perfectly clear that Mata Dayal must have been aware that the property in question was being sold to Lalji Sahai and that the sir plots were divided and it was in token of his consent to this that he attested the document.

The subsequent conduct of Mata Dayal also shows that at that time he raised no objection as regards the title of the vendors and never put forward any claim of his own. When an application for mutation of names was made in the Revenue Court, Mata Dayal was examined as a witness and stated that mutation of names may be effected in accordance with the sale-deed to which he had no objection and that the name of Lalji Sahai should be recorded in accordance with the application. Simultaneously with the application for mutation of names there was an application in which it was expressly prayed that although the names of the vendors and Mata Dayal had stood recorded jointly, the sir plots had been divided into two.

lists, A and B, and it was further prayed that the name of Mata Dayal might be expunged from the lands in his name. To this proceeding Mata Dayal was a party and he never objected.

Subsequently, certain tenants executed kabuliyats in favour of the vendee in respect of certain specific plots and these kabuliyats were also attested by Mata Dayal and in some cases he identified the tenants before the Sub-Registrar.

These circumstances are relied upon on behalf of the plaintiff and it is urged that they indicate precautions taken by Bhagwan Prasad and the vendee to obtain the admission of Mata Dayal in various ways. It has been suggested that he was absolutely ignorant of all the facts and of his legal rights and that a trick was played upon him and he was entrapped into admitting that he had no title to the property.

One may have a suspicion that so far as Bhagwan Prasad was concerned, he might have been aware of the nature of the claim which might be put forward by Mata Dayal. There is, however, no evidence on the record to show that Lalji Sahai was aware of any defect in the title of Shimbhu Nath and Prem Nath.

Although the plaintiff in his plaint alleged that he was not aware of all the facts and that he was made to attest the document without being informed of these facts and that he was also unaware of his legal rights, when he went into the witness-box he did not state more than this that he did not know that he was the owner of the property. The plaintiff did not in the witness-box make clear whether he was not aware of the rule of Hindu Law that a daughter's son succeeds in preference to the sons of another pre-deceased daughter's son or whether he was not aware that he would be entitled to have the arrangement made in the lifetime of Musammatt Shitab Kunwar, as regards the division of the property, set aside through a Court of Law. The learned Subordinate Judge has thought that the plaintiff was unaware of the rule of Hindu Law on this point. The plaintiff himself has not said so and we find it very difficult to believe that this was the case. It is a matter of common knowledge, especially among educated Hindus, that a daughter's son succeeds in preference to remoter heirs. There is therefore, no justification for assuming that the plaintiff was unaware of this elementary rule of Hindu Law. On the other hand, it might very well be that he did not know that it would be open to him to avoid the arrangement which was arrived at in the lifetime of Musammatt Shitab Kunwar. Arrangements which have been acted upon for nearly 30 years might well create an impression in the minds of laymen that they are good and cannot be avoided. It is only when the mind of the claimant has been disabused of the false notion by a judgment of a Court that he can feel certain that such an arrangement is not binding upon him. We are, therefore, prepared to assume that the plaintiff did not know that the arrangement which had stood for such a long time, was not binding upon him. Had he known this, he might possibly not have easily agreed to attest the document or agreed to a division of the sir lands.

The learned Advocate for the plaintiff-appellant has argued that s. 41 of the Transfer of Property Act can have no application when the plaintiff is not aware of his legal rights and that it cannot be assumed that the position of the vendors was that of ostensible owners with the consent, express or implied, of the plaintiff, when he was not aware of his legal rights. In support of his contention he has relied on the remark of a learned Judge of this Court in the case of Dungaria v. Nand Lal (1) that the consent referred to in that section must be an intelligent consent and not a consent based on misapprehension on the part of the person making it as to his legal rights. As regards s. 115 of the Indian Evidence Act, his contention is the same, namely, that there could be no estoppel if the plaintiff was not aware of his legal rights. The learned Advocate relies on a judgment of a Bench of this Court in Jai Narain v. Jafar Beg (2), where it was remarked that "the party possessing the legal right must know of the existence of his own right which is inconsistent with the right claimed by the other, and he must know of that other's mistaken belief of his rights and he must have encouraged that other in his expenditure of money or in the other acts done by him, before estoppel arising out of acquiescence can be a bar."

We may also add that there is no doubt that the vendee Lalji Sahai acted in good faith and paid full consideration. We cannot accept the suggestion that he was a party to any trick or fraud having been practised on Mata Dayal. He must, as the Court below has found, be deemed to be an innocent party who has paid full consideration. Even assuming that the plaintiff was ignorant of his legal rights and is in that way innocent, there can be no doubt that he was negligent in not taking steps for ascertaining his legal rights. We would thus have a competition between two innocent parties of whom the plaintiff, who is suing for possession, has been negligent. Under such circumstances he would not be entitled to succeed as against the other innocent party who has been guilty of no laches.

It is not necessary for us to consider the effect of s. 41 of the Transfer of Property Act, because we are satisfied that the plaintiff must, under the circumstances of the case, be estopped under s. 115 of the Indian Evidence Act from disputing the right of the vendee. We need not also consider whether the knowledge of a person's legal right is necessary in the case of mere omissions. As regards declarations and conduct, there can be no doubt that s. 115 does not require that a person who by his declarations or conduct induces a belief in the mind of the other, must of a necessity have been aware of his rights. Their Lordships, in the case of Sarat Chunder Dey v. Gopal Chunder Laha (3) remarked that they "think it right to say that it would make no difference in the effect to be now given to the plea of estoppel against a purchaser, though it clearly appeared that he was under the belief that a certain document was valid; which he could not set aside..... The law of this country gives no countenance to the doctrine that in order to create estoppel the person whose acts or declarations induced another to act in a particular way must have been under no mistake himself, or must have acted with an intention to mislead or deceive. What the law and the Indian Statute mainly regard is the position of the person who was induced to act; and the principle on which the law and the Statute rest is, that it would be most inequit-able and unjust to him that if another by a representation made, or by conduct amounting to a representation, has induced him to act as he would not otherwise have done, the person who made the representation should be allowed to deny or repudiate the effect of his former statement, to the loss and injury of the person who acted on it."

The principle laid down in this case was accorded full concurrence by their Lordships in the case of Forbes v. Ralli (4). We have, therefore, to see, whether in spite of the fact that the plaintiff was not fully aware that he had a right to challenge the arrangement which had stood for so many years, he did by his declarations or acts induce a belief in the mind of the vendee that the vendors had good title. The disposition of the property by Musammam Shitab Kunwar during her lifetime would at best be a voidable transaction on the same footing as an alienation without any legal necessity. The reversioner would have the option of either accepting the division or repudiating it. Once he accepts it and ratifies it, he loses his option of repudiation. A layman may not be aware that an arrangement of this kind during the lifetime of a Hindu widow between herself and her daughters and acquiesced in by her daughters' sons when after coming of age, and which has stood for nearly 30 years, can still be avoided by other reversioners who have not been parties to the transaction. A layman might well believe that an arrangement which has been acted upon for such a long time, cannot be set aside. This belief might further be strengthened if the person himself has been benefiting out of this arrangement. In the same way the vendee might honestly have believed that an arrangement which stood for nearly 30 years and had been acted upon, would be binding on all the reversioners. In spite of all this there might have been an anxiety in the mind of the vendee to make sure of his title by obtaining consent of the only possible claimant Mata Dayal. There is, therefore, nothing strange if the vendee obtained the consent of Mata Dayal to the mutation of names in his favour. The conduct of Mata Dayal shows that he did not put forward any claim whatever but agreed to the transfer of the property in favour of the vendee. It is, also, clear that if Mata Dayal had not agreed to a division of the sir and khudkasht plots, there would have been a considerable difficulty in effecting the division and it is probable that the vendee would not have agreed to take the property at all. He paid a high value for the 1-anna share and the reason given for it in the sale-deed is that it was agreed that the ex-proprietary rights in the sir lands would be relinquished. The position of the vendee has, therefore, undoubtedly been compromised and it is difficult to believe that he would have agreed to take the property if Mata Dayal had not been a consenting party. It may be a misfortune of Mata Dayal that he was not aware of his legal rights and could not be certain that the arrangement could have been set aside in a Court of Law. Nevertheless his declarations and conduct did induce a belief in the mind of the vendee that he was not claiming any title to the property and that, therefore, there was no defect in the title of the vendors. The pedigree makes it quite clear that there could possibly be no claimant other than Mata Dayal, and if Mata Dayal was willing to abide by the arrangement which had stood for so many years, the vendee would feel sure that there was no defect in his title.

We have, therefore, come to the conclusion that the plaintiff Mata Dayal is estopped by reason of his own previous conduct from denying the title of Shimbu Nath and Prem Nath to the property transferred under the sale-deed of the 26th September, 1919, which he himself attested. The result, therefore, is that this appeal is dismissed with costs.

In a suit for damages for loss of goods consigned under Risk Note in Form B, the Railway Company can only be made liable if it can be shown that the loss was occasioned on account of the wilful negligence on the part of the Railway Administration.

Appeal from a decision of the District Judge, Hazaribagh, dated the 4th April, 1925, reversing that of the Munsif, Giridih, dated the 6th September, 1923.

Mr. S. N. Bose, for the Appellants.

Mr. N. C. Sinha, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

Kulwant Sahay, J.—This appeal is concluded by findings of fact. The suit was for damages for loss of a certain number of tins out of a consignment of 100 tins of ghee. The trial Court found that the loss was occasioned on account of the wilful negligence of the Railway Company. On appeal the learned Judicial Commissioner has found that the evidence produced on behalf of the plaintiff does not prove wilful negligence on the part of the Railway Company or its servants. This finding is sufficient to dismiss the claim of the plaintiff, because the consignment was made under Risk Note in Form B and the defendants can only be made liable if it can be shown that the loss was occasioned on account of the wilful negligence on the part of the Railway Administration.

This appeal is dismissed with costs.

Madras District Municipalities Act (V of 1920), s. 354, cl. (2)—House-tax, assessment of—Absence of service of notice, effect of—Suit for refund of amount collected, whether lies.

Under the Madras District Municipalities Act, before house-tax could be collected, notice of the assessment should be given to the assessee and such notice should be properly served in accordance with the provisions of the Act.

Where the provisions of the Act relating to service of notice upon the assessee have not been complied with, the Municipality has no right to collect tax and s. 354, cl. 2 of the Act does not bar a suit to recover the amount collected.

Petition under s. 25 of Act IX of 1887, praying the High Court to revise the decree of the Court of the District Munsif, Tiruvalur, in S. C. S. No. 252 of 1925.

Mr. K. S. Desikan, for the Petitioner.

Mr. R. Sundaralingam, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application to revise the decree of the District Munsif of Tiruvalur dismissing the plaintiff's suit for a refund of the excess house-tax collected from him. The District Munsif dismissed the suit on the ground that it could not be maintained as no proper appeal was filed and even if it was filed it was not properly conducted. The main question in this case is whether notice of the enhanced assessment was served upon the assessee, the petitioner. Before house tax could be collected, notice of the assessment should be given to the assessee and such notice should be properly served in accordance with the provisions of the Act. In this case the petitioner stated that he did not receive any notice of the enhanced assessment. What were relied upon by the defendant, the Municipal Council, were two notices Exs. B and F which appear to be notices not of the enhancement but of the usual assessment. The respondent's Vakil is not able to show that notice of the enhanced assessment was served upon the petitioner. The District Munsif ought to have addressed himself to this question first before considering any other question for if no notice was served upon the petitioner the Municipality's right to collect tax is taken away and s. 354, cl. 2 is no bar to a suit to recover the amount collected for it says, if the provisions of the Act have been in substance and effect complied with no suit could be brought to recover any sum of money collected under the authority of the Act and it follows that where the provisions of the Act have not been complied with, namely, service of notice upon the assessee, a suit would lie. I set aside the decree of the District Munsif and direct him to restore the suit to file and dispose of it in the light of the remarks made herein. Costs of this petition will abide the result.

Landlord and tenant—Occupancy tenancy—Custom of transfer—Evidence—Recognition by landlord after his interest has ceased, whether binding on his successor.

In order to prove a custom of transferability of tenancy it is essential for the person setting it up to show that transferees had a right to be recognised by the landlord after purchasing the holdings without the consent of the landlord. Evidence which merely goes to prove that certain purchasers of tenancies were recognised by their landlords is not, therefore, sufficient to establish such a custom in the absence of proof of the circumstances under which the transfers were recognised [p. 531, col. 1.]

Recognition of a transfer by a landlord after he had parted with his interest though not with his possession and during the pendency of a suit against him for possession by his successor-in-interest is not binding on the latter. [p. 531, col. 2.]

Appeal from a decision of the Additional District Judge, Patna, dated the 23rd February, 1924, affirming that of the Subordinate Judge, Patna, dated the 14th May, 1923.

Sir Ali Imam and Mr. Anand Prasad, for the Appellants.

Messrs. L. N. Singh, Noorul Hussain and B. C. Sinha, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

Kulwant Sahay, J.—The plaintiffs are co-sharer-landlords to the extent of fourteen annas and odd, their interest being twelve annas as mukarraridars and proprietary interest in respect of the rest. The landlords of the remaining share are the pro forma defendants in the suit. The suit was instituted to eject the defendants Nos. 1 and 2 who were purchasers of a holding which was originally held by two persons Durgi Singh and Dako Singh on the ground that there was no custom of transferability of occupancy holdings in the village without the consent of the landlord.

The defence was that there was no abandonment by the original tenants, that there was a custom of transferability of occupancy holdings without the consent of the landlord and lastly, that there had been a recognition of the transferees by the landlords.

Both the Courts below have come to a concurrent finding of fact that the original tenants did actually abandon the disputed holding, that there was no custom of transferability of occupancy holdings and that there had been no recognition.

In this second appeal by the transferee-defendants it is contended that the learned District Judge was wrong in holding that there was no evidence to show how the purchasers under certain kobalas produced to prove the custom of transferability got themselves recognised. Sir Ali Imam on behalf of the appellants contends that there are documents to show that the purchasers under those kobalas did get themselves recognised by the landlords and he refers to certain khatians which show the purchasers as the holders of the holdings purchased by them. What the learned Judge, however, meant to say was that the circumstances under which the transferees were recognized had not been shown. It was possible that they might have been recognized on payment of some salami or by some other means. In order to prove the custom of transferability it was essential for the defendants to show that they had a right to be recognized by the landlord after purchasing the holdings without the consent of the landlord. This has not been done in the present case.

The next point taken was as regards recognition. It appears that one Musammam Nem Kueri was in possession of the twelve-annas share of the village for some time. She instituted suits for rent in the year 1914 against the original tenants Durgi Singh and Dako Singh and obtained rent-decrees on the 10th February, 1915, and in execution of the decree the holding was sold and purchased by her. It appears, however, that on the 10th November, 1915, Nem Kueri filed an application certifying payment of the entire decretal amount by the present defendants-appellants as purchasers of the holding, and it is contended that this amounted to a recognition of the transfer to the present appellants by Nem Kueri and that the plaintiffs-respondents are bound by that recognition. It has been found by both the Courts below that before the date of this recognition the interest of Nem Kueri had ceased to exist. It is true that the learned Subordinate Judge found that in spite of her interest ceasing she was still in possession; but before the filing of this petition on the 10th November, 1915, a suit had already been instituted against her by Audhbehari on the 15th September, 1915, claiming the twelve-annas as mukar-rari right and this suit was ultimately decreed in favour of Audhbehari. The present plaintiffs are the purchasers of the interest of Audhbehari. Under the circumstances even if the application of the 10th November, 1915, be treated as an application which would amount to a recognition of the appellants, such recognition would not be binding on Audhbehari or on the plaintiffs who are the representatives of Audhbehari. In any event the plaintiffs are not bound by the recognition in respect of the proprietary interest which they possess over and above the twelve-annas mukar-rari interest.

Having regard to the findings of fact arrived by the learned District Judge, it is clear that there is no substance in this appeal. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed with costs.

The phrase “substantial question of law” in s. 110 of the Civil Procedure Code means a substantial question of law as between the parties to the proceedings and not merely one of general importance. [p. 532, col. 1.]

In the absence of proof that the draft of a Will has been prepared under instructions from the testator, a Court cannot order the Probate of the draft when the execution of the Will has not been proved. [p. 532, col. 2.]

Application for leave to appeal to the Privy Council from the decision of a Bench in Miscellaneous Appeal No. 42 of 1926, dated the 23rd April, 1927, reported as 102 Ind. Cas. 635,

Mr. D. W. Kathalay, for the Appellant.
Mr. R. B. Gadgil, for the Respondent.

ORDER.—This is an application for leave to appeal to their Lordships of the Privy Council against the decision of a Bench of this Court, dated 23rd April, 1927, in Miscellaneous Appeal No. 42 of 1926*.

It is not disputed that the value of the subject-matter or property involved exceeds Rs. 10,000 and the only question is whether, in view of the judgment of this Court being an affirming one, any substantial question of law is involved. We accept the position that the phrase "substantial question of law" in s. 110 of the Civil Procedure Code means a substantial question of law as between the parties to the proceeding and not merely one of general importance. Even so, however, we can find not the slightest reason for supposing that as between the parties to the proceeding any substantial question of law is involved in the present case. As is clear from the judgment of the Bench, that judgment was wholly concerned with a pure finding of fact as to whether the Will in question had been executed or not. The Counsel for the applicant has urged that ground A which he mentions as one of the matters to be agitated before their Lordships of the Privy Council involves a question of law. That ground is to the effect that the Bench of this Court erred in law in starting from the evidence of the Handwriting-Expert. It is true that, in paras. 4 and 5 of the judgment of this Court, the Bench was of opinion that the evidence of Brewster (D. W. No. 11) was to be preferred, but the decision on the question of fact involved rested on many other factors as well and it was indifferent whether the Court considered first the Handwriting-Expert's evidence or any of these factors. We have been referred to certain remarks made by Ayyar, J., in In re Basrur Venkata Roy (1) as to the comparatively minor importance of the evidence of Handwriting-Experts, but what that case, in reality, laid down was that an accused should not be convicted of forgery upon the uncorroborated testimony of such an Expert. We have not the slightest hesitation in agreeing with the said dictum, but this, in effect, gives no real help to the applicant in the circumstances of the present case.

It has been suggested that an important question of law is involved as to the exact value which their Lordships would attach to expert evidence of the kind in question, but we are wholly unable to accept such a suggestion and it seems to us impossible to premise of the circumstances of the present case that any question of law is involved in this connection.

It has further been suggested, on the strength of the decision in Aulia Bibi v. Ala ud din (2), that this Court should have ordered Probate of the draft of the Will if it was held that the Will itself was not proved. In the case in question there was convincing evidence that the Will had been drawn up in accordance with instructions given by the Muhammadañ lady concerned in the case. The circumstances of this case are wholly different and there has not been any proof that the alleged testator had anything to do with the preparation of the draft in question. On the contrary, it seems to have been prepared by a coterie of the present applicant's party in the hope that the dying man could be induced to execute it. The case is, in short, one in which pure questions of fact are involved and in which we cannot grant leave as craved for.

The application is accordingly dismissed. The applicant must bear the non-applicant's costs. We fix Pleader's fees at Rs. 50.

G. R. D.

Application dismissed.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXXVIII, r. 5—Attachment before judgment—Defendants promising to file petition undertaking not to transfer—Failure to file petition, whether sufficient ground to order attachment.

defendants appeared and undertook to file a petition giving an undertaking not to transfer any property before the disposal of the suit. The said petition not having been filed, the Subordinate Judge at once made an order of attachment before judgment:

Held, that before making an order for attachment before judgment the Court had to consider whether the plaintiff had made out a sufficient case according to law in order to entitle him to get an order for attachment of the other properties of the defendants before judgment, and that the order for attachment made on the mere ground that the defendants had failed to file the petition was illegal.

JUDGMENT.

Kulwant Sahay, J.—The plaintiffs-respondents instituted a suit to enforce a mortgage, dated the 19th October, 1914. The mortgage was of twelve properties; but it appears that four of the properties have passed out of the possession of the mortgagors as a result of certain decisions of the Privy Council.

The plaintiffs instituted a suit on the ground that the remaining properties were not sufficient security for the mortgage. They filed an application on the 24th November, 1926, praying for an attachment before judgment on the allegation that the defendants were trying to execute certain transfers of the properties in order to avoid payment and to delay and defraud the plaintiffs. Their case was that the amount due under the mortgage would not be realised by sale of the mortgaged properties and that the other properties of the mortgagors would have to be proceeded against in order to realise the decree.

The defendants appeared and filed a petition of objection to the attachment before judgment on the 10th January, 1927. In their petition of objection they stated that they had no desire to transfer any property in favour of friends, relatives or strangers and the stamp-paper, which the plaintiffs alleged that the defendants had purchased in order to sell the property, was purchased long before the institution of the suit and the transaction for which it was purchased having fallen through the stamp-paper was returned to the Collector.

The learned Subordinate Judge fixed the 15th January, 1927, for hearing the matter as regards the issue of injunction. The order-sheet of the 15th January runs thus: "Petition not filed. Put upon the 17th January, 1927, for orders." It is explained that the petition referred to in the order of the 15th January was a petition which the defendants' Vakil undertook to file giving an undertaking not to transfer the property before the disposal of the suit. On the 17th January the defendants did not file the petition giving the undertaking and the result was that the learned Subordinate Judge at once made an order of attachment before judgment.

The only ground for making the order, as it appears from the order-sheet, is the failure of the defendants to give an undertaking not to transfer the property before decision of the suit. This, in my opinion is not sufficient. The learned Subordinate Judge has to consider whether the plaintiffs have made out a sufficient case according to law in order to enable them to make an order for attachment of the other properties of the judgment-debtors before judgment. It is stated on behalf of the defendants that a claim for money-decree would be barred inasmuch as the suit was brought more than six years after the due date. The plaintiffs rely on certain payments which they allege save a personal claim for money against the defendants from limitation. These are matters which the Subordinate Judge has to take into consideration before making an order for attachment. Under O. XXXVIII, r. 5 of the Code of Civil Procedure he has to be satisfied that the defendants are about to dispose of the whole or any part of their property or about to remove the whole or any part of their property from the local limits of the jurisdiction of the Court.

There has not been a proper consideration of the case by the learned Subordinate Judge and his order of the 17th January, 1927, must be set aside and the case remanded to him for re-consideration as to whether a sufficient case has been made out for attachment before judgment.

The ad interim attachment ordered on the 24th November, 1926, will stand.

We make no order as to costs.

PLAINTIFF—RESPONDENT.

Succession Act (X of 1865), ss. 54, 71—Oudh Estates Act (I of 1869), s. 19—Will of Oudh taluqdar—Bequest in favour of attesting witnesses—Oral evidence showing that legatees did not sign as attesting witnesses, but signed for some other purpose.

A Will executed by an Oudh taluqdar contained the following clause (para. 8):—"I have executed this Will with the consent of all my sons and have got them to sign it as witnesses with this very purpose so that this Will may be acted upon fully and they may not quarrel among themselves after my demise". The testator's sons accordingly appended their signatures to the Will:

Held, that although the position of the signatures created a presumption that they had been attached by the sons as attesting witnesses, such presumption was capable of being rebutted by parole evidence narrating what actually occurred at the time of the execution of the Will. [p. 536, col. 1.]

Held, also, (on the evidence, and agreeing with the concurrent findings of the lower Courts) that the sons did not sign the Will as attesting witnesses, and, therefore, the bequests in their favour were not void under s. 54 of the Succession Act, 1865, read with s. 19 of the Oudh Estates Act, 1869. [p. 536, col. 2.]

Consolidated Appeal by special leave from the decree of the Court of the Judicial Commissioner, Oudh (Dalal, J. C. and Wazir Hasan, A. J. C.), dated the 25th November, 1924, reported as 85 Ind. Cas. 558, affirming that* of the Subordinate Judge, Partabgarh, dated the 27th August, 1923.

FACTS of the case appear sufficiently from the judgment of their Lordships, and also from the report in the Court below (see 85 Ind. Cas. 558).

Sections 54 and 71 of the Indian Succession Act, 1865, (now replaced by ss. 67 and 84 of the Succession Act of 1925), are as follows:—

"Section 54: (Effect of gift to attesting witness). A Will shall not be considered as insufficiently attested by reason of any benefit thereby given, either by way of bequest or by way of appointment to any person attesting it, or to his or her wife or husband:

But the bequest or appointment shall be void so far as concerns the person so attesting, or the wife or husband of such person, or any person claiming under either of them.

"Explanation.—A legatee under a Will does not lose his legacy by attesting a codicil which confirms the Will.

Section 71: (Which of two possible constructions preferred). Where a clause is susceptible of two meanings, according to one of which it has some effect, and according to the other it can have none, the former is to be preferred."

Under s. 19 of the Oudh Estates Act, 1869, s. 54 of the Indian Succession Act, 1865, is made applicable to all Wills and codicils made by any taluqdar.

The main question for determination in the appeal to the Privy Council was whether a certain Will was valid so far as certain legatees were concerned, and the question depended on the fact whether or not the legatees signed the Will as attesting witnesses.

It was concurrently found as a fact by both Courts in India that the legatees did not sign the Will as attesting witnesses, but that they signed it by way of giving their consent to the act of the testator who was their father, and consequently both Courts held that the gifts to the legatees were not inoperative or void.

The testator was one Thakur Drigbijai Singh, a taluqdar. The Will was signed by eight witnesses including the four sons of the testator, but, on the face of it, it did not appear which of the witnesses signed as attesting witnesses.

JUDGMENT.

Duff, J.—This is a consolidated appeal from two decrees, both of the 25th of November, 1924, of the Court of the Judicial Commissioner of Oudh at Lucknow, which were pronounced in an appeal from the Subordinate Judge of Partabgarh. The question raised by the appeal is whether certain legacies in a Will of the late Drigbijai Singh, a taluqdar of Athgawan, in the District of Partabgarh, are valid, and the answer to this question must be governed by the determination of the issue, which was the real issue in the Courts below, whether or not the legatees entitled to the benefit of these legacies, if valid, signed the Will as attesting witnesses. The Court of the Judicial Commissioner held, affirming the decision of the Subordinate Judge, that this issue must be determined in favour of the respondents.

The testator, by his Will, appointed his eldest son, Lal Bahadur Singh, as taluqdar after him, and gave to each of his three younger sons, Jagannath Singh, Ran Bahadur Singh, and Jang Bahadur Singh, certain villages out of the taluqa, to be held absolutely with heritable and transferable rights as under-proprietors if and when they or any of them wished to separate from their eldest brother; but "so long as they live in union among themselves with the taluqdar" the taluqa was to remain undivided, and the income therefrom was to be "spent on the whole family," after paying Government and village dues.

The testator also directed the division of his moveable property in case of a separation, and by para. 8 he declared.

"I have executed this Will with the consent of all my sons and have got them to sign it as witnesses with this very purpose so that this Will may be acted upon fully and they may not quarrel among themselves after my demise."

As to the genuineness of the Will there is no dispute. Admittedly, also, disregarding the signatures of the testator's four sons, the execution of the Will is attested by a sufficient number of attesting witnesses, in conformity with the law in force in the Province of Oudh.

As would appear from an inspection of the translation of the Will, which is the plaintiff's Ex. 1, as reproduced in the record, it was signed by the testator as "executant," and below the testator's signature, after the signature of one of the witnesses, who, it is not disputed, was an attesting witness, there are the signatures of his four sons, and, below them, the signatures of three other persons who also admittedly signed as attesting witnesses. In the margin on the left of these signatures, and just above the signature of the first attesting witness, appears the word "Witnesses." The appellant, who is the son of the eldest son of the testator, on the strength of a passage in the judgment of the Subordinate Judge, contended that in the original Will the word "Witness" appears opposite each of the signatures below the testator's, including those of the sons. As in their Lordships' opinion it is immaterial, for the purpose of deciding the question before them, whether or not this was the form of the original document, it may be assumed that the appellant's contention upon this point is well-founded.

The Will is dated the 17th of December, 1886, and the testator died in February, 1889. In May, 1889, the name of the eldest son, Lal Bahadur Singh, was, pursuant to the dispositions of the Will, inserted in the Mutation Register, in place of that of the testator. The eldest son having died in May, 1912, a joint application was made in the following July by the appellant and his three uncles (including the two respondents) in the Tahsildar's Court for mutation of names and the substitution of the appellant's name for that of his father. Mutation was duly effected in conformity with this application.

Down to the death of Lal Bahadur Singh his three younger brothers had lived in union with him, and after his death these three brothers, uncles of the appellant, continued to live with the appellant in joint family until the year 1914. In July of that year the youngest son of the testator decided to separate from the joint family, and an application by him to the Tahsildar's Court for the substitution in the Register of his name in lieu of that of the appellant, in respect of the villages bequeathed to him under the Will, was not contested by the appellant, and accordingly was granted.

In June, 1921, the respondents having decided to separate from the joint family, applications were filed by them, requesting mutation of their names in respect of the villages to which they were severally entitled under the terms of the Will. The appellant having raised the objection that the applicants ought first to establish their title by a decree of the Civil Court, the applications were dismissed; and the respondents then, in May, 1922, instituted the suits out of which this appeal arises.

The Subordinate Judge held that the testimony of the three surviving sons of the testator as to the circumstances connected with the execution of the Will must be accepted as credible testimony. The effect of this testimony, as the learned Judge states it, was that the testator, their father, had summoned his four sons to his presence, and, having explained that he had made a Will leaving his property to them, asked them to attach their signatures to the Will, not as attesting witnesses, but in token of their consent, with a view to avoiding disputes after his death; and that they attached their signatures, pursuant to this request. The Subordinate Judge accordingly found, and with him the Appeal Court agreed, that the sons did not sign the Will as attesting witnesses.

Before their Lordships' Board, Counsel for the appellant admitted that the oral testimony narrating what occurred at the time of the execution of the Will was admissible in point of law, and, indeed, as will be seen, upon it his substantive contention was founded; nor did he argue that there was any ground upon which the appellant could ask for a reversal of the concurrent findings of the Indian Courts as to the credibility of that testimony. His contention was that, although the position of the signatures created only a presumption that they had been attached by the legatees as attesting witnesses, which presumption might be rebutted by parole evidence as to what actually occurred, still, since the signatures were by reason of their position ex facie signatures of attesting witnesses, that fact, when coupled with the fact disclosed by the oral evidence that they were placed there in compliance with the testator's request, was sufficient to constitute the attaching of the signatures an attestation in point of law; and that consequently all questions of intention, whether of the testator, or of the persons who signed their names, were without relevancy.

As touching the effect of the evidence adduced on behalf of the respondents concerning what actually occurred at the execution of the Will, their Lordships have no hesitation in concurring in the view of all the Courts in India; nor can there be, in their opinion, any doubt as to the character of the acts of the testator's sons in placing their signatures upon the document, when the terms of the Will itself and the facts disclosed by that evidence are taken into account. The testator himself, by para. 8, which is quoted above, had declared his intention; that paragraph, it is true, is not worded with the precision that might have been desired, but it would be a strange thing to give effect to it in such a way as to frustrate the obvious purpose of the testator in making it part of his Will.

Its manifest object was to secure the co-operation of his sons in carrying out the dispositions of the Will, and to do that by inserting in the Will a formal declaration that his sons, by appending their signatures thereto, had concurred in those dispositions. By reading the clause as declaring that the sons had signed the Will as attesting witnesses, one would ascribe to it a meaning according to which it would not only defeat the object of the clause itself, but nullify the distribution of his property which the testator was seeking to bring about in making his Will. The more reasonable and natural reading would appear to be that the sons had attached their signatures as concurring in the declaration contained in the paragraph; and this latter construction (under which this particular declaration would take effect, together with the Will as a whole) seems to be enjoined upon the Courts by s. 71 of the Succession Act.

The issue as to the character of the acts of the respondents does not for its determination depend upon any conclusion touching the nature of an undisclosed purpose or intention. The witnesses agree that while the testator invited others to sign as attesting witnesses, he addressed no such invitation to the sons, but asked them explicitly to sign for the special purpose of expressing their consent, with the view of avoiding dissensions in the future. The evidence, once it is accepted, shows that the act of each of them was, openly and palpably, with the knowledge of all present, the act of expressing consent, and nothing else. Their Lordships concur in the view of all the Courts below that in such circumstances the signers were not attesting witnesses within the meaning of s. 54 of the Succession Act.

Their Lordships will accordingly humbly advise His Majesty that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), s. 106, application of, in Punjab—Monthly tenant—Notice of ejectment—Notice not expiring with end of tenancy month, validity of.

There is no authority for the strict application in the Punjab of the technicalities required by s. 106 of the Transfer of Property Act and unless specifically provided for by the contract, a notice for ejectment of a lessee holding on a monthly rent need not expire with the end of a month of the tenancy. [p. 537, col. 2.]

A lease was executed on the 9th October, 1923, for 11 months on a monthly rent terminable at any time by two months' previous notice. Two months' notice was given on the 21st July, 1924. In a suit for ejectment it was contended that the notice was not valid inasmuch as it did not expire with the end of the month of the tenancy :

Held, that the notice was a valid one. [p. 538, col. 1.]

Second appeal from the decree of the Additional District Judge, Lahore, dated the 5th May, 1927, affirming that of the Subordinate Judge, Fourth Class, Lahore, dated the 31st January, 1927.

Mr. A. R. Kapur, for the Appellant.

Mr. Bishen Nath, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—Badri Nath, the defendant in the suit from which this appeal arises, took on lease from Ram Nath the plaintiff, a house, a kothri and a vacant site with effect from the 9th of October, 1923. He executed a deed providing that the rent, Rs. 9 per mensem, would be paid monthly and that if the landlord wished to have the house vacated he should give two months' previous notice. The deed of lease ended with a statement that the lessee had executed the deed of rent for 11 months.

On the 21st of July, 1924, the plaintiff served a notice on the defendant asking the latter to vacate the house within two months from the date of the receipt of notice at the risk of being charged double rent. The defendant did not vacate the premises.

In May, 1925, the plaintiff sued the defendant for ejectment and arrear of rent. The defendant contested the suit on the grounds, inter alia, that he had never been given possession of the vacant plot and that the notice was invalid because it did not mention the kothri and the vacant site and because it did not expire with the end of the month of the tenancy.

The trial Court decreed the rent but refused a decree for ejectment holding that the notice was invalid because it did not expire with the end of the month of the tenancy. On appeal the Additional District Judge, Lahore, confirmed this order agreeing with the trial Court's view regarding the invalidity of the notice. The plaintiff has preferred a second appeal contesting the correctness of the lower Court's decision on this point.

The Courts below have based their decisions on the Single Bench judgment of this Court in Chuni Lal v. Chuni Lal (1). Mr. Kapur for the appellant questioned the correctness of this judgment and relies on the Nagpur judgment in Saik Kasam v. Haji Yusuf Karim Abu (2) which dealt with a case on all fours so far as the point at issue here is concerned, with the present case.

The Transfer of Property Act has not been extended to this Province and neither in Pirbhu Dial v. Ram Chand (3) nor in Radha Kishen v. Ratan Lal (4) referred to in Chuni Lal v. Chuni Lal (1) do I find authority for the strict application in the Punjab of the technicalities required by s. 106 of the Act. Assuming, however, that s. 106 of the Act did govern the matter of notice here, the present case appears to me to be one in which the matter of notice is provided for by the contract itself and, therefore, one to be decided according to the agreement between the parties. Read as a whole the lease is terminable at any time on two months' notice, that is to say, similar so far as the point at issue is concerned, to the lease in the Punjab case, Rure Khan v. Ghulam Muhammad (5) decided by Campbell, J. In that case, as here, the lease was for 11 months, a provision in the present case obviously intended to avoid the necessity of registration (the rent in the present case being Rs. 99 for 11 months) and the lessor had given the lessee notice of a fixed period. In that case the period was one week. There too the rent was payable monthly and the lessor had asked the lessee to vacate the property within one week. It was held that the stipulation for the monthly payment of rent had no effect upon the condition by which the lessor could serve the lessee with notice at any time and that a week's notice to vacate on the 3rd June, 1921, (the 11 months of tenancy having begun on the 8th of August, 1920) was not invalid merely because it did not expire on the 7th of any Calendar month. Following this ruling and the Nagpur ruling cited above, I accept this appeal holding that the notice given by the plaintiff-appellant was not invalid, because it did not expire with the end of a month of the tenancy and on this finding remand the appeal to the lower Appellate Court for disposal after decision of the point left undetermined. The suit and appeal remained pending in the lower Court for two years and the appeal should be disposed of as soon as possible. The appellant will get his costs of appeal in this Court.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), ss. 109, 110—Riparian owners, dispute between, as to right to water—Question of mixed law and fact—Valuation of claim for appeal to Privy Council—Principles.

As a rule the majority of cases between riparian owners as to the right to water in a channel give rise to questions of law or at all events to mixed questions of law and fact. [p. 538, col. 2.]

The second paragraph of s. 110 of the Civil Procedure Code relates not only to claims to property of Rs. 10,000 in value but to questions respecting property of the like amount and that part of the section was introduced to cover claims relating to property of considerable value where the actual value of the relief claimed can only with difficulty be assessed, for instance, in cases where an injunction is sought regarding dealings with certain valuable property or in a case where the rights of irrigation are sought by one side and denied by the other in the case of a village of very considerable area. [p. 539, col. 1.]

JUDGMENT.

Miller, C. J.—Two questions arise for decision in this application. One is as to the value of the subject-matter on appeal to His Majesty in Council and the other whether there is substantial question of law for determination in the appeal to His Majesty in Council.

The dispute between the parties arises from a claim to the rights of water running through an artificial channel on the plaintiffs' land from one point to another and thence on to the defendants' land. On the plaintiffs' land there appears to be an ahar along the northern limit of which the artificial water-course runs. They claim that in order to fill the ahar during the rainy season they are entitled to block up the channel at a point to the north of the ahar on their own land until the ahar is flooded and only after that must they remove the obstruction and allow the water to flow through the rest of their land and eventually to that of the defendants.

The defendants, on the other hand, contend that the plaintiffs are not entitled to block up that channel for the purpose of filling their ahar, or reservoir, on their own land but only in the event of the water in any season rising high enough to overflow the embankment can the plaintiffs expect to have their ahar filled.

The plaintiffs, the petitioners before us to-day, contend that the questions involved in this decision are questions of law or at all events mixed questions of law and of fact. The facts although perhaps somewhat meagre upon which to arrive at a decision in a case of this sort have been found by the lower Court and the law applying to such facts has been applied by the High Court on appeal. As a rule, I think, it may be said that the majority of cases between riparian owners as to the right to water in a channel give rise to questions of law or at all events to mixed questions of law and fact. There are, no doubt, exceptions but in the present case it seems to me that it is sufficient to say that we consider the questions are such that it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that they are at least mixed questions of law and fact. In so far as that part of the application is concerned I think we ought so to decide.

With regard to the other point, namely, the value of the subject-matter on appeal it is quite true that the plaintiffs in their plaint valued the relief claimed at Rs. 2,500. At the same time they are claiming damages from year to year varying in amount and we are informed that from the year 1328 to the year 1335 the damages claimed amount to Rs. 9,600 but the question for determination in a case of this sort is whether this is a case within the second paragraph of s. 110 of the Civil Procedure Code. The second paragraph of that section relates not only to claims to property of Rs. 10,000 in value but to questions respecting property of the like amount and there is no doubt that that part of the section was introduced to cover claims relating to property of considerable value where the actual value of the relief claimed can only with difficulty be assessed, for instance, in cases where an injunction is sought regarding dealing with certain valuable property or in a case like the present where the rights of irrigation are sought by one side and denied by the other in the case of a village of very considerable area. In the present case the value of the village is said to be Rs. 80,000 and I have no hesitation in arriving at the conclusion that the value of this important claim to the rights of irrigation ought to be considered as at least of the value of Rs. 10,000.

The usual certificate will issue that the case complies with the provisions of s. 110 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The appellants are entitled to the costs of this application which has been opposed. Hearing fee five gold mohurs.

Pre-emption—Benami sale—Sale to co-sharer in stranger's name—Right of other co-sharers to pre-empt—Oudh Laws Act (XVIII of 1876), ss. 10, 13.

A co-sharer is entitled to exercise his right of pre-emption where a sale-deed is executed ostensibly in the name of a stranger even though the real beneficiary under the sale is another co-sharer. In the case of a benami sale, for purposes of pre-emption, the Court has only to see who the transferee is according to the proper construction of the deed. [p. 540, cols. 1 & 2.]

The benamidar may have no beneficial interest in the property or business standing in his name but he represents in fact the real owner, and is in the legal position of such representative. [p. 540, col. 1.]

Appeal against the decree of the Subordinate Judge, Barabanki, in Regular Civil Appeal No. 27 of 1926, dated the 24th of August, 1926, reversing that of the Munsif, Fatehpur, in Regular Suit No. 180 of 1925, dated the 25th of May, 1926.

Mr. Ali Zaheer, for the Appellants.

Messrs. Haider Husain and Naim Ullah, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The facts of the suit out of which this second appeal arises, as found by the learned Subordinate Judge, who heard the appeal, are as follows:—Moharram Ali and Farzind Ali are brothers holding jointly a small under-proprietary share in a certain village. On the 10th of May, 1924, Moharram Ali sold the moiety which belonged to him to Sultan Ali and Mohammad Wahab sons of his brother Farzind Ali for Rs. 368. It has been found by the lower Appellate Court that Farzind Ali himself supplied the money with which the purchase was made and that the transaction was a benami transaction under which Farzind Ali was to become the real owner of the property. It, therefore, decided that Mansur Ali and Newazish Ali, who would have had a right of pre-emption as against Sultan Ali and Mohammad Wahab, had no right to exercise the right of pre-emption in respect of this transaction inasmuch as they had no right to pre-emption against Farzind Ali. We do not agree with the learned Subordinate Judge in the view which he has taken. It is necessary to go back to the provisions of

Chap. II, Act XVIII of 1876. When Moharam Ali proposed to sell the property ostensibly to Sultan Ali and Mohammad Wahab he was under the obligation, in accordance with the provisions of s. 10 of the Act, to give notice to Mansur Ali and Newazish Ali. He did not do so. Thus after the sale had been completed Mansur Ali and Newazish Ali became entitled to bring a suit to enforce a right of pre-emption under the provisions of s. 13. We find that not only were Sultan Ali and Mohammad Wahab mentioned as the vendees in the deed but that vendor has stated that he had received the sale consideration from them and their names were entered in the revenue registers as the persons entitled to engage for the revenue of the property. In our opinion in these circumstances Mansur Ali and Newazish Ali had a right to exercise the right of pre-emption in respect of the property. Their right of pre-emption is against the persons who are the transferees mentioned in the deed. The principles, which should govern the rights and liabilities of parties to a benami transaction, are laid down to some extent in the decision of their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in Gur Narayan v. Sheo Lal Singh (1). The benamidar may have no beneficial interest in the property or business standing in his name but he represents in facts the real owner, and is in the legal position of such representative. If the sale had been made to Farzind Ali as ostensible vendee no right of pre-emption may have arisen, but when the deed of sale was executed at his own will and with his own connivance in favour of his sons, a right of pre-emption did come into existence. The plea of Sultan Ali and Mohammad Wahab is something of this nature: "In order to deceive the world our father concealed his share in the transaction and we were falsely stated to be the actual vendees when, as a matter of fact, we were not so, but now that we have discovered that this act of deception on our part has created a right of pre-emption in favour of a third party we demand that we should be allowed to state the truth to defeat the right of pre-emption but we do not propose to give up possession of the property." We do not say that they are estopped from taking this plea but we do say that they must fail on it. In our opinion in a case such as this the Court has only to look as to who is the transferee according to the proper construction of the deed and the suit for pre-emption lies accordingly. We, therefore, set aside the decision of the lower Appellate Court and restore the decision of the learned Munsif. Under that decision the plaintiff appellants were directed to deposit the full amount Rs. 368 within one month. We are informed that they have already deposited this amount. They will now be given a decree for possession of the property. The defendants-respondents Sultan Ali and Mohammad Wahab will pay their own costs and those of the plaintiff-appellants in all three Courts.

son of one Dalsukh Rai and was represented by his father. The third plaintiff was Jhawar Mal, minor son of Mangtu Ram and he was also represented by his father. The suit was against the East Indian Railway Co., and B. B. and C. I. Railway Co., and another person for compensation for the loss of certain tins of ghee consigned to the Railway Companies for carriage to Giridih. The Munsif gave a modified decree to the plaintiffs. The East Indian Railway Co., one of the defendants in the suit, preferred an appeal before the Judicial Commissioner of Chota Nagpur. During the pendency of the appeal Mangtu Ram the guardian of the minor respondent in the lower Court, Jhawar Mal died, but no steps were taken to appoint another guardian to represent the minor. It is stated in an affidavit filed in this Court that Mangtu Ram died in September or October, 1924. The appeal, was decided by the learned Judicial Commissioner on the 16th March, 1925, whereby the decree of the Munsif was set aside and the suit was dismissed.

It is now contended on behalf of the plaintiff appellants that as no guardian was appointed for Jhawar Mal after the death of his father and guardian Mangtu Ram the appeal became incompetent and the decision of the learned Judicial Commissioner cannot stand. There is no denial of the fact that Mangtu Ram died in September or October, 1924. The contention of the appellants is that the appeal abated because there was no appointment of a fresh guardian. On the other hand, it is contended that none of the respondents was dead, only the guardian of one of the minor respondents had died and the appeal did not abate and that all that was necessary under the law was to appoint a fresh guardian and that under O. XXXII, rr. 10 and 11 the effect of not bringing on the record a fresh guardian of one of the minor respondents would be to stay the hearing of the appeal until such appointment was made. I am of opinion that there was no abatement in the present case, but the decree of the learned Judicial Commissioner cannot stand as it was made in the absence of a guardian of one of the minor respondents. The decree of the Judicial Commissioner must, therefore, be vacated and the parties restored to the position in which they were at the time when the appeal was still pending and had not been disposed of by the learned Judicial Commissioner, that is, on the date of the hearing of the appeal by the Judicial Commissioner. Under O. XXXII, r. 11, the Court could not dispose of the appeal without the appointment of a new guardian. The result is that the decree of the learned Judicial Commissioner is set aside and the case is sent back to him for proceeding according to law. Costs will abide the result.

Mr. Ishri Prasad, for the Appellant.

Messrs. A. P. Sen and Sundar Lal Gupta, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—There is little to be said on this appeal. The case was tried with great care and great intelligence by the trial Court, and the appeal before the learned District Judge was decided as well as the original case was decided. There is a ground of appeal which has not been pressed to the effect that the Hardoi Court had no jurisdiction. The facts of this case are simple. The plaintiffs are members of a firm carrying on business as grain dealers in Hardoi. Both the Courts have arrived on the facts at the same conclusions. The defendants who are a firm carrying on grain business in Poona ordered 151 bags of bajra from the plaintiffs at Hardoi and remitted a sum of Rs. 1,000 in part-payment of the consignment. The plaint iffs obtained the grain and on the defendants' instructions caused the consignment to be booked to Poona and remitted the Railway receipt with a hundi for the balance due to the defendants' agents in Bombay. The defendants' agents honoured the hundi and lost the Railway receipt and owing to this latter fact the consignment was taken possession of by a firm of Poona other than the defendants' firm. The defendants' firm received full information as to how the mistake arose. Nevertheless, they filed a suit in the Small Cause Court at Poona against the plaintiffs in which they made absolutely false allegations to the effect that after they had remitted to the plaintiffs' firm a sum of Rs. 1,000 and honoured the hundi the plaintiffs' firm had sent no consignment to them. The allegations in this plaint were untrue and untrue to the defendants' knowledge. This is a finding of both the Courts and it is difficult to see how any other finding could have been arrived at upon the evidence. The defendants' firm then proceeded to misdescribe the plaintiffs in the summons issued and as a result of this misdescription two summonses were sent to the plaintiffs and returned unserved. Finally, substituted service was effected upon the plaintiffs, the same misdescription continuing and an ex parte decree was passed by the Poona Small Cause Court in favour of the defendants against the plaintiffs which was based upon an affidavit sworn on behalf of the defendants. The suit with which we are concerned was a suit for a declaration that the decree so passed was null and void on the ground that it had been obtained by fraud.

It was suggested in the grounds of appeal that such a suit as this, in which a Court in Oudh is asked for a declaration that a decree passed by a Court outside Oudh is null and void because it has been obtained by fraud, was a suit which no Oudh Court has jurisdiction to try. We consider it sufficient in repelling this contention to refer to a decision of a Bench of the Allahabad High Court in Jawahir v. Neki Ram (1) in which it was laid down that when, as here, an attempt has been made to execute such a decree within the jurisdiction of the local Court, the local Court has jurisdiction to hear the case. The question has been discussed very elaborately by the learned Judges who decided that appeal and we have nothing to add to their remarks. The learned Counsel who has appeared before us had argued that on the facts there was no fraud committed upon the Poona Court. Upon the facts we find that a very grave fraud was committed upon the Poona Court. We find that there was wilful mis-statement and wilful suppression of material facts in the plaint put in before the Poona Court and that the defendants deliberately mis-described the plaintiffs in order to prevent their being in a position to defend the case. We, therefore, dismiss this appeal with costs.

As a broad proposition it is not correct to say that in a case in which an ex parte decree has been passed and the aggrieved party has not availed of the remedy by way of an application under O. JUDGMENT.

Mukerji, J.—This appeal is directed against an order passed by the Second Subordinate Judge of Hooghly, on the 5th and 28th of May, 1925. By this order the learned Subordinate Judge allowed an appeal that had been preferred to his Court by a defendant in a suit which had been decreed ex parte and after setting aside the judgment and decree of the trial Court remanded the suit for further trial upon certain terms and conditions. The plaintiffs have now preferred this appeal. It appears that after several adjournments granted to the defendant on applications made by him for that purpose and upon the conditions that he would pay the costs of those dates the case was eventually fixed for the 26th February, 1924. On that day the plaintiffs were ready but the defendant again put in an application asking for an adjournment on the ground that he had been attacked with small pox and that, therefore, he was unable to appear in Court on that day. An order for adjournment was made on condition that the defendant would pay adjournment costs Rs. 15, but on the said costs not being paid the case was taken up, certain witnesses for the plaintiffs were examined and the learned Munsif decreed the suit ex parte on the evidence that was before him. From this decree an appeal was preferred on behalf of the defendant and in this appeal the learned Subordinate Judge, being of opinion that on the 26th February, 1924, the defendant was prevented by sufficient cause from appearing in Court inasmuch as he had been attacked with small pox and in that view holding that the adjournment asked for on behalf of the defendant should have been granted, passed the order to which I have referred. The plaintiffs, as I have already stated, have thereupon preferred the present appeal to this Court.

In support of this appeal two grounds have been urged on behalf of the appellants. The first ground is to the effect that on an appeal preferred from the ex parte decree that was passed in this case the Subordinate Judge was not entitled to go into the question as to whether the defendant was prevented by sufficient cause from appearing in Court on the day the case was taken up. His argument in substance is that this is a matter which properly comes within the purview of proceedings taken under O. IX, r. 13 of the Code of Civil Procedure and inasmuch as the defendant did not resort to that remedy it was not open to him to urge at the hearing of the appeal that he had preferred that he was prevented by some sufficient cause from appearing when the suit was called on for hearing and that, therefore, the learned Subordinate Judge was wrong in passing the order that he did in the present case. In support of this contention reliance has been placed on behalf of the appellants upon a passage which is to be found in the case of Jonardhan Dobey v. Ram Dhone Singh (1). That passage occurs in the Order of Reference made by Banerjee and Rampini, JJ., referring certain questions for consideration to a Full Bench of this Court and the passage runs in these words: "Upon the record, as it stands, the ex parte decree may be wholly unassailable, but, if the defendant has an opportunity (which he was prevented from having owing to some sufficient cause) of placing on the record evidence which he could have adduced to substantiate his defence, no such decree should have been passed. The remedy in such a case cannot be by way of appeal which must ordinarily proceed upon the record as it stands. The proper remedy must be the one provided by s. 108 of the Code of Civil Procedure." In my opinion, the passage relied upon by the learned Vakil on behalf of the appellant is obiter. Apart from authorities it seems to me to be perfectly clear that when a suit has been decided ex parte the remedy by way of appeal from the ex parte decree as well as the remedy by way of application under O. IX, r. 13 are both open to the person against whom the decision was passed. It is true that if he avails himself of the remedy by way of application under O. IX, r. 13 he is in a position of greater advantage than he would be if he preferred an appeal from the ex parte decree itself. This would be by reason of the fact that he would be able to establish by adducing evidence that he was unable to appear owing to circumstances over which he had no control whereas if he prefers an appeal from the ex parte decree itself the Court would have to proceed upon the record as it stands and to determine upon the materials that are on the record whether the application for adjournment was rightly granted or not. The question as to whether the order refusing the application for adjournment was rightly passed or not is, in my opinion, somewhat different from the question as to whether the absenting party was prevented by sufficient cause for not appearing in the course of the proceedings. The two, no doubt, are inter-related but the considerations are not quite the same. Reliance has in the next place been placed upon the decision of the Allahabad High Court in the case of Hummi v. Aziz-ud-din (2). The decision taken as a whole, no doubt, does support the contention which the appellants have put forward but the facts of that case are entirely different from those of the present case, one distinguishing feature being that in that case an application under O. IX, r. 13, to set aside the ex parte decree and to have a re-hearing was, as a matter of fact, dismissed and it was after that that the question against arose at the hearing of the appeal. A decision of the Burma High Court has also been referred to, namely, the case of Raj Chandra Dhar v. K. D. O. C. Ray (3). Now, with the utmost respect for the learned Judges who decided the case of Hummi v. Aziz-ud-din (2) and the case of Raj Chandra Dhar v. K. D. O. C. Ray (3), I must say that if they intended to lay down as a broad proposition that in a case in which an ex parte decree has been passed and the aggrieved party has not availed of the remedy by way of an application under O. IX, r. 13 he is precluded from raising the question of propriety of the refusal to adjourn his case in the appeal which he prefers from the ex parte decree itself, I am unable to agree in the view which the learned Judges had taken in the case. There is a decision of the Madras High Court in the case of Sadhu Krishna Ayyar v. Kuppan Ayyangar (4), where the contrary view has been taken. There is, therefore, in my opinion, no substance in the first contention that has been urged on behalf of the appellants.

The appellants' second contention is that inasmuch as evidence had been taken and a decision on the merits had been passed it was not open to the learned Subordinate Judge to make an order of remand in the form that he did. It is said that the remand has been made in the form prescribed under O. XLI, r. 23 of the Code of Civil Procedure and that the said rule has no application to the circumstances of the case before us. This undoubtedly is so but as has been pointed out in the case of Abdul Karim Abu Ahmed Khan Ghaznavi v. Allahabad Bank, Ltd. (5) and Jeihalal Girdhar v. Varajlal Bhaishankar (6), the Court is entitled to make an order of remand of this description under the provisions of s. 151 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It is now too late to contend that the powers of an Appellate Court as regards remand are restricted to the cases specified in O. XLI, r. 23 of the Civil Procedure Code. It has been argued that inasmuch as the aggrieved party could have availed of the remedy under O. IX, r. 13, it was not open to the Court to make an order under s. 151 because the inherent power of the Court has got to be exercised subject to the provisions of the Code and only in such case with regard to which no provision has been made by the Code itself. Now s. 151 says: "Nothing in this Code shall be deemed to limit or otherwise affect the inherent power of the Court to make such orders as may be necessary for the ends of justice or to prevent abuse of the process of the Court." If the defendant was entitled to raise the question of the propriety of the adjournment in the appeal that he preferred from the ex parte decree and if that Court came to be of opinion that the adjournment should have been granted then, in my opinion, the only sort of order that could properly be passed by that Court would be an order setting aside the decree passed by the trial Court and remanding the case for re-trial. This is the order which the lower Appellate Court has passed. The Code does not appear to have made any express provision for a case of this nature. I am of opinion that no grounds have been made out why we should interfere with it.

In this view of the matter the order passed by the learned Subordinate Judge seems to be right and this appeal should be dismissed. Having regard, however, to the dilatoriness on the part of the respondents in the conduct of the proceedings in the Court below I am of opinion that no order should be made for the costs of this appeal in their favour.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 103, 360 (1)—Deposition of witness, reading of—Accused not present—Presence of Pleader, whether sufficient—House search—Witness brought from distance—Witnesses, all whether must be produced—Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), s. 120-B—Explosive Substances Act (IV of 1884), s. 5—Arms Act (XI of 1878), s. 19—Conspiracy, person found at place of—Appearances against accused—Presumption—Possession of explosives—Temporary residence.

The words "appear by Pleader", as used in s. 360 (1), Criminal Procedure Code, are nowhere defined. In ordinary acceptance these words mean "represented by Pleader" that is to say, having a Pleader to act and plead. [p. 549, col. 2]

There is nothing in the provisions of s. 360 (1), Criminal Procedure Code to indicate that the Legislature intended that the reading over in the presence of the Pleader should be a compliance with the provisions of that section only in cases where the personal appearance of the accused is dispensed with by the Court. The natural meaning of the words is that if an accused person has engaged a Pleader, who is in attendance, the reading over of the deposition in the presence of the Pleader will be a full compliance with the provisions of the section, if the accused himself does not happen to be present at the time the deposition is read over. [ibid.]

The mere fact that one of the search-witnesses is brought by the Police from a distance of about half a mile from the place of search is not sufficient to discredit that witness, unless it is shown that he was in any way connected with the Police. [p. 552, col. 2.]

The word "permitted" in s. 103 (3), Criminal Procedure Code, cannot be taken to mean that the person whose premises are searched shall be present and that he must be given the option of being present. [ibid.]

No duty is cast on the prosecution to put every search witness into the witness-box. [p. 553, col. 1.]
Munni Sonar v. Emperor (3), dissented from.

Where there is no means of discriminating between the cases of various persons found at a place of a criminal conspiracy, and the circumstances point to the conclusion that every person found in the house was a member of the conspiracy, absence of proof that a particular person was there innocently leads to the conclusion that no one's presence was innocent. [p. 555, col. 1.]

Obiter.—Section 360 (3) is not an additional provision, requiring that the deposition recorded in English should be translated into the vernacular to a witness who has deposed in the vernacular, after having first been read over to him in English [p. 548, col. 2.]

Per Suhrawardy, J.—When appearances are against the accused in a case, and the prosecution has established prima facie the existence of incriminating circumstances, it is the duty of the defence to rebut the presumption arising from them by some tangible evidence other than by mere criticism and suggestions or untested and uncorroborated statements from the dock. The idea that the defence is not bound to adduce any evidence is dangerous. In Jury trials the last word may have some value but in a trial before three experienced Judges the prosecution and the defence stand on the same footing. [p. 556, col. 2.]

It cannot be said that temporary residence in a house containing explosive articles, even with the knowledge of their existence there, is possession within the meaning of s. 5 of the Explosive Substances Act. Conspiracy to possess connotes some act of possession or attempted possession. [p. 557, cols. 1 & 2]

Criminal appeals against the decision of the Commissioners appointed under ss. 4 (1) and (2) of the Bengal Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1925, dated the 9th January, 1926.

Babu Mrityunjoy Chattopadhyaya, for the Appellants.

Mr. B. L. Mitter (Advocate-General), for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.

Cammiade, J.—(January 5, 1927)—These four appeals are against a judgment of Commissioners appointed under sub-ss. (1) and (2) of s. 4 of the Bengal Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1925. Nine persons were convicted by this judgment; and out of these one has undergone sentence of death passed on him in connexion with the Alipore Jail murder. There remain eight persons. Five of them, namely, Hari Narayan Chandra, Rajendra Lal Lahiri, Birendra Kumar Banerjee, Dhrubesh Chandra Chatterjee and Rakhal Chandra De are the appellants in Appeal No. 89; Nikhil Bandhu Banerjee is the appellant in Appeal No. 90; Debi Prasad Chatterjee is the appellant in Appeal No. 91; and Shibaram Chatterjee is the appellant in Appeal No. 99. Two of the appellants in the first of these appeals, namely, Dhrubesh Chandra Chatterjee and Rakhal Chandra De, have been sentenced to transportation for life in connection with the Alipore Jail murder; and the learned Vakil who appears for them has moved us to exercise the powers vested in us by s. 397 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, and make the sentence passed in the case before us run concurrently with the other sentence, in the event of our finding these appellants guilty in the present case also. The learned Advocate-General has supported this request. The appeal in other respects, as far as these appellants are concerned, may be treated as sentimental.

All the appellants have been found guilty of the following offences, namely, conspiracy, under s. 120-B of the Indian Penal Code, to commit the offences specified in s. 4 (b) of the Explosive Substances Act and s. 19 (f) of the Arms Act and also substantive offences under both the last mentioned sections. Hari Narayan Chandra and Rajendra Lal Lahiri have been sentenced to transportation for ten years under s. 4 (b) of the Explosive Substances Act and to rigorous imprisonment for two years under s. 19 (f) of the Arms Act. Birendra Kumar Banerjee, Nikhil Bandhu Banerjee, Dhrubesh Chandra Chatterjee and Rakhal Chandra De have been sentenced to rigorous imprisonment for 5 years under the former section and rigorous imprisonment for two years under the latter. Shibaram Chatterjee and Debi Prasad Chatterjee have been sentenced to rigorous imprisonment for 3 years and 18 months respectively under the above two sections. The separate sentences passed on each of the appellants are to run concurrently.

The story of the case is to the following effect :—

The Police had been keeping watch over the house, No. 4 Sova Bazar Street; and instructions had been given to shadow Ananta Hari Mitra. On the 6th of November, 1925, a watcher named Nilini Kanta Roy, who was standing at the junction of Sova Bazar Street and Chitpore Road, saw Ananta Hari Mitra engage a taxi at about 1.45 p. m. and drive into Sova Bazar Street. After a few minutes, he saw the same taxi returning with Ananta Hari Mitra, Dhrubesh Chandra Chatterjee and another man inside. The taxi turned into Chitpore Road and went northwards. The watcher took down the number of the taxi.

That evening, at about 6 o'clock, the watcher came across the taxi and asked the driver where he had taken the three young men. The driver, whose name was Hiru, replied that he had driven them as far as Baranagore Bazar where they had alighted and engaged a ticca gharri. On being asked if he could point out the ticca gharri, he said he might, and also that his friend, Shamser Ali, who had been with him, might also help in the matter. The watcher went with Hiru to Shamser Ali's house. They took Shamser with them in the taxi to Baranagore Bazar. There Hiru and Shamser made enquiries among the ticca gharri drivers and returned and said that the man who had driven the young men was one Mona, who was not there at the moment. Next morning, the watcher went to Baranagore and found Mona, from whom he learnt that he had driven the three young men to Bachaspatipara in Dakhineswar. The watcher made Mona drive him to the place where the young men had alighted. There, Mona pointed out the house to which one of the young men had gone to get change for a rupee, while the other two had remained in the carriage. That house is the one referred to in the evidence as Dwaraka's house. Early on the morning of the 10th of November, Mr. Duckfield, Additional Superintendent of Police, 24-Parganas, went with a posse of Police to make a search. He was taken by Nilini Kanta Roy, the watcher, to Dwaraka's house. That house is in two parts. The house was surrounded; and at each of the parts of the house one of the inmates was questioned. It was ascertained from them that the next house, separated from this one by a tank, was occupied by strangers, who kept very much to themselves. Mr. Duckfield inferred that that was the house he wanted; and he had it surrounded. One search witness was taken on the way to the place, at a distance of about half a mile from the house that was searched; and three neighbours were also summoned and made to attend as witnesses to the search. All the nine persons who have been convicted were found at the house that was searched. The Police found the door closed, and they knocked for admittance. Rakhal Chandra De opened the door and stood in the doorway and Mr. Duckfield asked him his name; and he gave the name of Nimaj Chandra Deb. Rakhal was put under arrest. As the rooms on the ground floor were unoccupied, Mr. Duckfield went up the stairs, followed by some of the members of his force. He found the door at the head of the stairs closed and fastened. As no one complied with the request that that door should be opened, a pick-axe was procured, and the door was broken open. On the first floor of the house there are three rooms and an enclosed verandah. The house faces south; and the enclosed verandah is on the south side. As one goes up the stairs, one finds to the left a door leading off the enclosed verandah into the room that is referred to as the eastern room. On the right-hand side as one goes up, there is the enclosed verandah, out of which two doors open northwards into the rooms which are referred to as the middle room and the western room.

When Mr. Duckfield entered the enclosed verandah he found Rajendra Lal Lahiri at the foot of the flight of stairs leading to the roof, which lie between the stairs that lead to the ground floor and the eastern room. Mr. Duckfield arrested Rajendra Lal Lahiri, and sent him downstairs.

Mr. Duckfield then went into the middle room. There he found Dhrubesh Chatterjee and Shibaram Chatterjee lying ill, with Ananta Hari Mitra attending to them. The last named was put under arrest.

Mr. Duckfield then went to the eastern room. On the way there, he found Debi Prosad Chatterjee under arrest in the enclosed verandah. The latter had been in attendance on the three persons who were lying ill in the eastern room. Those three persons were Birendra Kumar Banerjee, Hari Narayan Chandra and Nikhil Bandhu Banerjee. None of the persons found upstairs gave his name, with the exception of Debi Prosad who also gave his father's name and address.

The eastern room was searched first. The articles found there were items Nos. 1 to 46 of search list Ex. B. The search of that room lasted till about 9-30 A. M.

At about 9 o'clock, the five persons who were ill were sent in an ambulance and in a taxi to Alipore, to be produced before the District Magistrate.

The search of the middle room was taken up after that of the eastern room was concluded. In the middle room, amongst other things, there was an almirah which was padlocked. Those of the arrested persons who had been brought up and were present were called upon to produce the key. As the key was not produced, the padlock was forced open. In that almirah were found most of the remaining articles specified in search list Ex. B including, among other things, a live bomb. The Chief Inspector of Explosives was sent for, and he placed the bomb in a bucket of water and took it away.

The search of the premises was continued till 7-30 P. M. on that day and was continued on the next two days. Nothing of any importance was found in the western room upstairs, in the room on the roof, in the ground floor rooms or in the outhouses.

The four accused persons in good health were present throughout the search of the middle and western room and were there for the rest of the day. They were produced before the Magistrate next morning.

Before proceeding to discuss the case on the merits, it is necessary to dispose of a preliminary objection to the validity of the trial, taken on behalf of all the appellants. It is contended that the provisions of s. 360 of the Code of Criminal Procedure have not been complied with. Our attention is drawn to the fact that the certificates given by the Commissioners at the foot of the depositions are in four different forms:—

(1) "Read over to witness in the presence of the accused or their lawyers, and admitted to be correct."

(2) "Read over in the presence of the accused and admitted to be correct."

(3) "Explained to the witness in the presence of the accused or their lawyers and admitted to be correct."

(4) "Explained to the witness in the presence of the accused and admitted to be correct."

It is contended that only the second of these forms of certificates shows compliance with the provisions of s. 360. As regards the reading over of the depositions in the presence of the lawyers representing accused persons, who were temporarily absent from the Court room for necessary purposes at the time the depositions were read over (Certificate form No. 1 above) it is urged that such reading over is not a compliance with the provisions of the section, the object of which is to enable both the witness and the accused to see whether or not the depositions have been correctly recorded.

As regards the certificates in forms Nos. (3) and (4) set forth above, it is contended that, in order to comply with the provisions of s. 360, it is the duty of the Court first to read over the recorded deposition in English, as provided in sub-s. (1) and then to have it interpreted to the witness as provided in sub-s. (3), and that as the certificate does not show that the deposition, where certificate in form No. 3 or No. 4 has been given, was read over in English, there was no compliance with the requirements of the section.

Before proceeding to discuss this matter it should be stated that all the accused persons under trial were represented by lawyers. Throughout the trial, all the accused persons were represented by a Solicitor named Delip Kumar Chakrabarti, witness No. 74 for the prosecution. Besides this, for the first five days of the trial, the appellant Nikhil was represented by Mr. Mukherji and certain other legal gentlemen who appeared also for other accused persons. On the sixth day of the trial, Mr. Mukherji and these other legal gentlemen made known to the Court that from that day forward they ceased to appear for Nikhil. All the accused persons admittedly knew English.

Two affidavits have been filed on behalf of the appellants, one by one Krishna Charan Chandra, brother of the appellant Hari Narayan Chandra, and the other by one Akhil Bandhu Banerjee, brother of the appellant Nikhil Bandhu Banerjee. On the side of the Crown, a statement signed by one of the Commissioners, contradicting the allegations made in these affidavits, has been filed. In the first of these affidavits the Commissioners are charged with having merely told some of the witnesses what purported to be the substance of the depositions that had been recorded; and it is further stated that all the accused persons were not present in the Court room at the time that some of the depositions were read over. The other affidavit states that Nikhil was not present in the Court room when some of the depositions were either read over or explained to the witnesses. The deponent states that he particularly remembers that Nikhil was absent from the Court room when the deposition given by Jugal Kishore was explained to that witness. He further repeats the charge that in the case of some of the witnesses only the substance of their depositions was given to them in Bengali.

The Commissioners' statement is to the effect that, whenever a witness deposed in English the deposition was read over to him in English, that, whenever a witness deposed in the vernacular, the deposition was read over sentence by sentence and then explained to the witness in the vernacular, and that if any accused person not represented by a lawyer was absent from the Court room, the Court invariably waited for his return before proceeding to read out the deposition to the witness.

The learned Vakils appearing for the appellants were none of them present at the trial, and are not in a position to support the allegations made in the affidavits. None of the legal gentlemen who did appear for the appellants at the trial has sworn an affidavit to support the allegations that have been made. The persons who have sworn the affidavits are the brothers of two of the appellants who have nothing to lose by swearing falsely. The allegations made by them are amply refuted by the statement signed by one of the Commissioners. The very record shows with what care and scruple the Commissioners did their work. The Commissioners have been at pains to record in each instance whether or not all the accused persons were themselves present in the Court room at the time a deposition was read over, showing that they made a point of ascertaining each time whether or not all the accused persons were present in the room when depositions were read over. There can, therefore, be no doubt that whenever Nikhil, who was considered unrepresented, was out of the room, the Court did, as the Commissioner has stated, await his return before reading over a deposition.

We are not prepared to accept the contention that sub-s. (3) to s. 360 is an additional provision, requiring that the deposition recorded in English should be translated into the vernacular to a witness who has deposed in the vernacular, after having first been read over to him in English. It would be a grave insult to the Court to question its integrity in giving a true rendering in the vernacular of the deposition it has recorded. There is nothing in the wording of the section to indicate that it requires that the deposition shall first be read over as recorded in English and shall then be translated into the language in which the witness has deposed. If such had been the intention of the Legislature, we should have expected the word "also" to stand between the words "shall" and "be interpreted" in sub-s. (3). It is, however, not necessary for us on this occasion to decide whether or not the interpretation sought to be put upon the section is correct, as the Commissioner who has made a statement has placed on record that whenever a witness deposed in the vernacular, the deposition recorded in English was first read out sentence by sentence and then interpreted to the witness.

As regards the objection that the reading over of a deposition in the presence of a Pleader, during the temporary absence of the prisoner represented by such Pleader, is not a compliance with the provisions of s. 360, we have been referred to the case of Kasim Ali v. Sarada Kripa Laha (1) and also to the wording of ss. 360 and 361 of the Code. It is true that in the case referred to we find that a Bench of this Court laid down as follows:—"It is clear from the wording of the section that if the accused is in attendance the evidence must be read over in his presence, and it is only when the accused appears by Pleader that the reading over of the evidence in the presence of the accused's Pleader is sufficient." But the facts of the case do not appear from the report. It may be inferred that in that case the deposition had been read over before a Pleader and that is all. There may have been more than one accused person in the case; and possibly the person in whose absence the deposition in that case was read over had no Pleader appearing for him. We, therefore, cannot consider the case as an authority for the proposition set up by the appellants.

As regards the argument based on the wording of these sections, we are unable to accept the contentions of the appellants. The contentions are as follows:—

Firstly that the words in sub-s. (1) of s. 360 "or of his Pleader, if he appears by Pleader" relate to cases where the personal attendance of an accused person is dispensed with under the provisions of s. 205 of the Code in which the words "permit him to appear by Pleader" are to be found and secondly that such interpretation is borne out by the provisions of s. 361, of which the first two sub-sections read:—Sub-section (1) "Whenever any evidence is given in a language not understood by the accused, and he is present in person, it shall be interpreted to him in open Court in a language understood by him." Sub-section (2) "If he appears by Pleader and the evidence is given in a language other than the language of the Court, and not understood by the Pleader, it shall be interpreted to such Pleader in that language."

Now, the words "appear by Pleader" are nowhere defined. In ordinary acceptance, these words mean "represented by Pleader" that is to say, having a Pleader to act and plead. In s. 205 the word "appear" seems to convey a double meaning, seemingly connoting, not merely authority to act and plead but also authority to personate the accused, but there is nothing to show that double meaning was intended by the Legislature. It is necessary that someone should be present at the trial to look after the interests of the accused; and all that s. 205 provides is that, when the Magistrate sees fit, a person against whom a summons has issued may be exempted from personal appearance, provided he engages a Pleader to attend and see that the proceedings are properly and legally conducted. The law considers that the interests of the accused will be completely safeguarded if his Pleader is in attendance. This is all that can be gathered from the provisions of that section. A similar intention is to be gathered from the provisions of s. 361.

But even if the double meaning of the word "appear" in s. 205 were intentional, there is nothing in the provisions of sub-s. (1) of s. 360 to indicate that the Legislature intended that the reading over in the presence of the Pleader should be a compliance with the provisions of that section only in cases where the personal appearance of the accused is dispensed with by the Court. The words used are "it shall be read over to him (the witness) in the presence of the accused, if in attendance, or of his Pleader if he appears by Pleader." The natural meaning of these words is, that if an accused person has engaged a Pleader, who is in attendance, the reading over of the deposition in the presence of the Pleader will be a full compliance with the provisions of the section, if the accused himself does not happen to be present at the time the deposition is read over.

We, therefore, hold that the provisions of s. 360 have been complied with.

Turning to the facts of the case we find a number of young men, not all of one caste, hailing from different places, none of them with any ostensible means of livelihood, and only one of them apparently possessing some money, living together in what is practically a village on the outskirts of

(1) 93 Ind. Cas. 973; 30 O. W. N. 336; 3A I. R. 1928 Cal. 528; 27 Cr. L. J. 509.

Calcutta, a place which is admittedly malarious. These young men keep very much to themselves. They hardly go abroad and even will not make use of the privy standing within the compound of the house, using instead a rain water pipe leading from the roof of the house. They have no intercourse with neighbours. They keep their door closed all the time. When one of them visits the grocer's shop to buy groceries, he does so late in the evening and tells the grocer to make haste and hand over the goods. They live under assumed names. Even when some of them are ill, rather than call local medical men, they go to the expense of bringing one from a distance, paying him a high fee and the expenses of conveying him to Dakshineswar and back. At the search of the house they occupy, the Police find a stolen revolver, a muzzle loading pistol, cartridges for revolvers, for an automatic pistol and for a shot gun, a live bomb, a large quantity of chemicals used in the preparation of explosives, handwritten and type-written instructions for the preparation of explosives of various kinds, cloth masks, written instructions about disguises, inflammatory literature and have hand-drawn maps of the neighbourhood.

All these young men profess to have no connection with the incriminating articles found at the search. Every one of them, except Nikhil, who made no statement, gives some excuse for being in that house. Hari Narayan says, that he is an ex-internee, and that as the Police were always on his tracks he decided to live in a quiet place outside Calcutta. He came to hear of the house at Dakshineswar through his friend Dhrubesh, and took it at the beginning of August, and went to live there with Birendra and Shibaram. Birendra says that the people of the house where he had worked as a private tutor in Howrah had calumniated him, and that he had to leave Howrah on that account. His friend, Hari Narayan, suggested living at Dakshineswar; and he went there to live with his friend, who also promised to take him into partnership in a business he was going to start. Birendra, however, was ill most of the time.

Shibaram says he had quarrelled with a Professor of Ashutosh College and had gone to St. Xavier's College, against his father's wishes. He failed in his annual examination; and his father expressed annoyance at this. He, therefore, left home. His friend, Hari Narayan, took him to live at Dakshineswar to save him expense and also promised to have him instructed in short hand. Dhrubesh says he had a quarrel with his uncle over money matters and left home and lived at one or two places and then went to the Dakshineswar house, where his friends had started a cheap mess. Rakhal had a quarrel with the manager of a business called the Chittagong Chemical Industries, for which he had been working. He was on the look out for other employment and wrote to his friend, Ananta Hari Mitra, who invited him from Chittagong to Krishnagar and then took him to live at Dakshineswar early in November.

Rajendra Lahiri, Debi Prosad and Ananta Hari say they went to the house on the 8th of November, two days before their arrest and found several people lying ill. They were asked to stay and help; and that is how they happened to be present at the time of the search. Rajendra claims to have come to know of the place through his friend Dhrubesh, whom he had met near the Dakshineswar temple, and had been invited to go and visit the mess whenever he could. Debi Prosad also had quarrels. He had formerly lived at the house in Dakshineswar in which he has a share. As he had quarrelled with his co-sharers, he had gone to live at Bally, on the other side of the river. The letting of the house to Hari Narayan and his friends was arranged through him, but his relatives tried to deprive him of his share of the rent. He, therefore, went to the house on the 8th of November to collect his share of the rent direct.

That the incriminating articles were found in the house and that all the appellants were arrested there on the 10th of November, 1925, are not questioned. The case sought to be set up for all the appellants is that they had no connection with the incriminating articles, and that those articles must have been introduced into the house by the Police; and if that theory is not accepted, it has not been proved which of the appellants was in possession of the incriminating articles.

As regards individual appellants, it is urged that, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, it should be believed that Rajendra and Debi did not go to th-house till the 8th of November, and that their purpose in staying there was merely to help in nursing people who were ill. For Shibaram it is said that he was too ill to know what was taking place in the house.

Touching the first part of the general defence set up in argument before us, it has been urged that firstly the search was not conducted in accordance with law, and secondly that, as Mr. Duckfield has said that the appellants who were in good health were brought up from downstairs when the middle room was searched, that is to say at 9-30, and the men who were ill were removed at 9 o'clock, the Police had had half an hour in which to "plant" the incriminating articles in the middle-room. At the time of the trial, the suggestion that was thrown out was that the things had been carried into the house before the arrival of the local search witnesses. This suggestion will appear only from the following passage in the deposition of the friendly search witness Makhan Lal Chatterji, prosecution witness No. 5, who is related to the appellant Debi Prosad. The question put to this witness was:—"Had you any conversation with the accused there." (There refers to the door of the house, where according to the witness he found Rajendra and Debi under arrest). I shall re-call it to you. Did the accused say this:—"Mahashay, why have you come so late? They have done what they wanted to do." And the answer was "yes."

From this it is argued that the suggestion then was that the incriminating articles were carried into the house by the Police before Makhan's arrival. Yet neither Rajendra nor Debi said anything about this in his statement on examination before the Commissioners. The learned Vakil appearing for the appellants naively states that these persons could not make such statements in their answers to the Commissioners, because they were downstairs and could not see the things being put into the almirah upstairs. They may or may not have been in a position to say that they saw things put into the almirah: but they must have been in a position to see things being taken upstairs. Considering the enormous number of articles taken at the search and the bulk of several of these articles, it certainly would have been impossible for the Police to have taken these things upstairs without being seen. This matter will have to be referred to further in connection with the comments that have been made about the searching of the persons of the Police and of the search witnesses before they entered the house. The failure of the appellants to state that they saw articles in the hands of the Police or indications that they were carrying articles concealed in their uniforms is a complete refutation of the suggestion that anything was carried into the house by the Police at any time.

The enclosed verandah upstairs is only about 5 feet wide. According to the search witness, Makhan, the contents of a tin box found in the eastern room were examined on that verandah. The officers conducting the search, some constables and the search witnesses were present. In such circumstances, it is difficult to understand how it could have been possible for the Police to carry to the middle room the large number of articles that were found there. If aspersions are made on the Police, it should be shown that such aspersions are justifiable. It is not sufficient to say that on certain occasions the Police have been known to fabricate circumstances. It must be shown that in the present case there are at least indications that the Police put the incriminating articles into the house. The indications point the other way. When the key of the padlock to the almirah in the middle room was asked for had those of the appellants who were present been innocent, one would have expected them to say "How should we know where the key is? You have yourselves put the padlock on the almirah." They would have made similar remarks when the incriminating articles were taken out of the almirah. Instead of which we find that when the bomb was found, the appellant Rajendra Lahiri offered to remove the fuse and make the bomb harmless.

Further the nature of at least two of the articles makes it extremely improbable that the Police had any connection with them. The first is the bomb, which, as Dr. Robson has deposed, was in a sensitive condition. He describes the mixture of chemicals contained in the bomb as a dangerous mixture and says that there is considerable probability of Ammonium Chlorate being formed from such a mixture, which might lead to a premature explosion. It is not reasonably probable that, in order to gain promotion or reward, the Police would carry about on their persons such an extremely dangerous article as this bomb. The other item is the revolver. This weapon was unlicensed. Whenever that weapon might have been discovered by the Police, the person with whom it was found would have been prosecuted. The weapon, moreover, is an expensive one; and it is unreasonable to suggest that subordinate members of the Police establishment keep expensive weapons of this description by them for the purpose of "planting" them on persons whom they intend charging with possession of unlicensed arms.

The suggestion that the Police smuggled the incriminating articles into the house does not bear investigation.

In the same connection, the learned Vakils for the appellants have drawn attention to certain discrepancies in the evidence on the subject of the searching of the persons of the Police and of the search witnesses; they have characterised the search of the eastern room as illegal, because, according to Mr. Duckfield's evidence, the four men who were not ill were not present at that search; and they have asked us to disbelieve the evidence of the search on the ground that two of the search witnesses were not examined.

The witnesses agree in saying that the Police were searched, although there are discrepancies concerning the manner in which they were searched. Some say hands were not laid on their persons; others say that the clothes were felt; and one Police Officer says that his pockets were searched. Mr. Duckfield offered himself for search and asked the search witnesses to search his force before he entered the house. As regards the search witnesses, they were four in number. Makhan was well disposed towards the appellants; and there is no suggestion that he took anything into the house. The other two witnesses to the search must also have been free from suspicion, since complaint is made that those persons were not placed in the witness-box. The suggestion, therefore, is that the remaining search witness, Jugal, must have smuggled things into the house. This is nothing but a suggestion. Suspicion is sought to be cast on Jugal because he was brought by the Police from a distance of about half a mile from the place. This circumstance is not calculated to create any suspicion unless it can be shown that Jugal was in any way connected with the Police. There is absolutely nothing to show this. The place where the house stands is more or less a village, well away from the Barrackpur Trunk Road. The house at which the Police went to make the search was one near which it must be more or less difficult to secure persons to attend a search. It is not every one who is willing to be dragged into a Police case. Therefore, the mere fact that Jugal was found nearly half a mile away from the house, that was searched is no ground for suspicion. There is also nothing reasonable about the suggestion. As already stated, the articles found were bulky. There were a great many bottles of acid, glycerine and other chemicals; there was glass apparatus of various kinds; and a large number of small phials, packets containing different substances and papers, besides the bomb, the revolver, the pistol and the cartridges. It cannot be seriously suggested that Jugal Kishore could have smuggled any appreciable portion of this bulk. We are not told what clothes the man was wearing; and there is nothing to show that he wore any more clothing than Makhan, who says he had on nothing more than a dhoti and a chadar. There is no force whatever in the suggestion that anything was smuggled into the house.

Nothing turns on the other two objections made concerning the search. With regard to the absence of Ananta Hari, Rajendra, Debi Prosad and Rakhal, the four persons who were in good health, at the time of the search of the eastern room, Mr. Duckfield may or may not be mistaken; but assuming that he is right in saying that all the four persons were downstairs when that room was searched, their absence can make no difference to the case. Our attention has been drawn to the remarks of Mr. Justice Beachcroft in the case of Romesh Chandra Banerjee v. Emperor (2), where the learned Judge observes that in his opinion the spirit of s. 103 of the Code of Criminal Procedure requires that the person whose premises are searched shall be present and that he must be given the option of being present. This view of the meaning of the word "permitted" in sub-s. (3), s. 103 was not accepted by Mr. Justice Woodroffe, the other learned Judge who decided that case. We are not prepared to agree with the interpretation put on the word "permitted" by Mr. Justice Beachcroft.

As regards the failure of the prosecution to put the other two search witnesses into the witness-box, our attention has been drawn to the case of Munni Sonar v. Emperor (3) where it was laid down that every search witness should be put into the witness-box, unless the prosecution are of opinion that such persons would misrepresent facts and would misstate what had happened. With all the respect to the opinion of the learned Judges who decided that case, we must hold that no such duty is cast on the prosecution. Sub-section (2), s. 103 expressly lays down that "no person witnessing a search under this section shall be required to attend the Court as a witness of the search unless specially summoned by it." The reason of this provision is obvious. Many persons would be unwilling to attend searches if, as a matter of course, they had to attend Court at the trial of the case, possibly two Courts, if the case is committed to the Sessions. The discretion is, therefore, left to the Court to require or not the attendance of such witnesses. It does not even appear that the appellants moved the Commissioner to have those witnesses produced; and they certainly did not call them as witnesses for the defence, which it was open to them to do, and which they should have done, since they profess to have a high regard for the truthfulness of these persons. There is no substance in the grievance sought to be made out.

Be those things as they may, the important question is whether or not the incriminating articles were in the house when the Police went to search it. If this is so, as we must find it to be so, it would not matter in the least, whatever irregularities might have been committed in the conduct of the search.

The other important question in the case is the question of possession of the incriminating articles. At the trial, an attempt was made in cross examination to suggest that the chemicals and the chemical apparatus were the property of a medical practitioner who had previously lived in the house. This suggestion has not been seriously pressed before us; and it is entirely negatived by the evidence. It appears that the medical practitioner who had occupied the house was one Govinda Gopal Mukherjee, Debi's maternal uncle. He had lived in the house for about twelve months and had been in the service of a neighbouring mill. He was away at his work the greater part of the day and had no private practice. He kept no chemicals in his house and had no laboratory. These facts are deposed to by Debi's relations, who are witnesses in the case. One of them, Nabin Kali, Debi's aunt, states that after the house had been let to the young men she had cleaned out the almirah in the middle room and left it open.

As far as concerns the bomb, there can be no question about its manufacture within a few days of the date of the search. There is unimpeachable proof that it was manufactured after the 23rd of October, 1925, because the circular slips of paper found within it, serving as a covering to the explosive powder, have been proved conclusively to have been cut out of the Amrita Bazar Patrika of that date.

A cash memo was also found among the papers in the house, showing purchase of extra pure nitric acid of the gravity of 1.42 on the 3rd of November, 1925, and among the bottles of acid found in the almirah was one of such acid. The cash memo has been proved by the chemist who sold the acid. The purchaser had given the name of Asok Chandra Roy—Asok being one of the names that one of the appellants had assumed. The address given to the chemist by the purchaser was 70 Balaram Ghose Street, totally fictitious address.

There is no room for the suggestion that the incriminating articles had belonged to the medical practitioner who had occupied the house. Possession of these articles can only be attributed to the occupants of the house at the time of the search. The only question is whether any of the persons found in the house can claim the benefit of the doubt in regard to this matter.

All the circumstances of the case leave no room for doubt that the occupants of the house were members of a conspiracy with anarchical designs. The persons found in the house belonged to different places. Hari Narayan belonged to Chinsurah; Biren to Salika; Dhrubesh to Nandigram in the District of Hooghly; Nikhil to Joypur in the District of Jessore; Rakhal to Chittagong; Rajendra to Pabna; Ananta Hari to Krishnagar in the District of Nadia; Debi Prosad to Bally in the District of Howrah; and Shibaram to Bhowanipore, Calcutta. Some explanation is necessary for the presence of such persons in the same house, several of them admittedly living together. The absence of explanation, which would be forthcoming if the appellants were innocent, undoubtedly corroborates the case for the prosecution. These youngmen, moreover, were doing nothing; and, according to their own account of themselves, the majority of them had quarrelled with their relations. They have, none of them, even stated that they had been making efforts to find employment. Only Birendra has said that he had had it in his mind to re-join his appointment in the office of the E. I. Railway. The fact that these youngmen were living in a place which is admittedly a hotbed of malaria does not suggest that they chose the place for the sake of their health. If they had been living honestly, there was no occasion for the extreme secrecy observed by them—secrecy carried to the point of making their lives disgusting. As already stated, these youngmen actually used a rain water pipe leading from the roof of the house as a latrine, when they had a privy outside. It is idle to say that people who do such a thing as this can have any but nefarious ways. Their only object in doing anything so disgusting could be to escape observation from neighbours. The inmates of the house went under false names. We have nothing but the statements of the majority of them that for one reason or another they had fallen out with their relatives and guardians and that they did not wish to be traced by them. This story is not consistent with the story that Rajendra who is supposed to have become stranger to the bulk of the occupants of the house, was invited to visit the house as often as he could go, or that Ananta Hari, a person who is said to have had no sort of connection with the establishment, took Rakhal to live there as a matter of course. We have nothing but the word of the appellants about the reasons for their being where they were found, with all the incriminating articles. People living in the house were collecting materials for the manufacture of explosives, had in their possession directions for the preparation of explosives of various kinds and at least one live bomb and also unlicensed arms. That persons who were engaged in doing such things would have as their mess mates any but fellow conspirators is utterly inconceivable. It cannot be believed that any person could have been admitted within the house unless he was a safe person. Since the occupiers of the house would not even associate with neighbours in the street and were so careful about avoiding even being seen by their neighbours, it is utterly unlikely that they would admit people within the house, least of all have people to stay with them, unless such people were co-conspirators. Of the co-owners of the house Hari Sadhan Chatterjee, Satish Chandra Chatterjee and Nabin Kali, each was admitted upstairs once. On the occasion of their visits, they found the door of the house closed and had to knock for admittance. Satish visited the house in the first part of August, and Hari Sadhan visited it in the first week of September. They went there to collect the rent. Nabin Kali went to the house on four or five occasions. She used to go to the garden to collect Bel leaves for worship. She used to find even the door of the outer wall of the house fastened and had to shout for admittance. She went upstairs once. That was at the time of the Ananta Chaturdashi in the month of Bhadra (end of August). That was the occasion on which she cleaned out the almirah in the middle room. It does not appear that any of the co-owners of the house went there after the first week in September; and we find that Debi paid the rent to Hari Sadhan at the beginning of November. Whether or not chemicals for the manufacture of explosives had been introduced into the house before the end of the first week of September, it is impossible to say. There is one circumstance that seems to indicate that they had not, namely, that apparently the house was not occupied during the durga puja festivities, which occurred in that year between 24th and the 27th of September. Nabin Kali states that the boys told her they were going home for the puja and would lock up the house. During the puja festivities she noticed that the door of the house was padlocked. Three days after the puja she noticed that the door was still padlocked, and it seemed to her that there was no one in the house. The real activities of the conspirators seem to have started after the pujas. There is no definite evidence this. The only circumstances that seem to indicate this are the one stated above, the manufacture of the bomb subsequent to the 23rd of October, the apparent purchase of nitric acid on the 3rd of November, as evidenced by the voucher found in the house, and the increase in the number of the house.

Over and above the grave improbability that any persons other than fellow conspirators would have been admitted into the house when the conspirators had become active, there is the want of plausible explanation of the presence of the persons who were admitted there after the pujas, and there is the further fact that the prosecution has established a connection between the house at Dakshineswar and 4 Sova Bazar Street, the house that Ananta Hari Mitra used to frequent. That house also was searched on the 10th. of November, and amongst the things found there were a five-chambered revolver with cartridges, six large bottles of nitric acid and inflammatory literature. A bicycle was found at that house; and the bill for repairs done to that bicycle was found in the almirah in the middle room of the Dakshineswar house, and has been proved by owner of the shop where the repairs were done. The established connection with 4 Sova Bazar Street and the repeated appearance in the accounts found in the almirah of mysterious names, including the assumed names of some of the persons found in the Dakshineswar house, prove that the establishment at Dakshineswar was a branch of a larger organization; and this fact makes it all the more impossible to believe that the conspirators at work at Dakshineswar would admit within their house any but persons who were members of the conspiracy. As we have no means of discriminating between the cases of the various persons found in the house, and as the circumstances point to the conclusion that every person found in the house was a member of the conspiracy, absence of proof that a particular person was there innocently leads to the conclusion that no one's presence was innocent. The explanation offered on behalf of Rajendra is palpably false. The improbability of persons who kept themselves so very much concealed as the inmates of the house inviting people to go and visit them has already been noticed. But, apart from this, we have clear indications that Rajendra had been in the house for some time and had not, as he says, only gone there on the 8th of November. He stated that, because he knew he could have to stay with the sick persons for a day or two, he went away and fetched a cloth, a chadar and Bryce's Democracy. At the search of the house at Dakshineswar, various articles were found which he claimed as his own—shaving materials, a blanket, a Panjabi and other things. His admitted belongings were found in various parts of the house. Over and above this, we find that his Panjabi bore the arrow mark, which the dhobi, who had washed the clothing of the inmates of that house, had been putting on those clothes. The dhobi has also identified Rajendra as one of the persons whom he saw at the house when he went there in connection with the washing of clothes. The dhobi says he was not allowed to enter the house, and that the clothes used to be thrown to him from upstairs.

The only appellants besides Rajendra who claim to have been recent arrivals are Rakhai and Debi Prosad. The former, as already stated, had come from Chittagong. The fact that according to his own case he was introduced to the establishment by Ananta Hari Mitra, who was connected both with this establishment and the one at 4 Sova Bazar Street, makes it all the more necessary that he should prove his statements. There is nothing but his own uncorroborated statement to show that he was a recent arrival. But, even if he was a recent arrival, the inferences arising from the facts of the case have to be rebutted; and there is absolutely nothing to rebut them.

As regards Debi Prosad, it may be said that he was a co-owner of the house and had occasion to go there to collect rent. There really appears to have been no reason why he should have collected his share of the rent for himself as his uncle Hari Sadhan, and his cousin, Satish, who lived close by could have collected it. Both these men have said that there was no quarrel between them and Debi Prosad. They admit that they wished to have the family properties partitioned, and that Hari Sadhan had caused notice to be served on Debi to that effect through a Pleader. Nabin Kali states that Hari Sadhan had wished to apply the rent of the house towards repairs.

It is possible that if there was a difference of opinion between Debi and his uncle on that matter, Debi might have decided to realise his share of the rent for himself. If Debi had merely gone to the house to collect the rent once a month, some sort of doubt might have arisen in his favour; but it appears from the evidence of the neighbours that he was seen going to and from the house fairly frequently. The excuse for his staying in the house from the 8th of November onwards is anything but satisfactory. According to his own story there were already three persons in the house to look after five persons who were ill. The story that he was asked to stay and help would have been an improbable one even if the inmates of the house were not involved in a criminal conspiracy. As matters stand, his story is incredible. There is no excuse whatever for Debi's failing to produce witnesses to prove that he had come from his house at Bally, on the other side of the river, only two days before the search of the house. The fact that he is a co-owner of the house is not sufficient to rebut the conclusions to be drawn against him from the circumstances of the case. On the contrary, the fact that he was a co-owner tells against him. He could not help being aware of the filthy use to which the rain pipe was put; and, had he been innocent, he would have strongly objected to such misuse of the premises. As part owner of the house he would have sought an explanation of the extreme secrecy observed by the persons who were his tenants. He offers no explanation in regard to these matters; and his silence clearly indicates guilty knowledge. Having such knowledge it is incredible that he should have consented to stay in the house when asked to do so, unless he was himself a member of the conspiracy.

The appellants were all of them in possession of the explosive and the unlicensed arms and were members of the conspiracy to possess them. They have been rightly convicted.

As regards the sentence, the Commissioners have not stated why they classed Rajendra Lahiri with Hari Narayan and not with Birendra and the other three who were sentenced to rigorous imprisonment for five years. We have nothing before us to show who were the leaders of the conspiracy except the statements of the appellants themselves. Hari Narayan admits that he was the prime mover in the starting of the establishment at Dakshineswar; and he fully deserves the sentence passed upon him. As regards Rajendra there is no evidence to prove that he was a leader; and we do not find anything on the record to justify his being punished more severely than Birendra, Dhrubesh or Nikhil. The only thing that suggests itself is that the Commissioners have punished him more severely because he offered to take the fuse out of the bomb, but this in itself does not make his case more serious than that of Birendra and the others. His sentence is, therefore, reduced to that imposed upon those three persons, namely, rigorous imprisonment for five years under s. 4 (b) of the Explosive Substances Act and rigorous imprisonment for two years under s. 19 (f) of the Arms Act, the sentences to run concurrently.

Considering the nature of the conspiracy, the sentences passed on the other appellants do not seem to be severe.

The sentences passed in the present case on Dhrubesh and Rakhal shall run concurrently with the sentences passed on them in the Alipore Jail murder case.

In other respects except the above the appeals are dismissed.

Suhrawardy, J.—I fully agree with my learned brother in his decision on questions of law and in the observations on the evidence made by him in his lucid judgment. There is one matter on which I should like to lay some stress. When appearances are against the accused in a case, and the prosecution has established prima facie the existence of incriminating circumstances, it is the duty of the defence to rebut the presumption arising from them by some tangible evidence other than by mere criticism and suggestions or untested and uncorroborated statements from the dock. The idea that the defence is not bound to adduce any evidence is dangerous. In Jury trials the last word may have some value but in a trial before three experienced Judges the prosecution and the defence stand on the same footing. In this case there are matters that are within the special knowledge of the prisoners which if they want the Court to accept they must substantiate them by evidence. For instance, the prisoners alleged that some of them were students, gone to the house at Dakshineswar to prosecute their studies.

and that some others were either looking for work or making arrangements to start a business. These are matters which only the defence could prove and the absence of such proof lends strength to the case for the prosecution.

While I concur generally with my learned brother, I am unable to persuade myself that the evidence against the accused Debi Prosad Chatterjee is sufficient for conviction for possessing and conspiring to possess explosive articles which offences, my learned brother holds, have been proved against him. I am not sure that the facts proved against him are not at all consistent with his innocence though they also make it probable that he was one of the conspirators. To my mind, the most the evidence against him proves is that he was friendly with the inmates of the house and possibly was aware of their nefarious designs and practice. He may even have attempted to shield his friends from suspicion. But to convict him of possessing, manufacturing or conspiring to possess explosive articles within s. 5 of the Explosive Act something more need be proved than his occasional visits to the house or his statement about the inmates of the house to Satis, P. W. No. 22 which is not true. There is another fact which apparently tells against him but it is not enough to prove his possession of the articles found in the house. It is proved that he made a certain statement to Mr. Duckfield, Superintendent of Police, which he subsequently tore up. We do not know how far that statement incriminated him, and though it was of such a nature that it could not be legally proved, we cannot presume that it contained confession of the guilt of possessing the articles found. If such presumption can be made, it will frustrate the very object of the law which keeps out statements made to a Police Officer. Such a presumption may be more damaging than the statement itself. This incident, therefore, cannot be used as evidence against him. The very fact of his occasionally visiting the house proves that he was not in possession of the things inside the house. It is probable that his statement that he was in the house for two days previous to the raid to help nursing the people who were admittedly very ill is true for no article belonging to him was found in the house at the search. I am not convinced that temporary residence in a house containing explosive articles, even with the knowledge of their existence there, is possession within the meaning of s. 5 of the Explosives Act. Conspiracy to possess, I take it, connotes some act of possession or attempted possession. On all these grounds I hold that the evidence for the prosecution falls short of bringing home to the accused Debi Prosad Chatterjee the charges under which he has been convicted and, in my opinion, he should be given the benefit of doubt and acquitted.

As my learned brother has taken a different view let the case of the accused Debi Prosad Chatterjee be placed before the Chief Justice for proper orders under s. 429, Criminal Procedure Code.

Let copies of our judgments be given to Babu Mrityunjoy Chatterjee, the Vakil for the accused Debi Prosad Chatterjee.

Owing to the difference of opinion, Appeal No. 91 was heard by Mr. Justice Buckland who delivered the following judgment:

Buckland, J.—(January 18, 1927)—The appellant Debi Prosad Chatterjee has been convicted by the Commissioners appointed under sub ss. (1) and (2) of s. 4 of the Bengal Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1925, of offences under ss. 120-B of the Indian Penal Code, 4 (b) of the Explosive Substances Act and 19 (f) of the Indian Arms Act and sentenced to three years' rigorous imprisonment under s. 4 (b) of the Explosive Substances Act and to eighteen months' rigorous imprisonment under s. 19 (f) of the Indian Arms Act, the sentences to run concurrently. Nine persons in all of whom the present appellant was one were convicted. They all appealed. One of them was executed upon conviction in another case and the appeals of the others have been dismissed and the convictions and sentences have been affirmed except as regards Rajendra Nath Lahiri whose sentence has been reduced. But as regards Debi Prosad Chatterjee, owing to a difference of opinion between the learned Judges who heard the appeal, the matter has been referred to me under s. 429 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. In these circumstances, it is unnecessary that I should state all the facts at length. They are to be found fully stated in the judgment of the Commissioners and again in the judgment of my learned brother Mr. Justice Cammiade. The question is whether the evidence supports the conviction of the particular appellant. The test is, I think, as the learned Vakil who appears for him has put it, whether there is evidence upon the record of the Commissioners upon which the conviction and the sentence can be supported. The point depends upon whether the evidence as to the appellant's association with the other persons convicted shows that he was at Dakshineswar at the times stated for a legitimate purpose or that he was there for the purposes which the prosecution alleges. There is evidence referring to instances more or less isolated when he was seen at Dakshineswar. But, without going into all the evidence in detail, there is in addition a considerable body of evidence of some 5 or 6 witnesses which, if believed, in my opinion, establishes the case for the prosecution. We first of all have the evidence of Nabin Kali Debi who describes how the house was taken for these persons and how it was arranged by the present appellant. The matter is narrated at some length and Debi Prosad answered various questions by her as to whether the women-folk would come and so forth. The story is not, in my opinion, one which one would expect to hear, if it was a simple matter of Debi letting the house in which he had an interest to his friends for a legitimate purpose. The evidence is not very strong but there is indication that in letting the house there was something that he wished to conceal. This is carried further by the evidence of Satish Chunder Chatterjee, a cousin of this appellant. To him the appellant made disingenuous statements, for, he said that he had got tenants for the house and that they were boys who messed together, that they were cousins and two of them had business and the others were students. He said that they were five—three brothers and two cousins, and they were acquaintances of his. On that evidence, I should say, he was endeavouring to keep Satish Chunder Chatterjee in the dark and to make it appear that there was nothing which would give rise to any suspicion on the part of his relatives as to the persons to whom he was letting the house and at the same time endeavouring to conceal their identity; for his case is that he did not know all these persons and that they were not all his acquaintances before he let the house in August. Then, when we come to the time when the house was occupied by these persons, we find that there is evidence by the witness Narendra Nath Chatterjee who lived at Dakshineswar that he saw young men washing their faces in the tank and among them was the appellant whom he saw entering and leaving the house but never going to the houses of the neighbours. Then, we have the evidence of Sumira; Mahato Koiri who says that he saw Debi Prosad taking his bath in the tank in front of the house which was afterwards searched. These facts show that Debi Prosad must have been on terms of some degree of intimacy with the occupants of the house; and the frequency with which he went there appears from the evidence of Suresh Chunder Chatterjee who said that he had seen Debi Prosad passing his house with other boys, that Debi Prosad had been seen there about two or three times a month and that the occupants of the house did not associate with the neighbours. If this evidence is believed, it is quite clear that the appellant was not frequenting the house at Dakshineswar for any of the purposes for which it is contended his object was in going there. It is suggested that he visited a sister living at Dakshineswar. There is no evidence that he went to her house and, even if he did so, it is quite consistent with the evidence to which I have referred. A stronger argument has been based upon the fact that he was a co-sharer in the premises and went there to collect rent. But it is obvious that the evidence, if it is believed, proves that he went there or in excess of what would be expected of a co-sharer landlord who simply went to collect rent. As regards the collection of rent, the evidence is that until the month of November various other parties who were interested—and not only the appellant—went to collect rent. The point, in my opinion, does not bear close investigation having regard to the rest of the evidence. It is further suggested that he simply went to see his former acquaintance; but there is also evidence showing that he was seen about with persons other than the one with whom, he says, he was formerly acquainted. He endeavours to account for his presence on the day of the search—10th of November and two days earlier by stating that some of the inmates of the home were ill and he was asked to stay and help to watch them. That statement might possibly have been accepted had there been no such evidence against him; for, it ap-appears that some of the inmates of the house were actually ill and it is conceivably possible that the appellant having gone there on the 8th of November to collect rent was asked to stay and watch the sick and in his kindness of purpose did so. But it is difficult to believe that that wholly explains his staying there in the face of the other evidence as regards his association with these persons. If the evidence to which I have referred be believed, there can be no question as to the guilt of the appellant. In my judgment, no sufficient reasons have been advanced for showing that the view taken by the Commissioners who tried the case was wrong or that I should take a different view of the evidence on appeal. In my judgment, the appeal must be dismissed and the conviction and sentence must be affirmed.

CRIMINAL APPEAL No. 374 OF 1927.

October 4, 1927.

Present:—Mr. Justice Madhavan Nair and Mr. Justice Cornish.

THE PUBLIC PROSECUTOR

—APPELLANT

*versusBUDIPITI DEVASIKAMANI—*ACCUSED.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), s. 84—Plea of insanity—Burden of proof—Criminal intent—Question of fact—Presumption from knowledge—Inveterate ganja-smoker, setting fire to school—Criminal intent, proof of.

The onus of proving the defence of insanity afforded by s. 84 of the Penal Code rests upon the accused. [p. 560, col. 1.]

Though ordinarily intention is to be inferred from knowledge, there may be cases where intent must be found as a fact and cannot be assumed. It is a question of fact in each case whether having regard to the mental condition of the prisoner, the general inference of intention from knowledge can reasonably be drawn. [p. 560, col. 2.]

An inveterate ganja smoker set fire to the thatched building of a school, by taking a torch from a kitchen and putting it to the thatch, and after throwing the torch on the roof of the kitchen ran away. It was found that as a result of the vicious habit of ganja smoking he was in the habit of beating his wife and children and refusing to take food, but the Medical Officer pronounced that the case was not one of insanity. It also appeared that the accused who was a teacher in the school had some ground for annoyance in connection with his service:

Held, (1) that the facts of the case were not strong enough to give him exemption from the criminality of his conduct under s. 84 of the Penal Code; [p. 560, col. 1.]

(2) that the requisite criminal intent could be presumed from his knowledge that his act was wrongful. [p. 560, col. 2.]

Appeal under s. 417 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, against the acquittal of the aforesaid accused by the Agency Sessions Judge, East Godavari, in Sessions Case No. 5 of 1927 on his file.

Mr. K. S. Vadarachari, for the Accused.

JUDGMENT.—The accused in this case was charged before the learned Agency Sessions Judge, East Godavari, that he, on the 19th of June, 1926, committed mischief by setting fire to the thatched building of the Board Elementary School at Gurtedu, with intent to destroy the same, an offence punishable under s. 436 of the Indian Penal Code. The prosecution case is that the accused took a torch from the kitchen, ran to the building, put it to the thatch and then threw it on the roof of the kitchen and ran away. The thatch caught fire and the school building was completely destroyed. The learned Sessions Judge found that the accused set fire to the school building but acquitted him on the ground that he was insane at the time when he did it and was, therefore, incapable of forming the intention or of having the knowledge which forms an essential ingredient of the offence. Against this acquittal the Crown has presented this appeal.

The accused is a smoker of ganja. There is evidence to show that, as a result of this vicious habit he used to threaten to beat his father and children, and used to beat his wife and run away into the forest; he would not take his food properly and when he was given it he would throw it away. The evidence also shows that he used to tear his clothes and wander about in the forest. He was kept under observation in the Central Jail at Rajahmundry for a fortnight. The Medical Officer who examined him found no reason to pronounce him insane at that time.

The learned Public Prosecutor contends that the plea of insanity is not borne out by these facts, that at the most the evidence would only show that the accused used to get voluntarily intoxicated by smoking ganja off and on and that voluntary intoxication is no defence to a criminal act.

The learned Vakil for the accused argues, that the evidence is to the effect that ganja smoking has induced in the accused incapacity city to understand the quality or nature of his wrongful act, and has produced in him a condition akin to that of delirium tremens in the case of a drunken man and that, even if this is not the case, under s. 86 of the Indian Penal Code the accused can rely upon voluntary intoxication in defence when he is charged as in this case with an offence of which 'intent' is a necessary ingredient.

The onus of proving the defence afforded by s. 84 of the Indian Penal Code clearly rests upon the accused [See Queen-Empress v. Irappa (1)]. As regards the first contention, we have no doubts that the evidence does not warrant a finding that the accused's habit of smoking ganja had induced in him a diseased state of mind so as to make him incapable of understanding the wrongfulness of his act. The Civil Surgeon found 'no cause to pronounce him insane'; but according to his evidence the accused looked 'more sad than insane.' Though smoking ganja might account for the queer things which the accused used to do, we do not think that the facts in this case, viewed in the light of well known judicial decisions such as Queen-Empress v. Venkatasami (2), Queen-Empress v. Lakshman Dagdu (3) and Queen-Empress v. Saktharam (4), are strong enough to give him exemption from the criminality of his conduct under s. 84 of the Indian Penal Code. The fact that he ran away after putting the torch to the thatch shows that at the time he committed the offence he was conscious that what he was doing was wrongful.

As regards the second contention, the wording of s. 86 of the Indian Penal Code lends some support to the argument advanced before us. That section lays down that, in certain classes of cases, the intoxicated person shall be liable to be dealt with as if he had the same knowledge as he would have had if he had not been intoxicated; but it does not provide that an intoxicated person shall be dealt with as if he had the same intent. The second part of the section speaks of knowledge only and omits any reference to intent. Whether this omission is intentional or not, as pointed out by Mr. Mayne, it may be due to the fact that in the majority of cases the question of intention is merely the question of knowledge. If the accused knew what the natural consequences of his act were, ordinarily he must be deemed to have intended to cause them [See In re Mandru Gadaba (5) per Ayling, J.]. Though ordinarily intention is to be inferred from knowledge, there may be cases where intent must be found as a fact and cannot be assumed, in which cases voluntary drunkenness may be relied on to show that the required 'intent' is absent. In England it will be a question in such cases for the Jury to decide whether having regard to the mental condition of the prisoner, the general inference of intention from knowledge can reasonably be drawn. This we think is the utmost that could be said in favour of this contention. Even according to this restricted interpretation, in this case, the evidence makes it clear that, in spite of the ganja smoking the accused had the requisite criminal intent, because as soon as he put the torch to the thatch he ran away. He knew that the act he was doing was a wrongful one and from this knowledge we can assume that he must have had the criminal 'intent' requisite for the offence. Further, the evidence shows that the accused himself was a school master in the same school for about a year and that, when his father who had retired from the school found that his son was behaving badly, he (the father) made a report asking for his son six months' leave. The accused must have apprehended that the result of the report would be the termination of his connection with the school and, therefore, he must have deliberately set fire to the building to show his annoyance.

In view of the evidence, the gist of which we have set forth above, we do not think that the plea of insanity has been established in this case.

We must, therefore, set aside the acquittal of the accused and convict him of the offence under s. 436 of the Indian Penal Code with which he was charged and sentence him to undergo one year's rigorous imprisonment. We order accordingly

APPLICANTS—RESPONDENTS.

Bengal Tenancy Act (VIII of 1885), s. 173 (3)—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 47—Rent sale set aside—Auction-purchaser, appeal by, whether competent.

No appeal lies at the instance of an auction-purchaser whose sale has been set aside under s. 173, cl. (3) of the Bengal Tenancy Act. [p. 563, col. 1.]

[Case-law referred to.]

No appeal is allowed against an order under s. 173, cl. (3), Bengal Tenancy Act, by any provision of the Act itself and this section is not included in the list of orders made appealable as such by the Code of Civil Procedure. The only way in which an order under s. 173, cl. (3), Bengal Tenancy Act, may be regarded as an appealable one is by treating it as one made under s. 47 of the Civil Procedure Code and thus satisfying the definition of a "decree" under that Code and being thus appealable as such. [p. 562, col. 1.]

Appeal against an order of the District Judge, Dinajpur, dated the 17th March, 1925, reversing that of the Subordinate Judge of that District, dated the 21st June, 1924.

Mr. J. N. Roy and Babu Bansori Lal Sarkar, for the Appellants.

Messrs. S. C. Maity and M. A. Quasem, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.Mukerji, J.—This appeal arises out of certain proceedings taken at the instance of some of the judgment-debtors to set aside a rent sale. The Subordinate Judge refused to set aside the sale. The District Judge, on appeal, set it aside. The auction-purchasers have preferred this appeal.

The application to set aside the sale was under O. XXI, r. 90, Civil Procedure Code, as well as under s. 173, cl. (3), Bengal Tenancy Act. Under O. XXI, r. 90, Civil Procedure Code, it was alleged that the sale-processes were not duly served, and that there was material irregularity in publishing and conducting the sale and that substantial injury in the shape of gross inadequacy of price resulted therefrom. As resting on s. 173, cl. (3), Bengal Tenancy Act, it was alleged that one of the judgment-debtors Taher Mahmud Mandal, in collusion with the decree-holders, managed to purchase the properties in the benami of his daughters.

The sale was held on the 5th October, 1923. The present application was originally filed on the date the Courts re-opened after the Dusserah Vacation and so within time. When so filed the auction-purchasers were not made parties therein. On the 12th January, 1924, the auction-purchasers were added as parties.

The Subordinate Judge held that the application must be treated as having been filed beyond time. He held that the sale-processes were not proved to have been served, but that there was no reliable evidence to prove that the property was under-sold. He held further that the evidence fell far short of proving that the purchase was made by Taher Mahmud in the benami of his daughters, though there were reasons to suspect that it was the case of a benami purchase.

The District Judge, on appeal, reversed the decision of the Subordinate Judge by an order which is not very remarkable for its lucidity. He found that Taher Mahmud had made the purchase in the names of his daughters. He held that there was material irregularity and that the price fetched was inadequate. The question of limitation he appears to have left undecided. He expressed himself somewhat loosely on this question—confusing an appeal with an application under O. XXI, r. 90, Civil Procedure Code—in these words: "As regards the appeal under O. XXI, r. 90 the auction-purchasers were not made parties till after the 30 days' time allowed by the Limitation Act. The petitioners themselves alleged that they were necessary parties and it is difficult, therefore, to accept this contention that O. XXI, r. 90 merely demands that the auction-purchasers should have notice before the orders are passed, without making them parties, but it appears to be a perfectly possible interpretation of O. XXI, r. 92. If correct, the appeal is not time-barred."

The respondents have urged that no second appeal lies in this matter. The appellants seek to justify the appeal firstly on the ground that fraud was alleged by the judgment-debtors in their application for setting aside the sale and that, therefore, the question that was decided by the Subordinate Judge and the District Judge fell within s. 47 of the Code. This justification is not possible as, though a general allegation of fraud was made in the petition, the evidence that was adduced and the order that the Subordinate Judge passed dealt only with fraud in publishing or conducting the sale within the meaning of O. XII, r. 90, Civil Procedure Code—for which only one appeal is allowed by the law. It is next urged on behalf of appellants that the question raised under s. 173, cl. (3), Bengal Tenancy Act, involves a question under s. 47 of the Code and that, therefore, a second appeal is competent.

The authorities bearing upon this question are not quite uniform. It should be observed at the outset that no appeal is allowed against an order under s. 173, cl. (3), Bengal Tenancy Act, by any provision of the Act itself and this section is not included in the list of orders made appealable as such by the Code of Civil Procedure. The only way in which an order under s. 173, cl. (3), Bengal Tenancy Act, may be regarded as an appealable one is by treating it as one made under s. 47 of the Civil Procedure Code and thus satisfying the definition of a "decree" under that Code and being thus appealable as such. Mookerjee, J., discussed this question very fully in the case of Joytara v. Ram Krishna Seal (1) and observed thus:—"Our attention was invited to a number of judicial decisions which are, perhaps, not easy to reconcile. A detailed examination of these cases is unnecessary, as, in our opinion, an inflexible rule cannot be formulated that an order under s. 173 is or is not appealable as a decree. The test to be applied in the circumstances of each case is, what is the true nature of the question raised, and who are the parties between whom it arises. The answer must depend largely upon the position of the applicant and the title he claims. We may observe, however, that there are expressions used in some of the cases in the books which may be open to criticism." The tests which the learned Judge laid down in that case were two, viz.: (1) whether the question raised in the application under s. 173 is one between the parties to the suit in which the decree was passed or their representatives, and (2) whether the question relates to the execution of the decree. The second test is obviously satisfied as, if the objection prevails, the sale must be reversed and the decree-holder must proceed to execute the decree again for its satisfaction. The first test is also satisfied because if the question arises between the parties to the suit or their representatives, and relates to the execution, discharge or satisfaction of the decree within the meaning of s. 47 of the Code, it does not cease to be a question within that section merely because the auction-purchaser, who was not a party to the suit, is a party to these proceedings. Judged by these two tests alone, the order appealed from would fall within s. 47 of the Code and the appeal before us would be competent. Were the question res integra I should have felt great difficulty in holding that the appeal before us is not maintainable.

But the authorities, which I have already said are not uniform, that have clustered round this point, have laid down certain restrictions in the matter of appeals that may be preferred from an order passed under s. 173, cl. (3), of the Bengal Tenancy Act. The cases of Raghu Singh v. Misri Singh (2), Chand Monee Dasya v. Santo Monee Dasya (3), Harabhandhu Adhikari v. Harish Chandra Dey Pal (4), Hira Lal Ghose v. Chundra Kanto Ghose (5), Amir Rai v. Basdeo Singh (6), Sriram Chandra Sen v. Guru Das Kundu (7) and Mohima Chandra Neogy v. Jogendro Kumar Ghosh (8) have been discussed in the judgment of Mookerjee, J., in Joytara v. Ram Krishna Seal (1). Of these the more important ones and bearing directly upon the case before us are Chand Monee Dasya v. Santo Monee Dasya (3), Sriram Chandra Sen v. Guru Das Kundu (7), Mohima Chandra Neogy v. Jogendro Kumar Ghosh (8) and Hira Lal Ghose v. Chundra Kanto Ghose (5). In the first of these cases the application was made by one of the judgment-debtors and the heirs of a deceased judgment-debtor on the allegation that a third judgment-debtor had purchased the property in the name of his wife; it was held that from an order setting aside the sale under s. 173, Bengal Tenancy Act no appeal lay at the instance of the auction-purchaser. In the second case the application was by the judgment-debtors and the appeal also was by them; it was held that the appeal lay on behalf of the judgment-debtors, though it would not lie on behalf of a third party. In the third case, the application was by a judgment-debtor and it was held that when there was an order under s. 173, Bengal Tenancy Act, an appeal would not lie at the instance of the auction-purchaser. In the fourth case it was pointed out that the question of a right to a second appeal does not turn upon who may happen to be the appellant, but upon whether or not the case is one within s. 244 of the Code. This last mentioned principle has evidently been ignored so far as the present question is concerned in the first three cases. There are other cases of this Court in which an appeal at the instance of the auction-purchaser has been held to be incompetent, e. g., Durlav Pradhaina v. Mahomed Mainuddi Bepari (9) and Jadab Chandra Mukherjee v. Joy Gopal Bhattacharya (10) in the latter of which cases Cox, J., on a review of the authorities said that the matter is no longer res integra, but the point must now be regarded as settled.

Whatever may be my own opinion on the propriety or correctness of the proposition that no appeal would lie at the instance of the auction-purchaser I feel bound to follow the long series of decisions to which I have referred and following them I must hold that the appeal before us is not maintainable. The appeal accordingly is dismissed.

We have been then asked to deal with the order of the District Judge in revision. The ground on which we are asked to do so is that his decision on the question of limitation is wrong. My own view of this question I have had occasion to express in Civil Rule No. 1048 of 1926 which I decided on the 26th January, 1927, but assuming that I am not right in the view that I entertain, I am not prepared, upon the findings of fact which the learned Judge has recorded, to interfere with his decision merely because he may have taken an erroneous view of law on the question of limitation. This application accordingly must be rejected.

As regards the appeal, in view of the unsatisfactory character of the order appealed from each party will bear its own costs.

Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act (VI of 1908), s. 208—Sale under rent-decree—Rights of purchaser—Usufructuary mortgage and lease to mortgagor—Decree for rent—Execution sale—Equity of redemption, whether passes to purchaser.

A sale under s. 208 of the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act can only pass the interest of the judgment-debtor in the tenancy in respect of which the rent decree is passed. [p. 564, col. 2.]

A executed a usufructuary mortgage to B and on the same date executed a kabuliyat to B for a period of five years in respect of the property covered by the mortgage. A did not pay the rent fixed in the kabuliyat. B sued for the rent and purchased in execution of his decree the right of A to remain in khas possession of the land. A sold his rights subsequently to C who sued for redemption. B contended that he had acquired the equity of redemption by his purchase:

Held, that what was sold and intended to be sold in execution of the decree for rent obtained by B was only A's right to remain in possession for the remaining period of the term under the kabuliyat, and that C was entitled to redeem B. [p. 561, col. 1.]

Appeal from a decision of the District Judge, Manbhum-Sambalpur, dated the 21st March, 1925, confirming that of the Subordinate Judge, Purulia, dated the 8th July, 1924.

JUDGMENT.

Kulwant Sahay, J.—This is an appeal by the defendant No. 1 and it arises under the following circumstances. The defendants Nos. 3 to 7 executed a usufructuary mortgage in favour of defendant No. 1 on the 26th January, 1914, for a sum of Rs. 500. On the same date the defendant No. 1 took a kabuliyat from the defendants Nos. 3 to 7 in respect of the property covered by the mortgage-bond for a period of five years on the promise that the defendants Nos. 3 to 7 would pay him 45 maunds of paddy per year. The result was that although the defendant No. 1 took the usufructuary mortgage of the property in dispute, he did not obtain actual possession thereof; but the mortgagors continued in possession under the kabuliyat executed on the same date as the mortgage. The defendants, however, did not pay the rent fixed under the kabuliyat and the defendant No. 1 had to bring a suit against the defendants Nos. 3 to 7 for realisation of the rent. This suit was instituted sometime in 1915 and a rent decree was passed and in execution of the decree the interest of the defendants Nos. 3 to 7 was sold and purchased by the defendant No. 1 on the 13th November, 1915, and the defendant No. 1 obtained possession in December, 1915.

The important question to be decided in the present appeal is as to what was the interest which was sold in execution of this decree. Subsequently the defendants Nos. 3 to 7 instituted a suit against the defendant No. 1 to set aside the mortgage on the ground that the property mortgaged was the right of a raiya in a holding and that such a mortgage was invalid under the provisions of the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act. This suit was dismissed on the ground that the property mortgaged was not a raiya holding but a tenure. The defendants Nos. 3 to 7 then sold their equity of redemption to the present plaintiff who instituted the present suit for redemption of the mortgage of the 26th January, 1914.

The defence of the defendant No. 1 was that the equity of redemption had already been sold in execution of the decree obtained by him in 1915 and that the plaintiff's purchase of the equity of redemption did not pass any interest to him as nothing was left to the defendant No. 3 after the sale of November 1915.

Both the Courts below have held that what was sold was the right of the defendants Nos. 3 to 7 to remain in possession under the kabuliyat of the 26th January, 1914, and the equity of redemption was not sold in execution of the decree obtained by the defendant No. 1.

The plaintiff's suit for redemption was, therefore, decreed.

In this second appeal on behalf of the defendant No. 1 it is contended that the relationship created by the kabuliyat was not that of a landlord and tenant but the relationship between the parties was that of a mortgagor and mortgagee and that the decree obtained by the defendant No. 1 was not a rent decree and what was sold was not a raiya interest which the defendants Nos. 3 to 7 never had, but, what was actually sold was the equity of redemption which the defendants Nos. 3 to 7 had under the mortgage of 26th January, 1914. It is, therefore, contended that what was purchased by the defendant No. 1 was the equity of redemption. It is conceded that the sale, if it was a sale of the equity of redemption, was irregular. It was a voidable sale and it is contended that the remedy of the plaintiff or his predecessor-in-title was to bring a suit to set aside the sale and that such a suit was barred, and, therefore, the present suit is also barred. Now, in order to decide whether the suit is barred by limitation, the question to be decided is as to what was sold in November, 1915. The best evidence as regards the nature of the title which was acquired by the defendant No. 1 by virtue of his purchase of November 1915 is the sale certificate. The sale certificate describes the property as "the right to possess khas." It is contended that this was not a raiya interest; but the right which the defendants Nos. 3 to 7 had was to redeem the mortgage. I am of opinion that such a construction cannot be placed upon the sale certificate. The sale purported to be effected in execution of a rent decree under the provisions of s. 208 of the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act and a sale under s. 208 of the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act can only pass the interest of the judgment-debtor in the tenancy in respect of which the rent decree was passed. It may be that the position of the defendants Nos. 3 to 7 was not that of an under-tenure-holder or an under-raiya under the defendant No. 1; but as between the defendant No. 1 and the defendants Nos. 3 to 7 the relationship, which the defendant No. 1 himself asserted did exist, was that of landlord and tenant and he purported to bring a suit for rent in the Revenue Court under the rent law and purported to sell the interest of the defendants Nos. 3 to 7 as tenants under him. The sale certificate goes to show that what was sold was the right of the defendants Nos. 3 to 7 to remain in possession of the land. This evidently referred to the right which the defendants Nos. 3 to 7 acquired under the kabuliyat of the 26th January, 1914. The defendant No. 1 never purported to sell the equity of redemption and he did not by his purchase acquire the equity of redemption. What he acquired was the right to remain in possession for the remaining period of the term under the kabuliyat of the 26th January, 1914. This is the finding of both the Courts below, and in my opinion this is the correct finding. Having regard to this finding it is not necessary to discuss the cases referred to by the learned Advocate for the appellant as those are cases in which it was the equity of redemption which the decree-holder purported to sell, and the question arose as to whether the relationship between the parties was that of a mortgagor and mortgagee or that of a landlord and tenant. In the present case the equity of redemption was not intended to be sold and was not, as a matter of fact, sold.

The appeal is dismissed with costs.

ORDER.—This is an application under s. 19 of the Indian Arbitration Act, IX of 1899, to stay proceedings in Suit No. 523 of 1926 on the file of the Court of Small Causes, Karachi.

It appears that the applicant and the opponent entered into certain forward contracts for the purchase and sale of wheat, cotton, etc. These contracts were negotiated by a broker and signed in foil by the opponent and in counter-foil by the broker, the counter-foil being delivered to the opponent and the foil being retained by the broker to be handed over to the principal.

The several headings in the contract note in foil and in counter foil are printed in English; but the details are written up in Sindhi in the Bania Sindhi characters. There is a clause printed at the end of the contract note to the following effect.

“Subject to the terms of our printed agreement which you have read and accepted. Even if you have not signed the agreement you shall be bound by the terms.”

It appears that differences arose between the applicant and the opponent on the account on the several contracts entered into between them, each party claiming that the other was indebted to him. The applicant claimed that a sum of Rs. 150-11-0 was due to him and on the 23rd July, 1926, gave a notice to the opponent demanding payment of the money within 24 hours failing which, a suit would be filed against him. The opponent replied in his letter dated the 28th July, 1926, that a considerable amount on the contrary was due to him from the applicant and if the applicant failed to pay within 48 hours a suit would be filed against him. Accordingly the present suit was filed by the opponent to recover a sum of Rs. 376-10-3 from the applicant in the Small Causes Court on 13th September, 1926.

Summons was served upon the applicant to appear and answer on the 10th January, 1927. On that day it appears from the diary of the case that the applicant appeared in the Small Causes Court by Mr. Manghanmal, Pleader, who intimated that he wished to apply for stay. The case was accordingly adjourned to the 26th January, 1927. On that day and on a later adjourned date of hearing the case could not be reached. Meanwhile, on the 2nd February, 1927, the applicant filed in this Court the present application for stay under s. 19 of the Indian Arbitration Act on the ground that the contracts were entered into subject to a submission clause and that the matter should, therefore, be referred to arbitration.

The application has been vigorously opposed by Mr. Shahani on three grounds. In the first place, he contended that there was no valid and subsisting submission clause appearing in the agreement form and if there was one the opponent was never made aware of it. Mr. Shahani argued that the submission clause forms part of a printed agreement to which no doubt, a reference is made in the English portion of the contract note which opponent has signed, but as he is ignorant of English, neither the knowledge of the proviso written in English in the contract note nor of the submission clause embodied in the printed agreement to which the proviso makes reference can be imputed to the opponent.

Whatever may have been in the mind of one of the contracting parties the other party was not made aware of it. There was no consensus ad idem in the mind of both the contracting parties and hence Mr. Shahani argues there was no binding submission clause by which the opponent can be held to be bound.

In support of his contention Mr. Shahani cited a number of rulings from the English Courts of which I need only mention Henderson v. Stevenson (1) and Richardson v. Rowntree (2). I venture to think that those cases are clearly distinguishable. It is not a case here of a note made in very small print in a corner of a passenger's ticket which could only be seen when the ticket is unfolded. The reference to the printed agreement is in the most prominent part of the contract note. It is no answer to say that as the opponent was ignorant of the English language and as the details of the contract filed in Sindhi in the Hindu Sindhi characters formed a complete contract by themselves he remained in ignorance of the terms printed in English. Mr. Kodumal on behalf of the applicant relies upon the circumstance that in another similar contract with a different principal the matter was referred to arbitration as disproving the allegation of the opponent that he remained in complete ignorance about the submission clause. No doubt the fact, that this was one of a series of similar contracts which the opponent has negotiated with several brokers on terms well known to the bazaar would throw strong suspicion on the air of innocence about the submission clause which the opponent assumes, but supposing that he did remain ignorant it was through his own fault. By the fact that he affixed his signature to a document written in English of which the clause now disputed was an important clause obviously he was put up on his enquiry as to the meaning of the printed matter. And if he did not take steps to ascertain the meaning he cannot claim to be exempt from liability he incurred through his own negligence.

The next point taken by Mr. Shahani was that the applicant is not entitled to a stay under s. 19 of the Indian Arbitration Act because at the time when the proceedings were commenced he was not ready and willing to do all things necessary to the proper conduct of the arbitration. This argument is based upon the fact that in the notices given by the applicant to the opponent on 23rd July, 1926, the demand for payment within 24 hours is accompanied by a threat that failing payment a suit will be filed against you. Mr. Shahani argued that a threat to take the opponent to the Law Courts was an implied refusal to have the matter settled by arbitration.

(2) (1894) A. C. 217; 63 L. J. Q. B. 283; 6 R. 95; 70 L. T. 817; 58 J. P. 493; 7 Asp. M. C. 482.

In my opinion there are two fallacies underlying this argument. A threat to file a suit does not necessarily mean that the party giving the threat is unwilling to have the matter referred to arbitration. A threat to resort to a Civil Court might have some effect upon the debtor to compel payment. But an intimation that the matter will be referred to arbitration would have no such effect. What the applicant evidently intended to do was to hold out a threat which might induce the opponent to comply with his demand.

He did not thereby indicate any unwillingness to submit to arbitration. In the second place there is nothing to show that the applicant was not ready and willing to have the matter referred to arbitration at the time the proceedings commenced. In the case of Anglo Persian Oil Co. Ltd. v. Panchapakesa Ayyar (3) Schwabe, C. J., states the law as follows:

"The law provides that if there is a submission for a reference to arbitration, and a party chooses to bring his suit, the other party can then decide whether or not he will remain before the Court which he indicates by taking some step in the action, or whether he will avail himself of his contractual rights to have the dispute referred to arbitration."

If this is the correct statement of the law there is no doubt that the time with reference to which the readiness and willingness of the applicant to refer to arbitration is to be determined is the time when the opponent brought the suit and the applicant was called upon to appear and answer. So that even if the earlier threat of the applicant may be adversely construed against him as Mr. Shahani asks me to do, he had under this ruling a locus poenitentiae till the time came for him to appear and answer the summons in the suit brought against him by the opponent. I think, therefore, that there is no substance in the second contention urged by Mr. Shahani.

(3) 76 Ind. Cas. 1011; 47 M. 164; (1923) M. W. N. 772; 18 L. W. 732; 45 M. L. J. 653; A. I. R. 1924 Mad. 336; 33 M. L. T. 103.

Lastly, Mr. Shahani argued that this application for stay does not lie because the applicant had after his appearance in the Small Cause Court in answer to the summons taken some step in the proceedings, the step being that he applied for an adjournment to enable him to file this application for stay. Mr. Shahani relied upon the ruling of Pratt, J. C., in Fleming Shaw & Co. v. Haji Yusif Ellias (4) where he distinctly laid down that an application made to the Court for postponement of the hearing of the suit is a step in the proceedings within the meaning of s. 19 of the Indian Arbitration Act irrespective of the intention with which the application is made. Whether the applicant wishes to have further time to file a written statement or to raise as a bar to the suit the agreement to refer to arbitration, in either event his application is an application to invite the Court to do something which would enable him to establish his defence. The learned Judicial Commissioner based his decision on the summary of the law on the subject as stated in Halsbury's Laws of England Vol. I para 956 which is to the following effect:

"A party who makes any application whatsoever to the Court even though it be merely an application for time, takes a step in the proceedings."

Mr. Kodumal argued that the law thus broadly laid down has been doubted in more recent decisions and referred to the general sense of the bar. He was, however, unable to cite any authority or any ruling of a Bench of this Court or of a Single Judge where this statement of the law has either been doubted or dissented from. The bar when appealed to did not assent to the view propounded by Mr. Kodumal and I do not think that there is any reason to doubt that the law as laid down by Pratt, J. C., in the ruling above cited is a sound law.

There is, however, a very important distinction between the facts of this case and the facts in Fleming Shaw & Co. v. Haji Yusif Ellias (4). In that case the Pleader for the applicant had appeared in the Small Causes Court and applied for a postponement on the ground that the documents relating to the suit had to be discovered and that time allowed had been too short to permit of this being done.

(4) 40 Ind. Cas. 81; 10 S. L. R. 190.

The Pleader, therefore, made an application to the Court asking for an adjournment with a view to study the documents; thereby impliedly admitting that he submitted to the jurisdiction of the Court. As was said by Page, J., in Bhowanidas Ramgobind v. Panachand Luchmipat (5):

"Any act in the nature of an application to the Court which indicates that a party is willing that the suit should proceed, in my opinion, would be a step in the proceedings within s. 19 of the Indian Arbitration Act. The intention of the party is to be gathered from the nature of the application which is made, and if, having regard to the form of the application, the Court is of opinion that a step has been taken it will so hold, notwithstanding that the party may in truth and in fact have no such intention, or that the application is coupled with a protest that the party desires that the matters in dispute should be referred to arbitration."

In the present case, however, as would appear from the diary there was no application for an adjournment of any kind. There was merely an intimation by the Pleader to the Court that an application for stay will be made to this Court. Far from submitting for a moment to the jurisdiction of the Court, the Pleader for the applicant at the very first opportunity intimated his desire to disown that jurisdiction. I do not think that by any straining of language an intimation given to this effect can be construed to be a step taken in the suit or proceedings. It would be far more correct to describe it as a step in bar of the suit or the proceedings.

For these reasons I am of opinion that there is no substance in any of the contentions argued with very great ingenuity by Mr. Shahani on behalf of the opponent.

The application is accordingly granted with costs.

The provisions of O. XXI, r. 89, Civil Procedure Code, are to be strictly complied with, being of the nature of an exceptional concession allowed to the judgment-debtor, and an auction-sale cannot be set aside under the section unless the necessary amount is deposited within thirty days from the date of the sale.

If a Court accepts a deposit and sets aside a sale, even though the applicant did not conform strictly to the provisions of O. XXI, r. 89, it exercises a jurisdiction which is not vested in it by law and its order is liable to be set aside in revision under s. 115 of the Civil Procedure Code.

Mr. M. R. Bobde, for the Applicant.

Mr. D. R. Buxy, for the Respondents.

ORDER.—The facts of this case are sufficiently clear from the lower Courts' orders. I do not think the learned District Judge was correct in applying the decision in Nilkanth v. Yeshwant (1) to the facts of the present case. In the first place, it is perfectly clear that the total amount liable to be deposited under r. 89 of O. XXI, Civil Procedure Code, was not deposited within 30 days of the sale. I do not think there is any ground for supposing that in this connection the judgment-debtor, non-applicant No. 1, was misled by the mistake in the proclamation of the sale. The provisions of r. 89 of O. XXI are to be strictly complied with, being of the nature of an exceptional concession allowed to the judgment-debtor. Here, there was no strict compliance with the rule in question. Still further, there was no unequivocal acceptance by the decree-holder of the deposit so made. On the contrary, the orders of 26th April, 1926, and 26th July, 1926, show that the judgment-debtor was only allowed to deposit the amount at his (1) 65 Ind. Cas. 331; 18 N. L. R. 134; A. I. R. 1922 Nag. 248.

own risk and the money, so to speak, was only provisionally received. I cannot, therefore, regard the decree as having been satisfied, and even were one to adopt the somewhat wide principle laid down by Kotwal, A. J. C., in Nilkanth v. Yeshwant (1) above quoted, I do not think it can be predicated of the present case that the Court's power to execute the decree had ceased. Macnair, A. J. C., in his judgment in Miscellaneous Appeal No. 43 of 1925, decided on 13th September, 1927, has seen cause to differ from the decisions of Kotwal, A. J. C., which is an officially reported case, but I do not think it necessary in the present case to go into the further questions involved for the simple reason that, in my opinion, r. 8J must be strictly construed, and in this case there was no complete compliance with the provisions contained therein.

I do not further think that the case was one in which the Court could rightly have had recourse to the provisions contained in s. 151 of the Civil Procedure Code, nor did, in my opinion, the equities of the case call for any such resort to the provisions mentioned, even were this course permissible. In my opinion, therefore, the case was one in which the Court was bound to confirm the sale. In supposing that it had authority not to do so and instead, to accept the deposit made by the judgment-debtor, it exercised a jurisdiction which was not vested in it and it is, in my opinion, the duty of this Court to interfere. The facts of the decision in Yad Ram v. Sunder Singh (2) which has been quoted on behalf of the non-applicant No. 1, were highly peculiar and I am unable to accept the contention offered by the latter that the present application for revision does not lie.

In my opinion, therefore, the present revision application must succeed. The order of the lower Appellate Court is set aside and the order of the first Court, dated 30th October, 1926, confirming the sale is restored. The non-applicant No. 1 (judgment-debtor) must bear the applicant's costs both in this Court and in the lower Appellate Court. I fix Rs. 20 as Pleader's fees.

—Suit by Lambardar for share of revenue under cl. (16)—Plea of agreement to collect from joint estate, whether available—Absence of prejudice, effect of.

In a suit by a Lambardar under s. 108, cl. (16) of the Oudh Rent Act for arrears of revenue due for the defendant's share, the defendant pleaded that there was an agreement between the parties that the Lambardar would make collections from a certain portion of the joint estate to recoup himself for the defendant's share of revenue and that this arrangement had been acted upon for a number of years. The agreement was upheld by the Courts below. In appeal it was contended that the conclusion which the Courts below had arrived at could be reached only in a suit under cl. (15) of s. 108 of the Act:

Held, that the decision of the lower Courts was not liable to be set aside on this ground inasmuch as the method of trial of the broad issue of the defendants' liability adopted by the lower Courts had not prejudiced the plaintiff.

Second rent appeal from the judgment of the Third Additional District Judge, Lucknow, dated the 9th April, 1927, confirming that of the Honorary Assistant Collector, First Class, Unao, dated the 5th March, 1926.

Mr. D. K. Seth, for the Appellant.

Mr. H. Husain, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is the plaintiff's appeal from the decree of the Third Additional District Judge of Lucknow dated the 9th of April, 1927, affirming the decree of an Assistant Collector of the First Class of Unao, dated the 5th of March, 1926.

The suit, out of which this appeal arises, was brought by the plaintiff, who is the Lambardar, for the recovery of Rs. 240 as arrears of revenue for the defendants' share in village Bichia Kori, District Unao, under cl. (16), s. 108 of the Oudh Rent Act, 1886. The claim was resisted by the defendants as untenable.

The lower Appellate Court in agreement with the Court of first instance has come to the conclusion that there was an arrangement between the parties that the Lambardar would make collections from a certain portion of the joint estate to recoup himself for the defendants' share of revenue and that this arrangement has been in force for the last 18 years. It was not disputed that the Lambardar had realized the profits of the portion of the estate.

It would appear from what has been stated above that the matter has now been concluded by the finding recorded by the lower Court but the argument in second appeal is that the conclusion at which the Courts below have arrived could only be reached in a suit for accounts under cl. (15) of s. 108 of the Oudh Rent Act, 1886, and not in a suit under cl. (16) as the present suit was. The lower Appellate Court has fully considered this argument and has come to the conclusion that the method of trial of the broad issue of the defendants' liability followed by the trial Court has not in any manner prejudiced the appellant and I agree with the opinion of the Court below.

It was further argued in support of the appeal that a decision between the parties in the year 1917 (Ex. A-1) was conclusive as to the amount of rent of certain sir lands. I agree with the Courts below that the judgment relied upon is not conclusive as to what the amount of rent of certain portion of the joint estate shall be for all times to come. These were the only two points argued.

I dismiss the appeal with costs.

An assignee of a portion of the equity of redemption is entitled to redeem the entire mortgage.

A person who had a right to redeem at the time of the passing of a decree for redemption in his favour and who had executed the decree and obtained possession cannot be deprived of the fruits of such a decree merely because he lost his right to redeem after the conclusion of the trial in the first Court.

A mortgagor who resists a suit for redemption on frivolous grounds is not entitled to recover his costs of the case. But where the opposite party also has been careless in not claiming redemption at the proper hour, the mortgagor should not be made to pay the mortgagor's costs.

Mr. Balwant Rai, for Mr. Abdul Ghani, for the Appellants.

Mr. Shamair Chand, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The first point raised in this second appeal is that the plaintiff, who is the assignee of one half of the equity of redemption of certain land mortgaged to the defendants, was not entitled to redeem the whole. Counsel cannot seriously support this contention. The second point is that inasmuch as the plaintiff in consequence of other litigation lost his right to redeem at all after the conclusion of the case in the trial Court, the suit should now be dismissed, the change in his position being somehow treated as having retrospective effect. He was entitled to bring the suit when he did so. He was entitled to redeem when the decree was passed by the trial Court and this subsequent disability cannot deprive him of the result of his victory. He has, moreover, as the record shows, executed his decree and obtained possession and it appears quite clear that this settles the matter so far as the present litigation is concerned.

The third and the only remaining point is the question of costs. In accordance with the terms of the mortgage the plaintiff undertook to redeem in one or two months. He admittedly made a demand, but the demand was not made in either of these months, nor did he offer to redeem when the proper time should arrive. The suit was contested on many grounds by the defendant, and the trial Court and also the Appellate Court have penalised them not only by depriving them of their own costs, which such mortgagees ordinarily receive, but have also compelled them to pay the costs to the plaintiff whose carelessness has been condoned and in a sense rewarded. While agreeing that the defendants' conduct debars them from realising their own costs, we can see no reason for allowing the plaintiff to recover his costs, inasmuch as he has admittedly not performed his duties in their entirety.

We, therefore, accept the appeal in so far only as to order that the parties shall bear their own costs throughout the litigation. For the rest the appeal is dismissed.

W. W. BROUCKE—RESPONDENT.

Bengal Tenancy Act (VIII of 1885), s. 74—Abwabs—'Actual rent' and 'malguzari', meanings of.

The object of the whole series of enactments from the Regulations of 1791 to the Bengal Tenancy Act of 1885 was to prevent exactions from tenants beyond the rent specified in their patta, when there was one, and if there was no written engagement, beyond what was the rent actually payable, whether by verbal agreement or by virtue of custom. [p. 572, col. 2; p. 573, col. 1.]

It must depend on the circumstances of each particular case whether the sum claimed is really part of the rent agreed upon to be paid as consideration for the lease. [p. 573, col. 2.]

The words actual rent in the above section of the Bengal Tenancy Act cannot be taken to mean either a fair and equitable rent or rent at customary or Pargana rates. [ibid.]

Quere.—Whether the words actual rent in s. 74, Bengal Tenancy Act, 1885, are equivalent to the assul jama of the old Regulations. [p. 573, col. 2.]

Long use or custom cannot validate abwabs as an addition to the rent. [ibid.]

Appeal from the judgment and decree of the Patna High Court (Dawson Miller, O. J., and Foster, J.), dated the 5th January, 1925, reported as 86 Ind. Cas. 597, modifying that of the Subordinate Judge, Muzaferpore, dated the 20th July, 1920.

FACTS.—The appellant as the executrix of her late husband, Raja Mohan Bikram Singh, the former proprietor of the Ramnagar Estate, sued the respondent for possession of thirty-six villages which her husband had let to him, with arrears of rent, compensation for use and occupation, and damages for breaches of covenants contained in the lease.

The main question in the appeal was whether any, and what, portion of the money which the respondent had agreed by the lease to pay to the appellant's husband as consideration for the lease was irrecoverable as being an abwab imposed in addition to the actual rent within the meaning of the Bengal Tenancy Act of 1885.

The trial Judge gave judgment and passed a decree in favour of the appellant. He held that the question whether the part of the rent attributed to the disputed items was in the nature of abwab depended primarily on the construction of the lease, and decided that the lease clearly showed that the whole of the payments reserved were rent.

From that decree the respondent appealed to the High Court of Judicature at Patna. The learned Judges of the High Court differed from the trial Judge on the construction of the lease. The principal judgment was delivered by the learned Chief Justice, who summed up his conclusion in the following words:—

"Whatever difficulty may have arisen in the interpretation of the Regulations, the law as it now stands under s. 74 of the Bengal Tenancy Act appears to me to present no ambiguity. All impositions upon the tenants under the denomination of abwab, mathat, or other-like appellations in addition to the actual rent, are illegal, and all stipulations and reservations for the payment of such are void. They cannot legally be exacted nor can the tenant legally bind himself by contract to pay them....In my opinion, it is clear beyond any reasonable doubt that abwabs, such as those mentioned in the lease, had been collected from the tenants long before the lease was executed, and were regarded as having the sanction of custom. I am also of opinion that on the proper construction of the lease the defendant undertook to pay them under the different denominations of abwabs, as set out in the Schedule, and as indicated in the body of the lease, and not as part of the rent which is described as malguzari....I hold that the only items recoverable under this lease, apart from the produce rent, are the first two named in the Schedule, namely, rent and road-cess, and that the decree should be varied by disallowing the other items."

Messrs. Lowndes, K. C., and Raikes, for the Appellant.

Messrs. De Gruyther, K. C., and Dube, for the Respondent.

In the course of the argument before their Lordships, most of the cases referred to in the judgments of the High Court [and reported as Broucke v. Chhatrar Kumari Devi (1)] were cited and commented on. Learned Counsel also referred to the "Fifth Report on East India Affairs, 1812", and to the definition of abwab therein given, namely, "Items of taxation, cesses, imports, taxes." This term is particularly used to distinguish the taxes imposed subsequently to the establishment of the assul, or original standard rent, in the nature of additions thereto.

Mr. De Gruyther, K. C., cited Radha Prosad Singh v. Bal Kowar Koeri (2), where the history of abwabs is traced.

JUDGMENT.

Lord Sinha.—The question in this case turns on the construction of a lease dated the 22nd May, 1911, of 36 villages of the Ramnagar Raj in the province of Behar and Orissa, granted by the Rajah to a Mr. Broucke.

The material part of the lease is stated in the judgment of the Chief Justice of Patna as follows :—

"I have let out 16-annas of the following 36 villages as per boundaries given below . . . at a consolidated annual jama of Rs. 15,581-5-0, being the rent (malguzari), road and embankment cesses, dues of priests (Mahal Uprohiti) and expenses for obtaining acquittance receipt (Farag Kharach), etc., in addition to 515 maunds of paddy specified below, payable annually at a uniform rate under a thika patta, the term whereof is given below, and on receipt of a kabuliyat, to Mr. W. J. Broucke."

At the end of the document is a schedule giving a list of the 36 mouzas and stating in the case of each mauza the total annual "jama" and details of how it is made up. One instance will suffice. The first mauza is Thath Mitia. The particulars thereunder show, first of all, that the term is for 15 years from 1319 to 1333 F. Then follows a list of payments in respect of that mauza as follows :—

	Rs.	as.	p.
Malguzari	673	2	0
Road cess	40	8	0
Embankment cess	10	2	0
Costs of acquittance	24	4	0
Dasahara and Chait Nawmi
Tika, Bheti, Guru Bheti	5	0	0
Batchhapi, Jangla-i-si m-
Dewani Dastur	24	14	0
Total	805	14	0

Paddy 35 maunds.

The total of Rs. 805-14-0 thus arrived at is then treated as the jama eksala (annual rent), and is divided into four kists of Rs. 201-7-6 payable in Asin, Pous, Chait and Jeyth.

The word "malguzari" translated as rent in the High Court record, ordinarily means revenue, and is so rendered in Wilson's Glossary.

The Chief Justice of Patna was of opinion that the last eight items of the list above had been collected as abwabs from the raiyats long before the lease was executed and were regarded as having the sanction of custom, and he held (Foster, J., concurring) that on a proper construction of the lease Broucke undertook to pay them as abwabs under the different denominations as set out in the said schedule and as indicated in the body of the lease, and not as part of the rent, which the Chief Justice took to be the meaning of "malguzari" (the first item). In that view the High Court held that under s. 74 of the Bengal Tenancy Act, the lessor was not entitled to recover the amounts covered by the items 3 to 10 of the list, as being abwabs in addition to the rent payable under the lease.

Section 74 of the Bengal Tenancy Act, 1885, enacts that "all impositions upon tenants under the denomination of abwab, mathat or other like appellations, in addition to the actual rent shall be illegal, and all stipulations and reservations for the payment of such shall be void."

That section has a long legislative history behind it from 1791 to 1885, which was referred to at the Bar, but to which it is unnecessary to refer further than to state that the object of the whole series of enactments from the Regulations of 1791 to Act VIII of 1885 was to prevent exactions from tenants beyond the rent specified in their patta, when there was one, and if there was no written engagement, beyond what was the rent actually payable, whether by verbal agreement or by virtue of custom.

(2) 17 C. 726; 8 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 1026 (F. B.).

There being a written engagement or lease in this case (the patta and kabuliyat) the only question is whether the actual rent payable by Broucke as tenant to the Rajah as his landlord is what that lease calls the "consolidated annual jama" of Rs. 15,581-5-0 plus 515 maunds of paddy, as the Subordinate Judge held, or only a portion thereof, as the High Court held.

Their Lordships are unable to endorse the view taken by the High Court.

Malguzari, which is the first of the items composing the total yearly jama for each village, cannot be rendered as rent, much less as actual rent; nor is there any evidence to show that the amount of the malguzari was the actual rent, as distinguished from abwabs, paid by the cultivating raiyyats of the village. The only distinction apparent on the face of the lease is between cash rent and produce rent. So far as the former is concerned, it is impossible to take the first item as being actual rent and the rest as abwabs when they are all included in the total, which is expressly stated to be the annual rental payable in four equal kists, or instalments, specified in figures. It is also to be noticed that the execution-clause of the patta, signed by the Rajah, is as follows:—

"Executed this jika-patta for a term of 15 years in respect of 34 villages and of 17 years in respect of 2 villages in all 36 villages at an annual jama of Rs. 15,581-5-0 and 515 maunds of fine paddy to be realised from year to year."

Similarly the execution-clause of the kabuliyat, signed by Broucke is as follows:—

"Kabuliyat given by me on jama rupees fifteen thousand and five hundred and eighty-one and five annas only."

Their Lordships agree with the Subordinate Judge that Broucke was bound under his engagement to pay the rent mentioned therein as the annual rental, and cannot evade this liability because the raiyyats may not or do not pay him what they used to pay to the Rajah. The question as to what each raiyyat was or is liable to pay as his rent is not before their Lordships, and they do not express any opinion upon it.

A large number of cases decided by the Calcutta and Patna High Courts were referred to in the judgments and cited at the Bar. Their Lordships do not consider it necessary to refer to them beyond expressing their agreement in the view that in each case it has to be ascertained whether the sum claimed is really part of the rent agreed upon to be paid as consideration for the lease.

The case of Tilukhdari Singh v. Chulhan Mahton (3) was also referred to. In that case there was an old tenancy without any written contract. But the money claimed was described in the plaint itself as old usual abwabs, and the zemindar's books of account produced in the case showed that on the face of those documents the payments made by the tenant were distinguished as (1) rent and (2) abwabs, i.e., so much for rent, and so much for abwabs. The latter were claimed on the ground that they were payable by custom and had been, in fact, paid for a long time without objection. It was held that long use or custom could not validate abwabs as an addition to the rent.

A somewhat novel argument was advanced on behalf of the respondent, viz., that the words actual rent in s. 74 of the Bengal Tenancy Act were equivalent to the assul jama of the old Regulations, and that any stipulation to pay a rent which, in fact, exceeded what was the assul jama would be illegal to the extent of such excess. This would raise an issue of fact as to what was the assul jama of the 36 villages—the subject-matter of the lease. No such issue was raised in the Courts of India, and, indeed, in no reported case does any such question appear ever to have been raised.

Their Lordships would, moreover, point out that the words actual rent in s. 74 cannot be taken to mean, either a fair and equitable rent or rent at customary or Per-gana rates.

In their Lordships' opinion Broucke's actual rent under his lease is the sum of Rs. 15,581-5-0 in cash and 515 maunds of fine paddy, as found by the first Court, and their Lordships will, therefore, humbly advise His Majesty that the judgment of the High Court should be reversed and the Provincial Insolvency Act (V of 1920), s. 10—Applicant when entitled to declaration of insolvency—Inability to pay debts, proof of.

For purposes of being declared insolvent all that an applicant need show is that prima facie his debts are more than Rs. 500 and that he is unable to pay the same. The fact that his father is a rich man or that his father allows him to cultivate some land is not sufficient to show that he can pay his debts.

Miscellaneous first appeal from an order of the Additional District Judge, Gurdaspur, dated the 14th February, 1927.

Mr. Bodh Raj Sahni, for the Appellant.

JUDGMENT.—Thakar Singh, appellant, applied to be declared insolvent and the learned District Judge rejected his application holding that he was capable of paying his debts. There is absolutely no evidence on the record either of the existence of the debts or of his ability to pay or not to pay. The appellant, however, put in a list in which he asserted that his debts amounted in all to Rs. 1,635 and his assets were only Rs. 15. Four creditors contested this application alleging that two of the so-called creditors, namely, Nos. 5 and 7, were relatives of the debtor and were not really creditors at all. They did not, however, challenge the assertion about their own debts and these debts are by themselves sufficient to justify a petition in insolvency, as they amount to

Rs. 955 in all. The assets of the petitioner are the Rs. 15 worth of articles that he states in his petition plus the fact that he is cultivating 7 ghumaons which evidently have been given to him by his father for this purpose. There is no evidence to show that the income of the 7 ghumaons is in one year sufficient to pay off all these debts.

I, therefore, accept the appeal and remand the case back to the District Judge for decision after a full enquiry and evidence taken as to the existence of the debts, and as to the capacity of the appellant to pay or not to pay these debts. It must be borne in mind that if the appellant is concealing any property, that may be taken into account when the question of his discharge comes up and if he has any property the income from which can be realised by him that income can be attached and the Court can see whether that is sufficient to pay off the debts. All that the would-be insolvent has to show is that prima facie his debts are more than Rs. 500 and that he is unable to pay the same. The fact that his father is a rich man, or that his father allows him to cultivate 7 ghumaons of land is not sufficient to show that he can pay the debts alleged due by him, or even the unchallenged debts without further evidence.

Cas. 468, preferred to the High Court against the decree of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Rajahmundry, in A. S. No. 98 of 1922 (A. S. No. 53 of 1922 on the file of the District Court, Gôdavari) preferred against that of the Court of the Additional District Munsif, Rajahmundry, in O. S. No. 15 of 1921 (O. S. No. 596 of 1919 on the file of the Court of the Principal District Munsif, Rajahmundry).

Mr. G. Lakshman, for the Appellant.

JUDGMENT.—We agree with the view taken by Devadoss, J. of the cases cited by the appellant. Those relating to mortgagor's suits for redemption and possession [such as In re Krishnaswami Pathan (1)] are distinguishable on the ground that the mortgagor seeks possession. As to the cases relating to mortgagee's suits for sale, it is true that some cases lay down that, where the joinder has been made and a decree was passed on the paramount title, it is not merely an irregularity which vitiates the finding. No case lays down that the defendant is bound to raise the question relating to the paramount title. We are not able to agree with the decision in Srimanta Seal v. Bindubasini Dasi (2) where no reasons are given for the view taken.

The Letters Patent Appeal is dismissed.

This appeal came on for final hearing on 4th February, 1927.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff alleged common enjoyment by the family from 1905 to 1919 and this was not denied by the written statement. There is nothing in the new point. No change need be made in the judgment.

* Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 151, scope of—Ex parte decree against minor without appointing guardian—Decree declared void—Power of Court to restore suit.

Where an ex parte decree obtained against a minor without appointing a guardian is declared void at the instance of the minor, the Court which passed the decree has inherent power to restore the suit to the file and to proceed with its trial from the beginning. [p. 576, col. 2.]

Where there are direct provisions of the law by which justice can be attained and injustice avoided, s. 151, Civil Procedure Code, naturally has no application. It applies only when there are direct provisions of the law of procedure which lead to injustice. [p. 576, col. 1.]

Application for revision of the order of the First Additional Sub-Judge, Second Class, Harda, dated the 24th June, 1926, in Civil Suit No. 41 of 1922.

Mr. G. L. Subhedar, for the Applicant.

Mr. K. V. Deoskar, for the Non-Applicant.

ORDER.—Gulab Mali, the opponent of this and the two connected applications for revision, is an occupancy tenant of land belonging to the applicant Shribalabh Brahman. He attained majority on the 29th of May, 1924. On the 15th of April, 1920, Shribalabh filed a suit against him (C. S. No. 57 of 1920) claiming the amount of the second kist of rent for 1916-17 and the full rent of the two following years. The plaintiff described Gulab as fifteen years of age, which was very nearly correct, and asked for the appointment of his grandmother as his guardian for the suit. Notices were duly served, but there was no appearance for the defendant and the Court passed an ex parte decree on the 15th of April, 1920, without having appointed any guardian for the defendant.

In 1922 Gulab filed Civil Suit No. 85 of 1922 claiming a declaration that the rent-decree passed against him was void because he was still a minor and had not been represented in the suit at all. A decree to that effect was passed on the 6th of November, 1922, and an appeal against it naturally failed.

In the same year Shribalabh filed two more suits for rent against Gulab, No. 41 of 1922 on the 20th of February, 1922, about a month before the institution of Gulab's suit for a declaration in respect of the previous decree, and No. 323 of 1922, on the 8th of August, 1922, four or five months after it. That there was no fraudulent intention about this, at least when the suits were instituted, is proved by the excessive carelessness shown in describing Gulab not only as a major in both suits but as twenty-one years old in February in one and as forty in August of the same year in the other. Summons in each case was served on Gulab personally, which, of course, he disregarded, and ex parte decrees for the rent claimed were passed on the 12th of June, 1922, a month after the first decree had been declared void, and the 3rd of October, 1922, a month before it. Like the first they were both declared void on the 2nd of May, 1925, in a suit instituted by Gulab in 1923.

After wasting some months in appealing against this declaratory decree, in addition to the two years wasted in contesting the suit in which it was passed, Shribalabh applied on the 5th of October, 1925, to have his three rent-suits restored to the file and treated as still pending, under s. 151 of the Civil Procedure Code. That is an admission that this could not be done under the provisions of the Procedure Code and a prayer that those provisions should be contravened, on the ground that that is the only way in which injustice can be prevented. The judgment of the lower Court is hard to follow, but at least it shows a complete failure to understand the position. Four arguments are set out as advanced against the granting of the application, and in the view that these "seem plausible enough," the application is rejected.

The first argument is "that when there are express provisions of law dealing with a case s. 151, Civil Procedure Code, has no application". That is perfectly true in a sense, but a sense directly opposite to that in which it has been understood. Where there are direct provisions of the law by which justice can be attained and injustice avoided, s. 151 naturally has no application. It applies only when there are direct provisions of the law of procedure which lead to injustice.

The next two "arguments" are instances of direct provisions of the law which would be violated if the application were granted. But the application is wholly one for the violation of provisions of the law and s. 151 says this can be done, though only in certain strictly limited circumstances. (One of the provisions mentioned is that for setting aside an ex parte decree. It is hard to see how that comes into this case.)

The fourth argument is "that if the applications are granted they will nullify the effect of the declaratory decrees passed by the Civil Courts." That is certainly a correct description of the applications, but it is no argument for or against them. If it were a reason for not granting them, the declaratory decrees ought never to have been passed, as they certainly nullified the effect of the previous rent-decrees.

Gulab Mali has furnished many indications of the rent claimed in all three cases having been really due, particularly by failing to deny it in this Court even after time was allowed to him to ascertain the facts, if they were not known to him already. But even if it cannot be assumed for the purposes of the present discussion that the rent claimed was really due, it is at least certain that Shribalabh had a right to have that question examined when he filed his suits.

Now it is clear that Gulab understood the whole matter when the first notice was served on him in 1920. He was then fourteen or fifteen years of age, and in 1922 filed the suit in which the rent-decree was set aside. It is probable that he acted himself in the matter, perhaps under advice from others, but anyhow he himself or his guardian intentionally refrained from appearing in all the rent-suits for no purpose but that of allowing decrees to be passed in them which could be set aside on the ground of minority after the claims were time-barred. That is undoubtedly getting an undue advantage by the use of the rules of procedure, however correct that use may be, that is to say, it is an abuse of them.

In this case there is no way of preventing that abuse but by ordering that the three rent-suits shall be restored to the file and treated as pending cases, instituted on the dates on which the complaints were originally presented, and shall be tried out from the beginning. I know of no provision of the law authorising such an order, and there may be many that directly forbid it, but the power to pass it (mentioned in s. 151 of the Civil Procedure Code as existing of itself but not conferred by that section) can be used only in these circumstances; unless it is the power to break rules, it is nothing at all, and rules that do not exist cannot be broken. The order stated is accordingly passed. The whole costs of these proceedings, in which the Pleader's fee will be fifteen rupees, and of those in the lower Court out of which they arose, will be paid by Gulab Mali.

CRIMINAL APPEAL No. 257 of 1926.

November 10, 1927.

Present.—Mr. Justice Ffiorde and

EMPEROR—APPELLANT

WALI MOHAMMED—ACCOUSED—

RESPONDENT.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 190(1)(b)—“Report”, meaning of—Competency of Magistrate to take cognizance of non-cognizable offence upon report by Police Officer.

The word “report” as used in s. 190 (1) (b), Criminal Procedure Code, as amended in 1923, means not only a “Police report” or “report of a cognizable case” but also covers a “report in a non-cognizable case”. Therefore a Magistrate is empowered under this section to take cognizance of cognizable; as well as non-cognizable offences upon a report made by a Police Officer. [p. 578, col. 2.]

Public Prosecutor v. Ratnavelu Cheitty (1) and Bholanath Das v. Emperor (5), followed.

Criminal appeal against an order of the Sessions Judge, Hissar, dated the 4th January, 1926, reversing that of the District Magistrate, Gurgaon, dated the 19th August, 1925.

Mr. C. H. Cardon Noad, Government Advocate, for the Appellant.

Mr. S. R. Laul, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

Agha Haidar, J.—This is an appeal by the Local Government against an order of the learned District Judge of Hissar Division, acquitting the respondent Wali Mohammed who was convicted of an offence under s. 161 of the Indian Penal Code and sentenced to one year's rigorous imprisonment by the District Magistrate of Gurgaon. The learned Sessions Judge has disposed of the appeal which had been preferred by the respondent, Wali Mohammed, on a purely legal ground and has ordered his acquittal.

Wali Mohammed, the respondent, was a foot constable in the Gurgaon District. It is alleged on behalf of the prosecution that he received a currency note of Rs. 100 from one Sohan Lal as illegal gratification. The Deputy Superintendent of Police made a report to the Superintendent of Police about Wali Mohammed's misconduct as a Police Officer and the Superintendent of Police on the 13th of December, 1924, submitted the following note to the District Magistrate:—

“District Magistrate.

“I send these papers to you for information.

“Foot constable Wali Mohammed is accused of taking Rs. 100 from one Sohan Lal of Police Station, Punhana, who was suspected of complicity in the Jainarain murder case. The offence against Wali Mohammed is clear. I, therefore, suggest that a judicial enquiry should be held against him under s. 161/165 of the Indian Penal Code. The note of Rs. 100 is attached with these papers in an envelope bearing on both ends of one side my initials.”

On receipt of this note the District Magistrate passed an order in Urdu which may be translated as follows:—

“The case may be entered in the register. Witnesses and the accused may be called by means of summons for the 14th of January, 1925. Dated the 13th December, 1924.”

On appeal to the learned Sessions Judge, the Counsel for Wali Mohammed raised the objection that as a result of the communication addressed by the Superintendent of Police to the District Magistrate the latter could only punish Wali Mohammed departmentally but could not take any action against him under the general penal laws. This contention found favour with the learned Sessions Judge who put a certain construction under s. 190 of the Criminal Procedure Code, quashed the conviction and sentence and acquitted the appellant without going into the merits of the case.

The sole question, therefore, in appeal, is whether the view taken by the learned Sessions Judge is correct or not. It may be observed that before the Criminal Procedure Code (Amendment Act), 1923, the language of cl. (b) of s. 190 (1) was “upon a Police report of such facts”. By the Criminal (Amendment) Act, 1923, an organic change was introduced in s. 190, and cl. (b) of s. 190 (1) now runs thus: “Upon a report in writing of such facts made by any Police Officer”. This has a very important bearing upon the matter under consideration. As s. 161 of the Indian Penal Code refers to a non-cognizable offence the argument on behalf of the respondent is to the effect that a Police Officer could only make a report of a cognizable offence and that he was not empowered under the law to make a report in a non-cognizable case. In other words, the word “report” as used in the amended clause of s. 190 should be interpreted as meaning “Police report” in spite of the change in the phraseology introduced by amendment and that the words “Police report” should be constructed as meaning technically the report of a cognizable offence. The learned Government Advocate, on the other hand, argued that this interpretation was no longer possible, having regard to the alteration in cl. (b) the word "report" not being limited or restricted as meaning "Police report", as the word occurs in the various sections of Ch. XIV, e.g., s. 174.

There has been considerable divergence of judicial opinion on the subject and reference was made during the course of the argument to a number of cases. It is unfortunate that, although the appeal was argued on the 7th and again on the 10th of November, 1927, the learned Government Advocate did not invite the attention of the Court to the Full Bench decision reported as Public Prosecutor v. Ratnavelu Chetty (1), as this would have shortened the discussion very considerably. It was only a mere accident that the attention of the Court was drawn to this important decision after the arguments had been over. The learned Government Advocate referred to Dilan Singh v. Emperor (2). That case does not seem to have any direct bearing upon the matter in controversy and need not be discussed.

The case reported as Chiragh Din v. Emperor (3), though it does not meet the real point in controversy, yet has some bearing upon the question before us. In this case at the instance of the Superintendent of Police, the Sub-Inspector filed a document which purported to be a complaint, though it was not addressed to any particular officer and the Sub-Inspector was not examined under the provisions of s. 200 of the Criminal Procedure Code. It was held that this defect of the Sub-Inspector not having been examined under the law, as it stood before the amendment, was cured by s. 537 of the Criminal Procedure Code, seeing that the accused did not suffer any injury and it was also held that the document filed by the Sub-Inspector was to all intents and purposes a complaint.

The case of Bhairab Chandra Barua v. Emperor (4) was also relied upon. The importance of that decision lies in the fact that although it was given before the amendment of the year 1923 the learned Judge placed a liberal construction upon the language of s. 190 and held that a "Police report" in a non-cognizable case is either a "complaint" under s. 4 (h) or a "Police report" within s. 190 (1) (b) of the Criminal Procedure Code and the Magistrate has jurisdiction to take cognizance of an offence disclosed by that report, although the offence may be a non-cognizable one.

Then we come to the case reported as Bholanath Das v. Emperor (5). This case was decided after the amendment of the year 1923 and the learned Judges held that "the provisions of s. 190 extend to any offence and notwithstanding the use of the words 'Police report' in s. 173, s. 190 (1) (b) cannot be restricted merely to non-cognizable offences, and a Magistrate is empowered by s. 190 (1) (b) to take cognizance both in cognizable and non-cognizable offences upon a report such as is mentioned in s. 190 (1) (b)."

Two more cases were cited by the learned Government Advocate during the course of the arguments, namely, Chaudri Bawoo v. Emperor (6) and Lee v. Adhikary (7). The case reported as Chaudri Bawoo v. Emperor (6) was decided after the amendment of the year 1923 but the circumstances of the case were peculiar seeing that the question decided in that case depended largely upon the scope and meaning of certain Local Acts and cannot be considered as an exposition of the meaning of s. 190 (1) (b) which may be of general importance. The case in Lee v. Adhikary (7) does not seem to have any bearing upon the question under consideration.

Emperor v. Ghulam Hussain (8) is very important and instructive. It was a case decided after the amendment of the year 1923, and the learned Judges observed as follows:—

"Now s. 190 of the Code is, and is intended to be, very wide. It empowers a Magistrate to take cognizance of an offence in almost every conceivable set of circumstances."

The matter, however, seems to be definitely settled by the Full Bench decision reported as in Public Prosecutor v. Ratnavelu Chetty (1) which, as already stated, was not cited by the Government Advocate. I may observe that during the course of the arguments I referred to the provisions of s. 529 of the Criminal Procedure Code and observed that, even when a Magistrate is not empowered by law to take cognizance of an offence under s. 190, sub-s. (1), cl. (a) or cl. (b), on the ground that he was not competent to receive from the Police the report of a non-cognizable offence, the defect could be cured if he acted in good faith and the proceeding shall not be set aside merely on the ground that he had no power under the law to entertain the report. I am glad to find that my view finds full support in the judgment of the Full Bench which lays down, among others; that the law requires that the Magistrate who takes cognizance of an offence under s. 190, sub-s. (1), cl. (a) or cl. (b) without having jurisdiction should only act in good faith, though erroneously to make his proceedings valid. It, further, lays down that s. 10 (1) (b) authorises certain Magistrates to take cognizance of any offence upon a report in writing of facts which constitute such offence made by any Police Officer and s. 200 (aa) provides that where a public servant acting or purporting to act in the discharge of his official duties, makes a complaint of an offence nothing shall require the Magistrate to examine him before taking cognizance of the offence. This Full Bench decision fully covers the question, raised in the present appeal and I follow the same as well as the case reported as Bholanath Das v. Emperor (5).

On behalf of the respondent a certain number of cases were cited, e.g., Chidambaram Pillai v. Emperor (9), In re Perumal Naick (10), Ram Lal v. Emperor (11) and Sarferaz Khan v. Emperor (12).

Chidambaram Pillai v. Emperor (9) does not seem to have any direct bearing upon the present case and as it merely lays down that where a Police Officer files a complaint in a non-cognizable case or regarding an offence of which it is not his duty to report, such complaint is a complaint within s. 4 (b) of the Criminal Procedure Code and is not a Police report. The case reported as In re Perumal Naick (10) consists of a very short judgment in which there is no discussion of any principle of law or reference to any reported case.

Ram Lal v. Emperor (11) was a case under the old law and cannot be invoked in aid as an authority, having regard to alteration in the section introduced by the Legislature in 1923.

Sarferaz Khan v. Emperor (12) is a case which really supports the contention of the Crown. In that case Knox, J., held that reports of investigation made by the Police into non-cognizable offence under order of the Magistrate passed under s. 155 (2) fell under s. 173 and the Magistrate could take cognizance of the case upon receiving such a Police report.

I may note that the Full Bench case reported as King Emperor v. Sada (13) has also been discussed before us. That case lays down that where a Police Officer of his own motion makes a report in a non-cognizable case, it is not a Police report as there is no provision in the Criminal Procedure Code which empowers a Police Officer to make such a report. Having regard to the change introduced in s. 190 of the Criminal Procedure Code, this case loses all its importance as an authority.

Thus we see that the weight of authority after the amendment of the law, is entirely in favour of the Crown. This being so the order of the learned Sessions Judge cannot be maintained.

I would accordingly allow the appeal, set aside the order of the learned Sessions Judge and as the case had been disposed of on a purely technical ground and the evidence had not been gone into, I would remand the case for decision on the merits.

CRIMINAL REVISION No. 105 OF 1927.

November 18, 1927.

Present:—Sir Louis Stuart, Kt., Chief

Judge, and Mr. Justice Raza.

EMPEROR—APPELLANT*versusBANDE ALI AND OTHERS—ACCUSED.Jurisdiction—Crime committed by British subject in Nepal territory—Jurisdiction of British Court.*

A British Court has jurisdiction to try a British subject for an offence committed by him in the Nepal territory.

Appeal against an order of the Additional Sessions Judge, Bahraich, dated the 19th September, 1927.

Mr. H. K. Ghose, Government Pleader, for the Crown.

Messrs. H. Husain and Naim-Ullah, for the Accused.

JUDGMENT.—In this case, the Court had issued notices to four persons, namely, Bande Ali, Azam, Dhondhe and Katter Khan to show cause why the sentences passed upon them should not be enhanced. They have been represented before us by their learned Counsel who has argued their case both on the question of their guilt and on the question of enhancement of sentences. He has argued that on the question of their guilt the prisoners in question have not been proved to have been guilty of any offence and he has argued on the question of sentences that even if they are guilty of any offence, the sentences passed upon them are sufficient and should not be enhanced.

This is the first time that the prisoners have put forward any plea in this Court. They were convicted on the 19th September, 1927, but they have not so far appealed. We do not in any way hold against them the fact that they have not appealed; we note simply that they have not done so. We have heard their learned Counsel and we have considered his arguments. The case is not of a usual nature. The offence of which the prisoners have been convicted is in respect of the death of two persons which resulted from a violent attack upon them committed on the 26th May, 1926, just within the Nepal territory.

The case for the prosecution was that Ram Narayan and Udit Narayan both now deceased, servants of a theikadar for grass in Nepal, had on that day apprehended a man called Bande Ali who was interfering with the monopoly possessed by their master and that they had taken him to a village called Baniagaon in Nepal where they asked a Muhammadan called Sahib Din to give them sufficient escort to take Bande Ali to the nearest Police Station in Nepal. Sahib Din was unable to provide that escort at once and meanwhile Bande Ali managed to have the news of his capture sent to his village in British territory. As a result three of the prisoners with other persons arrived on the spot and rescued Bande Ali forcibly. In the course of the rescue they along with Bande Ali inflicted injuries upon Ram Narayan and Udit Narayan which resulted in the deaths of the two latter. The four persons were accordingly tried for culpable homicide under the provisions of s. 304, Indian Penal Code, and have been sentenced to five years rigorous imprisonment.

The main evidence against them is the evidence of Sahib Din and his brother Kareem, and if this evidence is believed there can be no doubt as to their guilt. This evidence is corroborated directly against three of them and indirectly against all by Shankar, and Sarju has also given corroborative evidence. The learned Counsel for the prisoners who has argued with great force on behalf of his clients has endeavoured to show to us that the evidence of Sahib Din and Kareem is not deserving of credence. He bases his arguments upon the fact that apparently the prisoners have suggested to the Nepal Government that the real person who murdered Ram Narayan and Udit Narayan was Sahib Din himself. Sahib Din is not under arrest, but an inquiry against him seems to be progressing. We have been taken at length through this evidence and we are satisfied that the learned Sessions Judge has arrived at a correct conclusion in believing that Sahib Din and his brother Kareem have told the truth. We attach no value to the alleged discrepancies in the first report made at the Nepal Chauki and in the omission of mention of names from that report. We do not believe that the report was recorded in such a manner as to justify our attaching any weight as to its correctness. The manner in which this case has come before the British Court is as follows: Although the crime was committed in the Nepal territory, it has been committed by British Indian subjects. The prisoners are all British subjects and thus the British Courts had jurisdiction to try them. We are satisfied upon the evidence that they are guilty.

In regard to the question of sentence we consider that a sentence of five years' rigorous imprisonment is too lenient. As they have been convicted under s. 304, the maximum sentence that can be passed against them is one of transportation for life. We do not consider it necessary to pass that sentence. We pass the next sentence, that is, one of ten years' rigorous imprisonment and direct that in each instance the sentence be enhanced to a sentence of ten years' rigorous imprisonment.

CRIMINAL APPEAL No. 1061 OF 1927.

October 28, 1927.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), s. 79—Public servant acting under colour of office—Right of private defence.

Where a constable effects an arrest under colour of his office, there is no right of private defence against him even though the arrest is not strictly justified by law. [p. 582, col. 1.]

Appeal from the order of the Additional Sessions Judge, Ferozepore, dated the 11th May, 1927, modifying that of the Honorary Magistrate, First Class, Jallalabad, District Ferozepore, dated the 31st March, 1927.

Mr. Fakir Chand, for the Petitioners.

Mr. Mulk Raj, for the Government Advocate, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The petitioners were tried and convicted by the trial Magistrate for having committed offences under ss. 147, 332 and 225, Indian Penal Code, and were sentenced to various terms of imprisonment under each count. It was found that they had caused hurt to Police constable Wali Muhammad and his companions while rescuing from his custody certain persons who had been arrested for offences under the Excise Act. On appeal the learned Sessions Judge held that the search of the house and the arrest of those persons were illegal and that no offence under s. 332 or s. 225 had been established. Accordingly, he acquitted the petitioners of those offences, but maintained the conviction under s. 147, holding that the petitioners had used more force than was necessary. He also found as a fact that the petitioners had come to the scene of the occurrence armed with lathis in order to prevail upon the constable to release the culprits immediately but when all attempts at persuasion had failed they took the law into their own hands and rescued the offenders by causing hurt to Wali Muhammad and five other persons. He accordingly sentenced them to rigorous imprisonment for six months each. They have preferred a petition for revision to this Court and I have heard Mr. Fakir Chand at length.

Mr. Fakir Chand has attacked the findings of fact arrived at by the learned Sessions Judge, but after going through the record I find that there is legal evidence on the record in support of the findings on which the conviction under s. 147 is based. Indeed it appears that the learned Sessions Judge has misread the record in favour of the petitioners at least on two points. In his judgment he refers to P. W. No. 11 Qasim Ali as having deposed that Wali Muhammad constable was not in uniform. The statement of Qasim Ali as recorded does not, however, support this conclusion. The witness distinctly stated twice that the constable was in uniform at the time he made the search and effected the arrest. The learned Sessions Judge has further stated that "the constable admits in this case that he did not tell the accused that they were at liberty to furnish security before they were actually arrested. As a matter of fact, no security was demanded from them." It appears, however, from the statement of Wali Muhammad as recorded, that he actually told the petitioners that the offence was a bailable one and that they could furnish security but they expressed their inability to produce any person who would stand surety for them. In these circumstances I am not prepared to accept Mr. Fakir Chand's contention that the findings of fact arrived at by the learned Sessions Judge on which the conviction under s. 147 is based are erroneous and ought to be interfered with by this Court on revision.

Mr. Fakir Chand's next argument was that as the learned Sessions Judge has found that the arrest of the excise offenders Panju Singh and Suhari was illegal, they had been wrongfully confined and under s. 100, Indian Penal Code, the petitioners, who are their friends and caste-fellows, were justified in rescuing them. Mr. Mulk Raj for the Crown meets this by urging that in this case the constable was acting under colour of his office and, therefore, there was no right of private defence against the arrest effected by him even though such arrest was not strictly justified by law. There is force in this argument and I agree with it. The petitioners were not justified in taking the law into their own hands, nor could they, while rescuing the excise offenders, use more force than was necessary. I, therefore, uphold the conviction under s. 147, Indian Penal Code.

The petitioners had already been in jail for about four months, when they were released on bail by this Court. Having regard to all the circumstances of the case I think the ends of justice will be met by reducing the sentence of rigorous imprisonment from six months to the period already undergone. With this modification the petition is dismissed.

*Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 145—
Evidence recorded by Reader and not by Magistrate—Irregularity—Trial, whether illegal.*

The omission of a Magistrate in proceedings under s. 145, Criminal Procedure Code, to make a memorandum of the evidence as required by s. 356, Criminal Procedure Code, is a mere irregularity and does not vitiate the proceedings where no prejudice has been caused thereby. [p. 582, col. 2.]

Criminal revision against an order of the Sessions Judge, Fyzabad, dated the 14th September, 1927, confirming that of the First Class Magistrate, Sultanpur, dated the 14th July, 1927.

Mr. Hyder Husain, for the Applicants.

JUDGMENT.—I sent for the record in this application owing to the fact that the learned Sessions Judge had in his first order expressed the view that the matter should come before the Chief Court, although he subsequently changed his opinion and by a later order refused to send the record. I considered it only fair to the learned Counsel who presented the application to see the record. The application is concerned with proceedings under Chap. XII of the Code of Criminal Procedure. The Police having reported that the present applicants were endeavouring to take forcible possession over a certain tank stated to be in the possession of one Jaskaran, the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, who was duly authorised in that behalf, issued an order which purported to be under the provisions of s. 145 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. After having issued the order he proceeded to take documentary and oral evidence; and finally finding that Jaskaran was in possession of the tank and that there was a danger of a breach of the peace directed that Jaskaran should remain in possession and warned the other side not to interfere with his possession. He further directed that they should seek any remedy which they alleged against Jaskaran by a suit in the Civil Court. This order is objected to on two main grounds. One that there was no order drawn up within the terms of s. 145 for the initiation of proceedings, and the other that the Magistrate did not record the evidence of the parties as provided for under s. 356 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. The examination of the record shows that there is no force in the first objection. There was a regular order properly drawn up. On the second point it is true that the Magistrate has not complied with the provisions of s. 356. The evidence was recorded in the language of the Court, that is to say, in Hindustani, by his Reader. There was no objection to this being done, but under the section the Magistrate should have made a memorandum of the statement of each witness. The Magistrate will kindly note in future that in proceedings under Chap. XII he must follow the instructions of s. 356. But, in my opinion, this omission in no way vitiates the proceedings. The irregularity is in the proceedings. I have gone through the record carefully. I am satisfied that the Magistrate applied his mind to the evidence, that he took considerable care in sifting the evidence and that he arrived at a correct conclusion. It did not, in fact, make the slightest difference whether he did or did not record a memorandum of the evidence. He heard the evidence and he clearly appreciated its gist. In these circumstances the irregularity did not occasion a failure of justice and is covered by the provisions of s. 537 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. There are occasions when nevertheless for instructional reasons it is advisable to send the case back to the Magistrate, who has omitted to carry out the provisions of the law and direct him to try it over again. But in this particular case it appears to me that I should not only be wasting the time of the Magistrate but I should be wasting the time of the parties also. If I take this course, it would do the applicants no good. The tank clearly is in possession of Jaskaran. There clearly is an apprehension of a breach of the peace and I fail to understand what good there will be either to the parties or to the community by sending the case back to have the evidence recorded over again with a memorandum superadded according to the law with the result that exactly the same order will be passed again which has been passed already. I, therefore, reject this application.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 408—Second Class Magistrate invested with First Class powers during pendency of trial—Conviction—Appeal, whether lies to District Magistrate or Sessions Court.

The moment a Second Class Magistrate is invested with the powers of a First Class Magistrate he becomes a First Class Magistrate and any convictions by him in cases which were taken up by him as a Second Class Magistrate are convictions by a First Class Magistrate, and appealable to the Court of Session and not the District Magistrate.

Sheobhanjan Singh v. Emperor (1), followed.

Case referred for the orders of the High Court, under s. 438 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, by the Sessions Judge, West Godavary Division, in his letter, dated the 23rd December, 1926.

Mr. P. V. Vallabhacharyulu, for the Accused.

The Public Prosecutor, for the Crown.

ORDER.—This is a reference by the Sessions Judge of West Godavary Division. The case was tried by a Magistrate who had Second Class powers and the trial was continued by him after he got First Class powers. The case was re-numbered after he got First Class powers. He convicted the accused and an appeal against this conviction was preferred to the District Magistrate who quashed the conviction holding that the case against the accused was not made out. The question is whether the District Magistrate had jurisdiction to hear an appeal from the decision of a First Class Magistrate. The District Magistrate seems to justify his action on the ground that the trial was started by a Second Class Magistrate and he thought that he had jurisdiction to entertain the appeal. Section 408 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1828, says:

"Any person convicted on a trial held by an Assistant Sessions Judge, a District Magistrate or other Magistrate of the First Class, or any person sentenced under s. 349, or in respect of whom an order has been made or a sentence has been passed under s. 380, by a Magistrate of the First Class, may appeal to the Court of Session." So it is clear that only a Court of Session can hear appeals against convictions by First Class Magistrates. It is contended for the accused before us that inasmuch as the trial was begun by a Second Class Magistrate the appeal lay to the District Magistrate. This on the face of it is an untenable position. The District Magistrate has jurisdiction to hear appeals only from the decisions of Second Class Magistrates. The moment a Second Class Magistrate is invested with the powers of a First Class Magistrate he becomes a First Class Magistrate and any convictions by him in cases which were taken up by him as a Second Class Magistrate would be only convictions as a First Class Magistrate. We do not think it necessary to cite any authority but we may refer with approval to the case reported as Sheobhanjan Singh

v. Emperor (1). The District Magistrate not having had jurisdiction to hear the appeal his decision must be set aside as being without jurisdiction. We, therefore, set aside the acquittal by the District Magistrate on appeal, direct the Sessions Judge to send for the appeal records from the District Magistrate's Court, to take it on his file and to dispose of it according to law, after giving notice to the accused.

In an appeal under s. 476-B of the Criminal Procedure Code by a person against whom a complaint has been made, the opposite party entitled to notice is the Crown and not the person on whose application the complaint was made.

Rashid Muhammad Khan v. Emperor (2), followed.

Starting point of limitation for an appeal from an order making a complaint is the date on which the complaint is filed and not the date on which it is signed.

Petition under s. 115 of Act V of 1908 and s. 44 of Act VI of 1918 read with s. 439, Criminal Procedure Code, for revision of the order of the Senior Subordinate Judge, Sialkot, dated the 28th February, 1927, reversing that of the Subordinate Judge, Fourth Class, Daska, District Sialkot, dated the 28th June, 1926.

Mr. Nanwan Mal, for the Petitioner.

Mr. M. L. Puri, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The learned Senior Subordinate Judge, Sialkot, having on appeal under s. 476-B of the Criminal Procedure Code directed the withdrawal of the complaint that had been lodged by a Subordinate Judge, the petitioner on whose application the complaint had been made, seeks revision of the order in appeal mainly on two grounds, viz., (1) that the appeal was barred by time and (2) that the Appellate Court gave no notice of the appeal to him as it was bound to do under s. 476 B.

There is nothing on the record in support of (1). The complaint was signed by the Subordinate Judge on the 3rd July, 1926, and it appears from the Copyist's note on the top of a copy of the complaint which is on the record that it was filed on the 14th December, 1926. If that was correct limitation commenced from that date and the appeal was filed within time because it was filed on the 5th January, 1927; see Fitzhollmes v. Emperor (1).

As regards (2), notice of the appeal was sent to the Collector of the District, and his reply was that representation of the Crown was not necessary. According to s. 476-B, notice was to be sent to the parties concerned. In an appeal against a refusal to make a complaint the parties entitled to receive notice would be the accused person. But if the appeal were by the person against whom a complaint has been made, the opposite party is the Crown, as in all other criminal cases. [See on this point Rashid Muhammad Khan v. Emperor (2) in which it was held that respondent in a criminal appeal or revision is the Crown only].

I, therefore, see no reason for interference and dismiss this application in revision.

To come within s. 114 of the Penal Code the abetment must be complete apart from the presence of the abettor.

The accused was present at the occurrence of an offence under s. 326 of the Penal Code and it was found that the assailant inflicted a blow at the instigation of the accused. There was no evidence to show that there was any conspiracy between the accused and the assailant prior to the occurrence.

Held, that the accused could not be convicted under ss. 326 and 114 of the Penal Code for abetment of the offence under s. 326.

Petition, under ss. 435 and 439 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, praying the High Court to revise the judgment of the Court of Session, Trichinopoly, in Cr. A. No. 35 of 1926 (C. C. No. 18 of 1926, on the file of the Court of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, Trichinopoly).

Messrs. V. L. Ethiraj and A. S. Sivakamianathan, for the Petitioners.

Mr. K. Ganapathi, for the Public Prosecutor, for the Crown.

ORDER.—The petitioner is the 2nd accused in C. C. No. 18 of 1926 on the file of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, Trichinopoly. His son the 1st accused was convicted under s. 326, Indian Penal Code, with having voluntarily caused grievous hurt with an arwal to P. W. No. 1. The petitioner was convicted under ss. 114 and 326, Indian Penal Code, with having abetted the 1st accused (the son) and being present at the occurrence. He was sentenced to rigorous imprisonment for four months. It appears from the judgments of the lower Courts that the part taken by the petitioner in the commission of the offence was only this, namely, that he desired his son to cut P. W. No. 1. In one part of the judgment of the Sessions Judge, the part played by the petitioner is thus described:

"Appellant No. 1 (the son) cut him with an arwal at the instigation of appellant No. 2 (the petitioner).

There is no evidence that prior to this incident there was any conspiracy between the father and son to way-lay P. W. No. 1 and cut him. The petitioner himself has not taken any other part in the offence. On these facts the Courts below convicted him under ss. 114 and 326, Indian Penal Code. It appears to me that the conviction cannot stand and should be set aside. To come within s. 114 of the Penal Code the abetment must be complete apart from the presence of the abettor. The only abetment charged in this case required the presence of the abettor and as I have already observed there is no evidence of any conspiracy prior to the occurrence between the petitioner and his son. In these circumstances s. 114 cannot be invoked for convicting the petitioner reading with s. 326. This view of s. 114 was taken by the learned Judges of the Calcutta High Court in Ram Ranjan Roy v. Emperor (1). In that case the facts were very similar to the facts of the present case except that the main charge there was one of murder. This decision has been followed by our High Court in Annabi v. Emperor (2). The same view of the law has been taken by a Bench of this Court in In re Jogali Bhaigo Naiks (3). In this view the conviction of the petitioner under s. 326 read with s. 114 must be set aside.

The petitioner was sentenced to undergo four months' rigorous imprisonment of which I understand he has already undergone three months. I do not think, therefore, that it is necessary in the interests of justice that he should be called upon to undergo a fresh trial. I set aside the conviction and sentence and acquit him. His bail-bond will be cancelled.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 288—Statement recorded by Committing Magistrate transferred to Sessions Court record—Use of statement as substantive evidence, legality of.

It is not illegal to treat as substantive evidence the statement of a witness recorded by the Committing Magistrate and transferred to the Sessions Court record under s. 288, Criminal Procedure Code. [p. 587, col. 1.]

Amir Zaman v. Emperor (1), followed.

Criminal appeal from an order of the Sessions Judge, Lyallpur, dated the 23rd April, 1927.

Mr. L. Saunders, for the Appellants.

Mr. Khurshid Zaman, for the Government Advocate, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The appellants, Ala Singh, a Jat, and his nephews Saudagar Singh, Sant Singh and Udham Singh, have been convicted by the Sessions Judge of Lyallpur under s. 304-II of the Indian Penal Code for having caused the death of Gurbachan Singh, their collateral, by beating him with sticks on the 13th September, 1926, at village Jhabbar. Ala Singh has been sentenced to eight years' rigorous imprisonment and his nephews to six years' rigorous imprisonment each.

The story disclosed by the record is as follows: Ala Singh's son Anokh Singh was married to Musammatt Wiro some five years ago when she was about ten years old. About three years ago Musammatt Wiro's mother, who was married to one Buta Singh, eloped with Gurbachan Singh taking her children with her and went to live at Akki in Lahore District, about 40 miles from Jhabbar, where Musammatt Wiro was married by Gurbachan Singh to one Fauja Singh, apparently for a handsome consideration. Some five months later Ala Singh, his brother Ladha Singh father of Santa Singh, the appellant and Ujagar Singh, the brother of the appellants Udham Singh and Saudagar Singh (sons of Jawala Singh, another brother of Ala Singh, the appellant) went to Akki and took Musammatt Wiro away to Chak No. 9 where Ala Singh's nephews reside. Gurbachan Singh had been living at Akki under the name of Bahadur Singh, his intention, no doubt, being to conceal his whereabouts from Ala Singh and his family. About the end of August, or in the beginning of September, 1926, Ala Singh returned to Jhabbar. The story for the prosecution is that Ala Singh summoned his nephews, the appellants, to his aid and with them on the morning of the 13th September, 1926, attacked Gurbachan Singh in the latter's field where he was ploughing with his brother Piara Singh (P. W. No. 3) and Mangal Singh (P. W. No. 5). The attack was seen by Wadhawa Singh (P. W. No. 4) cousin of Ala Singh, who at once went to the village and informed the Zaildar Naupal Singh (P. W. No. 9). Naupal Singh sent the Lambardar Hira Singh (P. W. No. 13) to report the matter at Shekhupura Police Station, about fifteen miles away, where the first report was recorded about six o'clock in the evening. Gurbachan Singh was carried to the Jhabbar village dispensary where he died, after making a declaration accusing the appellants, at about half past nine in the morning.

In support of the charge against the appellants the prosecution produced medical evidence proving that Gurbachan Singh had died of the shock caused by his injuries which were seventeen in number, apparently the result of blows upon his arms and legs. The left humerus, part of the left ulna bone, two fingers and the left fibula as well as the left tibia were fractured.

Motive was proved by witnesses who told the story of Musammatt Wiro's abduction along with her mother by Gurbachan Singh and her recovery by Ala Singh. Doctor Shamsheer Singh, the Sub-Assistant Surgeon in charge of the village dispensary, who had examined Gurbachan Singh and witnessed his death Naupal Singh (P. W. No. 9), Fateh Muhammad Patwari (P. W. No. 10) Kartar Singh a cousin of the Zaildar, and Kharak Singh a sarbrah lambardar, gave evidence to prove that Gurbachan Singh had made a statement immediately before he died naming the four appellants as his assailants. This declaration was recorded by Naupal Singh. Piara Singh, Wadhawa Singh and Mangal Singh gave evidence as eye-witnesses of the assault. Naupal Singh also testified that Ala Singh had confessed to his participation in a fight with Gurbachan Singh. There was also a chance witness Bahadur Singh (P. W. No. 15) who stated that he had seen Ala Singh's three nephews riding away from Jhabbar together.

The appellants denied that they had assaulted Gurbachan Singh as alleged by the prosecution. They could not give any reason why they had been falsely accused and they produced no evidence in defence.

Two of the assessors were of opinion that the charge had been proved against all the four accused, one was for acquitting all of them and the fourth thought Ala Singh alone was guilty. The Sessions Judge, agreeing with the convicting assessors, convicted and sentenced the four accused as stated in the beginning of this order.

I have been taken through the record by Mr. Saunders who appears for the appellants and have also heard Mr. Khurshid Zaman who opposes the appeal on behalf of the Crown.

[His Lordship then referred to the evidence and proceeded :—]

The evidence, in my opinion, amply justifies the conviction of all the four accused. Mr. Saunders has not disputed the truth of the story about the elopement of Musammât Wiro from Gurbachan Singh. The facts proved are certainly such as would justify a finding that motive existed for a murderous attack by Ala Singh's relations upon Gurbachan Singh.

As regards the dying declaration, there is no doubt whatever that before he died Gurbachan Singh named the four appellants as his assailants. It is possible that the Sessions Judge is right in doubting whether Gurbachan Singh's statement was recorded at the very time at which it was made. My own opinion is that it was so recorded.

As regards the evidence of the eye-witnesses I am in complete agreement with the learned Sessions Judge's very carefully considered finding that it establishes the guilt of the four accused.

Mr. Saunders has questioned the legality of the Sessions Judge's acceptance as substantive evidence of the statement of Wadhawa Singh, recorded by the Committing Magistrate, and transferred to the Sessions Court record under s. 258 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. This point, however, is conclusively settled against Mr. Saunders by the judgment in Amir Zaman v. Emperor (1).

As regards the discrepancy about the nature of the weapons used by the assailants, it is significant that Doctor Shamsher Singh's opinion at first was that one of the injuries on Gurbachan Singh's leg had been inflicted by a sharp weapon, and I note that in the statement of Doctor Hari Chand, Assistant Surgeon, Sheikhpura, who made the post mortem examination of Gurbachan Singh's body, two contused wounds on the outer side of Gurbachan Singh's left leg were described as bone deep.

In my opinion the appellants were rightly convicted. The learned Sessions Judge inflicted the heavier punishment upon Ala Singh because he was obviously the leader in the assault. I am not prepared to interfere with any of the sentences imposed and I dismiss the appeal.

Bihar and Orissa Food Adulteration Act (II of 1919), ss. 3 (1), 14 (2)—'Labelled', 'sealed', meanings of—Sale of sealed tins—Power of Inspector to demand smaller quantities out of open tins—Adulteration of article—Conviction of accused, legality of—Prejudice.

A Sanitary Inspector went to the accused's shop and found 15 tins of mustard oil exposed for sale. He demanded and got 2½ chhataks of oil and found that the oil was highly adulterated. The accused was prosecuted for an offence under s. 3 (1) of the Bihar and Orissa Food Adulteration Act of 1919. The accused pleaded that he had purchased the tins in a sealed condition and used to sell them in the same condition.

Held, that the procedure adopted by the Inspector in not taking a full tin of oil in its unopened condition was illegal and seriously prejudicial to the accused in view of the provisions of cl. (2) of s. 14 of the Act, and that the accused could not under the circumstances be convicted under s. 3 (1) of the Act. [p. 589, col. 1.]

The word 'labelled' in s. 14 (2) of the Act denotes a written slip of paper or a metal or any other thing fixed or attached to articles of manufacture for the purpose of describing them or specifying their quality, etc., or the name of the maker. Neither the word 'labelled' nor the word 'sealed' necessarily means that the article should contain the name of the manufacturer. All that is required is that it must be distinctive from which the maker or manufacturer or the firm could be easily traced. [p. 588, col. 2.]

Appeal from an order of the Magistrate, Dhanbad, dated the 9th July, 1927.

The Government Advocate, for the Appellant.

Mr. S. N. Bose, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal by the Government under s. 317 of the Code of Criminal Procedure against the order of the Magistrate, dated the 9th of July, 1927, acquitting the accused Shib Das Marwari. He is a shop-keeper in Mauza Katras. On the 16th of January, 1927, the Sanitary Inspector of Jheria Mines Board of Health went to his shop and found 15 tins of mustard oil exposed for sale. He demanded 2½ chhataks of oil and told him that he required it for analysis. The chemical analysis disclosed that the oil was highly adulterated. The accused told the Inspector that he had purchased the tins of oil in a sealed condition, in the same condition in which he purchased them and he used to sell them in that very condition. A Sanitary Inspector visited the Dhanbad Oil Mills on the 23rd of January and purchased a sample which was found to be slightly adulterated. The accused was then prosecuted for an offence under s. 3 (1) of the Bihar and Orissa Food Adulteration Act (II of 1919), and was convicted by the Magistrate on the 25th of February, 1927. On appeal the conviction was set aside by the Sessions Judge of Purulia by his order dated the 2nd of May, 1927, upon the ground that no evidence was gone into the case and that the accused had not admitted his guilt. The accused was ordered to be re-tried and was accordingly placed on his trial again on the 9th of July, 1927. He has again been acquitted by the Magistrate upon the ground that the Sanitary Inspector did not take a full tin of oil in its unopened condition and consequently the accused was not given an opportunity of proving that he bought the oil in the same unopened tin and in the same condition in which it was exposed for sale. The Magistrate says that the procedure adopted by the Sanitary Inspector was irregular and the bona fide intention of the accused was not rebutted and that he was entitled to the benefit of doubt especially when according to the evidence he had purchased the tins only on the day previous to the date on which the sample was taken. The irregularity referred to in the judgment of the Magistrate relates to s. 14, sub-cl. (2) of the Act which says "no person shall be required under s. 6 to sell such food except in the unopened tin or packet in which it is contained." The learned Government Advocate disputes the correctness of the view taken by the Magistrate and says that the above-mentioned sub-cl. (2) of s. 14 has no application to the case, inasmuch as it refers to "food sold or offered for sale or exposed for sale in an unopened tin or packet duly labelled" as is set forth in the preamble to s. 14 and the oil in question in this case was contained in an unopened tin but the same was not duly labelled. The case of the accused from the very beginning has been that he had purchased the tin containing the oil, sample of which was taken by the Inspector, along with other similar tins thirty-two in number bought from the Oil Mills at Dhanbad and that he used to sell those tins in the unopened condition in which he had purchased them with the oil therein in the same condition and that on the day and the time when the Inspector took sample from the tin in question it along with 14 others was exposed for sale. That this was his case is to be found in the statement of the case given by the Inspector in his complaint wherein he says that he found exposed for sale 15 tins of mustard oil and subsequently in order to test the explanation of the accused he had the Oil Mills at Dhanbad inspected and sample of mustard oil taken from that Mill. The Inspector was examined on the 9th of July, 1927. The accused was asked to plead and did make his defence on the 8th of July, a day earlier. In his plea the accused stated to the Magistrate that he had taken sealed tins from the Dhanbad Oil Mills and that they remained in the condition in which he had purchased them and he used to sell them in the same condition. The expression used by the accused "sealed tins" is meant to import the idea that the tins were purchased from a recognized shop with a distinctive mark put on them. Accepting the contention of the learned Government Advocate as to the scope and meaning of "unopened tin or packet duly labelled" used in s. 14 it would come under that. The word "labelled" according to the ordinary acceptance of the term would denote a written slip of paper or a metal or any other thing fixed or attached to articles of manufacture for the purpose of describing them or specifying their quality, etc., or the name of the maker. The accused says that the tins were sealed and apparently he could not mean anything else than that they bore the distinctive mark showing that they belonged to the Dhanbad Oil Mills from which the accused had purchased them. Let it be stated that neither the word "labelled" nor the word "sealed" necessarily means that it should contain the name of manufacturer. All that is required is that it must be distinctive from which the maker or manufacturer or the firm could be easily traced. The accused clearly gave the condition of the tins on the 8th of July as bringing it within s. 14 of the Act when he was examined in Court, in the cross-examination of the Inspector questions were directed to corroborate the case of the accused on this point. The prosecution, therefore, had full notice and knowledge of what the defence was, namely, that the tins in question came under the definition of it given in s. 14. The Inspector did not question it, but suggested that it was easy for the accused to put in adulterated matter into the tin, inasmuch as it could be easily opened and then closed easily, because the mouth was closed with liquified tin.

The suggestion then was that the accused after having purchased the tin from the Dhanbad Oil Mills opened it and further adulterated the oil and then closed it again, which according to the Inspector would take a few minutes.

I, therefore, hold in agreement with the Magistrate that the tin in question was such as is contemplated by s. 14 of the Act and that the accused could not be required to sell the oil contained in it except the entire unopened tin as it was. Clause (2) of the section would, therefore, apply to the case. It was, therefore, wrong on the part of the Inspector to require the accused to sell to him $2\frac{1}{2}$ chattaks of the mustard oil by opening the tin.

The learned Government Advocate says that even if the Inspector had acted illegally in not purchasing the entire tin as is required by cl. (2) of s. 14, yet the oil of the tin having been found to be highly adulterated the accused could not take advantage of the illegality or irregularity and must suffer the penalty of law for exposing the oil contained in the unopened tin for sale. He refers to cl. (1) of s. 14 and says that it was for the accused to show that the oil in the tin was in the same condition in which it was sold to him by the Mill and after that after due care and attention he believed that it was genuine. The procedure adopted by the Inspector has to my mind prejudiced the accused seriously and deprived him of the best evidence to prove his bona fides. Had the tin containing the oil in question been taken possession of by the Inspector by purchasing it in the condition in which he found it, the accused could have been in a position to show that the oil in the tin was in the same condition in which he purchased it from the Mill. It could also have been seen whether the tin had any mark to indicate that it was surreptitiously opened and the contents thereof adulterated by the accused by the easy process referred to by the Inspector in his evidence. The accused made his own statement and examined the Assistant Manager of the Dhanbad Oil Mills, who admitted that only a day earlier the accused had purchased 32 tins of mustard oil from the Mill and that the tins were soldered with liquified tin.

The tin in question also was soldered in similar manner. This would indicate that the accused was telling the truth and that he gave the best evidence that was available and that any further best evidence was very much affected by the illegal procedure adopted by the Inspector.

In the circumstances of the case the accused was entitled to an acquittal. The appeal is, therefore, dismissed.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V. of 1898), s. 120—Period for which security is to be given, commencement of—Joint trial of several persons, legality of.

Under s. 120, sub-s. 2, Criminal Procedure Code, the period for which security is to be given commences on the date of the order under s. 118, that is, the date of the final order, and not from the date of the preliminary order. [p. 590, col. 1.]

Where in proceedings under s. 107 of the Criminal Procedure Code the essence of the charge was that the accused formed one gang with one purpose, namely, that of harassing the complainant and each act spoken to by the witnesses was an act prompted by that common object and directed towards accomplishing it and the evidence of the common association of all the persons for that one purpose was particularly strong:

Held, that the accused could be jointly tried. [p. 591, col. 1.]

O. No. 22 of 1925.

ORDER.—This criminal revision case is against the order of the Sessions Judge of Bellary dismissing an appeal to him against an order of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate of Bellary in a case under s. 107 of the Criminal Procedure Code. Two points are urged (1) that the period for which security has been ordered to be given exceeds the period fixed in the preliminary order under s. 112 (2) that the joint trial of the petitioners was illegal and highly prejudiced them.

As to point (1), the preliminary order under s. 112 was drawn up apparently on 28th October, 1925. Then the date has been struck out and 4th January, 1926, entered. That order called on the petitioners to show cause against giving security to keep the peace for one year, not, be it noted, for one year from that date. The final order was written, signed apparently on 21st September, 1926, and pronounced on 2nd October, 1926. It is the petitioners' contention that it is not open to the trial Court to order security for more than one year from the date of the preliminary order, that is, at the farthest upto 4th January, 1927. I am not prepared to accept this argument which would entail that in a case of this kind the time occupied by the trial Court would have to be subtracted from the period for which security should be given; such an interpretation of the law is bound to encourage accused persons in prolonging the trial as long as possible, since the longer they prolong it the shorter will be the time for which they will give security. In fact were they successful in prolonging the trial for one year, they will escape having to give security at all, and render the whole proceedings something of a farce. I am clear that this was not the intention of the Code. Section 120, sub-s. 2 lays down clearly that the period for which security shall be given shall commence on the date of the order under s. 118, that is, the date of the final order.

As to the second point, the argument is that the joinder of the petitioners in one trial has prejudiced them because the lower Courts have considered the evidence as a whole against all the petitioners and thus have used against some petitioners evidence which was given only against others. There were seven accused and the general case against them was that accused Nos. 2 to 7 are the hangers-on of the 1st accused who is the village Reddy, and owing to enmity between the 1st accused and P. W. No. 1 the 1st accused along with these adherents of his, accused Nos. 2 to 7 have been making P. W. No. 1's life in the village a burden to him, endeavouring to have him boycotted by the coolies and barbers and to drive him from the village. The prosecution case was that all these accused combined with one purpose to bring about this result. I have studied the evidence as a whole and it is clear that it is all directed towards this common purpose animating all the accused, namely, accused No. 1 urging the other accused to accomplish this purpose and the other accused carrying out in various ways petty acts of social tyranny and use of criminal force to aid and abet the 1st accused in his purpose. It is not a case where evidence is given of isolated acts which have no relation to this common purpose. The evidence of witnesses who speak to only some of the accused doing a particular act is, therefore, in my view, relevant to prove the common purpose animating all of these. In these circumstances it appears to me, that the joint trial was proper and that no illegality or prejudice to the accused has occurred.

My attention has been called to a ruling of a Single Judge of this Court reported as In re Kutti Goundan (1). It, however, can easily be distinguished on the facts. In that case two persons were put up jointly for giving security under s. 110, cls. (d), (e) and (f), that is, put shortly, for being habitual extortioners, mischief makers and dangers to the community. The learned Judge held that the evidence regarding their association in their nefarious acts was not strong; that being so, he held that their joint trial prejudiced each of them. The case in Hari Telang v. Queen-Empress (2) was also a case under s. 110, cls. (d), (e) and (f), and the Court held that it was improper to try jointly two persons charged under s. 110 (f), because it could not be said that their individual characters were so connected together that a joint trial on the ground that their characters render them dangerous persons was permissible. The case in Angnoo Singh v. Emperor (3) is very similar and in it also the learned Judge held that the evidence connecting the various accused together was very vague, general and of a hearsay description.

This cautionary principle does not apply to the present case. The essence of it is that the petitioners formed one gang with one purpose, namely, that of harassing P. W. No. 1 and each act spoken to is an act prompted by that common object and directed towards accomplishing it. The evidence of the common association of all the petitioners for that one purpose was particularly strong. I do not find that any objection on the ground of joint trial was taken before the trial Court, and it certainly was not made a ground of appeal before the Sessions Judge. In these circumstances I am not prepared to say that the joint trial was illegal or in any way prejudiced the accused. I am not prepared to interfere in this case and dismiss the petition.

JUDGMENT.

Allanson, J.—The 21 petitioners have been convicted under ss. 147 and 353/34 of the Indian Penal Code and sentenced to six months' rigorous imprisonment under each section, the sentences to run consecutively. The petitioner, Gendo, has also been fined Rs. 50.

On the 5th November, 1926, an Excise Inspector and Sub-Inspector with a number of Excise subordinates went to make house searches for illicit liquor and illicit distilling apparatus in village Haphua. The accused, who are all Oraons, belong to this village. The houses of Gendo and Mirwa accused were searched and also the house of one Dukhi and illicit liquor or distilling apparatus were found in each of these houses. While the search was going on in the house of the accused Somra there was an alarm, and a mob of 40 or 50 men started smashing and removing the articles which had been already attached and which had been left in charge of an Excise Head Constable. The Excise Inspector and his men remonstrated, but they were attacked by the excited mob and nine of them were injured and the whole party had to run away. The only names that could be given in the First Information were those of the persons whose houses had been searched. But at subsequent test identifications a number of persons, including the present petitioners, were identified by various members of the Excise party.

The prosecution witnesses who were not previously acquainted with the petitioners were not in a position to say what overt act each person did, that is which of them smashed the handis or which of them struck which of the excise party. They could only identify them as among the rioters. The learned Judicial Commissioner on appeal ignored the evidence of two witnesses, who in their depositions merely said that at the test identification they identified certain persons. This was really a faulty record by the Magistrate. The witnesses ought to have said that they identified these persons as among the mob. No defence witnesses were examined.

Sir Ali Imam on behalf of the petitioners urged that as the occurrence took place in the village, and as the Excise Officers were picketing certain houses and not allowing egress and ingress, the villagers must have been looking on, and no one can be convicted unless an overt act is proved against him. I find no evidence or suggestion that among a crowd of onlookers certain persons suddenly formed an unlawful assembly. The smashing of the handis and the subsequent attack on the Excise Officers was, according to the evidence, the work of a number of men. Moreover, in an occurrence of this kind, in which the witnesses did not know from before the person taking part but were only able to pick them out at a subsequent test identification, clearly it would be the persons nearest to the witnesses who would be likely to be identified. It would be curious if, instead of identifying as among the rioters those persons whom they really saw in the unlawful assembly, the prosecution witnesses should have picked out innocent onlookers who would presumably be at some distance. Any person who, when the smashing of the handis began, intentionally joined or remained in the unlawful assembly was a member of that unlawful assembly. Such a person could not help being aware that the action of those men was unlawful. Any person who has innocently got into a crowd and is unable owing to pressure of numbers to escape from it, of course, is not a member of the unlawful assembly; but he would have to make out his case on that point. There is no question here of such a crowd that innocent onlookers could not get out of it. No one who intentionally joins or continues in an unlawful assembly can be allowed to say that he was merely a harmless spectator. He must prove that he was there owing to no fault of his own and that he could not get out of the crowd. The whole object of the provisions of s. 142 of the Penal Code would otherwise be defeated. There is nothing to show that any of the accused were innocent onlookers or that the witnesses have identified as rioters persons who were merely looking on. None of the accused pleaded he was an innocent onlooker.

The other point argued on behalf of the petitioners is that they have really been convicted twice over for the same offence. But the common object of the unlawful assembly was to compel by criminal force the Excise Officers to stop the house searches, and this was effected by smashing up the handis, etc. When the Excise Officers expostulated with the rioters, they proceeded to attack them. The common object of the unlawful assembly was not to assault the officers, but the occurrence subsequently developed into such an assault. There can be no doubt that the assaults were made in furtherance of the criminal intention of the accused, namely, to drive away the Excise Officers. It was held in Prakash Chandra Kundu v. Emperor (1) which was also an Excise case, that separate convictions are legal under ss. 147 and 353, even when the common object of the unlawful assembly was to assault the public servants. The persons actually assaulting could also be sentenced under s. 353. In the present case the assault on the public servants was not the common object of the unlawful assembly. The assault took place later; but from the evidence it is clear that it was done in furtherance of the common intention of the mob and each of the accused is liable under s. 353/34. As was remarked in the above case, the question is rather an academic one; as the sentences passed could have been given under s. 147 only.

The aggregate sentences are not excessive. The assaults on the Excise Officers, the interferences with their work, and the destruction of the evidence of illicit distilling that had been detected were quite unjustifiable. The occurrence was of a serious nature and the work of Excise Officers would be brought to a standstill and their persons endangered, if they were liable to be attacked with impunity by a large body of aboriginals when they go to make searches in a village.

The application is rejected.

Sen, J.—I agree.

DEFENDANTS—RESPONDENTS.

Will—Construction—Absolute estate with clause that if devisee does not appoint successor estate shall descend to testator's heirs—Validity of disposition—Gift over—Defeasance clause—Executory devise—Condition prescribing succession unknown to law—Principles relating to construction of Wills—'Malik', meaning of.

A testator after making dispositions of certain property in favour of his son's widow M, and his grandson's widow P, provided as follows: 'On the death of M or P, the survivor will become the proprietor of the entire property or of that property which exists then (that is, at the time of the death of the lady who dies first) with power of transfer and then she will have all the powers of sale, mortgage, gift and bequest; after the death of the last survivor, the property which she will leave without nominating a successor will devolve on the legal heirs of the declarant (that is, the testator), but as against the said Musammats and their successors whom they will nominate no one will have any claim.' In a suit by the heir of the testator against the heirs of P who survived M and died without appointing any successor:

Held, (1) that P took an absolute estate under the Will; [p. 597, col. 2.]

(2) that there was no executory gift in favour of the heirs of the testator, and that even if there was such a gift it was invalid in law; [ibid.]

(3) that the estate taken by P was not an estate defeasible in the event of her not making a Will; [p. 597, col. 2; p. 598, col. 1.]

(4) that the testator had by the latter portion of the Will merely endeavoured to lay down a line of succession contrary to the succession known to the law, which he had no power to do; [p. 598, col. 1.]

(5) that the heirs of P were entitled to the estate on P's death in preference to the heir of the testator. [ibid.]

Per Stuart, C. J.—Where a testator has devised what is on the face of it an absolute estate and has subsequently added a clause, which has the appearance of reducing the powers of an owner of an absolute estate, it is necessary to decide what were his real intentions. Did he mean to grant an absolute estate? If he has done so, he cannot reduce the powers of the owner; and an attempt to reduce those powers will be repelled on the ground of the repugnancy of the restraint. But if, on the other hand, it appears that his full intention has been directed towards restriction it will have to be held, if the restriction is good, that the estate is not absolute. This is the law both in England and in India. [p. 598, col. 1.]

Per Wazir Hasan, J.—It is a universal rule of construction that the "grammatical and ordinary sense of the words is to be adhered to, unless that would lead to some absurdity, or some repugnance or inconsistency with the rest of the instrument, in which case the grammatical and ordinary sense of the words may be modified, so as to avoid that absurdity and inconsistency, but no further. [p. 599, col. 1.]

'In construing Wills in all cases the primary duty of a Court is to ascertain from the language of the testator what were his intentions, i.e., to construe the Will. In so doing they are entitled and bound to bear in mind other matters than merely the words used. They must consider the surrounding circumstances, the position of the testator, his family relationships, the probability that he would use words in a particular sense, and many other things which are often summed up in the somewhat picturesque figure. 'The Court is entitled to put itself into the testator's armchair.' But all this is solely as an aid to arriving at a right construction of the Will, and to ascertain the meaning of its language when used by that particular testator in that document. So soon as the construction is settled, the duty of the Court is to carry out the intentions as expressed, and none other. The Court is in no case justified in adding to testamentary dispositions. If they transgress any legal restrictions they must be disregarded. If they leave any eventuality unprovided for, the estate must, in case that eventuality arises, be dealt with according to the law which provides for succession of property in the absence of testamentary directions applying thereto. But the Court never adds to a Will anything which needs to be done by testamentary disposition. In all cases it must loyally carry out the Will as properly construed, and this duty is universal, and is true alike of Wills of every nationality and every religion or rank of life. That native testators should be ignorant of the legal phrases proper to express their intentions, or of the legal steps necessary to carry them into effect, is one of the most important of the 'surrounding circumstances' which the Court must bear in mind, and it is justified in refusing to allow defects in expression in these matters to prevent to carry out of the testator's true intentions." [p. 599, cols. 1 & 2.]

Rules established in English Courts for construing English documents are not as such applicable to transactions between natives of this country. [p. 599, col. 2.]

A Court cannot speculate upon what the testator may have intended to do or may have thought that he has actually done. It cannot give effect to any intention which is not expressed or plainly implied in the language of the Will. [p. 600, col. 1.]

It is always dangerous to construe the words of one Will by the construction of more or less similar words in a different Will, which was adopted by a Court in another case. [ibid.]

If a testator makes an absolute gift of property to A, any gift over of what may be left undisposed of by A is repugnant and void. [p. 603, col. 1.]

Per Misra, J.—The word 'malik' when used in a Will or a gift imports full proprietary rights unless there is something in the context to qualify it. [p. 607, col. 2; p. 608, col. 1.]

Where clear words have been used in a Will indicating that the donee has been made 'malik' and complete powers of transfer have been conferred upon him, it is not further necessary in order to give effect to the full powers conferred upon the donee that there must also be a provision in the Will to the effect that the estate conferred upon him is a heritable one. [p. 608, col. 2.]

[English and Indian case-law discussed.]

First appeal under s. 96, Civil Procedure Code, against the judgment and decree of the Sub-Judge, Lucknow, in Suit No. 239 of 1925, dated the 20th August, 1926.

The case came on for hearing before the Hon'ble the Chief Justice and Raza, J. on the 9th August, 1927, who made the following

ORDER OF REFERENCE.

The facts may shortly be stated as follows:—A certain Baldeo Singh executed a valid Will, dated the 24th February, 1911, under which he devised a portion of his property to Musammam Mahraj Kuar, the widow of his deceased son and to Musammam Param Kuar, widow of his deceased grandson, in the following manner. If they survived him—they did so survive him—they were to succeed jointly to a life-interest in this property. On the death of one of them.—Mahraj Kuar predeceased Param Kuar—the survivor was to succeed to the property “with power of transfer and powers to sell, mortgage or give away by gift or Will.” Param Kuar, as survivor, did so succeed. The Will continues that after such survivor's death the property, which she will leave without nominating the successor, will pass to the legal heirs of the deceased. It is on this latter clause that contest has turned. The plaintiff-appellant has been found by the learned trial Judge to be the sole legal heir of Baldeo Singh. The defendant-respondents all have been found to be the legal heirs of Param Kuar; and accepting for the moment the position that this conclusion of fact is correct, the decision of the case would turn upon the legal effect of the clause directing that such succession should open to the testator's heirs in event of the survivor, i.e., Param Kuar, not making a Will. We may here deal briefly with one or two points. It was asserted on the part of the plaintiff-appellant that under a custom of the family daughters could not succeed and that he was the legal successor to Param Kuar. The learned trial Judge has decided against the existence of such a custom. The learned Counsel for the plaintiff-appellant has stated to us that although the appeal asserts the existence of such a custom he does not propose to argue in favour of its existence. It is also the case that the defendants-respondents asserted the existence of a Will in favour of one of them. The learned trial Judge has decided against the genuineness of this Will. We are given to understand that the learned Counsel for the defendants-respondents proposes to argue in favour of the genuineness of the Will. We now come to the main point. What is the law in a case like this? The matter is one of some difficulty as there have been conflicting decisions in the late Court of the Judicial Commissioner upon the point and there is no binding authority by this Court. In view of the importance of the question involved we are of opinion that it should be decided by a Full Bench of this Court, and we accordingly refer to a Full Bench the decision of the question. We consider that it will be better not to put the point into the form of an exact question. We make the reference under the provisions of s. 14, Local Act IV of 1925.

[August 9, 1927.—The learned Chief Justice directed that in view of the importance of this question a Full Bench consisting of all the Judges of the Court (five in number) be formed and that one whole day be devoted in the cause list for the argument.]

Messrs. Ali Zaheer, Niamat Ullah and Bisheshwar Prasad Misra, for the Appellant.

Messrs. P. L. Banerji, Rameshwar Dayal, and Bisheshwar Nath Srivastava, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT OF THE FULL BENCH.

Stuart, C. J.—(October 18, 1927).—This is a reference to a Full Bench of the Court made under the provisions of s. 14, Local Act IV of 1925. The reference was made on the 9th August, 1927, by a Divisional Bench of which I was a member; and as it was considered that the questions involved in the reference were of considerable importance it was directed that the Full Bench should consist of all the Judges of the Court. The facts upon which the reference is based are as follows. A certain Baldeo Singh executed on the 24th February, 1911, a Will (Ex. 17) a translation of which will be found at page 5 of Part III of the printed paper-book. The plaintiff-appellant, Thakur Jagmohan Singh, and the defendants-respondents, Musammam Sheoraj Kuar, Janki Kuar and Suraj Kuar are agreed that this Will was executed by Baldeo Singh, and that the testator was of sound disposing mind. The first portion of the Will is devoted to a devise of certain property to the testator's daughters. In this it is clearly declared that the property in question is to be given at the time of the testator's death to his daughters and their heirs and in no circumstances is that property to return to the testator's family. The reference is only concerned incidentally with this portion of the Will.

The portion of this Will with which the reference is concerned explicitly is in respect of the following devise. The testator had a son Ambar Singh and a grandson Anrudh Singh. Both Ambar Singh and Anrudh Singh had died before the date of the execution of the Will. The testator made dispositions of certain property in favour of Mahraj Kuar, widow of Ambar Singh, and of Param Kuar, widow of Anrudh Singh. This portion of the Will commences by stating that the property which is to come into the possession of Mahraj Kuar and Param Kuar at the time of the testator's death is to be considered the estate proper, and that the property devised to the daughters and their heirs is to be considered as property separated from the estate. The Will directs that Mahraj Kuar and Param Kuar are to maintain the status of the estate and the house as they exist, and are not to alter them. The disposition in favour of Mahraj Kuar and Param Kuar in respect of the property devised to them is stated to be that Mahraj Kuar is to become proprietor (malik) and possessor of the entire ancestral property (with the exception of the property devised to the daughters) without any right to sell or mortgage it except to meet the charges of land revenue, the expenses of marriages, or other necessary expenses. Mahraj Kuar was to retain the management of the property and to meet from the income disbursements in respect of the payment of servants, marriages, and family ceremonies, and other expenses of management. She was to support Param Kuar if Param Kuar agreed to live with her. But in event of Param Kuar refusing to live with Mahraj Kuar, the net balance left over from the income after the payment of all charges was to be divided into two moieties one of which was to be enjoyed by Param Kuar.

Their estate was of a limited nature. This portion of the Will presents no difficulty.

I now come to the portion of the Will which presents difficulty and which constitutes the main portion on which the reference is based. The Will continues, that on the death of Musammatt Mahraj Kuar or Param Kuar the other will become the proprietor of the property detailed at the end of the Will with any additional property that may exist upon the death of the lady who predeceased the other; and then follows a condition that such property is to be given to the survivor as proprietor with power to transfer; that she is to have the power to transfer the property in question by sale, mortgage, gift or by a testamentary devise. The next clause states that, should such lady die without having nominated a successor by Will, the property is to pass to the heirs of Baldeo Singh.

Mahraj Kuar predeceased Param Kuar, and Param Kuar succeeded as survivor to the property in question. Param Kuar is now dead. It does not appear that Param Kuar transferred any property in her lifetime. The learned trial Judge has found that Param Kuar died intestate. Jagmohan Singh, the plaintiff-appellant, is admitted by the defendants-respondents to be the heir, under the Mitakshara Law, of Baldeo Singh, and Musammats Sheoraj Kuar, Janki Kuar and Suraj Kuar are admitted by the plaintiff-appellant to be the heirs, under the Mitakshara Law, of Musammatt Param Kuar. The questions which arose in the appeal before the Divisional Bench that have been referred to the Full Bench for decision are these. What is the construction to be placed upon the portion of the Will to which I have adverted and what is the law which should be applied to that portion of the Will when constructed? I take first the question of construction. The principles which I consider should be applied in a case like this are these. The Will must be read as a whole, and it must be decided what the testator actually meant in respect of the particular disposition. In arriving at this conclusion different considerations will arise. The Will in question has clearly not been drafted by a trained conveyancer. It is drafted loosely and carelessly, and it can be asserted with confidence that the words are used in a popular sense. Remembering that the document is drafted not by a trained conveyancer and that the words are used in a popular sense, it is necessary to decide what Baldeo Singh intended to give to Param Kuar upon the death of Mahraj Kuar, in the circumstances which have now occurred. According to my reading of the terms of the Will I consider that he intended Param Kuar to be the absolute owner of the property in question. I should not attach undue importance to the use of the word malik or proprietor by which he describes the recipient, if that word stood alone, for I find that in an earlier part of the Will the same word malik is used when only a limited estate has been granted to the recipient. Reading together the words—malik kul jaedad ba ikhtiyar intaqal—the said words meaning proprietor of the whole estate granted with power of transfer with the subsequent words that the recipient is to have full power to transfer by sale, mortgage or Will, I can only draw the conclusion that Baldeo Singh intended to make the recipient a full proprietor. That is the first point. It is true that he adds a condition that should the recipient have died without making a Will the property is to devolve, not to the recipient's heirs, but to his heirs. This is the difficulty and this is the principal point upon which the reference has been made. In a case such as this in which the testator has devised what is on the face of it an absolute estate and has subsequently added a clause, which has the appearance of reducing the powers of an owner of an absolute estate, it is necessary to decide what were his real intentions. Did he mean to grant an absolute estate? If he has done so, he cannot reduce the powers of the owner; and an attempt to reduce those powers will be repelled on the ground of the repugnancy of the restraint. But if, on the other hand, it appears that his full intention has been directed towards restriction it will have to be held, if the restriction is good, that the estate is not absolute. This is the law both in England and in India. I do not think it necessary to refer to authority as the question, in my opinion, does not admit of argument. The Court has frequently difficulty in such a case in construing the testator's intentions, but the difficulty here is not altogether one of construction. There have been two previous decisions of the Judicial Commissioner's Court which have treated this subject in view of the decision in

Hanbury v. Fisher (1); the decision of the House of Lords in appeal in the same case contained in Comiskey v. Bowring Hanbury (2) and a judgment of a Single Judge of the Court of Chancery in Comiskey v. Hanbury (3). The first decision of the Judicial Commissioner's Court was a decision of my own in 1918 when I was officiating as Judicial Commissioner. It is reported as Indar Kuar v. Chheda Singh (4). That decision was considered in a subsequent appeal decided by a Bench of the Judicial Commissioner's Court in 1921. This is reported as Rajeshuri v. Mathura Singh (5). It largely was owing to the apparently divergent views in these two decisions, that this reference was made by the Divisional Bench of which I was a member. I need not repeat the facts in Hanbury v. Fisher (1) and Comiskey v. Bowring Hanbury (2) as those facts are stated at length in the Oudh decisions in question. But I wish to explain what I meant in my previous decision. All that I wished to decide upon the point was that where an estate had been granted absolutely subject to an executory gift of the same at the death of the recipient, the executory gift was effective. In the case which I then tried I was of opinion that an absolute estate had been conferred subject to an executory gift. I might have expressed myself better in that judgment, and I do not contend in favour of every statement I made therein. I consider that I overstated the power of Mrs. Hanbury to dispose of the property, and I wish to withdraw the somewhat loose statement that in cases such as this there is a necessary antagonism between the gift of an absolute estate and the gift over. I am of opinion now that the true meaning of the decision of the House of Lords was that Mrs. Hanbury had obtained an estate which would become absolute if the executory gift failed. The subjection of the absolute nature of the estate to the executory gift, if the executory gift prevailed, was in effect to limit the estate to a certain extent. This was the view taken by Eve, J. in Comiskey v. Hanbury (3). In the well-known treatise Jarman on Wills, 6th Edition, the editor considers the decision in Comiskey v. Bowring Hanbury (2) to be authority for the proposition that it was "a gift to the wife for life with a power of appointment among the nieces and a gift to the surviving nieces in default of appointment, and if no niece survived, the wife shall take absolutely" page 1185 and he further at page 1323 stated that Mr. Hanbury's Will gave to his wife "an absolute interest defeasible in the event of any niece surviving her." I consider that this is the correct interpretation of the decision. In the particular case of Indar Kuar v. Chheda Singh (4) I laid down nothing more. I found that the recipient of the estate Musammam Mithana had received an absolute estate subject to an executory gift in favour of Indar Kuar. If Indar Kuar had predeceased Musammam Mithana the absolute estate in favour of Musammam Mithana would have become a perfect estate, but as Indar Kuar survived Musammam Mithana the executory gift held good. I do not think that the learned Judges who decided Rajeshuri v. Mathura Singh (5) appreciated my position. In the particular case which they decided they found that an absolute estate had been granted, and that there was no executory valid gift. Holding that view they rightly decided against the person who asserted the executory gift. I think it sufficient to say that what I consider to be the law on the subject is the law as known before the decision in Comiskey v. Bowring Hanbury (2) which laid down nothing to the contrary.

I can now approach the conclusion. Mr. Niamat Ullah, who has argued very ably on behalf of the appellant, has asked us to construe the Will as giving to the survivor of Mahraj Kuar and Param Kuar nothing more than a life-estate with a power such as is known in English Law as a power of appointment. He would have us take the view that Baldeo Singh did not grant under this portion of the Will a full proprietary estate, that he granted only a power of enjoyment and in addition a power of appointment. If I accepted the view that on the construction of the Will he had granted only a power of enjoyment together with a power of appointment I should accede to his argument, but I do not accept that view. In my opinion Baldeo Singh devised in this portion of the Will a full estate, but superadded to it a direction that the intestate succession of the holder of the full estate should be succession other than the succession known to the Hindu Law. Mr. Niamat Ullah would have us take the words "owner with power of transfer by sale, mortgage, gift or Will" as nothing more than conveying a power of appointment. But as I read the words they made the recipient a full owner; and the words denoting the power of transfer were descriptive of full ownership. I cannot find in the deed that there was any good executory gift to Baldeo Singh's heirs. I cannot find that there was any executory gift at all. My construction of the Will is that Baldeo Singh created the recipient a full proprietor, and that he added words by which he endeavoured to substitute for the succession known to the Hindu Law a succession which appealed to him. It is true that in the Will he does not state the recipient is to have hereditary rights, and from this Mr. Niamat Ullah argues that he meant she was not to have hereditary rights. In my opinion the possession of hereditary rights follows as a consequence of full proprietorship. In my opinion it is not necessary to state explicitly that a donee has a hereditary rights when the donor intends that he should have them, provided the donor has made his meaning absolutely clear to the effect that the donee is to have a full proprietary estate. The ownership of a full proprietary estate includes the possession of hereditary rights. I consider that Baldeo Singh intended to give an unfettered absolute estate, and being ignorant of the law which prevented him, when he had made such a gift, from controlling the intestate succession of the donee endeavoured to control it by laying down a rule of succession contrary to the rule of the law. Mr. Niamat Ullah commenced with the argument that no absolute estate was granted. I have already decided that on my construction of the Will an absolute estate was granted. He next took up the position that, even if an absolute estate were granted there was a good executory gift in favour of his client that had taken effect. I have already found that on my construction of the document there was no executory gift. He then took a third alternative plea. His case was that all that Param Kuar acquired was an absolute estate defeasible in the event of her not making a Will, and that inasmuch as she did not make a Will the estate reverted to the heirs of the testator, that is to say, to his client. This argument is similar to the argument which I have previously considered. I cannot construe the Will in this manner. Upon its wording it is, in my opinion, impossible to draw the conclusion that Baldeo Singh intended that if the recipient died without making a Will, the portion of the estate of which she had not disposed during her lifetime would be forfeited. This is purely a question of construction. I consider that he had no thought of a forfeiture of the estate granted. He has endeavoured, according to my view, to lay down a line of intestate succession contrary to the succession known to the law. There was no intention of forfeiture, in any circumstances. What I consider him to have intended is that if the recipient did not make Will, the portion of the estate of which she had not disposed during her lifetime should be diverted according to a line of succession unknown to the Hindu Law.

I now summarise my views. I consider that this case and all other cases of the same nature should be determined upon a construction of the document as a whole relating to the disposition. I consider that in cases such as this the actual intention of the testator should be sought from the words of the document keeping in mind the circumstances in which it has been prepared. Where, as here, the document has been prepared by persons unskilled in conveyancing the construction should follow the meaning of the words as found to be meant by the testator.

When, as here, it is found that the testator had intended to give an absolute estate and has attempted to limit the rights of the holder owing to an erroneous view of his powers so to limit those rights, the attempt to limit the rights must be rejected on the ground of repugnancy. I would, therefore, return the case to the Divisional Bench with a finding that Musammam Param Kuar succeeded to an absolute estate and that upon her death intestate the property would devolve upon her heirs. On this view the appeal would fail.

Hasan, J.—(October 29, 1927).—The question in this reference is the interpretation of the Will of one Baldeo Singh dated the 24th of February, 1911. Baldeo Singh, died in 1912 and it is agreed that Musammam Mahraj Kuar succeeded to the estate now in dispute under the devise contained in the said Will of Baldeo Singh. Musammam Mahraj Kuar was the widow of Ambar Singh, who was the son of Baldeo Singh and had predeceased his father.

Musammam Mahraj Kuar died on the 3rd of October, 1917, and it is further agreed that on her death Musammam Param Kuar succeeded to the same estate under the terms of the same Will. Musammam Param Kuar was the widow of Anrudh Singh, son of Ambar Singh and grandson of Baldeo Singh. Anrudh Singh had also died in the lifetime of Baldeo Singh. Musammam Param Kuar died on the 29th of May, 1922. The suit, out of which this reference arises, is brought by Jagmohan Singh for possession of the estate of Baldeo Singh, which was held possessed by Musammam Param Kuar at her death. For the purposes of this reference it is agreed that the plaintiff, Jagmohan Singh, is the heir-at-law under the rules of the Mitakshara to the estate of Baldeo Singh. The plaintiff claims the right to enter into the possession of the estate in suit on the death of Musammam Param Kuar. The three defendants, Musammam Sheoraj Kuar, Musammam Janki Kuar and Musammam Suraj Kuar, are the daughters of Musammam Param Kuar.

The plaintiff's case as presented at the arguments before us is that the estate which Musammam Param Kuar acquired under the Will of Baldeo Singh was determinable at her death and on the happening of that event the plaintiff is entitled to succeed either as a devisee under the same Will or as an heir-at-law of Baldeo Singh. The precise matter for decision, therefore, is the nature of the estate acquired by Musammam Param Kuar under the Will of the 24th of February, 1911 and its legal effect.

The estate of which Musammam Param Kuar died possessed was, it is agreed, devised to her in terms of cl. 3 of the Will and the argument on behalf of the appellant is that on a proper construction of that clause and in the light of other dispositions in the Will Musammam Param Kuar acquired only a limited estate with powers of alienation and testamentary disposition. The second line of argument that whatever be the nature of the estate which Musammam Param Kuar acquired, absolute or limited, it was subject to defeasances on the happening of the contingency of her dying without nominating a successor and it is agreed for the purposes of this reference that the contingency has happened. The broad contention on behalf of the defendants is that Musammam Param Kuar acquired an absolute estate and that the course of succession prescribed by the clause in question on the happening of the contingency is invalid both as gift over and as a direction. It is agreed that this course of succession is not the course of inheritance according to law which will follow on the death of Musammam Param Kuar if she died possessed of an estate of inheritance. The trial Court has accepted the defendants' interpretation and contention and dismissed the plaintiff's suit.

Clause 3 of the Will of the 24th of February, 1911, is unfortunately not in such a happy state of lucidity as to enable us to ascertain the intention of the testator without any difficulty. This being so, the principles of construction which eminent Judges have on former occasions enunciated for arriving at a conclusion as to the intention of the testator are to my mind of great and abiding value and I confess that I ordinarily take light from such principles in construing documents where language employed to express the intention is ambiguous, equivocal or to say the least not clear. To my mind the saying "to construe one man's nonsense by another's is nothing but pedantry. It seems to me that to apply the same rules of sound judgment as have been applied by former Judges to the interpretation of documents is but common sense.

In Grey v. Pearson (6) Lord Wensleydale observed that it was the universal rule of construction that the "grammatical and ordinary sense of the words is to be adhered to, unless that would lead to some absurdity or some repugnance or inconsistency with the rest of the instrument, in which case the grammatical and ordinary sense of the words may be modified, so as to avoid that absurdity and inconsistency, but no further."

The second principle, which I should bear in mind, may best be expressed in the language of Lord Moulton in the case of Venkata Narasinha Appa Row v. Parthasarthy Appa Row (7). His Lordship made the following observations:—"In all cases, the primary duty of a Court is to ascertain from the language of the testator what were his intentions, i.e., to construe the Will. It is true that in so doing they are entitled and bound to bear in mind other matters than merely the words used. They must consider the surrounding circumstances, the position of the testator, his family relationships, the probability that he would use words in a particular sense, and many other things which are often summed up in the somewhat picturesque figure. 'The Court is entitled to put itself into the testator's armchair'.....

But all this is solely as an aid to arriving at a right construction of the Will, and to ascertain the meaning of its language when used by that particular testator in that document. So soon as the construction is settled, the duty of the Court is to carry out the intentions as expressed, and none other. The Court is in no case justified in adding to testamentary dispositions. If they transgress any legal restrictions, they must be disregarded. If they leave any eventuality unprovided for, the estate must, in case that eventuality arises, be dealt with according to the law which provides for succession of property in the absence of testamentary directions applying thereto. But the Court never adds to a Will anything which needs to be done by testamentary disposition. In all cases it must loyally carry out the Will as properly construed, and this duty is universal, and is true alike of Wills of every nationality and every religion or rank of life.... That native testators should be ignorant of the legal phrases proper to express their intentions, or of the legal steps necessary to carry them into effect, is one of the most important of the 'surrounding circumstances' which the Court must bear in mind, and it is justified in refusing to allow defects in expression in these matters to prevent the carrying out of the testator's true intentions."

To the observations of Lord Moulton I would add the following observations of Wilson, J. in Ram Lal Sett v. Kanai Lal Sett (8) quoted with approval by Lord Macnaghten in the case of Bhagabati Barmanya v. Kali Charan Singh (9).

"It is no new doctrine that rules established in English Courts for construing English documents are not as such applicable to transactions between natives of this country. Rules of construction are rules designated to assist in ascertaining intention, and the applicability of many such rules depends upon the habits of thought and modes of expression prevalent amongst those to whose language they are applied. English rules of construction have grown up side by side with a very special law of property and a very artificial system of conveyancing, and the success of those rules in giving effect to the real intention of those whose language they are used to interpret depends not more upon their original fitness for that purpose than upon the fact that English documents of a formal kind are ordinarily framed with a knowledge of the very rules of construction which are afterwards applied to them. It is a very serious thing to use such rules in interpreting the instruments of Hindus, who view most transactions from a different point, think differently, and speak differently, from Englishmen, and who have never heard of the rules in question".

The third principle upon which I rely is this—"We are not at liberty to speculate upon what the testator may have intended to do, or may have thought that he had actually done. We cannot give effect to any intention which is not expressed or plainly implied in the language of his Will". Per Lord Watson in Scale v. Rawlins (10).

The fourth and the last principle of which I want to make use in this case is stated by Sir John Edge in the case of Sasiman Chowdhurain v. Shib Narayan Chowdhury (11) "that it is always dangerous to construe the words of one Will by the construction of more or less similar words in a different Will, which was adopted by a Court in another case."

I now proceed to the task of interpreting the Will before us. In the first part of this Will the testator recites the fact that he has no male issue and that he had made a previous Will. He then expresses his desire to alter the nature of the devise which he had made in his previous Will in favour of his grand-daughter and alters it. By this Will there is no doubt that he gives absolute "proprietary" estate to them and emphasizes it by saying that

"under any circumstances and at any time it shall not revert to my family". The estate so conferred on those daughters is clearly an estate of inheritance in terms of the Will itself. He, however, restricts the inheritance, in case of issue, to male issue only as is also clear from cl. 6 of the Will. This, it is not disputed, he could not do. It is clear, therefore, that the testator was labouring either under ignorance or forgetfulness of the rule of law that he had no power to prescribe a course of inheritance different from the course prescribed by law. After this appear manifestations of the testator's intention to make devise in favour of Musammam Mahraj Kuar and of Musammam Param Kuar. The first devise in favour of these ladies is made and expressed in the following passage:—

"As to my remaining property at first Musammam Mahraj Kuar.....and after her Musammam Param Kuar.....will become proprietors. Nothing will be done against this; that they will maintain the status of the family and the estate which exists at present and will not alter it, only the land granted to the daughters shall be separated from the estate." I regard the words just now quoted the main and the real words of disposition and what follows as "conditions" annexed to the said devise as the Will itself says. I construe these words as constituting the two ladies full and complete owners (malik), successively, of the property of the testator except the property bequeathed to the grand-daughters. The absolute ownership is emphasized by the words "Nothing will be done against this" which clearly mean that nothing will affect their status of full owners. "That they will maintain the status of the family and the estate.....and will not alter it," is an expression of wish, or at the most, is a direction, as to the mode of enjoyment conveying the desire of impartibility of the estate. Here again the futility of the testator's wish is apparent and the same wish permeates through all the subsequent clauses of the Will which the testator describes as "conditions". In condition No. 2 he again makes Musammam Mahraj Kuar proprietor (malik) of the estate "together with all the rights and things without exception of anything and right," and again imposes a restriction on her power to sell and to mortgage limited by the need of paying the revenue, meeting the expenses of the daughters' marriages and for other necessary expenses. There is much force in the arguments advanced by Mr. Niamatullah, Advocate for the appellant, that the status of a "proprietor" conferred on Musammatt Mahraj Kuar in cl. 2 is subjected to such disabilities as appertain to the status of a Hindu female and, therefore, the estate conferred is not higher than the usual Hindu female's estate. I think, however, that the argument loses all its force when it is considered in relation to the main words of the devise and the first portion of cl. 2 and lastly cl. 3. From the language employed in the whole of the Will and in the several clauses when separately considered I am irresistably led to the conclusion that the dominating idea in the testator's mind was that he could confer full ownership on a person and could also validly impose restraints on mode of enjoyment, on power of alienation and on the course of inheritance. This is by no means an uncommon failing of Indian testators.

Now comes cl. 3 of the Will. It may be translated as follows:—

"That on the death of Musammatt Mahraj Kuar or Param Kuar the survivor will become the proprietor of the entire property or of that property which exists then (that is, at the time of the death of the lady who dies first) with power of transfer and then she will have all the powers of sale, mortgage, gift and bequest; that after the death of the last survivor the property which she will leave without nominating a successor will devolve on the legal heirs of the declarant. But as against the said Musammats and their successors whom they will nominate no one will have any claim".

The construction of this clause is not free from difficulty. The intention of the testator as evidenced by the language of cls. 2 and 3 is, however, clear in one respect and it is this that the fetters as to the mode of enjoyment and power of alienation are removed as soon as one of the two ladies dies and the property passes into the hands of the survivor. This shows that the fetters placed on one of the conditions were intended to be placed for the benefit of the other.

Now the words "will devolve on the legal heirs of the declarant," are either words of limitation appertaining to the estate of the survivor or words of purchase; in other words they either prescribe a line of inheritance which the testator wished to follow on the death of the survivor of the two ladies intestate or they constitute a direct gift by the testator in favour of his legal heirs in the same event. If the latter construction is the true construction then there is a gift over in favour of a class to be ascertained at the death of the survivor. It seems to me, however, that the former construction is more supported by the language of the clause under consideration and by the general scheme of the Will. In the first place, there are no words of gift in favour of the heirs. In the second place there is no specified individual as the object of the testator's bounty. Be that as it may, if the preceding estate is an absolute estate the subsequent direction treated either as laying down a course of inheritance or as a gift over to a class must fail as will be shown hereafter.

Is there then a gift of absolute estate to the survivor? I have already expressed the opinion that the estate in dispute was devised in favour of the two ladies successively in absolute ownership under the first part of the Will of Baldeo Singh. In legal phraseology the devise amounts to the devise of an absolute estate in favour of one subject to an executory devise of the same estate in favour of the survivor. Clause 3 now under consideration is intended to explain and amplify the nature of the estate in the hands of the survivor. I find nothing in the language of cl. 3 to disclose the intention on the part of the testator of cutting down in any respect the absolute estate already devised. To my mind the nature of the estate in the hands of the survivor as expressed in this clause is precisely the same as is conferred upon her by the devise contained in the first part of the Will. The language employed on the first occasion for the purpose of indicating the nature of the estate is "at first Mahraj Kuar.....and after her Param Kuar will become proprietors (malik)". In cl. 3 the words used are "on the death of Musammatt Mahraj Kuar or Param Kuar the survivor will become the proprietor (malik)". The grammatical and ordinary sense of the word 'malik' is well understood. Expressed in English language it means "owner of property" and this is the sense in which the testator must be taken to have used it, having regard to the language spoken and written by the testator, to the modes of expression prevailing amongst persons of his class and to the entirely inartistic frame of this Will. As observed by Lord Buckmaster in Bhaidas Shivdas v. Bai Gulab (12) the word "malik" is not "a term of art, it does not necessarily define the quality of the estate taken but the ownership of whatever that estate may be." This Will is the Will of my countryman and is couched in the language which is my language. I strongly feel that I can say with confidence that the word "malik" in the setting in which it is placed here means nothing less than the status of a full owner embracing within it and connoting the incidents of an estate of inheritance and of power of alienation. In this particular Will, however, the two incidents of absolute ownership just now mentioned do not rest on implication alone. They are both expressly stated as will be presently shown.

It is argued by Mr. Niamat Ullah that the power of alienation is added by devise to the limited estate conferred on the survivor and in support of the argument reference is made to powers of appointment in English Wills and deeds. To my mind the analogy is misleading. Power of appointment, as understood in English law of real property was not, I am convinced, within the mental vision of the testator at all. I presume that he was wholly ignorant of it. According to my judgment the testator speaks of the power of alienation and testamentary disposition not by way of a gift of such power in addition to the gift of a limited estate but simply by way of explanation and amplification of what was implied as an inseparable incident in the status of a malik. There are no words connoting the gift of such a power and we cannot create one. I should not be understood to mean that the testator was under any legal disability to make a devise of a power of appointment if he intended to make one. All I say is that he had no conception of it and he has not made such a devise. The decision of their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in Bai Motivahu v. Bai Manubai (13) is, if I may respectfully say so, instructive in this connection. In this case their Lordships held that the testator had substituted his daughter Mameo in his own place and in that character had given her power to designate the person by her Will in whom the estate was to vest absolutely. They held that there was nothing contrary to any principle of Hindu Law in the testator making a gift of such a power. They said that there is an analogy to it in the law of adoption. They further held that the person taking the estate by virtue of the exercise of the power must take it as a devise of the testator and must fulfil the conditions in which the testator could himself make him a devisee. Their Lordships ended their judgment by making a very important pronouncement and it is this: "But whilst saying this they think they ought also to say that, in their opinion, the English Law of powers is not to be applied generally to Hindu Wills." The word "power" in cl. 3 of the Will stands for the word "ikhthiar", which only means "freedom, liberty" and is not a technical term. On the other hand, the word "power" in English conveyancing is a technical term and quite distinct from the power which a man has over his own property by virtue of his ownership—Tremayne v. Rashleigh (14). In my long experience extending over a quarter of a century in this part of the country I have not come across a Will or a deed in which power of alienation has been conferred as distinct and separate from the incident of ownership in property. To use the language of Wilson, J. in Ram Lal Sett v. Kanai Lal Sett (8), already quoted, "it is a very serious thing to use rules of construction of English Law in interpreting the instruments of Hindus, who view most transactions from a different point, think differently, and speak differently from Englishmen, and who have never heard of the rules in question". I think the limits of the application of the doctrine of "power" as understood in English Law to instruments executed by Indians must be taken to have been defined by their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in Bai Motivahu v. Bai Manubai (13), where power to designate a successor to the testator was upheld.

But even if I assume that there is a power of appointment added to a devise of a limited estate the assumption does not in any opinion advance the plaintiff's case. The scope and validity of a devise of power is subject to the same rules of law as any other devise, for instance, the rule against perpetuity. In the exercise of such wide and general powers as are given by cl. 3 of this Will, there is a possibility of the rule being broken. The power is, therefore, bad in law. But whether this is so or not one thing is clear. When the learned Advocate for the appellant asks me to construe the power of alienation contained in this clause as a power of appointment according to English Law I feel at liberty to take aid from cases decided in English Courts in construing the power under consideration. According to English decisions a gift over for life with a general power of appointment by deed or Will is equivalent to an absolute gift—Bray v. Bree (15), Jebb v. Tugwell (16) and In re Wolstenhome, Marshall v. Aizlewood (17).

The other argument advanced for the purpose of wresting the word "malik" of its necessary incidents and natural meaning is that the context shows that the devisee was divested of the estate of inheritance. The argument is fair but not sound. In support of the argument reliance is placed upon the passage—"the property...will devolve upon the legal heirs of the declarant." I am unable to conceive that a person possessed of testamentary powers without any restriction, as is the case here, is not possessed of an estate of inheritance. A Will may and it usually does provide for succession which may be either in accordance with law or against it. In my opinion the passage relied upon is an express provision as to succession to the estate of the devisee and in this sense it is consistent and not inconsistent with the implication involved in the full estate already and repeatedly devised in favour of the survivor by the testator. Thus the natural meaning of the word "malik" is not in any manner displaced or qualified by the context. The present case, therefore, entirely falls within the principle of the decision of Sasiman Chowdhurain v. Shib Narayan Chowdhury (11), in which the previous cases are reviewed.

Even if I construe this passage as a provision of gift over, which I do not, I cannot consistently with rules of sound judgment hold that the gift over was intended to cut down the prior estate of inheritance. There are no words showing such an intention and I cannot enter into the region of speculation. A gift over on the happening of a contingency of the nature mentioned in this clause (that is the devisee dying without nominating a successor) does not with reasonable certainty indicate the testator's intention to reduce the preceding absolute estate into a limited estate—Thornhill v. Hall (18), Fetherston v. Fetherston (19), Watkins v. Weston (20). In In re Freeman, Hope v. Freeman (21) Lord Justice Buckley at page 691* says—"The second principle is that a clear gift in a Will is not to be cut down by anything subsequent which does not with reasonable certainty indicate the intention of the testator to cut it down. If there be a plain gift in a Will the Court will not say it is defeated by something ambiguous in a codicil which does not plainly cut down the previous gift." Moreover, the gift over, if any, is quite consistent with the testator's view amply manifested in this Will that he could make a devise of an absolute estate and at the same time put restraints on such an estate.

I do not, however, hold that the passage "will devolve upon the legal heirs of the 'declarant'" contains any gift over. There are no words of gift. On the contrary, the words employed are clearly words indicating the devolution of inheritance. They are in marked contrast with the language used in relation to the estate of the grand-daughters: "It shall not revert to my family." I take no objection to the gift over, if any, on the ground that it is not in favour of a specified individual. It would be valid in favour of such members of the class as are in existence at the testator's death—Bhagabati Barmanya v. Kali Charan Singh (9). But I am of opinion that there is no gift over. I hold that in the passage relied upon the testator prescribes the course of inheritance which he desires, that the estate of the devisee should follow in case of intestacy. It is agreed that this course is contrary to the course prescribed by law. The testator's wish, therefore, must fail and the inheritance according to law should be left to run its course. It seems to me that the present case is wholly covered by the decision of their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in the case of Lal Ram Singh v. Deputy Commissioner of Partabgarh (22). This was a case which went before their Lordships on appeal from a decision of the late Court of the Judicial Commissioner of Oudh and I may be permitted to add that I was Counsel in the case in the said Court. In that case the ultimate remainder in absolute estate was held to have vested in one Lachhman Singh. The document had also provided that the inheritance shall devolve according to the provisions of s. 22 of the Oudh Estates Act, 1869. The rules of inheritance according to that section were, however, applicable to the grantor himself, and could not be applicable to the grantee. The document was, therefore, construed to mean that the grantor intended that the heirs to Lachhman Singh's estate shall be the same persons as were the heirs of the testator himself. [See the report of the appeal in the Court of the Judicial Commissioner in Narain Singh v. Deputy Commissioner of Partabgarh (23).] In deciding the appeal Lord Phillimore said: "In the first place, they (their Lordships) think that, to borrow a phrase from the English law of real property, the words 'heirs and representatives' are to be treated as words of limitation and not of purchase,—that is, that they are merely intended to express the absolute estate which it was proposed to give to Lachhman as distinguished from the life-estates which had preceded it. This being so, the latter words in the sentence may be regarded either as an idle attempt to derogate from the grant previously made and, therefore, to be rejected, or as words of description only, stating the legal incidents which the grantor conceived to belong to the estate which he had granted. In this case, his mistake as to the legal consequences does not affect the grant which he has made. They think, therefore, that Lachhman received an absolute estate in reversion."

Now I assume that there is a gift over: but having regard to the nature of the contingency on which it rests and the rule of law applicable to such an executory gift I hold that the gift over fails. It is clearly repugnant to the absolute estate conferred by the testator on the survivor of the two ladies. In the case of Sreemutty Soorjee-money Doozee v. Denobundo Mullick (24), Lord Justice Turner said:—"A man cannot create a new form of estate or alter the line of succession allowed by law, for the purpose of carrying out his own wishes or views of policy." This was quoted by Lord Justice Willes in the well-known case of Jotendromohun Tagore v. Ganendromohun Tagore (25), and he himself made the following observation:—"Inheritance is a rule laid down (or in the case of custom recognised) by the State, not merely for the benefit of individuals, but for reasons of public policy. It follows directly from this that a private individual, who attempts by gift or Will to make property inheritable otherwise than the law directs, is assuming to legislate, and that the gift must fail and the inheritance take place as the law directs." In the case of Dixon v. Charlesworth (26), Swinfen Eady, J., held, on the authority of Holmes v. Godson (27), that a gift over on death "without a Will" following a prior absolute estate "being inconsistent with the law regulating the devolution of the property in that event, is void for repugnancy."

It now remains to consider the last argument of the learned Advocate for the appellant in support of the appeal. He argues that the estate vested in Musammam Param Kuar was defeated by the happening of the contingency that she has died without nominating a successor. In support of this argument reliance is placed on Bhoobun Mohini Debia v. Hurrish Chunder Chowdhury (28) and Kristoromoni Dasi v. Narendro Krishna Bahadur (29). In the first mentioned case, the defeasance of the absolute estate depended on the failure of issue of the donee of the absolute estate (the contingency did not happen). In the second case on the construction as placed by their Lordships of the Judicial Committee on the Will in that case no estate shifted on defeasance from one donee to another. The bulk of the devise was held to be invalid. Certain life-estates and remainderman's estates were upheld. The two cases, therefore, are wholly inapplicable to the present case. In this case there are no words of defeasance and apart from the gift over there is nothing from which a defeasance of the prior estate can be inferred; and if the gift fails it must be held that the prior estate subsists and the plaintiff cannot succeed as an heir-at-law to the testator.

An executory devise on defeasance of a prior estate resting on a contingency of this nature is invalid, as already shown but I here take the liberty of quoting a passage from the judgment of Fry, J., in the case of Shaw v. Ford (30) which is as follows:—

"Now, that being so, I have to inquire what are the general principles of law applicable to such a case? They may, I conceive, be stated in this way. Prima facie, and speaking generally, an estate given by Will may be defeated on the happening of any event; but that general rule is subject to many and important exceptions. One of those exceptions may, in my opinion, be expressed in this manner, that any executory devise, defeating or abridging an estate in fee by altering the course of its devolution, which is to take effect at the moment of devolution and at no other time, is bad. The reason alleged for that is the contradiction or contrariety between the principle of law which regulates the devolution of the estate and the executory devise which is to take effect only at the moment of devolution and to alter its course. I am not bound to inquire into the logical sufficiency of the reason given, because it appears to me that the exception is well-established by the cases of Gulliver v. Vaux (31); Holmes v. Godson (27) and Ware v. Cunn (32). Another exception to the general proposition which I have stated is this, that any executory devise which is to defeat an estate, and which is to take effect on the exercise of any of the rights incident to that estate, is void; and there again the alleged reason is the contrariety or contradiction existing between the nature of the estate given and the nature of the executory devise over. A very familiar illustration is this, that any executory devise to take effect on an alienation, or an attempt at alienation, is void because the right of alienation is incident to every estate in fee simple as to every other estate. Another illustration of the same principle is that which arises where the executory devise over is made to take effect upon not alienating because the right to enjoy without alienation is incident to the estate given. Now that exception is fully justified by the cases of Bradley v. Peixoto (33); Ross v. Ross (34) and In re Yalden (35)."

The executory devise (or the gift over) also fails on the ground that the subject-matter was uncertain. The uncertainty arises out of the fact that the testator clearly intended that the survivor may dispose of the property which passes into her hands either by transfer inter vivos or by testamentary disposition. She could exercise this power to the extent of the whole property or she may not exercise it at all. On the date of the death of the testator, the date from which the Will came into operation, the subject-matter of the executory devise was, therefore, uncertain. It is immaterial for this purpose that Musummat Param Kuar as a matter of fact died without making any transfer or disposition. This principle was applied by Lord Buckmaster in the case of Bhaidas Shivdas v. Bai Gulab (12), on the authority stated therein of the case of Horwood v. West (36). "It may be observed", says Mr. Jarman, "that in numerous instances a devise or bequest of what shall remain or be left at the decease of the prior devisee or legatee has been held to be void for uncertainty". Most of the cases quoted by Mr. Jarman in support of the view just now stated can also be explained on the ground that if a testator makes an absolute gift of property to A any gift over of what may be left undisposed of by A is repugnant and void as is remarked by the learned Commentator, of the sixth edition of Jarman's treatise on Wills at page 463. In Bull v. Kingston (37) the gift over in case the devisee dies without a Will was held void on the ground of uncertainty. Another case on the same lines is Eade v. Eade (38). This finishes the reference.

The Honourable the Chief Judge and my learned brother justices Misra and Raza have said something in their judgments in respect of Indar Kuar v. Chheda Singh (4) and Rajeshuri v. Mathura Singh (5). Out of respect to them I feel that I also must say something. In my opinion both these cases were rightly decided if I may respectfully say so. In the first-mentioned case, I was Counsel for the appellant and my arguments were accepted and the appeal was allowed. The first argument was as to the construction of the Will and the construction placed on behalf of the appellant was that the devise of absolute estate in favour of the widow was subject to an executory devise in favour of the daughter. In support of the validity of the devise Comiskey v. Bowring Honbury (2) was cited. On the side of the respondents the construction was not questioned. What was questioned was that there could be no valid executory devise annexed to an absolute preceding estate. This was overruled and if I may say so with great respect was rightly overruled as a proposition of law. This is the substance of the decision in Indar Kuar v. Chheda Singh (4). In the second case no argument was advanced that the absolute gift could well in law be subjected to an executory devise or that there was any valid executory devise at all in that particular Will. This being so, the decision on the arguments as they seem to have been presented in that case was, it seems to me and if I may again respectfully say so, rightly given.

As regards the decision of the House of Lords in the case of Comiskey v. Bowring Honbury (2) just now mentioned, the judgments delivered by several noble Lords constituting the tribunal clearly show that the case turned upon the construction of the particular Will alone and no point of law was decided. The point of law involved in the case, all along assumed and not disputed, was that an absolute estate may be validly subjected to a valid executory devise. This is expressed in the terms of the decree prepared in the case.

My answer, therefore, to the reference is that Musammam Param Kuar acquired an absolute estate under the Will of Baldeo Singh, dated the 24th of February, 1911, and she died possessed of the same. The gift over, if any, is void in law.

Misra, J.—(October 21, 1927.)—The question referred to us for the decision of the Full Bench is one relating to the interpretation of a Will executed by one Baldeo Singh on the 24th February, 1911. Baldeo Singh owned immoveable property of large value in the District of Sitapur. He died in 1912 leaving Musammam Mahraj Kuar, widow of Ambar Singh his son, Musammam Param Kuar, widow of Anrudh Singh his grandson, and three grand-daughters. Under the terms of his Will he gave to his grand-daughters certain plots of land and devised the remaining portion of his estate to Musammam Mahraj Kuar and Musammam Param Kuar without any power of alienation as long as both of them were alive. After the death of one of them the surviving widow was to become owner of the entire property. It was also provided in the Will that the property which remained undisposed of by the surviving widow would go to his heirs provided no successor had been appointed by the said widow to succeed to the property after her death.

After the death of Baldeo Singh in 1912 the two widows, Musammam Mahraj Kuar and Musammam Parama Kuar, succeeded to his property. Musammam Mahraj Kuar died on the 3rd October, 1917, and after her death Musammam Param Kuar succeeded to the property. She also died on the 9th May, 1922. After her death Jagmohan Singh plaintiff-appellant applied for mutation of names in respect of the property left by the deceased Musammam Param Kuar but was opposed by Musammam Sheoraj Kuar, the defendant-respondent, who claimed the property under a Will alleged to have been executed by Musammam Param Kuar in her favour. The mutation of names was effected by the Revenue Courts in her favour, and subsequently by virtue of a compromise, defendants-respondents Nos. 2 and 3 obtained a decree for possession.

sion against her in respect of a certain share in her possession. The plaintiff-appellant Jagmohan Singh has now brought the present suit for possession of the entire property against all the defendants.

The defence entered upon by the defendants in the case was to the effect that under the Will of Baldeo Singh, Musammat Param Kuar was the absolute owner of the property in suit, and the plaintiff was not entitled to succeed in the face of the Will executed by Musammat Param Kuar in favour of defendant No. 1. It was contended that in any case, the property being the absolute property of Musammat Param Kuar, that is, her stridhan the plaintiff was not entitled to succeed to the property left by her in preference to daughters and thus preferentially entitled to succeed to her stridhan under the Hindu Law.

It was contended in reply on behalf of the plaintiff-appellant that on a true construction of the Will, only a life-estate had been conferred upon Musammat Param Kuar, and that on her death the property passed to the heirs of Baldeo Singh, the testator, and the plaintiff being the nearest reversioner to him was entitled to succeed to it. The genuineness of the Will alleged to have been executed by Musammat Param Kuar in favour of Musammat Sheoraj Kuar, defendant No. 1 was also denied, and it was further contended that there existed a family custom under which the daughters were excluded from inheritance of the stridhan of their mother; and thus the plaintiff-appellant was entitled to the property in suit being the nearest heir of Anrudh Singh, the husband of Musammat Param Kuar.

The learned Subordinate Judge of Lucknow who tried the case, found that no such custom as was pleaded by the plaintiff was proved to exist. He also found that the genuineness of the alleged Will of Musammat Param Kuar, set up by the defendant No. 1 had not been established. He further found that the plaintiff was the nearest heir of Baldeo Singh. He, however, interpreted the Will as conferring an absolute estate on Musammat Param Kuar and held that the defendants being the daughters of Musammat Param Kuar were preferentially entitled to succeed. He further held that the provision in the Will as to the succession of the heirs of Baldeo Singh was invalid and inoperative. In that view of the case he dismissed the plaintiff's suit,

In appeal the various findings arrived at by the learned Subordinate Judge were challenged, and one of the questions referred by the Bench, before which the case originally came for hearing, to the Full Bench was whether on a proper interpretation of the Will of Baldeo Singh, Musammat Param Kuar got an absolute estate or only a life-estate in the property in suit.

In order to be able to determine the said question I should like to quote para. 3 of the Will as it stands in the original:—

"Yeh ki Musammat Mahraj Kuar wa Param Kuar men seek bewah marjavegi to dusari malik kul jaedad musarraah zail ya us waqt jo ho ba-ikhtiyar intiqal ho jawegi aur usko jami ikhtiyarat bai wa rahen wa hibba wa wasiyat hasil honge aur bad wafat uske jo jaedad ki bila namzad karne kisi qayam-muqam chhor jawe wo wirsaa jaez manmuqir ko pohonchegi magar bamuqable Musammat man mazkur ya uske qayam maqum ke jisko bazariye tahrir namzad kare kisi ko koi haq na hoga."

The above clause of the Will when translated runs as follows:—

On the death of either Musammat Mahraj Kuar or Musammat Param Kuar, the survivor will become the absolute owner of the property detailed in the Will or of that portion of the property which may be found to exist at the time with power of transfer and that she will have all powers to sell, mortgage or to make a gift or Will of the said property; after her death whatever property she will leave undisposed of without nominating a successor, will devolve upon the legal heirs of the testator, but as against the said ladies or their successors whom they might choose to nominate in writing no one will be entitled to lay any claim to the property.

After giving my best consideration to the terms of the Will quoted above I have arrived at the conclusion that the estate conferred on Musammat Param Kuar was an absolute estate and not merely a life-estate. The words used in the Will, as will appear from the clause quoted above, are "malik ba-ikhtiyar intiqal (owner.....with powers of transfer). In order to make his intentions clear the testator further provided in the same clause that the survivor shall have all powers to sell, mortgage, to make a gift or Will of the property. In several cases their Lordships of the Privy Council have recently held that the word "malik" when used in a Will or a gift imports full proprietary rights unless there is something in the context to qualify it. In the case of Surajmani v. Rabi Nath Ojha (39) the words used in the deed of gift were "malik wō khud ikhtiyar" and their Lordships held that the words implied a gift of full proprietary rights. In the case of Fateh Chand v. Rup Chand (40) the words used in a Will of a Hindu testator were "malik wo qabiz" (owner in possession), and their Lordships held that the Will conferred full ownership on the devisee.

In Bhaidas Shivdas v. Bai Gulab (12) a Hindu testator had made a gift to his widow by means of constituting her "malik" (owner) of his property and by further providing that she would have power to leave whatever property might remain after her death to her daughters named in the Will as she liked. Their Lordships held that the Will conferred an absolute estate on the widow.

In Sasiman Choudhurni v. Shib Narayan Chowdhury (11) a Hindu by his Will gave his moveable and immoveable properties to his two widows, and provided that after his death they should have in every way full power and proprietary rights over the properties devised. The word used in the Will was "milkiyat". Their Lordships referred to the previous cases decided by them and held that the word "milkiyat" which meant all proprietary rights was enough to confer full and complete rights as proprietors including the full rights of alienation. The same rule of interpretation was accepted by their Lordships in Ramachandra Rao v. Ramachandra Rao (41).

In Tikram Singh v. Chet Kunwar (42) a Bench of the late Court of the Judicial Commissioner of Oudh consisting of Chamier, J. C., and Tudball, A. J. C. decided that where a property is given or devised though to a Hindu female, the use of the word "malik" imported full proprietary rights unless there was something in the context to qualify it.

It was contended by the learned Advocate for the appellant that although full power of transfer was given to the survivor of the two widows, yet because there was no provision in the Will that the property was to go by inheritance to the heirs of Musammam Param Kuar, it could not be said that the testator intended to confer an absolute estate upon her. The argument was to the effect that in order to confer an absolute estate not only full powers of transfer should be given but also it should appear from the terms of the Will that the property was to go to the heirs of the devisee. It was pointed out that a person to whom a life-estate was given could also be given a power of transfer; and the mere fact that the power of transfer was given would not apply that it was intended to confer an absolute estate carrying with it heritability also. I do not dispute the proposition that in certain cases a testator may confer a life-estate and may also give to the donee power of appointment or power of transfer. I am not, however, inclined to accept the argument that where clear words have been used in a Will indicating that the donee has been made "malik" and complete powers of transfer have been conferred upon him, it is further necessary in order to give effect to the full powers conferred upon the donee that there must also be a provision in the Will to the effect that the estate conferred upon him is a heritable one.

In Jotendromohun Tagore v. Ganendromohun Tagore (25) their Lordships of the Privy Council have clearly laid down that if an estate were given to a man simply without express words of inheritance, it would, in the absence of a conflicting context, carry with it an estate of inheritance. This case was decided by their Lordships in 1872, and it was followed by the Calcutta High Court so far back as the year 1875; vide, Kollany Kooer v. Luchmee Pershad (43).

In Lalit Mohun Singh Roy v. Chukkun Lal Roy (44) their Lordships of the Privy Council laid down that the word "malik" conveyed an idea of a heritable and alienable estate. The same view was taken by a Bench of the late Court of the Judicial Commissioner of Oudh in Karim Dad Khan v. Bibi Ghafuran (45).

I am, therefore, of opinion that the estate conferred upon Musammam Param Kuar under the Will was an absolute estate carrying with it the idea of heritability as well as of complete powers of disposal.

The next point for our interpretation is how far the provision in the Will providing for the succession of the heirs of Baldeo Singh, the testator, in case of the surviving widow dying without nominating any successor to the property, was a valid provision.

On behalf of the appellant it was contended that the estate conferred upon the surviving widow was a life-estate and consequently the provision was valid and good in law. It was further contended that even if the estate conferred upon the surviving widow be considered to be absolute, the said provision amounted to an executory devise and was a valid one. It was also valid if it be looked upon as a clause in defeasance. On behalf of the respondents it was, however, contended that the said provision was invalid because it amounted to the testator's laying down a course of inheritance to be followed after the death of the surviving widow in certain eventualities.

I have already given my opinion that on a true construction of the Will the estate conferred upon the surviving widow was an absolute one. We have, therefore, to see how far the subsequent provision relating to the succession of the heirs of the testator is valid. It was argued on the strength of a decision of the House of Lords reported as Comiskey v. Bowring Hanbury (2) that an absolute gift coupled with an executory devise of the testator's property was a valid one. It appears to me that although in the decree appended at the end of the judgment on page 92* it is stated that on a true construction of the Will of the testator, Mr. Hanbury, there was a gift of his real and personal estate to his wife absolutely, yet it is evident from the body of the judgment that their Lordships did not desire to lay down such

"To my mind it is clear that he (the testator) is contemplating that she (his wife) shall have the full use of the property during her lifetime, and that after her death one or more of his nieces is to be the object of his bounty, and if his widow does not select one or more, then they are all to share alike."

"Reading the Will without paying any attention to legal rules, and for the purpose only of seeking the testator's intention and the meaning of the words he used, it is obvious that he did not intend that his wife should have an absolute power to dispose of the estate in her lifetime or otherwise than by her Will."

"I think the meaning of the testator from a common sense point of view is clear enough. He wished his widow to have a life-estate in his property, and he then wished after that life-estate that it should be left to his nieces—to those of his own blood."

It would thus appear from the observations quoted above that what their Lordships decided was that the nature of the estate though stated in the Will to be absolute was really of a qualified nature, and consequently the executory devise in favour of the nieces was held to be valid. I am supported in this interpretation by a decision of the late Court of the Judicial Commissioner of Oudh reported as Rajeshuri v. Mathura Singh (5). I am of opinion that that case was rightly decided when it laid down the rule that where an absolute estate was granted, the grant of an ulterior disposition was void. The learned Judges referred to the decision of the House of Lords quoted above and expressed that the ground of decision of their Lordships in that case was that on a true construction of the Will it did not confer upon the donee an absolute power of disposition of the property, and, therefore, there was no repugnance between the estate conferred upon her and the gift over. But even assuming that the true interpretation of the aforesaid decision of the House of Lords is that an executory devise can be validly engrafted to an absolute estate, we have to determine whether there is a good and valid executory devise in favour of a particular individual in the Will before us. I am clearly of opinion that the Will cannot be interpreted to contain any provision which may be considered to be a valid executory devise. The real meaning of the testator appears to be that in case property was not left to any person the surviving widow, it would devolve on his heirs. He did not make any executory devise or gift over in favour of any particular individual or individuals but he only laid down what he considered to be the course of succession which his property should take in a certain contingency. In my opinion, the true meaning to be attached to the clause is that the testator was laying down a course of inheritance but was not making any bequest in favour of any particular individual or individuals to take effect in future.

It is a settled rule of law that a gift over would be void for repugnance where the estate conferred was of an absolute nature. The limitation whether by way of gift over or by way of executory devise would be invalid because it would be inconsistent with the absolute estate or power of disposition expressly given by the Will. There are a large number of decisions of English and Indian Courts which support this principle. In Ross v. Ross (34) it was held that where there was a bequest of a particular sum of money absolutely to a certain individual and there was a further condition inserted by the testator to the effect that in case the donee did not dispose of the said sum by Will or otherwise during his lifetime the said sum should be payable to the heir in tail of the testator, the said condition was void.

In the case reported as Watkins v. Williams (46) the House of Lords laid down the same principle. In that case a certain money fund was given to a person absolutely and a condition was attached to the gift over that so much as he shall not dispose of, should go over to another person. It was held that the condition was invalid and could not be enforced.

In Barton v. Barton (47) it was held that where there was an absolute devise or bequest of real or personal property followed by a gift over in the event of the donee dying intestate, the gift over was repugnant and void.

In Holmes v. Godson (27) the same rule was laid down. A testator had directed that his property was to vest in his son on his attaining the age of 22 years but if he attained the said age but did not make a Will then the property was to be sold and the proceeds therefor applied on other trusts. It was held that the property vested in the son absolutely and gift over was repugnant and void.

In Sures Chandra Palit v. Lalit Mohan Dutta Choudhru (48) the same principle of law was affirmed. In that case a Hindu testator had given his property moveable and immoveable absolutely to his widow and had given her rights of gift, sale and of all other kinds of transfer. He had also authorised her to adopt a son and also provided that in case she did not adopt or if the son adopted by her was not alive at the time of her death, the testator's heirs according to Hindu Law alive at the time of the death of the widow were to get the property which remained after disposal by the widow by way of gift or Will of the same. It was held by their Lordships of the Calcutta High Court (Mookerjee and Roe, JJ.,) that the widow having taken an absolute interest in the estate devised to her, the gift over in favour of the testator's heirs of what might remain undisposed of by her, was void and inoperative in law. The judgment deals with this question most exhaustively, and I entirely agree with the conclusions arrived at by their Lordships of the Calcutta High Court in that case and have nothing to add.

As to the argument that this clause should be treated as a clause in defeasance, it appears to me that it cannot be so interpreted. The estate given to the widow is not anywhere stated in the Will to be liable to be defeated on the happening of a particular contingency. As stated above what the testator actually provided for was that in case the surviving widow did not leave the property to a successor nominated by her by a Will the property such as was left by her was to go to the heir of the testator. He merely prescribed a course of succession which his property was to take if such a contingency happened; he did not provide for the defeasance of the estate held by the widow.

In Kristoromoni Dasi v. Narendro Krishna Bahadur (29) their Lordships of the Privy Council held that it was competent to a Hindu testator to provide for the defeasance of a prior absolute estate contingently upon the happening of a future event but the clause relating to defeasance must comply with certain conditions firstly, that the event must be one that will happen, if at all, at latest immediately upon the close of a life in being at the time of the gift; and secondly, that a defeasance by way of gift over must be in favour of some person in existence at the time of the gift. It would thus appear that in order to operate as a valid clause of defeasance, the clause must amount to a definite gift in favour of a definite individual in existence at the time of the gift. In my opinion the provision in the Will which is before us providing for the passing of the property to the heirs of the testator, cannot be interpreted as a gift in favour of a specified individual in existence at the time and cannot, therefore, be construed to be a valid provision.

My interpretation of the Will, therefore, is as follows:—

The Will conferred upon Musammat Param Kuar an absolute estate and the condition entered therein that in case she did not nominate a successor the property such as was left undisposed of by her was to pass to the heirs of the testator, was an invalid condition being inoperative and unenforceable in law.

Raza, J.—(October 22, 1927.)—The relevant and material clauses of the Will dated 24th February, 1911, are the second and third clauses, which are as follows:—

(2) "That after my death Musammat Mahraj Kuar shall become proprietor and possessor of the entire ancestral property, acquired property, moveable property, groves, trees and houses together with all the rights and things without exception of anything and right, with this condition that if Musammat Param Kuar and Musammat Mahraj Kuar may not live together amicably then after deduction of—all the household expenses and expenses of the servants and guests and visitors and weddings of daughters and other ceremonies in which it may be necessary to give them, in the way in which they are incurred now—whatever profit is left, half of it Musammat Param Kuar will get from Musammat Mahraj Kuar. Besides this she will have no other power. And Musammat Mahraj Kuar shall have no power to contract debts and to sell or mortgage the property except in order to pay the revenue and meet the expenses of weddings of daughters and other necessary expenses."

(3) "That on the death of Musammat Mahraj Kuar of Musammat Param Kuar, the survivor will become the proprietor of all the property detailed below or that property which exists then, with power of transfer and she will have all the powers to sell, mortgage or give away by gift, or Will. And after her death, whatever property she may leave without nominating any successor, will devolve on the legal heirs of the declarant (testator). But as against the said Musammats or their successors whom they will nominate in writing, no one will have any right."

It is on the third clause that contest has turned in this case. It is contended on behalf of the plaintiff-appellant that on the proper construction of the Will, the last surviving widow (Musammat Param Kuar) was given only a life-estate and, assuming that she was given an absolute estate that estate was defeated on the happening of the contingency mentioned in the Will, namely, her failure to nominate her successor.

Thus two points arise for determination in this case.

(1) Was Musammat Param Kuar given only a life-estate by the Will?

(2) If she was given an absolute estate, is the plaintiff-appellant still entitled under the Will to claim the property in dispute after her death, as the heir of Baldeo Singh testator, as she died without nominating a successor?

I have considered the provisions of the Will very carefully. In my opinion Musammat Param Kuar was given an absolute estate and not merely a life-estate, by the Will. She became the absolute owner of the property under the Will and no trust was created in favour of any person. She took the property absolutely for her own benefit. The testator intended to give her an unfettered absolute property and this is what he actually gave her by his Will. The testator has, of course, attempted, after giving the property to Musammam Param Kuar absolutely, to say how the property shall go if she dies leaving any property without nominating a successor, but that is a provision which the law will not allow and it is invalid, being repugnant to the prior absolute gift. When the property vested in Musammam Param Kuar absolutely, the gift over was repugnant and void.

In the case of Sasiman Chowdhurain v. Shib Narayan Chowdhury (11) a testator by his Will provided as follows:—

"I the declarant, of my own accord and free will, in order to avoid future disputes and to perpetuate my name, give all the mauzas in entirety or in part, both ancestral and purchased, theka properties, and all goods, and assets.....and all other properties, to both my first and second wives, Musammam Subast Chowdhurain and Musammam Sasiman Chowdhurain, who after my death will be heirs to all the moveable and immoveable properties.....The said Musammams, after my death, shall have, in every way, full power and all proprietary rights over all the moveable and immoveable properties, and they should, under the deed executed by me, pay annually Rs. 360 to Musammam Lachmi Chowdhurain, widow of my brother, Dular Chowdhury, until her death for her maintenance, and by this deed the said Musammams should get their names recorded in the Government sherista in the columns of proprietors."

In a suit for declaration that the widows took only the ordinary widows' estate under the Hindu Law it was held by their Lordships of the Privy Council that the widows had an absolute estate in the property covered by the testament. The term "malik" when used in a Will or other document as descriptive of the position which a devisee or donee is intended to hold has been held apt to describe an owner, possessed of all proprietary rights including a full right of alienation, unless there is something in the context or in the surrounding circumstances to indicate that such full proprietary rights were not intended to be conferred.

In the case of Bhaidas Shivdas v. Bai Gulab (12) a Hindu testator gave the whole of his immoveable estate to his wife as "malik" and directed that she should leave the property to his two daughters in such manner as she might like. The Will was divided into clauses. By cl. (2) the testator appointed his wife as the sole executrix. In the next clause after stating that he had no son, he appointed his wife to be his heir and the clause continued in these words:—

"And I constitute her the owner. And as to whatever property there may remain after her death my wife shall leave the said property to my two daughters in such manner as she may like (either) by making a 'Will' or by making (some) other instrument. Of my two daughters one named Bai Jamnabai was married to Shah Haridas Hemchand, but as he subsequently died she has now become a widow. To her and to (my) other daughter Bai Dewali who has been married to Shah Bhaidas Shivdas (i. e.), to both of them my wife shall give (my) property in such manner as (she) may like."

By later clauses of the Will the testator referred to powers that he desired his wife to enjoy, for example, by cl. (6) he expressly stated that he gave his wife authority to do what she thought right with profits and the ready moneys of a shop where he carried on business and further to continue any partnership with the partners if she so desired. By cl. (18) he provided that after there had been defrayed out of the rents of certain specific immoveable property, the expenses in connection with a religious object, for which he had made provision, the wife should apply the surplus for her maintenance and use and for the maintenance and use of the daughters if they were living with her, and if the surplus were insufficient she would deal with the moveable and immoveable properties in such manner as she thought fit. By cl. (20) again he gave express power to his wife to mortgage, lease, sell and use the properties. Finally, by cl. (23) he provided that after the death of his wife his daughters should be named executrices and he gave them authority to deal or manage the whole of his property and effects. The following observations were made by their Lordships of the

"There is no dispute that the word that was used in cl. 3 as the original word of gift was the word 'malik' which would be appropriately used to constitute the wife absolute owner. It is not that the word is a 'term of art', it does not necessarily define the quality of the estate taken but the ownership of whatever that estate may be; and in the context of the present Will their Lordships think the estate was absolute. At the time when the Will was executed it may well have been that whoever drew the Will was aware that at that time words of absolute gift in favour of a Hindu widow might not be supposed capable of conferring upon her a power of alienation, for, in the case of Surajmani v. Rabi Nath Ojha (39),...we find that the High Court had ruled:—'that under the Hindu Law, as interpreted up to the present in the case of immoveable property given or devised by a husband to his wife, the wife has no power to alienate unless the power of alienation is conferred upon her in express terms.' The decision in Surajmani v. Rabi Nath Ojha (39) showed that that provision was no longer sound and that if words were used conferring absolute ownership upon the wife, the wife enjoyed the rights of ownership without their being conferred by express and additional terms, unless the circumstances or the context were sufficient to show that such absolute ownership was not intended. If cl. 3 stood by itself it would, their Lordships think, be difficult to dispute that whatever the testator desired with regard to the disposition of his property after the death of his wife, he had not expressed his wishes in such a manner that they bound the property. The words under which the appellant claims are words which only attach to whatever property there may remain after the death of the wife. Without for the moment considering whether the desire expressed by the testator is expressed in a form that makes her disposition of it mandatory or no, it is sufficient to say that if that clause stood alone the principle stated in the case of Horwood v. West (36) would be applicable to this Will as it would to a Will in England. The Vice-Chancellor says at page 389* :— 'It is essential to the execution of a trust that the subject should be certain;

and if this testator intended that his wife should, at her pleasure, during her life, dispose of the property which he left to her and that his recommendation should extend only to what, if anything happened to remain of his property at her death undisposed of by her, then there is no trust to be administered by this Court'.....

.....Their Lordships, therefore, think that these subsequent clauses in the Will are not sufficient to displace the language of cl. 3, fortified by the powers given in cl. 20, and by that language there is no trust created in favour of the two daughters of the testator..... Even assuming it was intended to create a trust and the words were sufficient for that purpose the subject-matter on which the trust is to operate is by the terms of this Will too uncertain to enable the Court to give it administration".

In the case of Tripurari Pal v. Jagat Tarini Dasi (49) a testator by his Will provided as follows: "My present begotten son, Makunda Murari, will be 'shebait' for the performance of those ceremonies. If during the minority of the said Makunda Murari Pal, I die, then my second wife Srimati Brajamati Das, who gave birth to Makunda Murari, will be 'shebait' as his guardian, during the time of the said Makunda Murari's minority, and Makunda Murari, on attaining majority, will personally conduct the work of the sheba. God forbid, if during my lifetime or after my death, the said Makunda Murari dies, then the said Brajamati Dasi will be 'shebait' and after her death, Srimati Nistarini Dasi and Srimati Jagat Tarini Dasi, daughters born of the said Brajamati Dasi and of my loins, will be 'shebait'. Makunda Murari survived the testator and died after attaining majority and leaving a son. It was held by their Lordships of the Privy Council that there was an absolute gift of the shebaitship to Makunda Murari on his attaining majority. There were provisions in the case of his death as a minor, but no provision cutting down the absolute gift to him. It was further held that Makunda Murari's son succeeded him in the shebaitship. Thus the gift over, after the estate had once vested in Makunda Murari, was held to be contrary to law.

In my opinion the judgment of the House of Lords in the case of Comiskey v. Bowring Hanbury (2) is no authority for the proposition that a testator can make a gift over, after a vested bequest of an absolute estate. The judgment in that case has, I think, been rightly interpreted and explained in the case of Rajeshuri v. Mathura Singh (5) decided by the late Court of the Judicial Commissioner of Oudh in 1921. I may also refer to the case of Sures Chandra Palit v. Lalit Mohan Dutta Chaudhuri (48). It was held in that case that where a devisee takes an absolute interest, a gift over on his failure to dispose of the property or whatever part of the property he does not dispose of, is void. The judgment of the Calcutta High Court in that case is very instructive. It is an elaborate judgment in which almost all the authorities including Comiskey v. Bowring Hanbury (2) are referred to.

In my opinion the words in the Will under consideration on which the plaintiff-appellant relies are not sufficient to cut down the gift which, according to my construction, is absolute in favour of Musammam Param Kuar in the first instance. She took absolutely and not subject to any executory gift over. So far as I see the estate given to her is not anywhere stated in the Will to be liable to be defeated on the happening of a particular contingency. Having given the property absolutely to Musammam Param Kuar, the testator could not alter the line of succession allowed by law, for the purpose of carrying out his wishes or views of policy (if any). The power of disposition having been given, the widow took an absolute estate and the creation of further estate after the termination of the donee's interest which in terms was absolute, did not cut down the absolute estate, but was void.

I would, therefore, decide both the points mentioned above against the plaintiff-appellant.

Pullan, J. (October 30, 1927).—I have had the advantage of reading the judgments of the other members of this Bench and it is not necessary for me to re-state the terms of the Will or to do more than give briefly the grounds on which I concur in the finding of the Court. The reference has been made to a Full Bench because the Court of the Judicial Commissioner of Oudh placed two different interpretations on a judgment of the House of Lords. These cases are reported as Indar Kuar v. Chheda Singh (4) and Rajeshuri v. Mathura Singh (5). The decision of the House of Lords was that given in the case of Comiskey v. Bowring Hanbury (2) and, in my opinion, the difficulty has arisen from the somewhat loose use of the word "absolute" which appears in the finding of the House of Lords but not in the judgment of their Lordships. In my opinion the word "absolute" should always be used in its true meaning which is absolved or freed, and the limitation of an absolute estate is a contradiction in terms. In the case of Comiskey v. Bowring Hanbury (2) the estate given to Mrs. Hanbury was found not to be an absolute estate but an estate which would become absolute if a certain executory devise failed to operate. As long as Mrs. Hanbury was bound to make a Will in favour of one of her husband's nieces, her estate was not absolute and it was only in the event of all these nieces dying before Mrs. Hanbury that she would become vested with an absolute estate. Once an estate has become absolute it cannot be limited but it may come to an end. It is only when the absolute estate comes to an end that a gift over comes into operation.

In the present case we have only to consider whether the estate given to the widow was an absolute estate. The first and principal test is the language of the Will. The words used leave no doubt in my mind that the estate was absolute. As long as the two widows were alive a restriction was imposed by the testator that the holder of the estate for the time being could only sell or mortgage the property for certain specific reasons and was bound to give half the property to the other widow, but on the death of one the survivor was given the property as owner (malik) with power of transfer, and her rights to sell, mortgage and give away the property by gift or Will were unrestricted. An estate so given does not come to an end on the death of the donor intestate. What has been given absolutely must devolve on her heirs even if she makes no Will. It is not as though there were some directions to the widow to make a Will. Even had the estate come to an end on the widow's death there is ample authority for holding that the subsequent clause in this Will does not create a gift over in favour of the heirs of the testator. Undoubtedly the testator believed that if she died intestate he would be able by the terms of his Will to enact that the property should revert to his own legal heirs. But in enacting this clause the testator was in no way limiting the powers of the donee but was attempting to interfere with the ordinary law of intestate succession to an estate which he had already made absolute. Although the wishes of the testator when clearly expressed are carried out by the Courts wherever it is possible, it is not open to the testator to interfere with ordinary laws of succession to an estate which he has given absolutely by his Will to another person.

I do not consider that it is necessary for the determination of this appeal to consider further the applications made by the Judicial Commissioner's Court of the House of Lords' ruling. Every Will must be construed on the well-accepted principles which have been already laid down by the Hon'ble Chief Judge in his judgment. The present Will, in my opinion, conferred an absolute estate on Param Kuar. That absolute estate devolved on her heirs and the subsequent clauses in the Will in which the testator laid down that on her death intestate the property should devolve on his own heirs was invalid.

The case was returned to the Division Bench with the finding that Musammāt Param Kuar succeeded to an absolute estate and that upon her death intestate the property has devolved upon her heirs.

The Division Bench delivered the following judgment after receipt of the opinion of the Full Bench:—

Stuart, C. J. and Raza, J.—(November 1, 1927).—The finding of the Full Bench is that Musammāt Param Kuar succeeded to an absolute estate and that upon her death intestate the property devolved upon her heirs. The learned Counsel for the appellant has withdrawn the objection to the effect that the learned Subordinate Judge ought to have held the custom of exclusion of daughters from inheritance in their father's family with respect to all kinds of properties including stridhan to have been established. He does not argue the third ground of appeal. In consequence, this appeal is dismissed with costs.

Pleadings, amendment of—Suit for perpetual injunction, conversion of, into one for possession—Possession—Presumption of continuance.

Where in a suit for a perpetual injunction restraining the defendant from preventing the plaintiff from reconstructing a fallen house it was found that the defendant had quietly taken possession of it in the absence of the plaintiff:

Held, that the Court should not dismiss the suit forthwith but should allow the plaintiff to amend it so as to make it a suit for possession. [p. 616, col. 1.]

In case of a house which has fallen down the presumption is always in favour of the continuance of the possession of the person who occupied it before it fell down and the placing of some articles by a stranger in a portion of the house which has not fallen down does not amount to possession of the house by such a person. [ibid.]

Second appeal, under s. 41 of Act VI of 1918, against an order of the Senior Sub-Judge, Rohtak, dated the 11th December, 1926, reversing a decree of the Sub-Judge, Third Class, Rohtak, dated the 2nd August, 1926.

Mr. Shamair Chand, for the Appellant.

Mr. Rama Nand, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff a Brahman had a house for a long time in village Kahni. This house fell down a considerable extent about September, 1925, in the rains. The plaintiff wished to re-build it but was prevented by the defendants who are proprietors in the village, the plaintiff being a non-proprietor. The plaintiff accordingly sued for a perpetual injunction restraining the defendants from preventing him from constructing the house in dispute. The suit was decreed by the trial Court but was dismissed by the lower Appellate Court on the ground that the plaintiff should have sued for possession and had been wrongly advised to sue for an injunction. Against this decision the plaintiff has preferred this second appeal. It has been established that the plaintiff has not been living in the shop himself for some years though he never abandoned it. Nor was abandonment ever pleaded. He had been carrying on his business in a neighbouring village. The finding, however, of the lower Appellate Court on this point is that the defendants took advantage of the plaintiff's absence from the village at the time when the house fell down and quietly took possession of it then as it adjoined there own. It was urged before me that they could not have taken possession of the greater portion of the house as it had fallen down. Some moveable property, however, appears to have been in a room which has still a roof on it. The plaintiff's witnesses stated that this belonged to Amin Lal a relative of the plaintiff, but they have been disbelieved by the lower Appellate Court as Amin Lal was not questioned about this when he was in the witness-box. This may have been a mere oversight. In any case, I am of opinion that the plaintiff must be held to have continued in possession of the house which had fallen down and the mere fact that the defendants placed some articles in a portion of the house which had not fallen down would not amount to possession of the house. The presumption always is in favour of the continuance of possession and, in my opinion, it cannot be said that a tumbled down house like the one in dispute is capable of possession being taken of it. For all these reasons I would hold that the lower Appellate Court was wrong in law in holding that the possession was with the defendants. I would, therefore, accept the appeal with costs throughout and setting aside the decree of the lower Appellate Court, restore that of the trial Court.

In any case on the finding that the defendants quietly took possession when most of the house fell down, the lower Appellate Court should have allowed an amendment of the prayer as was done in Harji Mal v. Pokhar Das (1). It was most unnecessary to compel the plaintiff to institute another suit.

—Court to which appeal lies—Right of appeal to High Court on date of plaint—Amendment of Court Fees Act diminishing valuation below Rs. 5,000—Appeal, whether lies to District Court or High Court.

A decree in a suit in which the valuation of the relief claimed according to the law in force at the date of the plaint was more than Rs. 5,000 but at the time of the appeal is less than Rs. 5,000 owing to the amendment of the Court Fees Act, is appealable to the High Court and not to the District Court. Appeal against the decree of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Cuddalore, in O. S. No. 11 of 1921.

Kumaraswami Sastri, J., and Devadoss, J. before whom the case came on for hearing made the following

ORDER OF REFERENCE TO A FULL BENCH.

The respondent's Vakil takes the preliminary objection that the appeal does not lie to the High Court but to the District Court. The plaintiff, a widow, claimed maintenance at the rate of Rs. 100 a month including value of cloths, etc., and valued her claim in the plaint at ten times the amount payable for one year under s. 7, cl. (2) of the Court Fees Act. She also claimed past maintenance and a house to reside in. The total value of her claim according to the plaint is Rs. 14 600. The Subordinate Judge of Cuddalore gave her a decree for maintenance at Rs. 60 a month together with past maintenance. He also decreed that she should be given possession of a house for her residence during her life. The defendants have preferred this appeal against the decree of the Subordinate Judge. In their appeal they have valued the relief for maintenance at the amount allowed for one year under the Court Fees Amendment Act, s. 5. The total value of the appeal together with the past maintenance and the value of the house is Rs. 2,633-5-4. The respondent's Vakil contends that though the suit was valued at more than Rs. 5,000 under the law in force at the time of the filing of the plaint, yet the valuation of the suit according to the Amended Court Fees Act at the time the appeal was presented would have been less than Rs. 5,000 and, therefore, the appeal to this Court is incompetent. But for the amendment of the Court Fees Act the appeal would have been valued at Rs. 14,600, as in the plaint. It is admitted that the monetary jurisdiction of the Court is determined by the value of the claim in the plaint and not by the value of the relief decreed. Under s. 13 of the Madras Civil Courts Act III of 1873 "when the amount or value of the subject-matter of the suit exceeds Rs. 5,000 the appeal shall lie to the High Court." It is urged that the subsequent change in the law as to valuation makes the value of the relief in the plaint less than Rs. 5,000 and, therefore, the appeal lies only to the District Court, and reliance is placed for this contention upon two recent decisions of this Court in A. S. No. 32 of 1924 and in A. S. No. 415 of 1923.

In A. S. No. 32 of 1924, Ramesam and Jackson, JJ., held that the appeal lay to the High Court against the decree in a suit in which the relief claimed was valued at less than Rs. 5,000 according to the Court Fees Act before its amendment by the Madras Act V. of 1922, but which had to be valued at more than Rs. 5,000 under the Amended Act. The learned Judges relied upon Muttammal v. Chinnana Gounden (1) and the proceedings of the High Court in Proceedings 15th November, 1870 (2). This case is converse to the present one. The point now raised was decided in A. S. No. 415 of 1923 which was also a suit for maintenance and Phillips and Odgers, JJ., held following the decision in A. S. No. 32 of 1924 that the appeal did not lie to the High Court as according to the valuation under the Amended Court Fees Act, the relief claimed in the plaint was less than Rs. 5,000. In Muttammal v. Chinnana Gounden (1) the plaintiff sued to recover one-eighth of a mitta and obtained a decree. The defendant resisted the execution of the decree and claimed to be in possession of the lands as purchaser at a Court sale in execution of another decree. His objection was disallowed by the District Munsif and on appeal the District Judge upheld the decision of the District Munsif. The High Court set aside the order of the District Munsif and the District Judge and the petition was registered as a suit under the directions of the High Court. The District Munsif gave a judgment in favour of the defendant. The plaintiff appealed to the High Court. The first ground of appeal was that the District Munsif had no jurisdiction because the value of the property in dispute was Rs. 9,000. A preliminary objection was taken by the respondent that no appeal lay to the High Court. Kindersley and Muthuswami Ayyar, JJ., overruled the objection and observed: "We think that the subject-matter in appeal should be valued for the purpose of jurisdiction according to the law in force at the date of the appeal and not of the suit which led to it." They held that according to the law in force at the date of the appeal, the subject-matter of the suit exceeded Rs. 5,000 in value and, therefore, whether the District Munsif had or had not jurisdiction the appeal lay to the High Court. By Proceedings, dated the 15th November, 1870, the High Court gave this ruling "The High Court are of opinion that the valuation of an appeal must be according to the Act in force at the time of its presentation, and that the original valuation under a law obsolete at the period of appeal can have no influence on the decision." [Proceedings 15th November, 1870 (2)].

We should have felt bound to follow the decision in Muttammal v. Chinnana Gounden (1), and the two recent decisions in A. S. No. 32 of 1924 and A. S. No. 415 of 1923, but for the high authority of Lord Macnaghten who delivered the judgment of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Colonial Sugar Refining Co. Ltd. v. Irving (3). In that case an appeal was presented to the Privy Council against the decision of the Supreme Court of Queensland. During the pendency of the suit in the Supreme Court, the Judiciary Act of 1903 was passed and by s. 39, sub-s. 2, the right of appeal to the Privy Council from the decisions of the Supreme Court was taken away but a right of appeal was given from the Supreme Court to the High Court of Australia. The respondent moved the Privy Council by a petition to have the appeal dismissed on the ground that the appeal did not lie as of right to the King in Council. Their Lordships rejected the petition holding that the matter was not one of procedure only but one touching a right in existence at the passing of the Act and that "the Judiciary Act was not retrospective by express enactment or by necessary intendment." Lord Macnaghten observed: "The only question is, was the appeal to His Majesty in Council a right vested in the appellants at the date of the passing of the Act, or was it a mere matter of procedure? It seems to their Lordships that the question does not admit of doubt. To deprive a suitor in a pending action of an appeal to a superior tribunal which belonged to him as of right is a very different thing from regulating procedure. In principle, their Lordships see no difference between abolishing an appeal altogether and transferring the appeal to a new tribunal. In either case there is an interference with existing rights contrary to the well-known general principle that Statutes are not to be held to act retrospectively unless a clear intention to that effect is manifested."

It does not appear that this decision was brought to the notice of the learned Judges who decided the two appeals in A. S. No. 415 of 1923 and A. S. No. 32 of 1924.

An appeal to a certain forum is a vested right. It cannot be denied that an appeal to the High Court on facts is considered to be a very valuable right and it cannot be taken away except by an express Statute. The present suit was valued at more than Rs. 5,000 and if the suit was decided on the date it was filed, namely, 21st March, 1921, there would have been no question as to the maintainability of the appeal in the High Court. The Court Fees Act is only a fiscal enactment and in most cases the valuation for purposes of jurisdiction is the same as that for purposes of Court-fees. The jurisdiction value determines the forum for the appeal and the right of appeal to the High Court which either party to the suit had on the date of the plaint and some time after cannot be taken away by an enactment which amends some of the provisions of the Court Fees Act for the purpose of charging Court fees. As the decisions in A. S. No. 32 of 1924 and in A. S. No. 415 of 1923 are not reconcilable with the observations of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Colonial Sugar Refining Co., Ltd. v. Irving (3) to which the attention of the learned Judges does not seem to have been directed, and as the point is of considerable importance and is likely to arise in many cases, we refer the following question to the Full Bench:—

"Does the appeal against the decree in a suit in which the valuation of the relief claimed according to the law in force at the date of the plaint was more than Rs. 5,000, but at the time of the appeal is less than Rs. 5,000 owing to the amendment of the Court Fees Act, lie to the High Court or to the District Court?"

The appeal came on for hearing in pursuance of the said order of reference to a Full Bench before the Officiating Chief Justice, Mr. Justice Beasley and Mr. Justice Anantakrishna Ayyar.

Mr. E. V. Sundara Reddiyar, for the Appellants.

Messrs. K. V. Krishnaswamy Ayyar and N. S. Srinivasa Ayyar, for the Respondent.

OPINION.—The question that has been referred for decision is, "Does the appeal against the decree in a suit in which the valuation of the relief claimed according to the law in force at the date of the plaint was more than Rs. 5,000 but at the time of the appeal is less than Rs. 5,000 owing to the amendment of the Court Fees Act, lie to the High Court or to the District Court?"

This question has been referred to us because there are two unreported decisions of this Court which hold that the valuation must be determined according to the Amended Act and, according to that valuation, the appeal will lie either in the High Court or in the District Court. In neither of these cases was any reference made to the decision of the Privy Council in a case from Queensland, Colonial Sugar Refining Co., Ltd. v. Irving, (3). In that case in certain suits a right of appeal to the Privy Council was given by an Ordinance of 1860. Subsequently by the Judiciary Act of 1903 the decision in those suits was held to be final subject to an appeal to the High Court of Australia. The question for decision was whether in a suit filed before the passing of the Judiciary Act of 1903 the appeal still lay to the Privy Council or to the High Court in Australia, and it was held that the new enactment could not take away a vested right, unless in express terms it had retrospective effect. The remarks of Lord Macnaghten in his judgment are entirely applicable to the present case: "To deprive a suitor in a pending action of an appeal to a superior tribunal which belonged to him as of right is a very different thing from regulating procedure. In principle, their Lordships see no difference between abolishing an appeal altogether and transferring the appeal to a new tribunal". This clearly disposes of the point before us, for the question is whether the amendment of the Court Fees Act which came into force after the present suit was filed would deprive the plaintiff of a right of appeal to this Court which he had when he filed the suit. Under s. 13 of the Civil Courts Act, appeals from subordinate Courts lie either to the District Court or to the High Court, according to whether the value of the subject-matter of the suit is over or below Rs. 5,000. It is argued that this section does not confer any right of appeal to the High Court in definite classes of suits, but that the right of appeal is merely given to the Court authorized to hear appeals and the question of whether that Court is the District Court or the High Court depends on the valuation of the suit at the time of filing the appeal. It is difficult to treat this argument as in any way distinguishing the case from that in Colonial Sugar Refining Co., Ltd. v. Irving (3) for in both cases there was, when the suit was filed, a vested right of appeal to a particular tribunal, which is taken away by a subsequent enactment. According to the argument, when the right is taken away by a subsequent alteration in a mere fiscal enactment, the case is not the same as when the right depends on substantive law. This is untenable. It has been held by the Privy Council that this cannot be done and we are bound by that general expression of the law and must follow it. We may also refer to a case decided in 1869 Ratanchand Shrichand v. Hanmantrav Shivbakas (4) where the same principle was enunciated.

Respondent relies on some observations in Canada Cement Co. v. Montreal East Corporation (5). These observations do seem to give some support to the contention that a right of appeal can be taken away by a subsequent enactment, but there is no decision to that effect and no reference whatever to the previous decision of the Court in Colonial Sugar Refining Co. Ltd. v. Irving (3). The observation is obiter and can, therefore, have no force as against the prior decision which we must follow.

The answer to the question before us may also be put upon another ground and that is that the forum of appeal from a Subordinate Judge's Court depends on the value of the subject-matter of the suit. Presumably the value of the subject-matter of the suit is its value at the time of filing. Such value has to be set forth in the plaint and Court-fees paid accordingly. It is, however, contended that the value varies according to the particular enactment in force at the time; and that, although it may have a particular value when it is filed, the value of the suit can be changed if the law in respect of valuation is altered. This contention was distinctly negatived so long ago as 1874 in Muthusami Pillai v. Muthu Chidambara Chetti (6) where it was held that it is the money value of the original suit that fixes the jurisdiction throughout the subsequent litigation in its several stages. If this is so, the value of the subject-matter of the suit is the same throughout and it cannot be altered after the decree has been passed simply by an alteration in a fiscal enactment. To hold otherwise would lead to very great difficulties in the question of jurisdiction. A suit which when filed was within the jurisdiction of the District Munsif might subsequently become one which must necessarily be filed in a Subordinate Court or vice versa.

For both these reasons, therefore, we hold that in the suit referred to, the appeal lies to the High Court.

Petition, under s. 25 of Act IX of 1887, to revise the decree of the Court of the District Munsif, Tenkasi, dated the 30th April, 1925, in S. C. S. No. 37 of 1925.

Mr. P. N. Appuswami Iyer, for the Petitioner.

Mr. Ramaswami Iyer, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application to revise the decree of the District Munsif of Tenkasi, in S. C. S. No. 37 of 1925. The contention of Mr. Appuswami Ayyar is that if Ex. A is to be treated as an acknowledgment under s. 19 of the Limitation Act it would not save limitation as the period has to be computed from the date of signing the letter, namely, 6th November, 1921, and the suit was filed on 7th January, 1925, i. e., more than three years after the date of Ex. A. From the wording of s. 19, it is clear that the fresh period of limitation should be computed from the time when the acknowledgment was signed. The section being clear, it is unnecessary to rely on any decided cases. Mr. Appuswami Ayyar refers to Halsbury's Laws of England, Vol. XIX, page 108.

Mr. Ramaswami Ayyar's contention for the respondent is that Ex. A is a fresh contract under which the petitioner undertook to pay Rs. 33-15-3 after the first week of January and that his client is entitled to rely upon it not only as saving limitation but also as giving a fresh cause of action. I am unable to hold that Ex. A is a contract which would entitle the plaintiff to sue on it. Exhibit A was only filed by the defendant's Vakil in the course of the trial. I do not see how Ex. A could be construed as a contract under which the defendant could be held liable for any sum of money. Exhibit A is at best only an acknowledgment which would extend the period of limitation for three years from its date. It cannot form the basis of a fresh cause of action. In this case the judgment of the District Munsif is wrong.

The decree of the District Munsif is set aside and the suit dismissed with costs here and in the Court below.

Kayasthas of Bihar are not Sudras but belong to the Dwija or regenerate classes, and the rule of Hindu Law prohibiting the adoption of a daughter's son, sister's son and mother's sister's son among the regenerate castes is, therefore, applicable to them. [p. 635, col. 1; p. 636, col. 1.]

Raj Coomarr Lall v. Bissessur Dyal (2), dissented from.

[Case-law discussed.]

Inasmuch as this rule of prohibition can be varied by a family custom, a plaintiff seeking to challenge an adoption on the ground that it is in contravention of this rule of Hindu Law should raise his legal objection in the plaint so that the defendant may be able to plead the existence of a family custom to the contrary. [p. 636, col. 2.]

A mere declaration of adoption by the adoptive father is not sufficient to create a valid adoption; the actual giving and taking is essential whether the parties belong to the three regenerate classes or are Sudras. [p. 638, col. 2.]

A, claiming that he was the adopted son of his maternal grandfather X, took possession of properties of X to the knowledge of B and C, his brothers. After A's death C who claimed to be the adopted son of A, and A's widow were in joint possession and C continued to be in sole possession after the death of A's widow. After the lapse of many twelve years B's descendants sued for partition against C's descendants:

Held, (1) that the suit was not maintainable inasmuch as the adoptions set up by the defendants' ancestors had not been set aside within time; [p. 639, col. 2.]

(2) that as there was no proof that the plaintiffs' ancestry were in joint possession with A and C the suit was barred by limitation. [p. 640, col. 2.]

Court-fee is leviable on the construction of the plaint alone. Ad valorem fee on the value of the properties concerned cannot be levied on a plaint in a suit which is one for partition pure and simple. [p. 641, col. 2.]

against the decision of the Subordinate Judge, Gaya, dated the 30th June, 1922, dismissing the plaintiffs' suit.

JUDGMENT.

Jwala Prasad, J.—This is an appeal

The following genealogy taken from the pleadings and the evidence is not disputed—

The dispute in this appeal relates to the property of one Rai Hemnath Singh. He died in Magh, 1212, Fasli (January, 1805), leaving his widow Dularo Kuar and a daughter Nand Kuar who was married to one Chca Lal. Nand Kuar had three sons Newazi Lal, Dharam Lal, and Ridhnath. The plaintiffs are the descendants of Dharam Lal. The defendant is the descendant of Ridhnath. Newazi Lal had no issue. The plaintiffs' case is that the three brothers Newazi Lal, Dharam Lal and Ridhnath succeeded to the properties of Hemnath Singh, being his daughter's sons, and remained in joint possession of the same as members of a joint Mitakshara Hindu family, that by an arrangement set forth in an ekrarnama (Ex. 1), dated the 14th November, 1811, entered into amongst the aforesaid three brothers, Newazi Lal was to remain in possession of the joint family properties during his lifetime and after his death Ridhnath, the ancestor of the defendant, and his descendants, were to remain in possession on behalf of the other members of the family, whereas Dharam Lal and his heirs were to receive allowances with rights in certain circumstances set forth in the ekrarnama to have the family properties partitioned: that in accordance with this arrangement after the death of Newazi Lal, who had no issue, Ridhnath came into possession of the properties on behalf of all the members of the family including Dharam Lal and his descendants; that the defendant is now in possession of the family properties on behalf of himself and the plaintiffs who are descendants of Dharam Lal, and that he (the defendant) has been of late mismanaging the properties, has incurred heavy debts and has stopped payment of allowances to the plaintiffs and thus the plaintiffs are entitled to have the properties partitioned.

Accordingly, the plaintiffs pray (1) for a partition of the family properties claiming 8 annas share therein, (2) in the alternative for delivery of possession of properties representing their moiety share in case they are found to be out of possession and (3) in the event of their not getting the aforesaid reliefs, for payment of maintenance allowance to them at the rate of Rs. 21 per diem from Kartik, 1326, Fasli declaring the same to be the first charge on the estate.

The defendant resists the claim of the plaintiffs. He denies that the three brothers Newazi Lal, Dharam Lal (ancestor of the plaintiffs) and Ridhnath (ancestor of the defendant) succeeded to the properties of their maternal grandfather Hemnath Singh and remained in joint possession of the same as members of a joint Mitakshara family. He says that the ordinary succession by inheritance to the properties of their grandfather was intercepted by the adoption of Newazi Lal, one of the brothers, by Hemnath and that Newazi Lal succeeded to the properties as an adopted son and having no male issue he adopted his youngest brother Ridhnath, ancestor of the defendant. Thus, the defendant says that the properties came to be held by Ridhnath not as a grandson of Hemnath but as an adopted son of his brother Newazi Lal and the succession to the properties has accordingly been in the line of Ridhnath, and thus the properties have now come to the defendant in the ordinary course as the sole direct male descendant of Ridhnath; and that Dharam Lal, the ancestor of the plaintiffs, did not succeed to the properties nor had he any share therein and consequently the plaintiffs have no share or interest in the properties. He also denies the genuineness of the ekrarnama (Ex. 1) set up by the plaintiffs as having been executed by the aforesaid three brothers and its binding effect on him. Accordingly, he says that the plaintiffs have no right to partition the properties in suit or to obtain maintenance allowance. He says that the plaintiffs and their ancestors were servants of the estate and received salaries and occasional help, that Sheo Sahay Lal, who was originally plaintiff and died during the pendency of the suit, was dismissed from service and is no longer entitled to receive any salary or maintenance. The defendant asserts that the plaintiffs or their ancestors have never been in possession of the properties and that the suit is barred by limitation.

The plaintiffs deny the adoption of Newazi Lal by Hemnath and that of Ridhnath by Newazi Lal set up by the defendant and the validity thereof.

Upon these contentions, the learned Subordinate Judge framed amongst others issues Nos. 9 and 10. Issue No. 9 relates to the adoption of Newazi Lal by Hemnath and issue No. 10 relates to the adoption of Ridhnath by Newazi Lal.

The learned Subordinate Judge has decided both these issues against the plaintiffs and his decision is challenged in this appeal.

The plaintiffs deny the adoptions and say that even if the adoptions did take place they were wholly invalid. It is urged that the adoption of Newazi Lal by Hemnath was invalid, inasmuch as Newazi Lal being the daughter's son of Hemnath was not capable of being taken in adoption by the latter. It is not disputed and in fact it has been settled by the authority of the highest judicial tribunal that an adoption of a daughter's son, sister's son and mother's sister's son being expressly forbidden by the texts on Hindu Law, is contrary to law and void in the three regenerate classes, Brahmin, Kshatriya and Vaishya, and the principle a factum valet will not validate such an adoption: vide the Privy Council decision in Bhagwan Singh v. Bhagwan Singh (1).

The parties in this case are Kayasthas of Gaya District in Bihar. The learned Subordinate Judge holds them to be Sudra, upon the ground that according to the decision in Raj Coomar Lal v. Bissessur Dyal (2), the Bihari Kayasthas as a class are Sudra, though he says that much stress was laid upon the evidence adduced in that case and that in this case no evidence was given by the parties. The decision in that case was based upon a passage in the Vyavastha Darpana of Shyama Charan Sarkar where it is stated that the Kayasthas were Kshatriyas but they, at least those of Bengal, have been degraded to Sudradom by using after their proper names the surname "Das" instead of their own Kshatriya epithet "Varma" and also by omitting to perform the Upanayana ceremony. Some recent decisions of the Calcutta High Court have held that so far as the province of Bengal is concerned the Kayasthas are Sudra: Asita Mohan Ghose Moulik v. Nirode Mohan Ghose Moulik (3), Biswanath Das Ghose v. Sarosibala (4) and Bhola Nath Mitter v. Emperor (5). The last two cases have gone so far as to legalise inter-marriages between Kayasthas and Tantis, Domes in Bengal, on the ground that both of them are sub-castes of Sudras. The matter was neither inquired into nor discussed. It was taken as settled and the only authority relied upon is the aforesaid passage in the Vyavastha Darpana referred to above. The first of these cases Asita Mohan Ghose Moulik v. Nirode Mohan Ghose Moulik (3), went to the Privy Council Asita Mohan Ghose v. Nirode Mohan Roy Ghosh Moulik (6), and their Lordships of the Judicial Committee refused to give assent to the decision that the Bengali Kayasthas are Sudras and left the question open in the following words:—

"One contention was as to the rights of succession of persons who were by caste Bengali Kayasthas. It has been found not on evidence, but following some decisions of the High Court at Calcutta, that Bengali Kayasthas are Sudras. Their Lordships do not think it necessary to decide whether or not Bengali Kayasthas are Sudras, or to decide as to the construction of a text of the Dattaka Chandrika which has been referred to by the Courts below as applicable to Bengali Kayasthas. Their Lordships are of opinion that the rights of the parties depend on the construction of the agreement upon which Kumar Narendra Chandra Roy gave his son Sailendra Mohan Ghosh to Radha Mohan Ghosh in adoption."

The decision referred to in the passage quoted above as the basis of the view of the Calcutta High Court is that given in the case of Raj Coomar Lal v. Bissessur Dyal (2). The Privy Council decision does not seem to have been referred to in the subsequent decisions of that Court.

Thus the Calcutta High Court decisions as to the Bengali or Bihari Kayasthas being Sudras are inconclusive and the matter has been expressly left open by their Lordships of the Judicial Committee.

We are in this case concerned with the decision of Raj Coomar Lal v. Bissessur Dyal (2), relied upon by the learned Subordinate Judge for his decision that the Bihari Kayasthas are Sudras.

Mr. Justice Field who delivered the judgment in that case observed as follows:—

"We think that the whole question has been fairly summed up in the following passage of Babu Shyama Charan Sarkar's Vyavastha Darpana:—"There is, therefore, a preponderance of authority to evince that the Kayasthas whether of Bengal or any other country, were Kshatriyas. But since several centuries past the Kayasthas (at least those of Bengal) have been degenerated and degraded to sudradom not only by using after their proper names the surname 'Dasa' peculiar to the Sudras, and giving up their own which is 'Barma' but principally by omitting to perform the regenerating ceremony, Upanayana hallowed by the gayatri."

(6) 24 C. W. N. 794; 47 I. A. 140; (1920) M. W. N. 541; 12 L. W. 556; 28 M. L. T. 399 (P. O.).

According to the Vyavastha, the Kayasthas were Kshatriyas. Assuming for the sake of argument that the reasons given therein would entail degradation of a Kshatriya to sudradom, it does not say that the Kayasthas of Bihar call themselves Das or have given up the performance of Upanayana ceremony. Mr. Justice Field also does not find it as a fact that the Kayasthas of Bihar have adopted the surname Das and, as a matter of fact, the parties in that case did not bear the surname of Das. As regards the ceremony Upanayana also his finding is only that the usage of wearing sacred thread and performing certain other ceremonies of Kshatriyas amongst the Kayasthas of Bihar as a class is not uniform. He applied the Vyavastha (opinion) of Babu Shyama Charan Sarcar simply upon the assumption that the Kayasthas of Bihar are not distinguishable from the Kayasthas of Bengal. In this view he discarded the evidence of the Pandits and the Vyavasthas of Benares to the effect that the Kayasthas of Bihar are Kshatriyas, holding that the Kayasthas of Bihar are different from those of Upper Provinces and Benares. Thus Mr. Justice Field has differentiated the Kayasthas of Bihar from those of Upper Provinces and Benares. No reason has been given nor has any evidence been quoted for this view; it has simply been assumed. With great respect to his Lordship the view is not in consonance with the actual facts.

The social position, religious observances, customs and manners of the Kayasthas of Bihar are the same as those of the United Provinces and Oudh. Their marriages take place in the Kayastha families of the United Provinces and they dine with each other. They do not marry in the Kayastha families of Bengal, and in fact have no concern with the Kayasthas of Bengal in matters, social or religious. The Kayasthas of Bihar like those of the United Provinces are governed by the same School of Hindu Law, namely, the Mitakshara Law of Benares, as distinguished from the Dayabhaga which governs the Bengali Kayasthas. Benares is looked upon as an authority in all religious and social matters by the Kayasthas of Bihar just as by the other communities of that Province. The territorial division is only for the purpose of administration. A large portion of the Shahabad and Saran Districts in Bihar was for a long time in the United Provinces, and the District of Benares was at one time in Bihar.

Mr. Risley of the Indian Civil Service in his book "The Tribes and Castes of Bengal", 1891 Edition, page 443, referring to the Kayasthas or Lalas of Bihar, says that they "trace their mythical parentage to Chitrakuta, the scribe or recorder of Yama, the regent of the dead, and pique themselves on being wholly distinct from the Kayasthas of Bengal." and observes that "The physical characters of the Bihar Kayasthas afford some ground for the belief that they may be of tolerably pure Aryan descent."

Mr. W. Crooke in his book "Tribes and Castes of the North-Western Provinces and Oudh," Volume III, Edition 1896, page 185, while quoting the aforesaid passage from Risley, remarks that the Bihari Kayasthas are identical with those of the North-Western Provinces and Oudh.

The correctness of the Calcutta High Court decision was doubted by the Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court, consisting of Sir John Edge, C. J., Straight, Brodhurst, Tyrrell and Mahmood, JJ. The observation of Mr. Justice Mahmood who delivered the leading judgment in Tulsi Ram v. Behari Lal (7) is weighty. Says his Lordship:—

"Notwithstanding the ruling of a Division Bench of the Calcutta High Court in Raj Commar Lall v. Bissessur Dyal (2), I entertain considerable doubts as to the soundness of the view which seems to have been adopted by both the Courts below, that the literary caste of Kayasthas in this part of the country, to which the parties belong, fall under the category of Sudras, as understood in the division of mankind in the Institutes of Manu, or elsewhere in authoritative texts of the Hindu Law. The question is one of considerable difficulty, not only ethnologically, but also from a legal point of view, so far as the administration of the law is concerned, to this important section of the population concerned."

(7) 12 A. 328; 6 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 9

His Lordship further observed that the Kaysthas of lower Bengal "may be distinguishable from the twelve castes of Kayasthas in Upper India, such as the North-Western Provinces and Oudh."

The latter portion of the observation of his Lordship will apply to the Kayasthas of Bihar, inasmuch as they like the Kayasthas of North-Western Provinces and Oudh belong to the twelve sub-castes of Kayasthas and are descendants of the same common ancestor Chitragupta.

The learned Subordinate Judge to whom the judgment of Mr. Justice Mahmood was quoted felt himself bound by the Calcutta High Court decision. It seems that his attention was not drawn to the decision in the Privy Council case : Asita Mohan Ghosh v. Nirode Mohan Roy Ghosh Moulik (6) which left the point open. It is remarkable that Sir John Edge, who delivered the Privy Council judgment was a party to the Full Bench decision of the Allahabad High Court in Tulshi Ram v. Behari Lal (7).

The view taken in the Vyavastha Darpana in the Calcutta decision based upon it has not been accepted by Hindu lawyers of eminence and authority. Referring to the recent decision of the Calcutta High Court, Golap Chandra Sastri in his book on Hindu Law (1924), at page 143, says that it has come as a surprise to the Hindu community. Sarvadhikari in his book "the Principles of Hindu Law of Inheritance" (1923), at page 835, says that the decision is not correct and that it has given rude shock to the whole Kayastha community in Bengal. Similar is the view of Jogendra Chandra Ghosh in his book "The Principles of Hindu Law" (1917), at page 1006. These lawyers have not accepted the view that the Kayasthas who were admittedly Kshatriyas have become Sudras, nor the view that their giving up the sacred thread or assuming the epithet of 'Das,' even if this is a regret, would cause degradation. On this point Sarvadhikari in his learned work 'The Tagore Law Lectures' of 1880, at page 10, 1923 Edition, says:—

"Even the wearing of the sacred thread, the well-known badge of the regenerate classes, cannot furnish in many cases an inevitable test in this vexed question. There are many Thakurs and Baniyas who though they are universally recognized as members of the regenerate classes do not put on the sacred thread. The only safe rule to follow in all cases where the determination of the caste of a person is in question is to ascertain the custom and usage by which the social conduct of the person given is regulated. The remarriage of widows and equal rights and privileges of legitimate and illegitimate sons and similar customs and usages are marks by which Sudras can be distinguished."

The learned author in the succeeding pages 831 to 835 of the book examined the question closely with reference to the texts of Srutis, Smritis, and Puranas, judgments of subordinate Courts, authoritative gazetteers, the Durpanas of the Pandits of the Sadar Dewani Adalat, Agra, Yajnavalkya and its commentary, the Mitakshara, which governs the Kayasthas of Bihar, North-Western Provinces and Oudh and has held that the Kayasthas belong to the regenerate class, are Kshatriyas and are by no means Sudras. He seriously questions whether the non-observance of some of the practices can permanently degrade people belonging to a high class into a lower one and says that suppose the people of this caste again resume their former practices, as many Kayasthas in Bengal have done in recent years, what would be their status. The question in the Calcutta case, he says, was neither argued nor decided and the opinion of Shyama Charan Sircar in his Vyavastha Darpana was regarded as decisive on the point. He says the Kayasthas of Bengal cannot be Sudras.

The cases relied upon by the Calcutta High Court for upholding a marriage between a Kayastha and a Sudra woman were those in which the parties were from their origin different sections of Sudra caste. Those cases should not have been applied to the Kayasthas who by their origin are Kshatriyas even if they are degraded Kshatriyas. A person belonging to a regenerate class does not lose his right of being governed by the rules of that class though he might be socially looked down upon.

As regards the Kayasthas of North-Western Provinces and of Bombay (this will include the Bihar Kayasthas), Sarvadhikari says that they justly say that they should be governed by the same laws by which the regenerate classes are governed. Similar is the view of Golap Chandra Sarkar both in his book on Adoption and on Hindu Law. He also closely examined all the texts and authorities on Hindu Law: Vyas, Vishnu, Vrihata, Prasara, Padana, Skanda and Bhavishya Puranas, Yajnavalkya and Mitakshara. He is emphatic in his opinion that the Kayasthas are Kshatriyas and that the non-observance of the ceremonies would not degenerate a higher caste into a lower one so as to affect his civil rights. He says that the caste of a person did not originally depend on heredity but on the occupation and possession of characteristic merits under the texts of Manu, but with the lapse of time it has become a matter of heredity, and merit or no merit the son gets the caste of the father. By non-observance of ceremonies no regenerate class has been degraded. If that were so, there will be no caste among the Hindus now except the Sudra, as there are very few of the regenerate classes who can say that they and their ancestors did all the duties imposed on the caste. Why then the Kayasthas of all the regenerate castes should be degraded into the category of Sudras for want of orthodoxy? He further says that it should be noted that in all other respects the Kayasthas observe the rules enjoined upon the Kshatriyas.

Mr. J. C. Ghosh is also of the same opinion. Referring to Vyavastha Darpana of Shyama Charan he disputes its correctness and its applicability to the Kayasthas of North-Western Provinces who have got the sacred thread. He says that the distinction of caste being based on the nature of occupations of classes the Kayasthas who are Judicial and Revenue Officers, administering the laws of the Rishis and the Vaidyas who were physicians in the Hindu times, could not be regarded as Sudras.

The aforesaid Hindu lawyers base their opinion upon the Sruitis Smritis and Puranas, and the social position and occupations of the Kayasthas as well as upon the custom and usages regulating the marriages and other religious rites and ceremonies. The decision of the Calcutta High Court is based solely upon the Vyavastha Darpana of Shyama Charan Sarkar. The correctness of the decision has been doubted by the Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court. The recent decision of the Privy Council left the point open. The question is important, not only ethnologically but from the legal point of view so far as the administration of the Hindu Law to this important section of the population is concerned, as observed by Mahmood, J., in the case already referred to. Hence the question needs an early solution. Its determination will materially affect the law which will govern adoption, marriage, rights of legitimate and illegitimate children to succeed, etc., inasmuch as the Hindu Law with regard to these matters is different for the three regenerate classes and the Sudras.

The Smritis of the Rishis, such as, Manu, Yajnavalkya, Narada, Vyas, Vasishta, etc., have divided mankind into four castes: Brahman, Kshatriya, Vaisya and Sudra. Manu in Chapter X, Sloka 4, says that there is no fifth caste. Therefore, the Kayasthas have to be located in one of these four castes. The Mahabharata asserts that at first there was no distinction of classes, but that these have subsequently arisen out of differences of character and occupation. According to Dr. Muir (Sanskrit Text, Volume I, pages 159 onwards) "the members of every political society are divisible into four classes corresponding to the four castes of the Hindus. Those distinguished by intellectuality, learning and religion are the real leaders of the society: next in importance are the royal class, the warriors on whom the protection and the very existence of the State depend, and who are characterised by physical abilities, courage, administrative capacity and intelligence. Then come those concerned in production of wealth by agriculture, trade and cattle breeding or cattle tending, requiring intelligence and a lower standard of morality. And lastly the labourers serving the preceding three classes or practising the mechanical or other similar arts, distinguished by their capacity for physical labour and spirit of dependence. The virtues and qualities requisite for distinction in these occupations as well as their importance to society are taken into consideration for fixing the relative rank of the four classes; and the common story of their origin is nothing more than an allegory representing society and different classes of its members, as one human body and its limbs respectively. The fact that there are as many castes as there are occupations proves the origin of the institution."

Dr. Muir gives a similar explanation of the mixed classes mentioned in the Smritis. According to him the origin of the mixed classes by inter-marriage between the four tribes is imaginary and allegorical. He says "where the abstract qualities of any two of the four tribes were thought requisite for filling a particular occupation, persons following that occupation were supposed to be descended from the offspring of an inter-marriage of a man belonging to the one tribe, with a woman appertaining to the other."

He illustrates this by referring to Ambasthas or the physician class of Bengal who combine in themselves the culture and learning of Brahmans and the commercial instincts of Vaisyas. The higher instinct is supposed to be derived from the superior class represented in the Smritis as the father and the lower instinct from the lower order represented by the mother. Thus he says "The principle of heredity underlies the system, and gained considerable support from the state of early society."

The scientific way of dividing the members of a society according to character and occupation laid down by Dr. Muir has been expressed in the form of allegory by the Dharma Sastras of Manu and other Rishis. It is sufficient to refer to Manu for all the Smritis and Puranas agree therein.

Manu says that for the furtherance of the good of the world the God Brahma created Brahman, Kshatriya, Vaisya and Sudra from his mouth, arms, thighs and legs, according to the relative sacredness of these parts of the body. The Brahman was produced from the mouth for the reason of being the repository of Vedas, the Ruler of all the creation and one who lays down the duties of all the social orders; the Kshatriya from the arms for the protection of the subjects; the Vaisya from the thighs or loins for the purpose of production of wealth by agriculture, trade, etc., and Sudra from the legs for the service of the three classes (Manu, Chap. I, Slokas 31 and 88 to 92).

Manu then deals with the mixed classes by inter-marriage between the four castes according to the occupation requiring mixed qualifications of the principal four castes and lays down rules for the location of them among the four classes according to their heredity. The general principle is that the offspring of an inter-marriage between two castes is lower than the caste of his father and higher than that of the mother. His caste is that of his father though inferior in rank due to the mother being of a lower order. When none of these tests applies, Manu would have the class determined in accordance with the occupation, act or conduct of the party. The names of castes and sub-castes etymologically denote the occupations of the various castes and sub-castes. The origin of a caste is attributed to a particular limb of the God Brahma to mark the distinctive occupation and status of that caste in society. In this all the Smritis of Manu and others as well as Dr. Muir agree. These allegories and legends as to the origin of particular castes are important to show the character and occupation which originally were attributed to them the social position, the physical and mental capacity which they were originally supposed to possess and the light in which they were regarded by other castes. Therefore, they afford very important tests for determining the caste of a particular community. I would briefly refer to them in connection with the Kayasthas whose caste we have to determine.

According to the Hindus, the souls of men after death receive rewards and punishments according to their sins and virtues, and hence it is believed that good and bad deeds of men are not destroyed. The souls of men after death go to Yamapuri which is presided over by the deities called Yamas who keep records of men's actions and accordingly give them their dues. The principal Yama is called Yamaraja or Dharamaraja, that is, the ruler of Yamapuri or the King of La-

The Yama Samhita which is a tract from the 9th Chapter of Ahimsa Kamdhenu, a work of Hindu Law, says that Dharamaraja complained to Brahma about his difficulties in performing his most responsible duties of keeping records of the deeds of men and doing justice to them. Brahma went into meditation. Chitrugupta sprang from his body and stood before him bearing an inkpot and a pen. The God Brahma (Creator) said:—"Because you are sprung from my body (kaya), therefore, you shall be called Kayastha and as you existed in my body, unseen I give you the name of Chitrugupta." He then assumed charge of Yamapuri. Dharma Sharma married his daughter Irawati to Chitrugupta and Manuji, son of Surya (the Sun) married his daughter Sudakhina to him. Chitrugupta had eight sons from the former and four from the latter and these twelve sons became the progenitors of the twelve sub-divisions of the Chitruguptavansi Kayasthas, namely, Mathur, Gaur, Nigam, Ashthana, Kulshretha, Suryadwaja, Balmika, Bhatnagar, Srivastava, Ambastha, Sak-sena and Karana,

In Padma Purana, Uttar Khanda, it says that Chitrugupta had twelve sons by two wives. They were all invested with the sacred thread and were married to Nagakanyas. They were the ancestors of the twelve sub-divisions of the Kayasthas. The story also says that the Kayasthas are Chitravansi Kshatriyas and never Sudras. They are entitled to all the Sanskars.

The same legend with some slight difference is given in most of the Puranas. Padma Purana after stating the legend says: "Chitrugupta was placed near Dharamaraj to register the good and evil actions of all sentient beings, that he was possessed of supernatural wisdom and became the partaker of sacrifices offered to the gods and fire. It is for this reason that the twice-born always give him oblations from their food. As he sprang from the body of Brahma he was called Kayastha of numerous gotras on the face of the earth." Vide W. Crooke's Tribes and Castes, North-Western Provinces and Oudh, 1896 Edition, Vol. 3, pages 184-213.

In Shristhi Khanda the same Purana says that the sacrificial rites and study of the Kayasthas should be like the Dwijas, their occupation like that of the Kshatriyas.

Navishya Purana states that God, the Creator, gave the name and duties of Chitrugupta as follows:

"Because you have sprung from my body, therefore, you shall be called Kayastha and shall be famous in the world by the name of Chitrugupta. Oh my son, let your residence be always in the region of the god of justice for the purpose of determining the merits and demerits of men and receiving my irrevocable order, you should observe the Dharma, law and usages of the Kshatriya tribe according to Shastras."

Vignana Tantra says the same thing, adding that the descendants of Chitrugupta are Kshatriyas by caste, and not Sudras by any means.

The same is the enjoinder of Brahma to Chitrugupta according to Brihat Brahma Khanda quoted by Kamalakar Bhatta. He was named Kayastha Kshatriya having sprung from the body (kaya) of Brahma. He was directed to perform the sanskars of Kshatriyas, to marry Kshatriya girls and to have writing as his profession.

The story of Chandraseni Kayasthas as having descended from Chandra Sen, a Kshatriya Raja, is well-known and has been reported in the Puranas and also in the modern treatises on tribes, such as of Sherrings, Vol. II, Chap. II, page 181, 1879 Edition, and Steele's Laws and Customs of Hindu Castes in the Deccan Province, page 94, 1868 Edition. For a detailed account vide Skanda Purana Renukamahatmaya. On account of contest between the Brahmins and the Kshatriyas with respect to their relative rank in society a fierce war broke out between them in which Parsuram, the Brahmanic hero, is said to have twenty-one times extirpated the Kshatriya race (Sarkar's Hindu Law of Adoption). His father was killed by a Kshatriya Raja; he pursued in his thirst for Kshatriya blood the pregnant wife of Chandra Sen into the hermitage of Dalabhaya Rishi. The child in the womb was saved through the entreaties of the Rishi, who when born was called the Kayastha and though deprived of the martial profession was directed to carry on the profession of reading and writing which appertained to the Kshatriyas. He was attached to the Court of Kings, was initiated into the Sanskars of the Kshatriyas and was taught Vedas. His descendants are the Kshatriyas in the Deccan and are known as Parbhu Kayasthas.

Skanda Purana in another place as quoted in Vachaspathya, page 2943, gives an account of Raja Chitra also called Vivasvan, Aditya or Mitra, the blessed and purest, having performed for a long time tapasya (austerities) obtained from God Surya the boon of becoming sarvagya (omniscient), possessed of divine intellect and supernatural powers. Dharamaraja finding his duties of keeping records of the deeds of men and doing justice according to their merits and demerits too onerous managed to remove Raja Chitra to Dharmapuri to assist him in his duties. Chitra having thus disappeared from the mortal world was called Chitrugupta. He became one of the fourteen Yamarajas or ruler of Yamapuri (Daksha Smriti).

Garuda Purana describes the imperial throne of Chitrugupta in Yamapuri holding his Court and dispensing justice according to the deeds of men and maintaining their record, in the following words:

धर्म राजश्चित्रगुप्तः श्रवणोभास्करादयः ।

कायस्थ तत्रपश्यन्ति पापपुण्यचरसर्वशः ।

(There Dharmaraja, Ohitragupta, Sravana and others see all sins and virtues which remain concealed in the bodies of men).

Vyoma Samhita quoted in Shabda-Kalpadrum says:

कलौहि क्षत्रियस्तस्य जपयज्ञेबुराजतम् ॥

The Kayasthas have sprung from the kaya or body of Brahma. They are similar in rank to Brahmaṇas, but in Kaliyug their religious observances and duties have been prescribed to be those of Kshatriyas. Brahma himself is said to have ordained them to perform the duties of Kshatriyas. Similarly, Apastamba Shakra of the Veda quoted in Shabda-Kalpadrum 2nd part, page 228, Shabda 20, under Kshatriya, states that Kayasthas are Kshatriyas. Ohitragupta who reigns in heaven and his son Chaitrarath, who was light of the family, meritorious and of illustrious deeds ruled on earth for a long time as King of Ohitrakoot near Allahabad.

Meru Tantra quoted in Shabda-Kalpadrum under the word 'Kshatriya' supports the same view.

The Mahabharata (Anusasan Parva, Chap. 130) recites the teaching of Ohitragupta requiring men to do virtuous and charitable acts and performing Yagya, saying that men are rewarded or punished according to their good or bad deeds.

These allegorical descriptions of the origin of Ohitragupta and the Kayasthas having sprung from God Brahma in meditation and, as Risley puts it, from his inner consciousness for the purpose of managing the business affairs, performing literary work, administering justice, punishing and rewarding the deeds of mortals and keeping records thereof, indicate the status and position of the Kayasthas in society and their occupation as appertaining to the three higher or regenerate classes and that they could not be classed as Sudras whose origin is said to be from the lowest part of Brahma indicative of the servile duties requiring absolutely no mental activity.

The name Kayastha etymologically denotes the occupation and social position of the Kayasthas. According to Shabda-Kalpadrum, a dictionary of high authority, and Brihat Bidhan, Kayastha is defined as that is, one who lives in the body of everybody and thus comes to know of the inner life of men, that is their deeds and misdeeds, merits and demerits. The word "Ohitra" (चित्रः) is defined by Shabda-Kalpadrum as follows: चित्रयति पापपुण्य विचाराचित्रं करोति लिखतीत्यर्थः यमविशेषः यथातथ्या दिन्तैव one who pictures, records and considers the sins and virtues of men and who is one of the Yamas, so as to give the mortals their dues after death.

कायेषु तिष्ठतीति = कायेषु सर्वभूतशरीरेषु

अन्तर्यामी यथा तिष्ठतीति

Turning to the Smritis, Vishnu in Ohap. VII, verse 3, says that a document attested by the King is one which is written or prepared by a Kayastha, an officer of the Court appointed by the King, and stamped with the finger prints of the head of the department. The words are राजाधिकरणं तन्नियुक्त कायस्थं कृतं तदध्यक्षकरं चिह्नितं राजसामिकम् ।

Virihat Parasara in Ohap. X, Sloka 10 says: लेखकानपि कायस्थान् लेखं कृत्यहितैषिणः ।

Kayasthas should be appointed as writers being expert in the art of writing.

Again in Ohap. I, Sloka 235, he says that Danda-dhrita (दाण्डधृतः), the Magistrates and Judges of the Courts should be (dharma-gya) persons versed in laws and good administration; Kayasthas who are versed in the art of writing (लेखकानपि कायस्थान्)

Similarly, Shukraṇiti in Ohap. XXXII, Sloka 420, describes Kayasthas as lekhaks (कायस्थो लेखकस्तथा), and in Ohap. II, verse 178, says that the accountant and lekhak knew the Vedas, Smritis and Puranas.

Brihaspati quoted in Prasara Madhava and Vyas cited in Vaijayanti say that "a lekhak and ganak (writer and accountant) must be a person who has command over languages (literally who knows particulars about words), is pure in mind (mind and body), has control over his temper, is not covetous, is truthful and can write clearly and in a lucid style."

Vyas says that the writer and the accountant should be श्रुताध्ययन सम्पन्नं that is versed in Mimamsa (Śrutis) and Vedas (Adhyayana) as explained by Mitakshara in commenting upon Yajñavalkya, Ohap. II, Sloka 2, which says that the King's Councillors should be versed in the sacred books of Mimamsa and Vedas, expert in law, truthful and impartial.

Slokas 10 to 12, Chap. I of Vyas and slokas 32-34, Chap. VIII of Usana are either interpolations as some say, or, do not apply to the Chitruguptavansi Kayasthas who have been described by Vyas as writers and accountants, versed in Vedas and Smritis and Councillors and courtesans of kings, as Shyama Charan Sarkar himself says.

Yajnavalkya in Slokas 317 to 320 describes how the edicts of the king should be written, sealed and promulgated. Apararka in his commentary upon these Slokas quotes from Vyas and shows that these edicts should be written by lekshaks, the ministers of war and peace (sandhi vighraha-kari), and that they should be promulgated to the gentry and officials among whom Kayasthas have been mentioned.

Similarly, Vijnanesvara in his Mitakshara commenting upon these Slokas says:

"He (King) should cause it to be recorded by that officer of his, who is in charge of war and peace (i. e. by a Kayastha), and not by anybody else. As says a Sruti: That officer of his, who is sandhi vighraha kari or the officer in charge of peace and war should be its writer (lekshak)."

Yajnavalkya uses the word "Kayastha" in Slokas 335 36, Chap. I. Commenting upon this, Mitakshara says that Kayasthas are accountants and writers (कायस्थानुक्ता लेखकाश्च). He makes the word "Kayasthas" synonymous with accountants and writers. Similarly, Apararka says that Kayasthas were revenue-collectors. (kar-adhikrita).

The author of the Viramitrodaya makes the following comment on the text of Vyas already quoted and proves that the Kayasthas are a twice-born class, "The accountant must be twice born because it is declared, that he should be a person who has studied the Vedas which none but a twice-born can do; so also the writer must be twice-born, because they go together."

The accountants and scribes constitute one of the ten parts of a judicial proceeding (Jolly's Translation of Narada, page 6, s. 16). Brihaspati says the same thing, as quoted in Prasara Madhava, Vyavahara Kanda.

Yajnavalkya in Sloka 335 (numbered 334 and 336 in some books) enjoins the king to protect his subjects from the oppression of the Kayasthas especially. Mitakshara gives the reason that they being the favourites of the king (Rajvallabha) and officers of the Court as Ministers of War and Peace, Councillors and writers and accountants are more likely to take advantage of their position and oppress the subjects. This view is in accordance with Manu who in Chap. VII, Verse 123, says that the king's servants connected with the Government of the realm may become exacting and deceitful and the king should protect his subjects from such officials.

According to the Smritis, the officers of the realm, such as, ministers of peace and war, courtesans and Councillors, Governors and headmen of villages should be men versed in the Sastras, valorous and born of noble family, pure, intelligent, affluent in wealth and of tested virtue and comprehension: Manu, Chap. VII, Verses 54 to 121; Yajnavalkya, Chap. I, Verse 312.

The officers of the Court must be twice-born who are preferable to Sudras even if they are by name twice-born. A Sudra, the Smritis say, should in no circumstances be associated with the Court: Manu, Chap. VIII, Verse 20; Vyas, Chap. I, Verse: Vasishtha, Chap. XVI. The realm of a king wherein a Sudra official administers justice is destroyed under his very eyes like a cow merged in the mire (Manu, Verse 21, Chap. VIII).

Thus, according to the smritis and the commentaries thereon, notably of Apararka, Vijnaneshwara called the Mitakshara and Viramitrodaya the recognized authorities in the Benares School, the Kayasthas were officers of the Court, Ministers of War and Peace, writers and accountants and were required to study the sacred Vedas and the Dharma Sastras. Had they been Sudra, they would not have been allowed these privileges which appertain exclusively to the regenerate classes.

By origin the Kayasthas were of pure regenerate descent. Even if they be of mixed origin, as some say, they cannot be Sudras as shown below.

Yajnavalkya in Chap. I, Sloka 92, calls a son begotten by a Vaisya (twice-born) on a Sudra woman a Karan. Some commentators make Karan synonymous with Kayasthas. Yajnavalkya himself does not say so. The confusion has probably arisen on account of Karan being one of the twelve sub castes of Kayasthas which has nothing to do with the offspring of mixed marriage mentioned either in Manu or Yajnavalkya. This is clear from Shabda Ratnakar which gives several meanings of the word "Karan", such as, "Cause, body, war, son of a Vaisya by a Sudra woman, and a sub-division of the Kayasthas."

These are different uses of the word ; one has nothing to do with the other. Karan sub-caste of the Kayasthas descended from Arun, one of the twelve sons of Chitrugupta, is not to be confounded with the offspring of a Vaisya husband and a Sudra wife. Even if Karan be Kayastha he will not be a Sudra, for according to Manu he will retain the caste of the father though he may not have the same respect on account of inferiority of the mother (सदृशानेव तानाहुर्मादिदोष विगर्हितान्). the reason for this given by Manu in Chap. X, Sloka 72, being that the seed of the father is of greater importance in an act of fecundation. In Sloka 41 of that Chapter he clearly states that the sons begotten by twice-born ones on wives of their own caste or on wives belonging to an inferior caste have the rights and privileges of the twice-born, that is, of being initiated with the thread, etc., and that he will not be a Sudra. Thus, even if Karan be the offspring of a Vaisya on a Sudra woman, he will be a twice-born, and not a Sudra. In any case Karan is only a sub-caste of Kayastha and cannot embrace the whole community. It is undisputed that if Kayastha is the offspring of a Kshatriya by a Vaisya woman, as given by Wilson in his glossary, he will be a twice-born called Mahishya according to Manu and Yajnavalkya, because both the father and mother are such. If he is the offspring of a Kshatriya by a Sudra wife he will be an Urga Kshatriya both according to Manu and Yajnavalkya, and an Urga Kshatriya is not a Sudra as held in Sri Gajapaty Hari Krishna Devi Garu v. Sri Gajapaty Radhika Patta Maha Devi Garu (8), Brindavana v. Radhamani (9), Jawala Singh v.

Sardar (10) and Chuoturya Run Murdun Syn v. Sahub Purhulad Syn. (11) where the Vyavastha of the Pandit of Sadar Dewani Adalat was not accepted and the Rajput was held to be a Kshatriya. These authorities have examined the text carefully and have gone so far as to hold that even an illegitimate son of a twice-born retains the caste of his father and does not become Sudra.

Thus, even if Kayastha is an offspring of inter-marriage he will be a twice-born. Even Shyama Charan Sarkar whose Vyavastha is the basis of the decision under review does not accept that a Kayastha is the offspring of a mixed marriage or that he is Karan. He is decidedly of opinion that the Kayasthas are Kshatriyas and this is so according to the Smritis and the Puranas. He, however, says that they have degraded themselves to sudradom by omitting to perform the Upanayana ceremony. This will not cause their degradation to sudradom, as Manu himself in Chap. X, Verse 20, definitely lays down that twice-born ones devoid of the rights of initiation with the thread are Vratyas (broken vowed ones) called Vratya Brahmans, Vratya Kshatriyas and Vratya Vaisyas respectively. Among Vratya Kshatriyas he mentions the name of Karan in Sloka 22. So if Karan is synonymous with Kayastha as some commentators say, then Kayastha will be Vratya Kshatriya, that is Kshatriya by origin and descent but of broken vows. Yajnavalkya in Chap. 2, Sloka 38, says that they will be Vratyas, "so long as they do not perform the sacrifices called Vratyastoma," and Mitakshara commenting upon this says "performing which (Vratyastoma) they again become entitled to Upanayana."

Mitakshara and Balambhatta both explain Vratya as devoid of sacrament, that is, excluded from performing the religious ceremonies. They do not say that such a twice-born will lose the civil rights of succession, marriage and adoption. Sarva-dhikari, as already observed, emphatically expressed it and asked the question what would happen if the Kayasthas, who are Kshatriyas and who according to Shyama Charan Sarkar omitted to perform Upanayana and thus degraded themselves to sudradom, would again begin, as many are doing, to wear the sacred thread? It is not clear whether Shyama Charan Sarkar means by degradation to sudradom that they become Sudra in all respects and will be governed by the laws of Sudras. Perhaps he means to say what Yajñavalkya and Mitakshara have held that they will be devoid of sacrament only, while retaining their rights as Kshatriyas by birth.

Sirisa Chandra Vidyarnava in his translation of the Mitakshara at page 214, 1918 Edition, upon the authority of Balambhatta, says that the Chandraseni-Kayasthas or Parbhus of Bombay and the Chitrugupta Kayasthas are Kshatriyas. So far as the Kayasthas of Upper India, Behar and the Deccan are concerned, the matter is concluded by the authorities of Mitakshara and Viramitrodaya, which govern them, that they belong to regenerate class. By profession assigned to them from time immemorial they must be regarded as Kshatriyas, for according to Amar Kosha, Kshatriya verga, Slokas 16-17, writing is one of the duties of Kshatriyas.

The careful research of the modern writers of authority shows that the position assigned to the Kayasthas of the aforesaid Provinces is still retained by them by occupation and observance of religious rites and ceremonies.

W. Crooke of the Bengal Civil Service in his book on the Tribes and Castes of the North-Western Provinces and Oudh, Vol. III, pages 184 to 213, deals with the Kayasthas. He gives the Puranic legends of their original growth already referred to. Their common ancestor was Chitrugupta. He had twelve sons: Bhanoo, Vibhanu, Vishwabhanu, Virjawan, Charu, Sucharu, Chitra, Matiman, Himavan, Chitracharu, Arun and Atindriya. The twelve sub-castes of Kayasthas have descended from these twelve sons; Srivastava from Bhanoo, Surajdhwaja from Vibhanu, Asthana from Vishwabhanu, Balmiki from Virjawan, Mathur from Charu, Gaur from Sucharu, Bhatnagar from Chitra, Saksena from Matiman, Ambastha from Himavan, Nigram from Chitracharu, Karan from Arun, and Kulasastha from Atindriya. Bhanoo, the ancestor of Srivastava, immigrated to Kashmir where he became Raja of Srinagar and obtained the title of Rajadhiraja from Charu.

gupta, the Raja of Magadh (South Bihar). Vibhanu, the ancestor of Surajdhwaja, obtained this title from Raja Sursena of the Ikshwaku race because he helped him in performing a sacrifice. Vishwabhanu, the ancestor of Asthana, was honoured by the Raja of Benares and he presented to him astha or eight kinds of precious pearls and hence he was called Asthana, Virjawan, the ancestor of Balmiki, gained the name of Balmiki on account of his austerities and devout meditation in God. Mathurs, the descendants of Charu, are so called on account of their having settled at Mathura. The Gaur Kayasthas, descendants of Sucharu, are so called from Gaur or Gauda, the old capital of Bengal. The Sena dynasty was founded by this sub-caste; their ancestor Bhagadutta is said to have fought in the war of Mahabharata on the side of Duryodhana against Yudhishtira. Raja Lalasena was another famous king among them. The last of that dynasty was Raja Lakshmanian. Bakhtiar Khilji deposed the Gaur Kayastha dynasty. The Bhatnagar sub-caste derives the name from the residence on the bank of the Bhat river or the old town of Bhatner, the fort of which is of some historical interest having been at various times captured by Mahmud of Gaznavi, Tamur and Kamran, brother of Humayun. The Saksena sub-caste, literary "friend of the army" was given this title by the Srivastava Raja of Srinagar on account of their skill in war. One of their ancestors Surajchandra or Somadutta obtained the title of Kharua as a recognition of his honesty as treasurer to Kusa, one of the twin-sons of Rama and Sita; hence the Kharva sect of Saksena sub-caste. The other section called Dusra is so named because one of them accompanied Humayun, father of Emperor Akbar, during his refuge in Iran after his defeat by Sher Shah. Ambasthas are so called because of their worship of the goddess Ambaji. They have settled at Girnar hill. They are versed in the art of surgery, and there is a colony known as Kothar at Nagram in the Lucknow district, who have a great local repute. The Ambastha subject is also to be found in the Gaya and Patna districts of Bihar. There is a class called Ambastha who are Vaidya or physician in Bengal. In the Sruti already referred to (Manu X, 8), Ambastha is mentioned as descended from a Brahman and a Vaisya. Some say that this refers to the referred to in Sarvadhikari's Hindu Law, 1922 Edition, page 834, says that upon a question being referred by the Maharaja of Benares the Pandits of Benares, Kashmere, Bengal and Bombay affirmed the view of the Padam Purana that the Kayasthas are descendants [of Chitrageeta and the offsprings of the grand-daughters of Brahma and Surjya and that the name 'Kayastha' is derived from their having sprung from the kaya or body of Brahma, who invested them with the profession of scribe and the duties of Kshatriyas, the pen being substituted for the sword. They also based their opinion upon the similarity of habits and customs and on religious authority. At page 375 it mentions the high posts occupied by Kayasthas as Nizams, Collectors or Captains under the Oudh Government and high titles being conferred upon them and their continuing to hold similar appointments under the British Rule. At page 73 it refers to the Kayasthas as warlike and gives instances of their having fought battles, such as the military deeds of Triloke Chand. In Vols. II and III it gives a number of instances of the military deeds performed by Kayasthas and their having taken part in the battlefields and having thereby acquired large territories and having been invested with titles of Rajas, Thakurs, Subedars, etc. According to Rajputana Gazetteer, the Kayasthas of Rajputana call themselves Rajdhana.

The research of the modern writers, as shown above, has led to the conclusion that the Kayasthas are not Sudras but belong to the three regenerate classes.

Sarvadhikari in his book on Hindu Law, 1922 Edition, page 633, has referred to Vyavastha No. 60 of 1861 of the Pandit of Sadar Dewani Adalat of North-Western Provinces then located at Agra. This Vyavastha contains the well-considered and authoritative opinion of the Pandit that the Kayasthas are Kshatriyas. We have been referred to the Kayastha Ethnology of the late Munshi Kali Prasad Srivastava, 1877, which quotes a number of Vyavasthas of the Pandits of Kashmere, Kashi, Mathura, Patna Mithila, Agra, Oudh, Central Provinces and Bengal given from time to time and extending over a large period. The book also refers to a number of decisions of the subordinate Courts of the United Provinces, Oudh and Behar (Patna), showing that the Kayasthas were held to belong the regenerate class, wear the sacred thread and perform the marriage and other ceremonies according to the rules that govern the regenerate classes, widows do not re-marry and illegitimate children do not inherit.

I would, however, prefer to rest my judgment on the Smritis, the Puranas and other authoritative works and the independent research by eminent writers which I have already referred to. It is, however, important to notice that no contrary view of any Court in the United Provinces and Behar has been referred to us. This shows that it has been accepted without any controversy that the status of the Kayasthas as belonging to the twice-born caste has been accepted in those Provinces. Even Shyama Charan Sarkar whose Vyavastha is the basis of the solitary decision in the case of Raj Coomar Lall v. Bissessur Dyal (2) admits that the Kayasthas whether of Bengal or any other country are Kshatriyas. There is, therefore, no controversy that by origin the Kayasthas are Kshatriyas. Shyama Charan Sarkar, however, says that they were degraded to sudradom by non-observance of the Upanayana ceremony and by assuming the Sudra epithet of 'Das' instead of their own Kshatriya 'Varma'. It has already been shown that his opinion does not relate definitely to the Kayasthas of Bihar and other Provinces except that of Bengal and that, as a matter of fact, this is not so far as the Kayasthas of Behar are concerned. Even if it were so, these lapses referred to above would not cause any actual degradation or the loss of rights of the Kayasthas in matters of inheritance, marriage and adoption. The Sastras do not entail any such result by such deviation from the orthodox practices. The Dharma Sastras have laid down the rules of conduct, rites and ceremonies in the Acharya and Vyahara Kanda. If any twice-born fails to pay due regard to the precepts of Acharya and Vyahara Kanda or commits a breach thereof he can purify himself by the rules of expiation laid down in the Prayaschitta part; so long as he does not do so he may only be looked down upon but cannot be degraded to sudradom or the status of a Sudra so far as his civil rights are concerned. His caste for civil matters is that which he acquires by birth; he retains the caste of his father even if his mother be of an inferior caste. In the case of Bhagwan

Kuar v. Jogendra Chandra Bose (12) it was held that a Hindu does not cease to be so merely by occasional lapses in matters of diet and ceremonial observances from orthodox Hindu practice. The principle will equally apply where the question is whether the members of a regenerate class have ceased to belong to it by reason of such lapses. If the omission to wear the sacred thread were to cause degradation, the Banias and Thakurs who do not put on the sacred thread would have become Sudra whereas they admittedly belong to the Dwija class. As already shown by reference to Yajnavalkya Mitakshara and Balambhatta such an omission will only deprive a twice-born of his sacramental rights and he can regain that right by performing the vratyastoma ceremony.

It is not necessary to pursue the matter further. The reasons given by Shyama Charan Sarkar in his Vyavastha cannot cause degradation of the Kayasthas to sudradom and in any case the Behari Kayasthas are not Sudra, and I respectfully differ from the view taken in the case of Raj Coomar Lall v. Bissessur Dyal (2).

The Kayasthas of Behar are the descendants of Chitrugupta and belong principally to the sub castes of Srivastava and Ambastha; there are a few who belong to the other sub castes. All of them came down from Upper India and are governed by the laws and customs which prevail there; Parbati Kumari Debi v. Jagadis Chunder Dhabal (13) and Rutcheputhy Dutt Jha v. Rejunder Narain Rai (14). According to Mitakshara and Viramitrodaya, whose authority has been recognized by the Privy Council, they belong to the Dwija or regenerate class. Therefore, the rule prohibiting an adoption of a daughter's son, mother's sister's son and sister's son among the three regenerate classes will apply to them. The evidence in this case, particularly on behalf of the defendant, indicates that the family in question has been observing the ceremonies in connection with marriages, deaths and births according to the Vedic rites that obtain in the case of the regenerate classes and priests of high order officiate those ceremonies. In the absence of direct evidence to the contrary the learned Subordinate Judge was not justified in holding that the parties belong to the Sudra caste and in refusing to apply the above rule prohibiting the adoption of a daughter's son. The general rule of Hindu Law cannot be disputed; but it may be varied by family custom. The plaintiffs did not specifically raise this legal objection to the validity of the adoption of Newazi Lal by Hemnath, the maternal grandfather, and the defendant was thus precluded from pleading custom varying the rule. There was no issue raised upon the point and the plaintiffs, therefore, cannot rely upon the general principle of prohibition: Rup Narain v. Gopal Devi (15). The only issue raised was "did Hemnath adopt Newazi Lal as his son as contemplated by the Hindu Law?" (Issue No. 9). This is an issue regarding the factum of adoption, and the plaintiffs say that Newazi Lal was not adopted according to the Sastras. On the other hand, the defendant asserts that Newazi Lal was duly adopted.

Newazi Lal is said to have been adopted at the time of his marriage which was performed by Hemnath in 1804. On 26th May, 1804, Hemnath executed a deed of tamlaknama appointing Newazi Lal as successor to his properties after his death. He died in January, 1805, leaving his widow Dulari Kuer, his daughter Nand Kuer and three grandsons by his daughter, namely, Newazi Lal, Dharamlal and Ridhnath. In his own paternal family his brother Bishwanath and his nephews Mohan, Sohan, Tirloke Chand and Jagannath Sahay, sons of his predeceased brother Raghunath Singh who had died in 1793, were alive. Bishwanath died on 17th March, 1806, leaving his widow Gharbaro Kuer and a daughter married to Mahadeo Dutt. Soon after the death of Bishwanath, Tirloke Chand and others, sons of Raghunath, instituted Suit No. 5 in the Provincial Court of Azimabad against Musammât Gharbaro Kuer widow of Bishwanath, Musammât Dulari Kuer, widow of Hemnath and Newazi Lal, alleging that the properties in dispute were acquired by the three brothers Hemnath, Bishwanath and Raghunath, father of the plaintiffs, and that they were jointly held by them, but that the defendants on the death of Bishwanath on 13th Chaitra 1213 wrongfully took possession of the properties and refused to give any share to the plaintiffs in that case.

Newazi Lal contested the suit on the ground that the properties were acquired by Hemnath and he had a right to those properties as his adopted son.

The Provincial Court by its judgment (Ex. H), dated the 12th December, 1812, dismissed the plaintiffs' suit upon the ground that it was not proved that the plaintiffs or their father Raghunath were co-parceners with Hemnath and had jointly acquired the properties in dispute. As to the plaintiffs' claim to succeed as a reversionary heir of Bishwanath, the Court observed that so long as the adoption and the tamlknama set up by Newazi Lal were not set aside the latter had a preferential claim. The Court, however, did not determine the question of adoption on the ground that the matter was directly pending in another suit in the Provincial Court of Azimabad instituted by Newazi Lal against Mahadeo Dutt, son-in law of Bishwanath on the 13th September, 1809. In that suit Newazi Lal sought to set aside a deed of gift, dated 2nd Baisakh 1216 (2nd April, 1809), executed by Gharbaro Kuer, widow of Bishwanath after the death of the latter. Newazi Lal claimed the properties as an adopted son of Hemnath, asserting that the properties belonged to Hemnath and that Bishwanath was merely a farzidar for Hemnath and hence the widow had no right to execute the deed of gift in favour of her son-in-law. The Court by its judgment (Ex. H-1), dated the 6th May, 1813, upheld the contention of Newazi Lal and decreed his claim. Newazi Lal had instituted several other suits in which he claimed properties which stood in the names of various persons on the ground that they were mere farzidars of Hemnath. These cases were also decided in his favour and were along with the aforesaid case of Mahadeo Dutt taken in appeal to the Sadar Dewani Adalat and were decided by the judgment of that Court, dated 3rd December, 1818, (Ex. H-2) in favour of Newazi Lal. The Sadar Dewani Adalat differing from the Provincial Court held that the properties were jointly acquired and Bishwanath had one-third interest therein. It, however, agreed with the Provincial Court in holding that the deed of gift executed by the widow of Bishwanath in favour of her son-in-law Mahadeo Dutt was a forged document and observed that the claim to the one-third share of Bishwanath would be adjudicated upon when it would be made by a proper heir of Bishwanath. The Sadar Dewani Adalat dismissed the appeal.

Mahadeo Dutt then appealed to the Privy Council, but subsequently withdrew the appeal and filed a deed of relinquishment, dated the 19th April, 1826, and set forth in the Rubkari (Ex. H-3) of the Sadar Dewani Adalat, dated the 22nd August, 1826. By this deed Mahadeo Dutt waived his claim to the properties in dispute admitting that they were the self-acquired properties of Hemnath and were purchased in the farzi name of Bishwanath and that Newazi Lal was adopted by Hemnath. He also stated that Newazi Lal remitted his claim for wasilat and costs and hence he filed the deed of relinquishment.

The judgment of the Sadar Dewani Adalat (Ex. H-4), dated the 20th January, 1838, shows that Nand Kuer, daughter of Hemnath was alive and in fact is said to have given Ridhnath her son, the defendant's ancestor, in adoption to Newazi Lal in Chaitra 1230 (1830) long after the aforesaid litigations. The widow of Hemnath was a party to the aforesaid litigation. The plaintiffs, therefore, contend that during the lifetime of Dulari Kuer and Nand Kuer, the mother and grandmother respectively of Dharam Lal, Newazi Lal and Ridhnath, they had no right to the properties of Hemnath nor were Dharam Lal and Ridhnath, the respective ancestors of the plaintiffs and the defendant, parties to those litigations, and hence they are not bound by the result of those litigations or anything said or done by the parties thereto.

As regards the judgments (Exs. H-1 and H-2), dated the 6th May, 1813, and 31st December, 1818, of the Provincial Court of Azimabad and of the Sadar Dewani Adalat respectively, it is urged that these decisions do not prove any actual adoption attended with necessary ceremonies, and, on the other hand, they show that proper ceremonies were not performed and the actual giving and taking, which is essential for a valid adoption, had not taken place. The judgment of the Provincial Court does not refer to the ceremonies at all. The judgment of the Sadar Dewani Adalat refers to it in the following words:—

"Although it is not clear if all the necessary ceremonies in connection with the adoption of Rai Newazi Lal were performed according to the Sastras, yet from a perusal of the depositions of the witnesses as well as from the other circumstances of the case it is evident that Rai Hemnath Singh took Newazi Lal in his lap and adopted him in the presence of the audience, especially his near relatives, Rai Bishwanath Singh and others. As a matter of fact, on the death of Rai Hemnath Singh, Rai Bishwanath Singh placed the turban of succession on the head of Newazi Lal and the necessary ceremonies connected therewith were performed by Bishwanath himself as well as other relations and castemen. The sapindi karam and kiria (after death ceremonies) of Rai Hemnath Singh and Rai Bishwanath Singh were also performed by Rai Newazi Lal respondent. Hence there remains no doubt about the fact if Rai Newazi Lal has been adopted by Rai Hemnath Singh or not. With a view to the above facts there appears to be no reason to alter the decision of the Senior Judge of the Provincial Court of Azimabad, dated the 5th May, 1814."

As to what actually took place at the time of adoption it is to be found in the evidence of Tula Ram (Ex. 1-2) who was examined as a witness in both the aforesaid litigations:—

"The mother of Newazi Lal had been at first sitting behind the purdah (curtain) along with other ladies. At that time Hemnath Singh called her and obtained her permission, saying that he was going to adopt Newazi Lal as his son and that he had already obtained the permission of Ochoa Lal (father of Newazi Lal). The mother of Newazi Lal replied that she gave her consent out of her own free will."

At another place he said:—

"He took the bride (the girl to be married on the occasion to Newazi Lal) as well as Newazi Lal, the bridegroom on his lap in janvasa (place where the bridegroom's party stops) and said that he adopted Newazi Lal as his son and addressed the audience and told them to be aware thereof.....I did not see Ochoa Lal under the mandwa at the time when Rai Hemnath Singh adopted Newazi Lal as his son, on the performance of the ceremony in which kus (grass) and water are used. It is possible that he may have come later on.....He may have gone there after the performance of the ceremony in which kus and water are used."

The plaintiffs rely upon the case of Shoshinath Ghose v. Krishnasunderi Dasi (16) and Krishna Bhamini Dasi v. Braja Mohini Dasi (17) and contend that a mere declaration by the adoptive father is not sufficient to create a valid adoption and that the actual giving and taking is essential for a valid adoption whether the parties belong to the three regenerate classes or are Sudra. They say that the evidence of Tula Ram, who was an accredited servant of Hemnath and was in charge of all important affairs and in fact properties were also purchased by Hemnath in his farzi name, and his presence at the adoption show that Hemnath simply obtained permission of the mother of the boy, took Newazi Lal on his lap in the janvasa (marriage canopy) and declared that he had adopted him as his son; that Ochoa Lal, father of Newazi Lal, was not present at the time and neither he nor his wife actually performed the ceremony of giving and that the permission given by the wife is not valid in law during the lifetime of her husband. Upon the evidence of Tula Ram given soon after the adoption the plaintiffs contend that the actual giving and taking was not proved and that the Sadar Dewani Adalat did not hold that a proper giving and taking ceremony had taken place but it only held that Hemnath took Newazi Lal on his lap and adopted him. It is conceded that it would not be reasonable to expect direct evidence of adoption and all the necessary ceremonies having been performed after a lapse of long time; but it is contended that this would not apply to the present case where the adoption was investigated and evidence was given when it was quite fresh and that evidence showed that the essential ceremony of actual giving and taking had not taken place. Accordingly, the plaintiffs contend that Newazi Lal did not become a legally adopted son of Hemnath and he did not cease to be the son of his own father Ochoa Lal. The plaintiffs also rely upon the tamlaknama of 1804 (Ex. Q) executed by Hemnath and contend that had Hemnath adopted Newazi Lal he would not have appointed him to be his successor after his death, for upon a valid adoption Newazi Lal would have become the son of Hemnath from the moment the adoption took place and would have become a co-parcener with him as his aurasa or a natural born son.

The plaintiffs further contend that their ancestor Dharam Lal was not a party to that litigation and that no title to the property had accrued to him at that time, inasmuch as both the widow and the daughter of Hemnath were living and hence the plaintiffs or their ancestor are not affected by any finding of the Court in that case.

These contentions are sound. The fact, however, remains that Newazi Lal took possession of the estate of Hemnath and remained in possession till his death on 24th Asin 1243 (1st October, 1835) and that Sona Kuer his widow entered into possession and occupation of the properties. This led to another litigation. Ridhnath the youngest brother of Newazi Lal alleged that he was adopted by Newazi Lal in Chait 1230 Fasli (1823) and set up a deed of inheritance, dated 9th Jamad-us sani 1251 A. H. (October 1835) said to have been executed by Newazi Lal. He obtained a rubkari in December 1836 from the Sadar Amin in respect of a certain sum of money which stood in the name of Newazi Lal. This was upheld by the District Judge. Accordingly, Sona Kuer instituted Suit No. 220 of 1836 in the Civil Court of the District of Bihar for declaring the adoption and deed of inheritance set up by Ridhnath to be false and invalid. The Court by its judgment, dated the 20th January, 1838, Ex. H (4), held that the deed of inheritance set up by Ridhnath was spurious and his alleged adoption by Newazi Lal was false; that the adoption had not taken place; that the mother of Ridhnath had no power to give him in adoption without having an authority from her deceased husband Choa Lal and that the necessary ceremonies, such as the performance of homa, the recitation of mantras, pouring of water and taking the child in the lap of the adopter, were not performed. The Court set aside the rubkari, dated the 17th November, 1836, and decreed the suit of Sona Kuer, the plaintiff.

Ridhnath appealed to the Sadar Dewani Adalat. The appeal was disposed of on compromise. Both Sona Kuer and Ridhnath filed ekrarnamas Exs. J (37) and J(38), dated the 19th August, 1839, in the said appeal, agreeing that both of them would jointly remain in possession of the properties and after the death of Musammat Sona Kuer, Ridhnath and his descendants would remain in sole possession thereof. Accordingly, both of them remained in possession of the properties, and after the death of Sona Kuer, Ridhnath remained in sole possession.

Dharam Lal was not a party to the litigation, but he intervened in the appeal in the Sadar Dewani Adalat and admitted both the adoptions: (1) of Newazi Lal by Hemnath and (2) of Ridhnath by Newazi Lal and disclaimed all connections with the properties. He, however, was not a party to the compromise between Ridhnath and Sona Kuer.

On behalf of the defendant it is urged that Dharam Lal having renounced his claim to the properties, he or his descendants the plaintiffs are estopped from claiming them. They are also estopped from disputing the adoptions, inasmuch as Dharam Lal admitted it in that case. The plaintiffs dispute this contention. They urge that Dharam Lal had no title to the properties at that time and his mother Nand Kuer being alive there was nothing which he could disclaim. The adoption was in spite of the admission set aside, and it was held that the adoption had not taken place. His admission was against truth and he or his descendants the plaintiffs are not estopped from relying upon the true fact that adoption had not taken place. He was not a party to the compromise entered into between Ridhnath and Sona Kuer. He was, therefore, not bound by the statement of Sona Kuer in that case.

Briefly the plaintiffs' contention is that the aforesaid litigations and the adoptions set up by Newazi Lal and Ridhnath did not affect the right of Dharam Lal to succeed to the properties after the death of their grandmother and mother. They also say that during their lifetime the possession of Newazi Lal or Ridhnath did not affect the right of the plaintiffs' ancestor which accrued only after the death of their mother and grandmother. This is true. But the possession of Ridhnath and his descendants would be adverse to Dharam Lal and his descendants the plaintiffs after the death of the mother and the grandmother when the succession opened to the grandsons of Hemnath. The exact dates of the death of the widow and the daughter of Hemnath are not known. All that is known is that the widow of Hemnath was alive during the litigation between Tirloke Chand, herself and Newazi Lal which terminated with the judgment (Ex. H), dated the 12th November, 1872. Since then her name has not appeared in any litigation.

Nand Kuer, the daughter of Hemnath, is mentioned in the judgment (Ex. H-4), dated the 20th January, 1838, as having given her son Ridhnath in adoption to Newazi Lal. This is all that is known about her. She had at least three sons in 1805 when her father Hemnath died. One of the sons was married in 1804. She must have been much over 60 years in 1838 during the aforesaid litigation and, therefore, when the present suit was instituted in 1918 both she and her mother must have died when several twelve years had elapsed.

Now, Dharam Lal knew that Newazi Lal and Ridhnath set up their exclusive title to the properties based on their respective adoption. In fact, he admitted the adoption of the latter in the litigation with Sona Kuer which ended in 1839. He also knew that they were in possession of the properties by virtue of a claim adverse to him. Ridhnath and his descendants were solely recorded in the Government registers in respect of the properties in dispute; they have been dealing with the properties as their own and have been in possession thereof as sole owners; the documents are too numerous to mention.

Therefore, unless the plaintiffs prove that they and their ancestors were jointly in possession of the properties along with Ridhnath and his descendants their claim to a partition of the properties and to recover possession of their share therein is long barred by time. In fact, the plaintiffs or their ancestor could not succeed without having the adoptions of Newazi Lal and Ridhnath set aside and the suit for setting aside such adoptions is barred by limitation even if the said adoptions are invalid, vide Mohesh Narain Munshi v. Taruck Nath Moitra (18), Jaga- damba Chowdhraji v. Dakhina Mohan Roy Chaudhri (19) and Vaithialinga Mudaliar v. Srirangath Anni (20). In order to prove their joint possession the plaintiffs set up an ekrarnama or agreement (Ex. 1), dated the 14th November, 1811, entered into between the three brothers Newazi Lal, Dharam Lal and Ridhnath declaring their title to the properties and their joint possession and agreeing that Newazi Lal and after him Ridhnath would be in possession of the properties as karta or manager on behalf of Dharam Lal and his descendants.

(18) 20 C. 487; 20 I. A. 30; 6 Sar. P. C. J. 261; 17 Ind. Jur. 164; 10 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 330 (P. C.).

The plaintiffs' case is that, as a matter of fact, neither Newazi Lal was adopted by Hemnath nor was Ridhnath adopted by Newazi Lal, but that the adoptions were set up in order to prevent the properties going to the brother and nephews of Hemnath. Accordingly, the plaintiffs say that Dharam Lal supported the adoption of Ridhnath and with a view to his not being permanently deprived of the inheritance the ekrarnama in question was executed. The plaintiffs' case, therefore, entirely rests upon the ekrarnama.

The Court below has held that the ekrarnama is not genuine and has given good reasons for this view. The Court says that the signature and seal of Newazi Lal on this document do not agree with his signature and seal on the admitted documents on the record; that the documents of 1811 were all written in the Persian language, but the ekrarnama is written in Urdu; that the description of the District as Zila Gayaji in the document is false, inasmuch as Zila Gaya did not come into existence until 1865 prior to which the District was called Zila Bihar. No good reason has been given for differing from the view taken by the Court below as regards this document.

Thus, the ekrarnama not having been proved, the plaintiffs have no other evidence to prove that they or their ancestors were in joint possession of the properties with Ridhnath or his descendants. Admittedly, for the last several generations the defendant and his ancestors have been in possession of the properties and their names have been (19) 13 I. A. 84; 13 C. 308; 10 Ind. Jur. 307; 4 Sar. successively recorded in public and private documents. The plaintiffs have failed to prove their possession over the properties in dispute and consequently their claim for partition or for the recovery of actual possession must fail.

As to their claim for receiving allowances from the estate, it is not denied that for the last several generations they received allowances. The plaintiffs say that they and their ancestors used to receive maintenance allowances from the estate on account of the arrangement arrived at between Dharam Lal and Riddhath the ancestors of the parties. The defendant admits that they used to receive money and help; but denies that this was done on account of any arrangement between the parties or as a matter of right but that the plaintiffs and their ancestors received money and help on ceremonial occasions in their family on account of their being servants of the estate.

The parties through the able assistance of their legal advisers and the suggestions made by the Court have arrived at a satisfactory solution by means of an amicable settlement. The defendant has allowed the plaintiffs to get property yielding a net income of Rs. 1,200 yearly after deducting Government revenue, cesses and collection charges. The terms of the settlement have been set forth in the sworn petition filed on behalf of the parties. The points involved in this case are, as this somewhat lengthy judgment will show, complicated. They were argued at great length and with ability at the Bar. We are satisfied upon a careful consideration of those points that the settlement arrived at is for the benefit of all the parties concerned and notably of the minor plaintiffs-appellants, and accordingly we accord our sanction to it as being for their benefit. We direct that the appeal be decreed in terms of the compromise petition which will be embodied in the decree of this Court as a part thereof.

An objection has been taken as to the item in the decree of the Court below regarding the Court-fee to be paid by the plaintiffs. This was the subject of issue No. 2 in the Court below. The Court below assessed ad valorem Court-fee upon the value of the properties in suit and accordingly directed the plaintiffs to pay the deficiency. The plaintiffs appealed to this Court, but ultimately withdrew the appeal in view of the fact that they were permitted to sue in forma pauperis. They were also allowed to appeal as paupers. The litigation having terminated as indicated above, the question has been raised as to the correctness of the decision of the Court below regarding the Court-fee payable by the plaintiffs. It would seem that the view taken by the Court below is incorrect. The learned Subordinate Judge held that reading the plaint it was a suit pure and simple for partition, and the Court-fee originally paid by the plaintiffs was sufficient. Upon the objection, however, of the defendant and in consideration of the ekrarnama (Ex. 1) the Court changed its view and held that ad valorem Court-fee was leviable. In my opinion the Court-fee is leviable upon the construction of the plaint alone and consequently the plaintiffs were liable to pay Court-fee as in a partition suit. Accordingly, the plaintiffs, who were allowed to sue as paupers, are directed to pay the Court-fee calculated as above.

Mr. C. A. Seshagiri Sastri, for the Appellant.

Mr. K. V. Srinivasa Iyer, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of an application made by a petitioning creditor in I. P. No. 29 of 1920 to set aside the sale of the insolvent's properties held by the Official Receiver. One Solamalai Asari was adjudged an insolvent on the 12th July, 1911, and on 11th November, 1912, nine items of his properties were sold to one Virabhadra Konan. At the time of the sale the Court had not passed an order vesting the properties in the Official Receiver. Accordingly, the appellant put in an application, M. P. No. 222 of 1919, to declare the sale already held invalid and to order the Official Receiver to re-sell the properties after the Court had passed the vesting order. The learned District Munsif agreeing with the contention of the appellant declared that the sale was void and passed an order vesting the properties in the Official Receiver and directed him to sell the properties again. In appeal it was held that the application of the petitioning creditor was barred by limitation. But the High Court set aside this decision and remanded the case again to the District Court for disposal; the decision by the District Judge is the subject-matter of the appeal before us.

The learned District Judge has held that though the sale by the Official Receiver was void as no vesting order had been passed at that time, still when the District Munsif made the vesting order which he did in M. P. No. 222 of 1919 the provisions of s. 43 of the Transfer of Property Act became applicable and the sale which he held at first became valid. Section 43 says: "Where a person erroneously represents that he is authorised to transfer certain immoveable property and professes to transfer such property for consideration, such transfer shall, at the option of the transferee, operate on any interest which the transferor may acquire in such property at any time during which the contract of transfer subsists."

It has been held by this Court in Pinnamameni Basava Sankaran v. Garapati

Narasimhulu (1) that in circumstances like the present the vesting order has retrospective effect and the sale held by the Official Receiver when he was not authorised to do so becomes effective as a result of the subsequent vesting order passed by the Court by virtue of s. 43 of the Transfer of Property Act; and this is, what has happened in this case. We, therefore, agree with the District Judge that the learned District Munsif had no power to order a re-sale as by the vesting order he passed he had cured the defect in the original sale.

It is argued that since the District Munsif has declared the original sale void by his order, s. 43 becomes inapplicable. We cannot agree. The sale was already void because the Official Receiver had no power to sell owing to the absence of the vesting order. We think that the subsequent vesting order makes the first sale valid.

We dismiss the appeal with costs.

Income Tax Act (XI of 1922), ss. 26, 55, 58—Finance Act (XIII of 1925), s. 7—Unregistered Association converted into limited Company—Rate of super-tax applicable on profits made prior to conversion.

Where an unregistered Association is converted into a limited Company, the rate of super-tax applicable to it, in respect of the profits of the Association for the year previous to that of the conversion, is the flat rate of one anna in the rupee appropriate to a Company. [p. 645, col. 1.]

In the matter of Begg Sutherland & Co., Ltd. (2), commented on.

Appeal from a judgment of the High Court, in Civil Reference No. 6 of 1926 Bombay, (Macleod, C. J., and Crump, J.), reported as 98 Ind. Cas. 226 dated the 9th April, 1926, delivered upon a reference made by the Commissioner of Income Tax, Bombay, under the Indian Income Tax Act, 1922, whereby the opinion of the Commissioner upon the questions raised by the case was overruled, and it was decided that the amount of an assessment to super-tax made upon the respondent Company was excessive.

FACTS.—The question arising in this appeal, shortly stated, is whether the rate of super-tax applicable to the income dealt with by the assessment was in the circumstances of the case the rate applicable to the income of an unincorporated Association of individuals, or the rate applicable to that of an incorporated Company.

The respondent Company is a Company incorporated under the Indian Companies Act, VII of 1913, as a Company limited by guarantee. The Company was registered on the 1st April, 1925, with the object of taking over, and did in fact take over, the assets, effects and liabilities of the Western India Turf Club.

The Western India Turf Club before the 1st April, 1925, was a members' club and unincorporated, and had been assessed to super-tax upon its total income as an unregistered firm or association of individuals not being a firm at the rates of duty prescribed for such a firm or Association by the enactment for the time being in force.

For the year of charge beginning the 1st April, 1925, the rate of duty prescribed for such a firm or Association was a scale rate rising from one to six annas in the rupee as provided by the Indian Finance Act, XIII of 1925, i. e., for the excess over the first fifty thousand one anna in the rupee, for the next fifty thousand $1\frac{1}{2}$ annas, for the next fifty thousand two annas and so on up to six annas.

By the said Act the rate of duty prescribed for an incorporated Company for the same year of charge was a flat rate of one anna in the rupee.

The Company after its incorporation on the 1st April, 1925, made for the purpose of super-tax for the year 1925-26 a return of the total income of the unincorporated club of the previous year 1924-25. Section 55 of the Indian Income Tax Act, 1922, prescribes that super-tax shall be charged, levied and paid 'in respect of the total income of the previous years of (inter alia) any company, unregistered firm or other Association of individuals.

The Senior Income Tax Officer assessed the amount of the income of the previous year of the unincorporated club at Rs. 15,03,522, and no dispute arises in the case about the correctness of this figure.

Section 58 of the Indian Income Tax Act, 1922, made applicable to super-tax s. 26 of the same Act. The latter section is set out in the judgment of the Privy Council.

The Senior Income Tax Officer considered that the rate of super-tax applicable to the income in respect of which the assessment was to be made, namely, the income of the unincorporated club for the previous year, was the scale rate prescribed as abovestated for the income of an unregistered firm or unincorporated Association of individuals, and on this basis he determined, in pursuance of s. 23 of the said Act, the amount of super-tax to be Rs. 4,59,153.

The respondent Company, upon being served with a notice of demand, of that amount of super-tax, objected to the amount of the tax so assessed and appealed to the Assistant Commissioner under s. 30 of the said Act on the ground that the rate of tax applicable was not the scale rate which had been adopted, but the flat rate of one anna in the rupee applicable to the income of an incorporated Company. Upon the basis of this contention the super-tax payable would have been Rs. 90,845.

The Assistant Commissioner dismissed the appeal and confirmed the assessment under s. 31 of the said Act on the basis determined by the Senior Income Tax Officer.

The respondent Company thereupon, pursuant to s. 66 (2) of the said Act, required the Commissioner of Income Tax to refer to the High Court the questions of law arising out of the assessment, and the Commissioner accordingly drew up a statement of the case and submitted it with his own opinion thereon as required by the section to the High Court.

The questions for the opinion of the High Court are set out in the judgment of the learned Chief Justice; [see In re the Indian Income Tax Act, 1922 (1)].

(1) 98 Ind. Cas. 226; 50 B. 648; 28 Bom. L. R. 1236; A. I. R. 1926 Bom. 539.

The opinion of the Commissioner upon the questions referred to the Court was as follows:—

"I am clearly of opinion that the profits made by the club in the year 1924-25 when it was not a limited Company have been rightly charged to super-tax at the scale rates of one to six annas and that the flat rate of one anna cannot be applied to these profits which are not those of a Company having been made prior to the conversion of the club into a limited concern. My answer to the questions is, therefore, as under:—

(i) The profits are liable to super-tax at the scale rates of one to six annas and not at the flat rate of one anna.

(ii) Section 26 is to be regarded as merely requiring the Company to take the place of the defunct firm for the purpose of the payment of the tax due from it on its profits earned prior to the conversion.

(iii) The club is rightly assessed to super-tax at the scale rates of one to six annas.

(iv) It cannot be assessed for the year in question at the flat rate prescribed for a company."

The reference made by the Commissioner of Income Tax came on for hearing in the High Court on the 9th April, 1926, before Sir Norman Macleod, C. J., and Mr. Justice Crump, and judgment was given on the same day overruling the opinion of the Commissioner of Income Tax and deciding in favour of the respondent Company the questions submitted in the case. The Court held that the rate of super-tax applicable was the flat rate of one anna in the rupee and awarded costs against the Commissioner.

Against this judgment and order the Commissioner of Income Tax preferred an appeal to His Majesty in Council upon leave granted by the High Court under s. 66-A, of the Income Tax Act (inserted by the Amending Act, XXIV of 1926)

The case in the Court below is reported as In re the Indian Income Tax Act, 1922, in 98 Ind. Cas. 226.

Messrs. Lowndes, K. C., and Reginald Hills, for the Appellant.

Messrs. A. M. Latter, K. C., and Raymond W. Needham, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

Lord Chancellor.—The question raised by this appeal is a short one. The Western India Turf Club was originally an unregistered Association; but as from the 1st April, 1925, it was converted into a Company by being registered under the Indian Companies Act (VII of 1913) as a Company limited by guarantee, the object of the Company being to take over the assets, effects and liabilities of the Western India Turf Club. The question raised in these proceedings is, at what rate that Company should pay super-tax for the tax year commencing on the 1st April, 1925.

The enactment chiefly in point is s. 55 of the Indian Income Tax Act, XI of 1922. That section is in these terms:—

"In addition to the income-tax charged for any year, there shall be charged, levied and paid for that year in respect of the total income of the previous year of any individual, unregistered firm, Hindu undivided family or Company, an additional duty of income-tax (in this Act referred to as super-tax) at the rate or rates laid down for that year by Act of the Indian Legislature."

On that section two questions may arise, which it is necessary to keep distinct.

First, the question may arise on what amount of income the tax-payer is to pay his super-tax. On that point the section provides that he is to pay super-tax in respect of the total income of the previous year. Strictly speaking, this company had no total income in the previous year, for it did not then exist; but that difficulty is removed by s. 26 of the same Act, which provides that—

"Where any change occurs in the constitution of a firm or where any person has succeeded to any business, profession or vocation, the assessment shall be made on the firm as constituted, or on the person engaged in the business, profession or vocation, as the case may be, at the time of the making of the assessment."

It should be added that s. 26 is applied to super-tax by s. 58. The effect of those sections is that, for the purpose of assessment to super-tax, you must take the total income, not of the respondent Company itself, but of the predecessor-in-title of the Company; and the income in this case has been assessed on that basis.

The second question which arises is, at what rate is the tax-payer to pay super-tax. With regard to that point, s. 55 provides that the tax-payer is to pay "at the rate or rates laid down for that year"—that is, for the year of assessment—"by Act of the Indian Legislature." In other words, for the purpose of ascertaining the rate of the tax you are referred to a Statute to be afterwards passed. That Statute was afterwards, passed, and it is Act XIII of 1925. It provides by s. 7, sub-s. (2) that—

"The rates of super-tax for the year beginning on the 1st day of April, 1925, shall, for the purposes of s. 55 of the Indian Income Tax Act, 1922, be those specified in Part II of the Third Schedule."

When one turns to Part II of the Third Schedule, one finds these rates specified, namely, "In respect of the excess over Rs. 50,000 of the total income (1) in the case of every Company, one anna in the rupee." Then follow other rates relating to corporations, individuals or Associations not being Companies, and some of those rates are calculated on a rising scale. What is the effect of that? It can only be that this particular tax-payer, being a Company falling within the first words of Part II of Sch. III, must pay at the rate there specified, namely, at the flat rate of one anna in the rupee.

The argument which has been used in favour of the appeal seems to involve the fallacy that liability to tax attached to the income in the previous year. That is not so. No liability to tax attached to the income of this Company until the passing of the Act of 1925, and it was then to be taxed at the rate appropriate to a Company.

With regard to the Allahabad case which has been cited [In the matter of Begg Sutherland & Co. Ltd., (2)], it is sufficient to say that, if the question there decided should again arise, that decision will require further consideration.

For the reasons which they have given their Lordships are of opinion that this appeal fails; and they will humbly advise

His Majesty that it be dismissed with costs.

JUDGMENT.

Kulwant Sahay, J.—This is an appeal by the defendants-appellants in the lower Appellate Court against an order of the Subordinate Judge refusing to record a compromise under O. XXIII, r. 3 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The appellants purchased certain lands belonging to a sanghat. The plaintiff-respondent, who claims to be the mahanth of the sanghat, brought a suit for setting aside the conveyance on the ground that the defendant No. 6 who executed the conveyance was a mere pujari and had no right to execute it. The suit succeeded in the trial Court and the defendants have filed an appeal which is pending before the Subordinate Judge. They filed an application before the Subordinate Judge stating that there had been a compromise between the mahanth plaintiff and themselves whereby the mahanth agreed to transfer the land in dispute to the appellants on receipt of a sum of Rs. 700. The mahanth denies the correctness of this allegation and says that he had never compromised the suit.

The learned Subordinate Judge has held that the agreement, even if it has been arrived at, between the parties is not a lawful agreement which can be recorded in law.

In my opinion he is right. The mahanth has no absolute right over the properties of the sanghat and cannot dispose of them. He is a mere trustee and he can transfer the properties belonging to the mutt only for legal and justifying necessities of the mutt. He says that there is no necessity to transfer this property and the agreement alleged by the appellants, even if correct, is not a lawful agreement which can be enforced. The order of the learned Subordinate Judge is, therefore, correct.

The result is that the appeal is dismissed with costs. The original appeal will now proceed.

Madras Local Boards Act (XIV of 1920), s. 93—Profession tax—Chetti agent receiving fixed salary, whether liable to pay profession tax.

A Chetti agent receiving a salary and not carrying on any other business holds a salaried appointment and is not liable to pay profession tax under s. 93 of the Madras Local Boards Act.

Petition, under s. 25 of Act IX of 1887, for revision of the decree of the Court of the District Munsif, Devakottai, in S. C. S. No. 555 of 1925.

Mr. Rangaswami Iyengar, for the Petitioner.

Mr. A. C. Sampath Iyengar, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application to revise the decree of the District Munsif of Devakottai decreeing the suit for a return of the amount collected as profession tax from plaintiff by the Taluq Board of Devakottai.

The contention of Mr. Rangaswami Iyengar for the petitioner is that the respondent resides within the limits and, therefore, is liable under the Act. Under s. 93 of the Local Boards Act persons who hold any appointment public or private or are in receipt of any pension or income from investments are exempted from paying profession tax. This proviso was evidently overlooked by the Taluq Board when it assessed the petitioner. The petitioner is only a chetti's agent receiving a salary and is not carrying on any other profession within the local limits of the Taluq Board of Devakottai. He is a resident of Palni and Mr. Sampath Ayyangar says that he has paid profession tax in Palni as he is liable under the District Municipalities Act to pay profession tax even though he is in receipt of only a salary. Whether he paid profession tax to the Palni Municipality or not is besides the point. The only question is whether the plaintiff comes within the proviso to s. 93. As he is holding only a salaried appointment he is not liable to profession tax under s. 93 of the Local Boards Act.

I dismiss the civil revision petition with costs.

Impartible estate—Alienability—Concurrent findings of fact—Non-interference on appeal—Practice of Privy Council.

In the absence of proof of custom restricting alienation, an impartible estate is alienable.
Protap Chandra Deo v. Jagadish Chandra Deo (1), followed.

Concurrent findings of the Courts in India on questions of fact (as, for instance, fraud and misrepresentation) will not be disturbed by the Judicial Committee on appeal.

Appeal from a judgment of the High Court, Patna (Dawson Miller, C. J., and Foster, J.), dated the 6th March, 1925, affirming that of the Additional Subordinate Judge, Monghyr, dated the 5th September, 1921.

FACTS—The suit out of which this appeal arises was instituted by the appellant before the Subordinate Judge of Monghyr to set aside a sale of an impartible estate known as the Khaira Raj which had been in the possession of the appellant's ancestors for several centuries and which was sold by the last male holder Kumar Guru Prasad Singh, the brother of the appellant, by a registered conveyance, dated the 15th of January, 1919, to Rai Bahadur Baijnath Goenka and others who together with the vendor were impleaded as defendants in the suit.

The sale was challenged on two main grounds, (1) that the Khaira Raj, which is an impartible estate governed by the rule of lineal primogeniture, was by custom inalienable, and (2) that Kumar Guru Prasad Singh was of dissolute habits and addicted to drink and drugs by reason whereof his mental capacity was impaired and he was incapable of managing his own affairs and that the purchasers taking advantage of his helpless condition and incapacity induced him by fraud and misrepresentation to execute the conveyance in question.

After recording evidence, both oral and documentary, the learned Subordinate Judge delivered his judgment on the 5th September, 1921. He held that the appellant had not established any custom prohibiting an alienation by the holder of the Raj. He also held that the charges of fraud and misrepresentation had not been proved. In the result the learned Subordinate Judge made a decree dismissing the suit.

Against his decree the appellant appealed to the High Court of Judicature at Patna, and on the 6th of March, 1925, that Court made a decree dismissing the appeal. The learned Judges were of opinion that the holder of the Khaira

Raj for the time being was the sole proprietor of it, and, therefore, had complete powers of alienation, that a custom preventing alienation had not been proved, and that the transaction of sale was valid and binding.

From the said decree of the High Court the appellant preferred an appeal to His Majesty in Council.

Their Lordships dismissed the appeal on the short ground that the question involved was covered by their recent pronouncement in Protap Chandra Deo v. Jagdish Chandra Deo (1). Their judgment (delivered through Viscount Sumner) is as follows:—

Messrs. De Gruyther, K. C., and Raikes, for the Appellant.

Messrs. Lowndes, K. C., and Dube, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

Viscount Sumner.—Their Lordships are indebted to Counsel for having at the outset explained the difficulties that lie in the way of the appellant in bringing this appeal to a conclusion satisfactory to himself. In their Lordships' opinion the first part of the case is completely covered by the recent decision of their Lordships' Board in the case of Protap Chandra Deo v. Jagadish Chandra Deo (1) and, as to the second part, it relates to concurrent findings of the Courts in India on questions of fact, and their Lordships are, therefore, unable to entertain it.

Their Lordships will, therefore, humbly advise His Majesty that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

No. 854 of 1910 on the file of the Court of the District Munsif Tanuku).

Mr. P. Somasundaram, for the Appellants.

Mr. P. Venkataramana Rao, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The question for decision in this case is whether an application by a decree-holder for extension of time to file an encumbrance certificate cannot be said to be a step-in-aid of execution within the meaning of Art. 182, cl. (5) of the Limitation Act. In Kuppuswami Chettiar v. Rajagopala Iyer (1) it was decided that a statement by a decree-holder objecting to the judgment-debtor's application to enter up satisfaction is not a step-in-aid of execution. Applying the principle of that decision we must hold that the present application does not amount to a step-in-aid of execution as "it does not ask the Court to take any step-in-aid of execution." The decision in Kasifi Mohammad Hamidudin v. Mohammad Ghouse Sahib (2) is an express decision on the question before us. There it was decided that an application like the present one cannot be said to be a step-in-aid of execution. In that case, reliance was placed upon the decision in Kuppuswami Chettiar v. Rajagopala Iyer (1) and also on the decision in Krishna Pattar v. Seetharama Pattar (3) which following Kuppuswami Chettiar v. Rajagopala Iyer (1) again, held that the filing of a statement by a decree-holder objecting to the judgment-debtor's application to record satisfaction of the decree is not a step-in-aid of execution. In Kasifi Mohammad Hamidudin v. Mohammad Ghouse Sahib (2) all the cases which have been now cited before us have been noticed.

Two decisions were specially relied upon by the appellant, namely, Abdul Kadir Rowther v. Krishna Malamal Nair (4) and Kunhi Mannan v. Seshagiri Bhaktan (5). No doubt the decision in Abdul Kadir Rowther v. Krishna Malamal Nair (4) to the effect that an application to adjourn the case for the production of evidence amounts to a step-in-aid of execution does support the appellant; but this case was subsequently dissented from in Masilamani Mudaliar v. Sethuswami Aiyar (6) by Ayling, J. The decision in Kunhi Mannan v. Seshagiri Bhaktan (5) in view of the special facts of that case does not support the appellants' arguments. There, it was found necessary that an order should be obtained from the Court for the purpose of proceeding with the execution of the decree and when the petitioner asked the Court to issue such an order it was held that the application containing that request amounted to a step-in-aid of execution. This case has been explained in the decision in Krishna Pattar v. Seetharama Pattar (3).

The decision in Kuppuswami Chettiar v. Rajagopala Iyer (1) has been followed not only in the two Law Weekly Cases already referred to but also in Balaguru- swami Naicken v. Guruswami Naicken (7) It would thus appear that our Court has fairly consistently held that an application to amount to a step-in-aid of execution within the meaning of Art. 182, cl (5) should be one asking the Court to take some step in furtherance of the execution of the decree. The only decision which appears to us to hold a contrary view is the one in Abdul Kadir Rowther v. Krishna Malamal Nair (4). Ravur Munusami Naidu v. Pandala Muthial Naidu (8) simply follows this decision. As we have already pointed out, Abdul Kadir Rowther v. Krishna Malamal Nair (4) has been dissented from in Masilamani Mudaliar v. Sethuswami Aiyar (6). The trend of the decisions of our Court is in support of the view held in Kuppuswami Chettiar v. Rajagopala Iyer (1). We think that decision so far as it relates to the point argued before us lays down the correct principle.

Lastly, it was brought to our notice that the decision in Rajendra Lal Saha v. Abdul Karim (9) is in favour of the appellant, but a perusal of that judgment makes it clear that no clear principle is enunciated in it. In these circumstances we hold, applying Kuppuswami Chettiar v. Rajagopala Iyer (1) that the decision of the learned Judge of the Court below that an application for extension of time to file an encumbrance certificate is not a step-in-aid of execution, is right and that the appellant's application is barred by limitation. This appeal is dismissed with costs.

Second appeal against a decree of the Court of the Additional Subordinate Judge, Bezwada, in A. S. No. 23 of 1923, dated the 16th April, 1924, preferred against that of the Court of the District Munsif, Nandigama, in O. S. No. 238 of 1921.

Mr. G. Lakshmanna, for the Appellant.

Mr. P. Satyanarayana Rao, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The only point for consideration in this second appeal is whether the 1st plaintiff, Sarvayya is entitled to the estate of Subbayya by right of survivorship. There were three brothers, Mangayya, Subbayya and Seshayya. They divided their properties in 1894. Seshayya was then a minor. He attained majority in 1896 and died in 1897. His widow adopted the 1st plaintiff, the only son of Subbayya. Subbayya is now dead. Sarvayya, the 1st plaintiff claims the estate of Subbayya, by right of survivorship. He put forward three contentions in the District Munsif's Court:—

1. That he was a dwamushyayana son of both Subbayya and Seshayya.

2. That at the partition of 1894, Mangayya separated from the family and Subbayya and Seshayya continued to be members of a joint Hindu family and,

3. That he and Subbayya entered into an agreement whereby they both became members of a joint Hindu family. All the three points were found against the 1st plaintiff by the District Munsif. On appeal the Sub-Judge agreed with the District Munsif in finding the first and second points against the 1st plaintiff but he held that he had re united with Subbayya and therefore, he was entitled to succeed to Subbayya's estate. The 3rd defendant has preferred this second appeal.

It is contended by Mr. Lakshmanna for the appellant that there could be no re-union between persons who were not parties to a division. In other words a reunion can only be among persons who were once joint and who had become divided. In Balabux v. Rukhmabai (1) their Lordships of the Privy Council lay down the principle in the following terms:—"A re-union in estate properly so called can only take place between persons who were parties to the original partition. This appears to be the meaning placed on the well-known text of Vrihaspati in Mitakshara, Chap. II, s. 9:—"He who being once separated dwells again through affection with his father, brother, or paternal uncle is termed re-united." The text of Yagnyavalkya is "A re-united brother shall keep the share of his reunited co-heir who has deceased or shall deliver it to a son subsequently born." (See Setlur's Hindu Law Books on Inheritance page 57). Vignaneswara in commenting upon this text observes: "The effects which had been divided and which are again mixed together are termed re-united. He to whom such appertain is a re-united parcener."

"Re-union cannot take place with any person whoever it be but only with a father, a brother, or a paternal uncle, as Vrihaspati declares 'He who being once separated lives again through affection with his father, brother or paternal uncle is said to be re-united.'" The literal interpretation of the text can lead to no other conclusion than that a person in order to become re-united with another must have divided the family property with the other. We are not concerned in this case with the question whether the persons enumerated by Vrihaspati, the father, brother or paternal uncle, exhaust the list of persons who could become re-united. The only question in this case is whether a person who had not divided the inheritance with a father, brother, or uncle can become re-united with any of them. It is admitted that the plaintiff was born only in 1896 and that he was not a party to the partition in 1894. In Basanta Kumar Singha v. Jogendra Nath Singha (2) it was assumed that a reunion could only be among persons who had become divided.

observes "Re-union, the Sanskrit word being samsrista, implies a state of union or jointness, a partition and a subsequent state of jointness amongst co-parceners by mutual consent and through affection." The word used in the text is "samsrista".

In Vishwanath Gangadhar v. Krishnaji Ganes (4) it was held that "a reunion must be made by the parties or some of them who made the separation." It may be said that this decision was under Mayukha Law and is, therefore, no authority on a point of the Mitakshara Law. Chief Justice Couch after an examination of the Mitakshara, the Dayabaga and the Mayukha systems observed at page 75* "it appears to us that the meaning of the passage from Vrihaspati which is the foundation of the law is, that the reunion must be made by the parties, or some of them, who made the separation. If any of their descendants think fit to re-unite, they may do so; but such a union is not a reunion in the sense of the Hindu Law, and does not affect the inheritance."

The observation in Lakshmibai v. Ganpat Moroba (5) may be considered obiter as the evidence did not make out a reunion and the same remark applies to the observation in Nand Krishore v. Bohra Net Ram (6). No case contra has been brought to our notice by the respondent and the decision in Balabux v. Rukhmabai (1) governs this case. We find this point for the appellant.

Mr. Varadachari who appears for the 1st respondent wants to support the decision of the Sub-Judge on the ground that there was no division in status when some of the moveables were divided in 1894 and the brothers remained joint as regards the immoveable properties of the family and that under the law it is open to the members of a joint Hindu family to divide some of the family properties and remain joint with regard to the rest. Exhibit UU is the list prepared in 1894 at the time of the division of the property. Mr. Lakshmana read and translated to us a considerable portion of UU and we are satisfied that under UU all the three brothers Mangayya, Subbayya and Seshayya become divided. The statements in QQ and other documents by Mangayya and Subbayya that they were members of a joint Hindu family were made in order to keep out the widow of Seshayya who would otherwise inherit his share. It was with that view that Seshayya's widow was made to adopt the only son of Subbayya and she was given some property for her maintenance and the rest of the property remained with Subbayya. Exhibit Y dated 25th June, 1898, does not help the 1st plaintiff. It is clear from Ex. UU that the immoveable properties were not divided by metes and bounds as the family was carrying on trade and it was necessary for the purpose of the trade that the immoveable properties should not be divided by metes and bounds. As we concur in the finding of the two Courts that there was a division in status in 1894 it is unnecessary to consider the cases relied upon by Mr. Varadachariar in support of his contention that there could be a division of some property among members of a joint Hindu family and yet they could remain joint with regard to the other properties not divided by them; such as Gavrishankar Parabhuram v. Atmaram Rajaram (7), Raja Yarlagadda Mallikarjuna Prasad Nayudu v. Raja Yarlagadda Durga Prasada Nayudu (8), Mallikarjuna Prasada Naidu v. Durga Prasada Naidu (9), Muthusami Mudaliar v. Nallakulantha Mudaliar (10), Appovier v. Rama Subba Aiyar (11), Ajodhya Pershad v. Mahadeo Pershad (12). We may remark in passing that some of these cases may require re-consideration in view of the present state of the law that an unambiguous unilateral declaration of intention of one co-parcener communicated to the other co-parceners is sufficient to create a divided status between him and the other co-parceners.

In the result we allow the second appeal, set aside the judgment and decree of the Sub Judge and restore that of the District Judge with costs here and in the Court below.

*Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), s. 53—

 Setting aside alienation—Charge for consideration paid, whether can be given.*

When the question is whether an alienation was for the purpose of defeating or delaying the creditors, if it is proved satisfactorily that only a small portion of the consideration recited in the document did really pass, it is open to the Court to come to the conclusion that the transaction was intended to defeat or delay creditors. In such a case the proper order of the Court should be to set aside the transaction as a whole, because the transaction which is intended to defeat or delay creditors cannot be good in part and bad in part, and in so setting aside the alienation, the Court cannot allow a charge in favour of the alienee even to the extent of the consideration which actually passed.

When a person buys property or gets a mortgage of property for a consideration which is far short of that mentioned in the document, it cannot be said that he is a bona fide alienee or mortgagee.

Second appeal against a decree of the District Court, North Arcot, in A. S. No. 88 of 1923, preferred against that of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Vellore, in O. S. No. 76 of 1921.

Mr. P. S. Narayanaswami Iyer, for the Appellants.

Mr. Viswanatha Aiyer, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The only point in the second appeal is whether the 1st defendant is entitled to a charge in respect of the amount of consideration for Ex. IV which was found to have passed. Exhibit IV was executed for a nominal consideration of Rs. 2,660 and the consideration found to have passed was only Rs. 1,044-15-0. More than Rs. 1,000 was not paid by the 1st defendant towards the discharge of certain debts due from his mortgagor. The District Judge has definitely found that Ex. IV was executed without consideration in part and presumably with intent to defeat or delay the creditors of defendants Nos. 2 and 3, viz., the plaintiffs. But he allows a charge in favour of the 1st defendant in respect of the consideration which he finds to have been paid. When the finding clearly is that the document was executed with intent to defeat or delay the creditors, it cannot be said that the District Judge found the intent only on the part of the alienors and not on the part of the alienee. Mr. Viswanatha Iyer strongly urges that so far as his client was concerned there is no finding that he was a party to the conspiracy to cheat the creditors of the mortgagor. But the finding is in general terms and when it is found that a good portion of the consideration for the document was not paid by the 1st defendant he cannot be said in any sense to be a bona fide alienee for full consideration. When a person buys property or gets a mortgage of property for a consideration which is far short of that mentioned in the document, it cannot be said that he is a bona fide alienee or mortgagee. No doubt where there are no creditors to be defeated or delayed, the mortgagor or alienor could insist upon payment of the unpaid portion of the consideration. Where the question is whether the alienation was for the purpose of defeating or delaying the creditors, if it is proved satisfactorily that only a portion of the consideration recited in the document did really pass, it is open to the Court to come to the conclusion that the transaction was intended to defeat or delay creditors. The finding being clear on this point, it is not open to the 1st defendant to contend that he is a bona fide lender to the extent of the consideration found to have passed. In such a case the proper order of the Court should be to set aside the transaction as a whole, because the transaction which is intended to defeat or delay creditors cannot be good in part and bad in part. We may in this connection refer to Punyam Viswanatha Reddi v. Galiraja Venkata Reddi (1) to which one of us was a party.

The second appeal is allowed and the plaintiff's suit is decreed with costs throughout.

JUDGMENT.

Odgers, J.—This was a suit brought by one Kulandavelu Pillai the adopted son of Muthukumara Pillai for the recovery of possession of the suit lands which as he alleged had been trespassed upon by the 2nd defendant in October, 1914. The appeal really hinges on the effect, if any, to be given to Ex. I. Exhibit I purports to be a sale deed, dated 8th June, 1899, executed by Muthukumara Pillai in favour of his son-in-law Ramaswami Pillai, the 1st defendant, and as alleged by the plaintiff was a benami sale-deed without consideration. It was executed for certain purpose set out in para. 5 of the plaint. The defence of the 1st defendant was that the sale-deed, Ex. I, was a perfectly valid deed and a proper price had been paid for the lands in question. The finding of the District Munsif is that no consideration was paid by the 1st defendant for Ex. I and that when it was executed it was intended only to be a nominal transaction. That being so, the learned District Munsif went on to find that in spite of these findings Ex. I could be used long afterwards, namely, in 1910 to confer a good title on the 1st defendant, his son-in-law by way of gift or rather to give effect to a document which was originally a nominal transaction but which had ceased to be such and which had been given effect to either before or about the time of the adoption of the plaintiff. There is some evidence that the father-in-law Muthukumara Pillai did intend to benefit his son-in-law and his daughter in some way, for instance, he effected a change of patta with the Revenue Authorities and gave them possession of the lands. Exhibit I was executed, as found, with the intention of being a purely nominal transaction, that is to say, of having no legal effect. Can it then be said that the executant of the nominal transaction, by a change of intention can afterwards use it for a transaction which would be valid in law? In my opinion, there are several very obvious objections to the re-employment, if one may so call it, of a document of this description. There are evasions of the stamp law, the Registration law and the fiction that you are to regard the recitals in Ex. I as non-existent and as conferring what is practically a gift on the person to whom Ex. I is handed over. We have been shown no authority by which the executant of a document executed with one intention can by change of mind utilise that document for a transaction of a wholly different character. There is another very short objection to this second appeal and that is this, that this case was never set up in the pleadings or the issues but has apparently been found by both the lower Courts from motives of sympathy with the daughter and son-in-law of Muthukumara Pillai. It seems to me that such is out of place in a second appeal and we must strictly confine ourselves to the question of law that has been raised and for which, as I say, no authority has been cited. A case has been quoted by Mr. Vaz the learned Counsel for the appellant from Bai Motivahoo v. Purshotam Dayal (1) an expression of opinion of Sir Lawrence Jenkins on page 315* which is perhaps as near as one will get to anything in the reports. The cases on gift or long possession amounting to evidence of gift quoted by the learned Vakil for the respondents do not seem to me to have any bearing on the present case where the evidence given on the perfectly straightforward and simple case set up in the pleadings and the issues has been misdirected by both the lower Courts to this finding of a re-utilisation of Ex. I for giving it the effect of a gift deed. For these reasons, I think the second appeal must be allowed with costs throughout.

Devadoss, J.—I agree. I only wish to add that when a document is executed without the intention of conveying title by one person in favour of another, it cannot afterwards be used for the purpose of conveying title merely because one of them changes his mind and wants the document to be operative. When a document is once executed as a nominal document, that is to say, without intending to convey any title, it cannot afterwards be used for the purpose of conveying title.

Once a document has been admitted in evidence the admission of such a document cannot be questioned whether the document was admitted with objection or without objection. Appeal from a decision of the Subordinate Judge, Patna, dated the 27th August, 1924.

Mr. N. C. Sinha (with him Mr. N. C. Ghosh), for the Appellants.

Mr. S. M. Mullick (with him Messrs. Muhammad Hasan Jan and S. Deyal), for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

Kulwant Sahay, J.—The suit out of which the present appeal arises was instituted by the plaintiffs-appellants for partition of joint family properties, their share being 8 annas.

The defence of the defendants was that there had been a previous partition of all the joint family properties in Assin, 1329 and a fresh partition could not be effected. The learned Subordinate Judge has given effect to the contention of the defendants and has dismissed the suit.

The learned Advocate for the appellants does not very properly contest the findings of the Subordinate Judge on the merits: in fact the evidence seems to be overwhelming in support of the findings of fact arrived at by the learned Subordinate Judge. The learned Advocate has, however, taken an objection to the effect that Ex. B which purports to be a list showing the allotments of the properties to the plaintiffs and the defendants is either a deed of partition or an award. If it is a deed of partition, the document is invalid for want of registration; if it is an award, it is invalid for want of stamp duty, and in either case the document is not admissible in evidence, and if this document is excluded no oral evidence is admissible.

Now looking at the document, Ex. B, it is clear that it is not a deed of partition, it is not a document executed by anybody, it is not signed by the parties to the partition, and it can in no sense be treated as a deed of partition. It may be treated as an award of the arbitrators who effected the partition and it ought to have been stamped with the proper stamp duty. But the document has been admitted by the learned Subordinate Judge in evidence and s. 36 of the Stamp Act provides that where an instrument has been admitted in evidence, such admission shall not, except as provided in s. 61, be called in question at any stage of the same suit or proceedings on the ground that the instrument has not been duly stamped.

It is contended that objection to the admissibility of the document was taken before the learned Subordinate Judge and s. 36 would apply only to cases where a document is admitted without objection. There seems to be no justification for this contention. Section 36 is quite clear that once a document is admitted in evidence, the admission of such a document cannot be questioned whether the document was admitted with objection or without objection. It is, therefore, too late now for the learned Advocate for the appellant to contend that the document cannot be used as evidence in this appeal.

The learned Advocate for the appellant then refers to a passage in the judgment of the learned Subordinate Judge where it is stated that the defendants stated before him that they were ready to take for themselves the share given to the plaintiffs and that the plaintiffs were at liberty to take the shares given to them and he says that such exchange ought to be made now. The offer was made to them in the Court below and the respondents refused to accept the offer. Now it is too late for them to compel the defendants to exchange the shares.

There is no substance in this appeal and it must be dismissed with costs.

Ross, J.—I agree.

In a suit for damages for malicious prosecution the plaintiff is not bound to prove his innocence. [p. 655, cols. 1 & 2.]

Balbhaddar Singh v. Badri Sah (2), followed.

Padashim v. Maung Lun (1), not followed.

Mr. Shanmugam, for the Appellant.

Mr. Thet Tun, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal arising out of a suit for damages for false and malicious prosecution. The plaintiff-appellant, U Soe, was thugyi of Kyauktan, the most southern portion of Moulmein. This quarter appears to have been a hot bed of rice thieves, and special measures were taken against them. The Criminal Investigation Department with the aid of U Soe arrested many of them and they were sent up for trial. U Soe appeared as a witness for the prosecution. Many of them were convicted. After this the respondents, who were some of the witnesses for the defence in the case against the rice thieves, filed a petition before the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, Moulmein, asking that action should be taken against U Soe under s. 110, Criminal Procedure Code, on the ground that he habitually harboured thieves and bad characters. The Sub-Divisional Magistrate opened proceedings which terminated in the release of U Soe. The respondents then made a further application in revision to the Sessions Judge, and the application was dismissed. U Soe then filed the present case against the respondents for Rs. 1,000 damages for false and malicious prosecution. The Township Judge gave him a decree for Rs. 450. An appeal was filed to the District Judge, who allowed the appeal and dismissed the case with costs in both Courts. It is against this appellate decree that the present appeal has been filed.

The District Judge allowed the appeal on one ground, namely that the appellant had failed to prove his innocence. In so doing he followed the decision of the late Chief Court of Lower Burma in Padashin v. Maung Lun (1). In this ruling it is laid down that in a case of this kind the plaintiff has to prove four points:—

(i) that he was innocent of the crime alleged;

(ii) that his innocence has been pronounced by a competent tribunal;

(iii) that there was a want of reasonable and probable cause for the prosecution; and

(iv) that the proceedings against him had been initiated in a malicious spirit, i.e., from an indirect motive and not in furtherance of justice.

This is the latest published ruling of the Chief Court of Lower Burma and no ruling of the Rangoon High Court on the subject has been published.

It can, however, no longer be considered good law. There is a recent decision of the Privy Council Balbhaddar Singh v. Badri Sah (2), which lays down the points which should really be proved by the plaintiff. They are:—

(i) that he was prosecuted by the defendant;

(ii) that the proceedings complained of terminated in favour of the plaintiff, if from their nature they were capable of so terminating;

(iii) that the prosecution was instituted against him without any reasonable and probable cause; and

(iv) that it was due to a malicious intention of the defendant and not with a mere intention of carrying the law into effect.

Viewed in this light it is clear that the learned District Judge, who had not the Privy Council ruling before him, erred in holding that the plaintiff must fail, because he had not proved his innocence. There is no doubt whatsoever that the plaintiff has proved by the production of the records of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate's Court that he was prosecuted by the defendants and that the proceedings terminated in his favour. It will then be necessary to see whether the prosecution was instituted without reasonable and probable cause, and that it was due to a malicious intention on the part of the defendants, and not with the mere intention of carrying the law into effect. The Township Judge in his judgment has found both these points in the plaintiff's favour. The lower Appellate Court has not come to any finding with regard to them, because in view of his finding with regard to the second point it was unnecessary. It seems to me that the trial Court was quite correct in its findings on these two points. It is possible, as has been suggested, that the plaintiff's record in the past may have contained one or two doubtful episodes, but at the time that the respondents filed their petition against him before the Sub-Divisional Magistrate he had definitely come out on the side of law and order. He had been assisting the Police in rounding up the rice thieves, who were infesting the village, and had procured the conviction of a number of them. Proceedings under s. 110, Criminal Procedure Code, have got to deal with a man's existing character and habits, not with anything he may have done in the more or less remote past. The defendants themselves had been witnesses for the defence in the rice theft case and prima facie one would look with suspicion on a case brought by them against one of the principal witnesses for the prosecution, charging him with being an habitual harbourer of thieves. In view of the judgments of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate and the Sessions Judge, it was, in my opinion, clearly incumbent upon the defendants to show that they had reasonable and probable cause for filing their application to the Sub-Divisional Magistrate. They produced four witnesses to do so. The first witness, San Po, is a self-confessed thief, who was an approver in the rice theft case. He admits that he is on bad terms with the headman and kicked him in the presence of the Township Officer, for which he was convicted. He has also been sentenced to five years' rigorous imprisonment in a da cutting case and has been fined for another assault. He inspires no confidence.

(2) 95 Ind. Cas. 329; 30 C. W. N. 866; 1 Luck. 215; 24 A. L. J. 453; 3 O. W. N. 499; A. I. R. 1926 P. C. 46; 43 C. L. J. 521; 28 Bom. L. R. 921; (1926) M. W. N. 482; 51 M. L. J. 42; 29 O. C. 163; 7 P. L. T. 591 (P. C.).

The second witness, Bo Olet, was also arrested in the rice theft case. He has been convicted for another theft and confessed in the rice theft case, but apparently his confession was not believed, for he was discharged in it. He also has other convictions against him.

The third defence witness, Kwan Sone, also states that he was one of the rice thieves, although he was discharged in that case. He says that the headman lent him Rs. 50 to buy stolen rice, but there is nothing beyond his bare statement to prove it.

The fourth defence witness, Po Ti, is another approver in the rice theft case. He says that he does not know whether the headman knew of the dealings in stolen rice and he forgets whether he ever paid him anything in connection with the rice theft case.

In view of the fact that the defendants were all witnesses on behalf of the rice thieves themselves, I am quite unable to place any credence in their witnesses. I must hold that the defendants have failed to show that they had reasonable or probable cause for filing their application against the plaintiff, and I am in entire agreement with the learned District Judge who, when passing orders as Sessions Judge in the criminal revision case, stated that the action of the then petitioners came more out of hostility on their part to the headman than of any interest for the benefit of the public.

As regards the damages awarded by the Township Court, it seems to me that the Township Judge fixed them on a very moderate scale. I, therefore, set aside the decree of the District Court and restore the decree of the Township Court, giving the plaintiff Rs. 450 as damages. The respondents will pay the appellant's costs on that amount throughout.

Co-owners—Abadi—Construction of building and transfer by co-owner in sole possession—Right of other co-owners to sue for joint possession—Transfer, effect of—Sole possession, whether confers title—Custom, validity of.

If co-owners of the abadi under some arrangement remain in separate possession of a certain site, this does not give the other co-owners a right to sue. But if the co-owners in possession construct a building on the site, the other co-owners may sue for demolition of the building and for joint possession, provided that they do so within a reasonable time. [p. 657, col 1.]

The right of co-owners to sole possession is a right which continues only so long as they possess themselves and such a right is consistent with the other co-sharers' title. If, however, the co-sharers transfer to a stranger, this amounts to a denial of the title of their co-owners and is inconsistent with that title. Such a transfer gives the co-owners a right to sue for a declaration that the transfer is invalid against them. It also gives them a right to sue for joint possession with the transferors and ejectment of the transferee; for the transferee gets no title to possession by the transfer. [p. 657, cols. 1 & 2.]

A custom whereby a co-owner can by reason of mere separate possession claim an absolute title is a custom which would be inconsistent with the very status of co-ownership and as such cannot be recognised. [p. 657, col 2.]

Second appeal from a decree of the Additional Subordinate Judge, Farrukhabad at Fatehgarh, reversing that of the Munsif, Farrukhabad.

Mr. Peary Lal Banerji, for the Appellants.

Dr. K. N. Katju, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This second appeal arises out of a suit brought by the plaintiff-respondents. They sued for possession of a certain site in the abadi. The abadi is the unpartitioned property of the plaintiffs and defendants Nos. 1 to 3. Some years ago, defendants Nos. 1 to 3, who along with one Afzal-un-nissa Begum were at the time in sole possession and occupation of the land, built two shops on it. The plaintiff brought a suit for recovery of joint possession on the ground that the building by their co-owners was unlawful. Their suit was dismissed by the trial Court. On appeal, however, they obtained a decree against defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3, but failed to join as respondent Afzal-un-nissa Begum. The consequence was that they never succeeded in executing the decree.

In the present suit their failure to execute that decree was pleaded as somehow barring the plaintiffs from bringing the present suit. The trial Court allowed this objection. The lower Appellate Court has rejected it and given the plaintiffs a decree for joint possession. The present suit is based on the fact that the defendants Nos. 1 to 3 have transferred the site along with the buildings to defendant No. 4, a stranger. Their plea is that the sale to a stranger has constituted a new cause of action.

The law on this subject does not appear to us open to doubt. If co-owners of the abadi under some arrangement remain in separate possession of a certain site, this does not give the other co-owners a right to sue. But if the co-owners in possession construct a building on the site, the other co-owners may sue for demolition of the building and for joint possession, provided that they do so within a reasonable time. In this case it must be held that the defendants Nos. 1 to 3 were entitled to occupy the site and the buildings in sole possession. The plaintiffs had failed in the previous litigation to get a decree against Afzal-un-nissa Begum, and as her right, could not be separated from that of defendants Nos. 1 to 3, this in effect meant that the plaintiffs had failed to disturb the sole possession of the defendants Nos. 1 to 3 of the site and of the buildings. That litigation, however, merely affirmed in the defendants a right to retain possession. It gave them no right to transfer possession to a stranger. The right of co-owners to sole possession is a right which continues only so long as they possess themselves and such a right is consistent with the other co-sharers' title. If, however, the co-sharers transfer to a stranger, this amounts to a denial of the title of their co-owners and is inconsistent with that title. Such a transfer gives the co-owners a right to sue for a declaration that the transfer is invalid against them. It also gives them a right to sue for joint possession with the transferors and ejectment of the transferee; for the transferee gets no title to possession by the transfer. Again the transferors by reason of the transfer and delivery of possession to the transferee must be deemed to have left the plot vacant. The co-owners thereupon acquire a right to joint possession and the transferors can no longer plead a right to separate possession in contravention of which right they have themselves acted.

A plea of custom was set up by the defendants. We agree with the lower Appellate Court that a custom whereby a co-owner can by reason of mere separate possession claim an absolute title is a custom which would be inconsistent with the very status of co-ownership and as such cannot be recognised.

For the foregoing reasons we consider that the decision of the lower Appellate Court was correct and dismiss this appeal with costs.

Contract Act (IX of 1872), ss. 69, 70—Agreement to deliver coals free on rails—Consignment under freight system—Consignee paying freight charges to Railway—Suit by consignee against contractor for recovery of freight paid, maintainability of.

The defendant entered into a contract with the Executive Engineer of Godavari for the supply of a certain quantity of coal, to be consigned from a colliery in Bengal. The agreement was that the coal should be supplied free on rails at Rajahmundry. The consignments of coal were received under freight system under which the consignee was to pay the freight. No freight was paid at the time the coal was taken delivery of, but after some months the Railway Administration wrote to the Government of Madras to pay the amount of freight and the amount was paid by the Government. In a suit for recovery of the amount of freight paid by the Government to the Railway Administration from the contractor:

Held, (1) that when the coal was brought to Rajahmundry without paying the freight, it was open to the Executive Engineer to have rejected the coal as under the terms of the contract the delivery was to be free of charges at Rajahmundry; and not having done that, he was not entitled to claim from the defendant the amount of freight which he paid, since his right extended only to rejecting the coal and not to claim any charges that he chose to pay to a third person, namely, the Railway Administration; [p. 658, col. 2.]

(2) that the Executive Engineer or the Secretary of State was in no way interested in paying the freight on behalf of the defendant and that neither s. 69 nor s. 70 of the Contract Act applied and the suit was liable to be dismissed. [ibid.]

Petition, under s. 25 of Act IX of 1887, praying the High Court to revise the decree of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Rajahmundry, in S. C. S. No. 223 of 1925.

Mr. P. Venkataramana Rao, Government Pleader, for the Appellant.

Mr. N. Chandrasekhara Iyer, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application to revise the decree of the Subordinate Judge of Rajahmundry dismissing a suit by the Secretary of State for a sum of money said to be due by the respondent to the petitioner. The main contention urged by Mr. Venkataramana Rao, the learned Government Pleader, is that the respondent did not pay freight for the coal supplied and the petitioner is entitled to recover it from the respondent. The facts are, the respondents Rangaswami & Co., Madras, entered into a contract with the Executive Engineer of Godavari for the supply of a certain quantity of coal. The coal was consigned from a colliery in Bengal and the contract was that the coal should be supplied free on rails at Rajahmundry. The consignments of coal were received under freight system under which the consignee was to pay the freight. No freight was paid at the time the coal was taken delivery of but after some months the Railway Administration wrote to the Government of Madras to pay the amount of freight. After some correspondence the amount was paid by the Government. This suit is brought for the purpose of recovering the amount of freight paid by the Government to the Railway Administration from the respondent. The question is, whether the Secretary of State is entitled to recover this amount from the respondent.

Mr. Venkataramana Rao strongly contends that his case comes within s. 69 or 70 of the Contract Act, that the respondent was bound to pay the freight and inasmuch as he did not pay the freight he is bound to make good the amount to the plaintiff. The finding of the Subordinate Judge is that the amount of freight was not paid by the respondent to the Railway Administration. The question is not whether the respondent paid the freight to the Railway Administration or not, but whether he is liable to the plaintiff for the freight. Under the contract the respondent was to deliver the coal free on rails, that is to say, without Government having to pay anything for freight. When the coal was brought to Rajahmundry without paying the freight, it was open to the Executive Engineer to have rejected the coal as under the terms of the contract the delivery was to be free of charges at Rajahmundry; not having done that, he is not entitled to claim from the respondent the amount of freight which he paid, for his right extended only to rejecting the coal and not to claim any charges that he chose to pay to a third person, namely, the Railway Administration. Section 69 of the Contract Act says that a person who is interested in the payment of money which another is bound by law to pay, and who, therefore, pays it, is entitled to be reimbursed by the other. The contention of Mr. Venkataramana Rao is, that the Executive Engineer was interested in paying the amount which the defendant was bound to pay to the Railway Administration. I am unable to accept this contention. The Executive Engineer or the Secretary of State was in no way interested in paying the freight on behalf of the defendant, because under the contract the defendant was to pay the freight and deliver the coal free on rails at Rajahmundry. If he did not choose to do so, the Secretary of State was in no way interested in seeing that the amount was paid. Therefore, s. 69 has no application to the present case and s. 70 cannot apply as it cannot be said that the plaintiff did anything lawfully for the defendant and the defendant had the benefit of it. As I said, the right of the plaintiff was to have rejected the coal when it was not delivered free on rails. All this trouble has arisen owing to the fact that at the time of delivery the Executive Engineer or the person responsible for it overlooked the fact that freight was payable. The mere fact that owing to oversight or senselessness of the plaintiff's officers certain amount of money was collected from him, is no ground for making the respondent liable for the amount. At best, the plaintiff was only a volunteer so far as this payment is concerned and, therefore, is not entitled to recover it from the respondent.

There is no other point in the case. The civil revision petition is dismissed with costs.

Madras District Municipalities Act (V of 1920), s. 354 (2)—Wrong assessment—Suit for refund, whether lies.

Sub-s. 2 of s. 354 of the Madras District Municipalities Act was intended to provide real protection to the Chairman and the Municipal Council and its effect is that, when they have proceeded in the matter of assessment in accordance with the Act, no suit will lie against them for recovery of the amount of assessment collected even if their actual decision is wrong.

Petition, under s. 25 of Act IX of 1887, praying the High Court to revise the decree of the Court of Small Causes at Trichinopoly, in S. O. S. No. 3336 of 1925.

Mr. R. Kesava Iyengar, for the Petitioner.

Mr. P. Venkatramana Rao, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—I agree with the learned Small Cause Court Judge that the petitioner's suit is barred by s. 354 (2) of the Madras District Municipalities Act. The allegations in the plaint are consistent with the provisions of the Act having been complied with the substance and effect. It is alleged that when the petitioner appealed against his assessment, no order on his appeal was communicated to him. That, if so, was discourteous. But there appears to be no provision in the Act or the rules under it requiring the decision on such an appeal to be communicated formally to the appellant. Apart from that alleged defect in procedure the petitioner complains that "he has been assessed most arbitrarily without reference to facts and figures." Mr. Kesava Ayyangar argues for him that no assessment which is incorrect does in substance and effect comply with the provision of the Act, that an incorrect assessment has no legal basis. If that argument is accepted, then s. 354 (2) of the Act is no protection against a suit of any person who is not in complete agreement with the Municipal Council about the justice of his assessment. I have no doubt that the subsection was intended to provide real protection to the Chairman and the Council and that its effect is that, when they have proceeded in the matter of assessment in accordance with the Act, no suit will lie against them even if their actual decision is wrong. A disappointed assessee certainly cannot escape the bar against his suit by describing the action of the Council or the Chairman as arbitrary or by using any other strong language.

A Court should not grant a relief which is not sought or by the plaintiff nor find a case which has not been tried.

Appeal against the decree of the Additional District Judge, Wardha, dated the 22nd July, 1926, in Civil Appeal No. 54 of 1926.

Mr. M. B. Niyogi, for the Appellant.

Mr. A. R. Bobde, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff in this suit claimed from the defendant his lambardari haq for the years 1331 to 1333 Fasli.

The case was tried and a decree was given in favour of the plaintiff for Rs. 58-6-6. On appeal it was discovered that it was not the lambardari haq which the plaintiff could claim but the muccadami haq quite a different thing. The lower Appellate Court's order-sheet of 15th May, 1926, runs:

"As regards ground No. 1, Mr. Karode urges that his claim to five per cent. is based on being a muccadam and not a lambardar, though the point was not made clear in the lower Court. The lower Court allowed lambardari haq on the ground that it was allowed in a previous suit, but that point will not be res judicata as the right is a recurring one. Mr. Gole admits that if plaintiff is allowed muccadami haq, the account per year is correct, and he would then contend only about interest. He wants time to state whether the plaintiff was muccadam during the three years in suit."

The order-sheet of the next hearing runs:—

"Appellant by Mr. Gole. He admits that plaintiff and his father were muccadams for the three years in suit. The only question for argument is whether muccadam haq should be allowed or not."

It is contended for the appellant (defendant) here that under s. 192 of the Land Revenue Act the remuneration of the muccadam has to be fixed by the Tahsildar and recovered by the lambardar from the proprietors of the mahal or patti for which he is appointed, and it is argued that the Civil Courts cannot take cognizance of the case. It is further contended that under s. 229, cl. (p) of that Act any claim in connection with the office or remuneration of the muccadam is not cognizable by a Civil Court.

It does not seem to me necessary to enter into these contentions; for it appears to me that the suit should be dismissed on the ground that it was brought for recovery of the lambardari haq; it was not for the recovery of the muccadami haq which has been decreed by the lower Appellate Court. This change in the case in the lower Appellate Court has prevented suitable issues being raised in the trial Court; and if a plaintiff is so careless as to make a mistake of this nature, although he may be repeating only a mistake made in previous proceedings, he has only himself to blame if his case fails. The relief decreed is not the relief sought; the case found by the lower Appellate Court was not the case tried; and under these circumstances I think that the plaintiff's claim should be dismissed with costs.

I set aside the decree of the lower Appellate Court and dismiss the case with costs.

A Court should either allow or dismiss a petition presented to it. An order simply stating "petition will be recorded" is no order at all and should not be passed on any petition.

Petition, under s. 115 of Act V of 1908, praying the High Court to revise the order of the Court of the District Munsif, Vellore, in J. A. No. 898 of 1925, in O. S. No. 417 of 1924.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 10—Suit for dissolution of partnership—Pendency of appeal—Second suit for recovery of money received by defendant, trial of, whether should be stayed.

A suit for dissolution of partnership was dismissed by a Sub-Court on the ground that there was no partnership till a particular time. Pending an appeal to the District Court, the plaintiff sued in the District Munsif's Court to recover certain sums of money, as having been received by the defendant which ought to be paid to him. On an application by the defendant for stay of trial of the suit in the Munsif's Court pending the disposal of the appeal in the District Court:

Held, that there was no possibility of a conflict of decrees, as the main questions in the two suits were different, and that there was no necessity for stay of the second suit.

Petition, under s. 115 of Act V of 1908, praying the High Court to revise the order of the District Munsif, Chittoor, in I. A. No. 850 of 1927, in O. S. No. 691 of 1925.

Mr. A. C. Sampath Ayyangar, for the Petitioner.

Mr. B. Somayya, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application to revise the order of the District Munsif refusing to stay the trial of the suit which was ready for judgment. The contention of Mr. Sampath Ayyangar is that there is an appeal pending in the Chittoor District Court (A. S. No. 252 of 1925) and, therefore, under s. 10, Civil Procedure Code, the District Munsif is not competent to try this case, because the very same matter is the subject-matter of the appeal. The plaintiff in the Sub-Court suit who is the respondent to this petition sued to have a partnership dissolved. The Subordinate Judge dismissed this suit on the ground that there was no partnership till the year 1923. In the Munsif's Court he sues for the recovery of certain sums of money as having been received by the defendant which ought to be paid to him. The suit in the Munsif's Court was filed after the disposal of the suit in the Subordinate Judge's Court. The contention that there will be a conflict of decisions if this suit is allowed to be decided does not appeal to me for, in the suit in the Munsif's Court the plaintiff sues for specific sums of money and in the Sub-Court the main issue was whether there was a partnership or not. If that point is decided in plaintiff's favour, the Subordinate Judge or the District Court will direct accounts to be taken. In the taking of accounts any decision in regard to particular items will be taken into consideration. That being so, I do not think that the decision in this suit would in any way conflict with the decision that may be ultimately arrived at in the appeal. In this view I dismiss the civil revision petition with costs.

Limitation Act (IX of 1908), s. 19—Acknowledgment, whether implies promise to pay—Contract Act (IX of 1872), s. 12.1

An acknowledgment of debt implies a promise to pay and though an acknowledgment is required by s. 19 of the Limitation Act to be made before the expiry of the period of limitation, a promise under s. 25 of the Contract Act may be made after the period. [p. 663, col. 1.]

Appeal against the decree of the Additional District Judge, Narsinghpur, dated the 8th July, 1926, in Civil Appeal No. 2 of 1926.

Dr. Sir H. S. Gour, for the Appellant.

Mr. N. G. Bose, R. B., for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiffs sue for Rs. 876 7. Their case is that on 23rd July, 1923, Rs. 1,300 were due by the defendant to them on old accounts. The plaintiffs intended suing and got a plaint drafted, but the defendant then agreed to execute a sarkhat for Rs. 670 and to secure it by the pledge of gold ornaments already held by the plaintiffs on old pledges, and to execute another sarkhat for Rs. 630, pay all the expenses which the plaintiffs incurred in preparing their suit and to pay interest at 12 per cent. per mensem. The defendant, therefore, executed the sarkhats Exs. P. 2 and P. 3 on 23rd July, 1923. He did not redeem the ornaments mentioned in Ex. P. 2 and these were sold, fetching Rs. 668. The balance due on the two sarkhats with interest came to Rs. 876-7.

The defendant's story was that he executed the first sarkhat Ex. P. 1 without understanding the accounts. This was for Rs. 1,025. He also executed the other two sarkhats Exs. P. 2 and P. 3 at the plaintiffs' shop as the defendant's brother told him that he had made an account of his own debts with the plaintiffs and that to meet the plaintiffs' wishes the defendant should go and execute them. The defendant further contended that the claim was time-barred and also that he is not liable to pay interest at higher rate than the rate of interest originally agreed upon between the parties.

These allegations were denied and the case went to trial on the following issues:—

1. Did the defendant on 23rd July, 1923, promise to pay Rs. 1,300 due on old account to plaintiffs and execute the sarkhats for Rs. 670 and Rs. 630?

2. Did he agree to pay interest at 12 per cent. per mensem?

3. Did he agree to pay the costs of any plaint as alleged?

4. If so, what are those costs?

5. Did the defendant execute the sarkhat for Rs. 1,025 without understanding the accounts?

6. Did he sign the sarkhats of Rs. 670 and Rs. 630 under any mistake?

7. Does any of these facts, if proved, entitle the defendant to go behind the settled accounts?

8. To what relief, if any, are the plaintiffs entitled?

The trial Court held that the defendant executed the two sarkhats, that he agreed to pay interest at 12 per cent. per mensem and agreed to pay the costs of the plaint which amounted to Rs. 20. As regards the sarkhat for Rs. 1,025, the first Court found that the defendant failed to prove that he executed them without understanding the accounts and that the other two sarkhats were signed under any mistake. Dealing with the amount due, the trial Court finds that the defendant did promise to pay Rs. 1,300 and that for this amount sarkhats for Rs. 670 and Rs. 630 were executed; but the agreement being oral could not help the plaintiffs under s. 25 (3) of the Contract Act, unless the acknowledgments (Exs. P. 2 and P. 3) could be interpreted to be those "agreements in writing and signed" by the defendant. The Court finds that an unconditional acknowledgment such as Exs. P. 2 and P. 3 has always been held to imply a promise to pay, but that as held in Ratanlal v. Anwar Khan (1) such an implied promise to pay is not a contract within the meaning of s. 25 (3) of the Contract Act. A portion of the claim evidenced by the first sarkhat for Rs. 1,025 was held time-barred. The Judge writes:—

"If the acknowledgments, Exs. P. 2 and P. 3, could be interpreted to mean 'an express promise to pay in writing,' in other words if they could be interpreted to constitute a contract within the meaning of s. 25 (3) of the Contract Act, I would be inclined to decree the plaintiffs' claim, disregarding the fact that at least a portion of it consists of a time-barred debt [vide, David Sutherland Clark v. Mrs. Rose Crimshaw (2)]. But as the facts are, the acknowledgments cannot be interpreted to mean 'written promises to pay' and, therefore, cannot form the basis of a suit [vide Beohar Raghuir Singh v. Udechand (3)]. The plaintiffs have not chosen to base their claim on accounts, in spite of a written application of the defendant filed on 9th November, 1925. They have expressly based their claim on an agreement, which it has been shown above cannot help the plaintiffs inasmuch as it was not 'in writing' the acknowledgments Exs. P. 2 and P. 3 also having been held above as not forming a contract within s. 25 (3) of the Contract Act. The defendant has had no chance of showing how the whole amount of the first sarkhat Ex. P. 1 was time-barred on the date of that sarkhat. Under the circumstances plaintiffs' claim in so far as it relates to the accounts under Exs. P. 3 and P. 2 cannot succeed."

But the plaintiffs' claim for Rs. 23-13, i. e., Rs. 20 for the plaint costs and interest, was decreed and further, finding the defence false, the first Court gave the plaintiffs Rs. 75 as compensation under s. 35-A of the Civil Procedure Code.

On appeal the Additional District Judge, Narsinghpur, holds that there was a new contract between the parties on 23rd July, 1923, the old debt being wiped off on that date. The fact that the liability under the sarkhat dated 24th July, 1920, forms the consideration for the compromise sued upon does not prevent the compromise being a new and independent contract which may form the basis of a suit and which may be proved by oral evidence. It was held that the new contract is enforceable, that the suit is not one for recovery of an old debt but for the recovery of money due under an agreement of compromise. It was held that no part of the plaintiffs' claim is beyond time and the appeal was allowed, the cross-objections being dismissed. Against that decision the present appeal has been lodged by the defendant.

(1) 53 Ind. Cas. 527; 2 N. L. J. 261.

(2) 73 Ind. Cas. 652; A. I. R. 1923 Lah. 4813; 32 Ind. Cas. 321.

It is argued for the appellant that on 24th July, 1920, when Ex. P. 1, the sarkhat for Rs. 1,025 was executed, Rs. 920 then due were barred by time. It is argued that once a debt is barred by time, it ceases to operate as any consideration and that it can only be proved by a new contract as provided for in s. 25 of the Contract Act, that is under s. 19 of the Limitation Act, and any compromise under s. 25 of the Contract Act must be registered.

For the respondents (plaintiffs) it is contended that Ex. P-1 for Rs. 1,025 is not a mere acknowledgment as ornaments were pledged: it is a contract; and within three years two other sarkhats Exs. P-2 and P-3 were executed on the 23rd July, 1923. There is a promise to pay. Maniram v. Seth Rupchand (4), Ratanlal v. Anwar Khan (1) Sitaran v. Nandram (5) and Chunilal Ratanchand Gujrati v. Laxman Govind Dube (6) are relied on. As to there being no consideration, it is contended for the respondents that the forbearance to sue is sufficient: Mahalinga Nadar v. Ganapathi Subbien (7). The second two sarkhats, it is pointed out, were executed within three years of the first, and the suit is filed within three years of the date of the second two.

There is no doubt that acknowledgment of debt implies a promise to pay, and though an acknowledgment is required by s. 19 of the Limitation Act to be made before the expiry of the period of limitation, a promise under s. 25, Contract Act, may be made after the period. There is no doubt that in the present case the defendant did promise to discharge his old debt by the execution of the two new sarkhats, and it seems to me that the lower Appellate Court is right in holding that there was a new contract between the parties on 23rd July, 1923. The sarkhats were given, the consideration for the same being the old debt due on the plaintiffs, forbearance to sue, and I think the case can be termed to be one for recovery of money due under a compromise. I agree with the Court below that the claim is in time and dismiss the appeal with costs. The appellant will pay the respondents' costs.

A mortgage right acquired over a holding before the passing of the Madras Estates Land Act is saved by s. 125 of the Act as against a purchaser in execution of a rent-decree. [ibid.]

Petition under s. 115 of Act V of 1908 and s. 107 of the Government of India Act, to revise the order of the Court of the Revenue Divisional Officer at Cocanada, dated the 11th September, 1925, and passed in E. P. No. 113 of 1924.

Mr. K. Kameswara Rao, for the Petitioners.

Mr. A. Krishnaswami Iyer, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application to revise the order of the Revenue Divisional Officer of Cocanada, dismissing the claim petition of the petitioner. The Divisional Officer held that O. XXI, r. 58, Civil Procedure Code does not apply to execution proceedings under the Estates Land Act. Under s. 192 the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure are made applicable, excepting a few, to proceedings under the Estates Land Act, and there is no express provision which exempts O. XXI from applying to proceedings in execution of rent-decrees. In the absence of specific provisions to the effect that a claim petition is not to be entertained by a Revenue Court, I am not prepared to hold that an application under O. XXI, r. 58 cannot be made to the Revenue Court. It is not contended for the respondent that the rent-decree in this case is in the nature of a mortgage-decree. No doubt, a claim petition is not competent when a mortgage-decree is being executed.

The petitioner had a mortgage right over the holding before the passing of the Estates Land Act and any right acquired before the passing of the Estates Land Act in the holding is saved by s. 125 of the Act. The petitioner filed a suit in 1907 on two mortgages and obtained a decree before the passing of the Act, and he, therefore, had the mortgagee's right on the date of application over the property which was sought to be put up for sale. It is suggested on behalf of the respondents that the petitioner became the owner of the equity of redemption before the decree in favour of the respondents in 1919 and, therefore, he being the owner of the holding the landlord was entitled to bring it to sale. That question would depend on the question whether the petitioner became the owner by purchase in Court and as that matter has not been investigated, it is not possible to express any opinion on the point. I, therefore, set aside the order of the Divisional Officer and direct him to restore the claim petition to file and dispose of it according to law. Costs of this application to abide the result.

Petition under s. 115 of Act V of 1908, and s. 107 of the Government of India Act, praying the High Court to revise the order of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Coimbatore, dated the 27th July, 1927, and made in I. A. No. 391 of 1927, in O. P. No. 104 of 1926.

FACTS.—On an application to sue in forma pauperis a defendant who was served and was absent was declared ex parte. While the proceedings were going on, he applied to be allowed to take part in the proceedings and to set aside the ex parte order but his application was dismissed. A revision petition was filed against the said order of dismissal.

Mr. Krishna Bharathi, for the Petitioner.

Mr. Balasundaram Ayyar, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—There is no sufficient reason to interfere with the Subordinate Judge's order. There was indeed no need for the petitioner to act the order that the inquiry into the original petition would proceed ex parte so far as he was concerned, set aside, if, as is now explained for him, he wanted only to take part in the case at the stage which it had reached. When he eventually did appear he was entitled to take part in the proceedings and is still entitled to do so, provided that his intervention at this stage does not delay the proceedings. For instance, if the evidence had been closed, it would not be proper to allow him to call fresh evidence unless he had satisfied the Subordinate Judge that he had good reason for not appearing earlier. On that point, the Subordinate Judge was not satisfied, and I see no sufficient reason to differ from him.

C. P. Tenancy Act (I of 1920), s. 62—Acquisition of portion of holding by Government—Omission of tenant to apply for reduction of rent—Tenant, whether liable for full rent.

Failure on the part of a tenant, a portion of whose holding has been acquired under the Land Acquisition Act, to apply under s. 62 of the C. P. Tenancy Act for reduction of rent is not a ground for passing a decree against him for the whole rent especially where it is admitted that the whole rent is not, in reality, leviable from him in view of the diminution of the holding.

Appeal against the decree of the District Judge, Nagpur, dated the 15th December, 1925, in Civil Appeal No. 197 of 1925.

Mr. D. T. Mangalmurti, for the Appellant.

Mr. M. D. Khandekar, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—I have heard Counsel for the appellant in this case but found it unnecessary to call on to the respondent's Pleader to reply. It is perfectly clear to my mind that the present plaintiff-appellant has mistaken his remedy in the present case. It is not denied that portions of fields Nos. 64, 67 and 68 were acquired by Government in 1923, and it is equally clear from the lower Appellate Court's judgment that the rent of the holding has been accordingly proportionately reduced.

The present plaintiff-appellant for some reason or other, which it is difficult to understand, urges that it was for the defendant to take the initiative in having the rent reduced under s. 62 of the Tenancy Act, but it is perfectly clear that it was also open to the landlord to initiate proceedings under the said provision. As a matter of fact, para. 71 of the Land Acquisition Manual lays down the proper procedure to be followed in a case like the present and, if there was any failure on the part of the Land Acquisition Officials to take the necessary steps, it was open to the present plaintiff-appellant to initiate the necessary proceedings under s. 62 of the C. P. Tenancy Act. I know of no reason why it was peculiarly incumbent, on the tenant to move in the matter, and, in any event, neither law nor equity would justify this Court in decreeing the plaintiff-appellant's claim against the defendant-respondent when it is admitted and clear that the whole rent is now not, in reality, leviable from him in view of the diminution of the area of his holding.

I, therefore, see no reason to interfere and dismiss the present second appeal. The appellant must bear the respondent's costs. Costs in the lower Courts as already ordered.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 92—Scheme—Provision for liberty to apply for directions or alterations, whether ultra vires.

In a scheme settled by the Court under s. 92 of the Civil Procedure Code the reservation by the Court to a person or persons of liberty to apply for a relief which will come within s. 92 of the Code is ultra vires; but if such reservation does not offend, in this way or against any other provision of law it may be useful or advisable for carrying out the provisions of the scheme already framed and would be intra vires. This appeal came on for hearing on the 10th and 11th of January, 1927, before Odgers and Krishnan, JJ., and their Lordships made the following

ORDER OF REFERENCE TO A FULL BENCH.

Odggers, J.—In O. S. No. 30 of 1921, on the file of the Subordinate Judge of Chingleput a scheme was settled on 3rd January, 1923, for the Devasthanams, and shrines connected therewith of Sri Adikesavaperumal and Sri Bhashyakarlu Swami in Sriperumbudur. The scheme, inter alia, in paras. 99 and 100 provided as follows:—

"99. It shall be competent to the Advocate-General or the Collector of the District or the dharma-karthas or either of them or any five worshippers to apply to the Court (1) to modify or delete any rule hereby promulgated, (2) framing additional rules for the management of the Devasthanam and securing due administration of, or the protection of, the Devasthanam property, (3) for regulating the conduct of business in the Devasthanam and the worship in the shrines and the celebration of utsavams, (4) with reference to the framing of the budget, (5) for sale of broken or useless jewels or items of stock for re-making or converting them or for the purchase of new ones, either by way of addition or by way of replacement."

"100. It shall be competent to the Advocate General or the Collector of the District or any five worshippers to apply to the Court for the removal of any dharma-kartha who is charged as (1) subject to any of the disqualifications provided in r. 21, (2) guilty of misconduct, whereby his continuance as dharma-karta will be injurious to the Devasthanam, giving assignment of such misconduct."

In M. P. No. 150 of 1924, dated 31st July, 1924, in the above suit the Advocate-General moved to modify the scheme as there were disputes between the two trustees appointed under it. This was opposed. The first point taken before us is that the Subordinate Judge made no final order on the petition, but only gave a tentative expression of opinion and that, therefore, no appeal lay. To my mind the objection must fail. The Subordinate Judge says in para. 6, "In these circumstances I should think the scheme requires an amendment" and in para. 8, "The scheme will be amended accordingly." This clearly shows that the Subordinate Judge had made up his mind to amend the scheme. It is said for the appellant that either s. 92, Civil Procedure Code, is a bar to an application of this sort by the Advocate-General in a scheme suit or that the suit came to an end with the settling of a scheme. The Court, therefore, had no jurisdiction to entertain the application of the Advocate-General and the clauses in the scheme giving him leave to apply are ultra vires. There is a direct authority for this view in Abdul Hakim Baig v. Mahomed Burramuddin (1) where Devadoss, J., says at page 583*, "When a scheme is settled, the suit comes to an end. To say that any person could apply to alter the scheme once framed would necessarily mean that the suit is pending. It cannot be said that the suit is pending for all time from the mere fact that the scheme framed contains a provision that an application can be made for altering the scheme" and again at page 584*, "when s. 92, Civil Procedure Code, directs that for the settlement of a scheme and for other reliefs the sanction of the Advocate-General should be obtained, it would be ultra vires of any Court to obtain jurisdiction by inserting a clause in the scheme whereby persons interested in the scheme or others are enabled to apply to the Court for the alteration of the scheme." Wallace, J., was of the same opinion and says at page 590*, "I am of opinion that s. 92 was intended to be enforced whenever any of the reliefs mentioned in it are asked for, whether or no a scheme has already been framed under it," though (at page 591*) he concedes that this conclusion will compel worshippers to bring suits even for the most petty alterations in the original scheme, but that will only be for such alterations as are within the mischief of s. 92.

In a similar case in Runganatha Thathachariar v. Krishnaswami Thathachariar (2) Oldfield and Venkatasubba Rao, JJ., held that no appeal would lie from an order directing the proper authorities to fill up a vacancy among trustees since it was not an order in execution of a decree.

There is no doubt that if the decision in Abdul Hakim Baig v. Mahomad Burramuddin (1) is right, this appeal must be allowed, but we are by no means satisfied that it is so. There seems no reason on principle why worshippers and others interested should be driven to a separate suit every time an alteration in a temple scheme is required or why the well-known advantages of reserving "liberty to apply" so often availed of in England should not be applied here. Subrahmanya Ayyar and Davies, JJ., in Prayag Dossji Varu v. Tirumala Srirangacharlavaru (3) thought that s. 539 of the old Civil Procedure Code conferred on Courts in this country the same powers as were possessed by the Court of Chancery at the time of its enactment, e. g., the power to appoint additional trustees even though such appointment involved a departure from the arrangement contemplated in the constitution of the trust.

The learned Judges also held on the authorities that the High Court possessed in the matter of administration of public religious charities "the same practically unlimited jurisdiction as the Court of Chancery." On appeal to the Privy Council Prayag Dossji Varu v. Tirumala Srirangacharla Varu (4) the Judicial Committee themselves settled a scheme which (cl. 10) reserved liberty for the Vicharanakarthas or any person interested to apply to the District Court, with reference to the carrying out of the directions of the scheme.

In Sevak Jeranchod Bhogilal v. Dakore Temple Committee (5) the Privy Council had confirmed a temple scheme of which cl. 20 ran as follows:—"The provisions of this scheme may be altered, modified or added to by an application to His Majesty's High Court of Judicature at Bombay," c.f., the same case in Shankarlal Purshotham Gor v. Dakore Temple Committee (6). In Sakharam Daji Ganpule v. Ganu Raghu Guroo (7) a scheme had been settled in 1897 and the question whether the present suit (brought long after) was barred by s. 92 (2) was answered in the affirmative but the Court said it was open to any one interested to apply to the Court which framed the scheme to supplement or modify it. It was not suggested that a separate suit was necessary and that though no liberty to apply is reserved under the scheme such a reservation can be always implied.

Further in Manadananda Jha v. Tarakananda Jha (8) the Court in framing a scheme had given liberty to any person interested to apply to the District Court with reference to the carrying out of the directions of the scheme and also to the High Court for any necessary modification of the scheme. Mookerjee, J., said:—"The principle on which these clauses were inserted in the decree was explained by this Court in the following passage of its judgment in the case of Sadupadhya Umesha-nand Ojha v. Ravaneswar Prasad Singh (9):—

"The authority of the Court to amend the scheme from time to time has not been and cannot possibly be questioned. As was pointed out by Mr. Justice Subrahmanya Ayyar in the case of Prayag Dossji Varu v. Tirumala Srirangacharlavaru (3) which was subsequently affirmed by the Judicial Committee in Prayag Dossji Varu v. Tirumala Srirangacharla Varu (4) there is ample authority for the proposition that a Court which has sanctioned a scheme for the administration of a charitable trust is competent from time to time to vary the scheme as exigencies of the case may require. Reference need only be made to the decisions in Attorney-General v. Bovell (10), Attorney-General v. Bishop of Worcester (11), Major of Lyons v. Advocate General of Bengal (12) and Browne's Hospital v. Stamford (13)."

Finally a Bench of three Judges of this Court in O. S. No. 527 of 1924, (the Triplican Temple case) sanctioned (cl. 36) liberty to apply under certain conditions. With this body of authority against the view taken in Abdul Hakim Haig v. Mahomed Burramuddin (1) and with the express authority of the Privy Council in two cases mentioned above, where the power to reserve liberty to apply appears to have been assumed without question or hesitation, we are not prepared to follow the ruling in Abdul Hakim Baig v. Mahomed Burram-

We have, therefore, decided to refer the following question to the Full Bench:—"In a temple scheme settled by the Court where liberty to apply is reserved to a person or persons (a) to ask for directions as to carrying out the scheme or (b) to move the Court for alterations or modifications of the scheme—is this reservation intra vires of the Court or is a separate suit necessary either under the provisions of s. 92, Civil Procedure Code, or on the ground that the suit has come to an end and the Court, therefore, functus officio" [as decided in *Abdul Hakim Baig v. Krishnan, J.—I agree.

The appeal was heard on the 15th and 16th August, 1927, in pursuance of the aforesaid Order of Reference to a Full Bench, by the Officiating Chief Justice, Mr. Justice Beasley and Mr. Justice Anantakrishna Ayyar.

Messrs. T. M. Krishnaswami Ayyar and T. E. Ramabhadrachari, for the Appellant.

Messrs. P. R. Ganapati Ayyar, Watrap S. Subrahmanya Ayyar, T. R. Srinivasa Ayyangar, T. Rangachari and R. Purshottama Ayyangar, for the Respondents.

The case stood over for consideration till the 18th of December, 1927, on which date the Court expressed the following

OPINION.

Phillips, Offg. C. J.—The question that has been referred for our opinion is: "In a temple scheme settled by the Court where liberty to apply is reserved to a person or persons (a) to ask for directions as to carrying out the scheme or (b) to move the Court for alterations or modifications of the scheme—is this reservation intra vires of the Court or is a separate suit necessary either under the provision of s. 92, Civil Procedure Code, or on the ground that the suit has come to an end and the Court, therefore, functus officio?"

This question has been decided by a Bench of this Court in Abdul Hakim Baig v. Mahomed Burramuddin (1) where it was held that the provision in a scheme for an application being made for relief specified in s. 92, Civil Procedure Code, was ultra vires. The same view was also taken by another Bench of this Court in Ryali Brahmayya v. Venkatacharya Naray- anamurthy (14) and in Ayinailli Narayanamurthi v. Bulusu Achayyasasthula (15). Spencer and Srinivasa Ayyangar, JJ., came to the same conclusion although in that case the observation was purely obiter. In Majeti Antayya v. Lingambhotla Venkata Rammayya (16) Madhavan Nair, J., and myself were inclined to take the same view, but it was unnecessary for the purposes of that case to decide the question. Prima facie a direction by the Court that future proceedings with reference to a trust should be held before it by means of an application would appear to be ultra vires in view of s. 92, Civil Procedure Code. That section prescribes that in the case of breach of a trust created for public purposes of a charitable or religious nature a suit has to be filed either by the Advocate-General or by persons who have obtained his sanction. The section specifically indicates that the remedy is by way of a suit subject to certain conditions and consequently any provision which says that the same remedy may be obtained by means of an application without conditions to the Court would appear to be ultra vires. It is pointed out in Prayag Dossji Varu v. Tirumala Srirangachariavaru (3) by Subrahmanya Ayyar, J., that the Courts in this country have been given under s. 53J of the Civil Procedure Code (corresponding to the present s. 92) the same powers as were possessed by the Court of Chancery at the time of its enactment, and this view was upheld in Rama Das v. Hanumantha Row (17). It does not necessarily follow from this that the procedure to be adopted when exercising this power must be the procedure prescribed for the Court of Chancery in England. On the contrary, in cases relating to public trusts s. 92 of the Civil Procedure Code definitely lays down the procedure to be adopted before the jurisdiction of the Court can be invoked. Similarly in England under Sir Samuel Romilly's Act and the Charitable Trusts Act a certain procedure is laid down and that procedure is different from the procedure in this country, for the Attorney-General is allowed to proceed in the matter of these trusts by means of a petition—a procedure which has been substituted for the previous method of proceeding by information. As against this view it was contended by Mr. Rangachariar that the Courts have power to insert such provisions in a scheme and he bases his argument on two grounds: (1) In Administration suits and other similar suits the Court has always power to give leave to apply and even in some cases where such leave is not expressly reserved it may be implied; and (2) The Privy Council has on two occasions sanctioned the insertion of a similar provision in schemes approved by it. The principle upon which the Court reserves leave to apply is based on the fact that in certain suits the Court is unable to give a complete judgment upon all the points connected with the case, or even if it is not unable to do so it thinks it advisable that the decision should be deferred. In all such cases, naturally leave to apply, at a later date is either expressly given or possibly may be implied, but when the Court has finally decided any question there can be no ground for granting leave to put in an application to modify this final conclusion, for the final conclusion has become a decree and an application to modify it would be an application to set aside the decree. When, therefore, the Court has definitely framed a scheme for a religious institution under s. 92, Civil Procedure Code, and has decided that certain things shall be done under the scheme it can hardly be said that this is not a final adjudication of all the questions arising in the suit in connection with such scheme and consequently one cannot infer that anybody could, as of right, apply for modification of the scheme. Reference may be made to In re Jarvis's Charity (18), where it was held that when a petition was presented for the appointment of a new trustee the certificate of the Charity Commissioners under the Charitable Trusts Act was essential. That certificate is similar to the sanction of the Advocate-General, referred to in s. 92. The ground of that decision was that a final order had already been made and, therefore, the petition on which it was made cannot be said to be actually pending. It was held in Attorney-General v. Bishop of Worcester (11) that a scheme having been framed might be subsequently altered but it was recognized that such alteration must be effected on an application by the Attorney-General—the procedure prescribed for such matters in England. The mere fact that the Court will allow a modification of the scheme does not necessarily show that modifications can be carried out in this country by procedure other than that prescribed by s. 92.

So far as the authority of the Privy Council is concerned, I am inclined to think that too much weight may easily be attached to the two cases relied on by Mr. Rangachariar. The first is the Tirupathi Temple case, Prayag Dossji Varu v. Tirumala Srirangacharlavaru (3). The judgment of this Court in that case does not give us much assistance in the present case, but in the appeal from this Court, the judgment in which is reported as Prayag Dossji Varu v. Tirumala Srirangacharla Varu (4), the Privy Council with a few modifications approved the scheme framed by the Madras High Court and that scheme contained the following two provisions:—

“Clause 10. Liberty for the Vicharanakartha and any person interested to apply to the District Court with reference to the carrying out of the directions of the scheme.

Clause 11. Liberty for the Vicharanakartha and any person interested from time to time to apply to the High Court for any modification of this scheme that may appear to be necessary or convenient.”

The words “or convenient” were added by the Privy Council. Clause 11 certainly supports Mr. Rangachariar's view that the Privy Council approved of a direction to apply to the Court by a petition for modification of the scheme. However, when we peruse the report more carefully it appears that this appeal was heard ex parte and the scheme appears to have been finally settled “with the assistance of the learned Counsel engaged.” The question of the validity of cls. 10 and 11 was not raised before their Lordships and cannot be said to have been decided. The other case relied on is the Dakore Temple case. This went before the Privy Council and is reported as Sevak Kirpa Shankar Daji v. Gopal Rao Manohar Tambekar (19). In that case the scheme prepared in the lower Court was approved with a few modifications. Reliance is placed mainly on cl. 20 of the scheme which says that the provisions of the scheme may be altered, modified, or added to by an application to His Majesty's High Court of Judicature at Bombay; but we find there is also a cl. (12) which directs the Committee to make rules for various purposes, which rules have to be sanctioned by the District Court of Ahmedabad, so that they may have the same force as if they were part of the scheme, sub-cl. 7. Therefore, after the case left the Privy Council further rules had to be framed and sanctioned by the District Court, and apparently under cl. 20 alterations or modifications might be made by the High Court of Bombay. That this is the intention of their Lordships appears from the report in Sevak Jeranchoo Bhogilal v. Dakore Temple Committee (5). Apparently rules had been framed under the scheme and were sanctioned by the District Court. Against the order of the District Court an appeal was filed in the High Court and from there the case was taken to the Privy Council. It was then held that it was wrong to consider the order made by the District Judge sanctioning the rules as one under s. 47, Civil Procedure Code, and, therefore, no appeal lay to the High Court and similarly no appeal lay to His Majesty in Council; but it was suggested that the High Court had power conferred upon it by cl. 20 of the scheme to alter, or modify, or add to the rules sanctioned by the District Judge on an application made to it with that object, but it had no other power. The scheme, therefore, as it left the Privy Council, was not final and further orders were necessary in the District Court and in the High Court before the scheme took its final shape. In the circumstances of these two cases which I have analysed, can it be said that the Privy Council has decided that a provision for persons interested to apply for modification of the scheme is not ultra vires? To do so would, I think, be stretching case-law too far. The point was never raised, much less decided, but in certain circumstances and without contest the Privy Council has given its sanction to such a rule in the Tirupathi Temple case. The rule in the Dakore Temple case appears to be one framed before the final shaping of the scheme. I am, therefore, of opinion that in neither of these cases can it be said that the Privy Council is of the opinion that such a clause is intra vires. We have, therefore, the opinion of several Judges of this Court that such a rule is ultra vires and, on the other side, there is the very vague authority of the decisions of the Privy Council.

In Patna and Calcutta a different view has been taken. In Sadupadhya Umesha-nand Ojha v. Ravaneswar Prosad Singh (9) it was held by the Calcutta High Court that power might be given to amend the scheme on an application—a power which should even include the removal of a member of the temple committee. In Muhammad Waheb Hussain v. Abbas Hussain (20) the Patna High Court held that not only was such a rule intra vires but that it was necessary that it should be inserted. Both these cases seem to treat the suits as administration actions, but although they may deal with questions relating to the administration of the trust fund, certainly not every suit under s. 32 can be called an administration suit. A suit may be for the removal of a trustee and the decree may be passed accordingly, but this certainly cannot be said to be an administration suit. The question of administration very frequently arises and it is for the Court to decide in what manner the administration shall be carried out, but it does not follow from that that the Court should assume to itself the administration of the trust, which it in fact does if it makes rules providing for applications to be made by trustees and others interested in the trust for varying or modifying the scheme already framed. If there is leave to apply in such suits, it necessarily implies that the suit is pending, and, therefore, once a suit has been filed for settling a scheme and liberty to apply is given in the scheme the suit should be deemed pending for ever and ever, for it is always possible that some person interested may make an application. This principle, therefore, of reserving liberty to apply in temple suits appears to me to be based on wrong premises. It should only be done when the Court is unable, or for good reasons thinks it advisable not to finally determine any question arising for its decision but to leave such decision for a future date. Unless there is some ground of this sort the decision must necessarily be final and, therefore, an order that such final decision can be altered by a mere application would seem to be ultra vires. I may observe here that the question put to us is a double question and the answer to the two parts of the question must be different. The first is "Where liberty to apply is reserved . . . to ask for directions as to carrying out the scheme . . ." So far as this is concerned this may well be intra vires unless it contravenes the provisions of s. 92, Civil Procedure Code, for the assistance of the Court is asked merely to carry out what it has already ordered, and if such assistance can be given without contravening the provisions of s. 92, there can be no objection to such a rule being framed, but when permission is given to apply to the Court for alteration or modification of the scheme it appears to me that this at once offends against s. 92. The scheme having been framed, any modification or alteration of it is in effect a new scheme and the power to frame a scheme is given only subject to the conditions specified in s. 92. I will, therefore, answer the question put to us by one joint answer, namely, that the reservation by the Court to a person or persons to apply for a relief which will come within s. 92 of the Civil Procedure Code is ultra vires but that if such reservation does not offend in this way or against any other provision of law it may be useful or advisable for carrying out the provisions of the scheme already framed.

Inam—Service inam granted partly for public service.—Resumption, legality of—"Kattu kaluva service", whether public service—Grant by two persons—One alone, whether entitled to revoke.

A service inam granted in part for performance of a public service cannot be resumed merely on the ground that the services are no longer required.

Where two persons having interest in a particular property make a grant of the same for the purpose of securing certain services, it is not competent to one of them alone without the concurrence of the other to cancel or revoke the grant.

A grant for kattu kaluva service is a grant of a public nature.

Second appeals against the decrees of the District Court, Vizagaptam, in A. S. Nos. 7 and 9 of 1924, preferred against those of the Court of the District Munsif, Chodavaram, in O. S. Nos. 622 and 623 of 1922 respectively.

Messrs. S. Srinivasa Iyengar and S. Venkatesa Iyengar, for the Appellant.

Mr. Y. Suryanarayana, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—I am not persuaded that the judgment of the lower Appellate Court in this case is wrong. In the plaint itself the grant has been stated by the plaintiff-appellant to partake at least in part of a grant for kattu kaluva service. Such service has, in the decision referred to and relied upon in the Courts below, been held to be a public service. If the grant was originally made for public service, that is, in other words, service to the villagers and not for private service to the zemindar himself, it follows that the plaintiff cannot resume the inam on the ground that he does not need any longer the service to be performed to him. Though the lower Appellate Court has found that it was a grant in lieu of wages on the footing that it was a grant at any rate partly for public service to be performed for the villagers, it follows that the plaintiff has no right by himself to resume a land terminating the service. Again in this case the ground on which the argument was put forward was that ever since the Permanent Settlement, the plaintiff has had cast on him and also has undertaken the duty in respect of the irrigation of the village but whatever may be the rights and obligations of the landlord as between himself and the Government under the terms of the Permanent Settlement, it does not follow that the landlord is entitled to put an end at his pleasure and without the concurrence on the part of the villagers to certain services which have been provided for by the grant. It is not suggested that the villagers in whose favour or for whose benefit the services are to be performed have agreed to the resumption of the grant. There is also one other aspect which I might advert to. The grant, it is admitted, was made before the Permanent Settlement. It was made by the villagers. It is said that the grant could not have been made without the consent of the landlord. Assuming for argument that the zemindar was also consenting party to the grant being made, it then follows that two persons having interest in particular property made a grant of the same for the purpose of securing certain service. If both of them joined in making the grant it does not hold to logic or reason that one of them should be entitled to cancel or revoke the grant and resume the inam merely at his pleasure and without the concurrence of the other party who was also a grantor. No doubt, if there had been such a condition in the grant itself or if it was pleaded and found, such a thing may be considered. But that is not the case. On the finding of both the Courts below that the service for which the grant was originally made by the villagers was at least partly of a public nature, it follows that the resumption claimed could not be supported. The lower Courts were right in their judgment. The second appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

SECOND APPEAL No. 1406 of 1924:—Following my judgment in the connected Second Appeal No. 1405 of 1924 this second appeal is dismissed with costs.

Trusts Act (II of 1882), ss. 49, 61—Trustee—Investment of funds—Jurisdiction of Court to interfere with trustee's discretion on summary petition.

A District Judge has no jurisdiction to interfere with the discretion of a trustee in the investment of trust funds on a summary petition. He can do so only in a properly instituted suit.

Petition for revision of the order of the District Judge, Amritsar, dated the 27th March, 1927.

Mr. J. M. Mackey, for the Petitioner.

Mr. Dev Raj Sawhney, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—Tara Chand minor acting through his mother Musammam Gujri moved the District Judge of Amritsar under ss 61/49 of the Indian Trusts Act II of 1882 asking that Sardar Harnam Singh, a trustee, should be ordered to deposit certain trust money in the Imperial Bank of Amritsar or otherwise to invest it in some approved securities. The learned District Judge held that he had no jurisdiction to interfere with the discretion of the trustee except on a properly instituted suit and the petition was dismissed.

Against this order of dismissal the minor through his mother has come to this Court in revision and it has been urged that the District Judge had jurisdiction. It was pointed out that under s. 49 of the Indian Trusts Act, the District Judge, as the principal Civil Court of original jurisdiction in Amritsar was empowered to control the discretionary powers conferred on a trustee on suitable occasions arising and that the District Judge could function on a petition. In this view I am unable to agree. Section 49 appears in Chapter V and deals with disabilities of trustees. This section gives the District Judge power to control the actions of a trustee when it becomes necessary to do so. In the following Chapter VI, provision is made for the rights and the liabilities of beneficiaries and under s. 61 it has been enacted that a beneficiary has a right to compel a trustee to perform any particular act or to restrain him from committing any contemplated or probable breach of trust. The learned Counsel who appeared for the petitioner admitted that the beneficiary could not move the Court under s. 61 in a summary manner. In my judgment the view taken by the learned District Judge is correct and is in consonance with Civil Revision No. 864 of 1926 decided by Mr. Justice Coldstream on the 30th of November, 1926.

I, therefore, dismiss this petition with costs.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 297, 307—Jury trial—Non-direction, when amounts to misdirection—Disagreement with verdict of Jury—Reference to High Court, when necessary—Discretion of trial Judge.

It is only when the non-direction of a Jury is such that there are grounds for thinking that the Jury by reason of it may have been put on the wrong track and made to arrive at a wrong conclusion that such non-direction can amount to a misdirection. [p. 675, col. 2.]

Section 307 of the Criminal Procedure Code gives a discretion to the Judge in the matter of reference and it is only when he disagrees with the verdict of the Jury and is clearly of opinion that it is necessary for the ends of justice to submit the case to the High Court that he shall so submit it. If he is not clearly of that opinion his failure to submit the case is not a subject for interference by the High Court on appeal. [p. 676, col. 1.]

Criminal appeal from a decision of the Additional Sessions Judge, Bhagalpur, dated the 15th February, 1927.

Mr. W. H. Akbari, (with him Mr. S. Hussain), for the Appellants.

Mr. C. M. Agarwala, Assistant Government Advocate, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

Sen, J.—In this case there were four persons charged under s. 395 of the Indian Penal Code. Of these four, Madhu Mian has been acquitted the Judge accepting the unanimous verdict of the Jury in his favour. As regards the other three accused, the Jury by a majority of four to one, were of opinion that they were guilty under s. 395 of the Indian Penal Code. The learned Additional Sessions Judge took time to consider the verdict and finally passed an order accepting the verdict and convicting the accused Bishu Tatwa, Bajit Mian and Baijnath Jolaha under the said section and sentencing them to rigorous imprisonment for four years each. This appeal is on behalf of two of the three accused so convicted and sentenced, namely Bajit Mian and Baijnath Jolaha.

There are two grounds urged. The first is that having regard to the view of the learned Additional Sessions Judge that the verdict was against the weight of evidence he should have submitted the case to the High Court under s. 307 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. The second is that even if in the opinion of this Court the learned Additional Sessions Judge was not bound to make a reference under s. 307, the order of conviction and sentence should be set aside inasmuch as the verdict of the Jury was the result of misdirections on some of the most important issues in the case.

I propose to deal with the second ground first. It is necessary to consider some of the facts of the case in order to appreciate the arguments advanced under this head by learned Counsel appearing for the appellants. The dacoity in question is alleged to have taken place on the night of the 17th August, 1926, in village Basaita in the house of one Mahadeo Gangota. Mahadeo Gangota was sleeping on the osara of the southern room of his house. After midnight he was roused by someone striking him with a lathi whereupon he entered the room opening on to the osara where his sons, Chedi, the first informant in the case, and Harihar were. The dacoits effected an entrance into the room and dragged out Mahadeo and Chedi into the angan. Mahadeo thereafter, entreated the dacoits to let him go offering to make over a hasuli to them. He went into the southern room, brought out a hasuli belonging to his wife, which had been hidden in the bedding, and made it over to the dacoits. Chedi in the meantime had effected his escape and ran into the fields. After the hasuli had been handed over, the dacoits began to intimidate Mahadeo's wife, Musammatt Surji, and tried to extract information from her as to where her valuables were hidden. They lighted a fire, threatened to burn her if she did not comply with their requisition, and even went to the length of scorching her leg in the fire they had lit for the purpose. Ultimately, when they discovered that there was not much else to be had from the house they retreated after taking such other small articles as they could get hold of,

Chedi remained out in the fields the whole night. In the morning he sought out the village chaukidar and, with him and one Bhutan Gangota, proceeded to Kishunganj thana where he arrived at 6 p. m. on the 19th August, 1926. It happened, however, that there was no one at the thana who had power to institute a case. There was only a literate constable in charge of the thana who made an entry in the station diary and sent on Chedi and his companions with a copy of this entry to village Lachmipur. They reached Lachmipur at 11 p. m. and there the writer head constable drew up a regular First Information Report. A great deal of the argument advanced in this Court turns upon this First Information. Chedi while lodging the First Information Report stated that he himself did not know who the dacoits were. All that he could say was that his father had said that there were eight dacoits in all, that they were speaking Urdu and that all of them were young. He added, "I could not see on account of darkness if they had applied anything to their faces."

Later on, however, there appears to have been some development inasmuch as Musammatt Surji is alleged to have identified Bajit, Baijnath and also Bishu Tatwa, the last named with particular reference to his gold topped teeth. It may be noted that in view of his evidence, given in the course of the trial the question naturally arose as to whether if Musammatt Surji had so definitely recognised the three accused, their names would not have been stated in the First Information Report lodged by Chedi. It was suggested on behalf of the prosecution that it was just possible that Chedi had not come back home from the fields before going to the Police Station to lodge the First Information. "This theory, however, as appears from the charge to the Jury administered by the learned Additional Sessions Judge, could not stand for a moment. In point of fact Chedi, it is suggested in the charge, must have come home and had a consultation with his father and mother and seen what damage the dacoits had done to the house and the yard, and having so apprised himself of the main facts and circumstances connected with the dacoity he must have proceeded to the Police Station to lodge the First Information. The learned Additional Sessions Judge makes special reference to the fact that Chedi, having been away in the fields most of the time when the dacoits were in the house, could not possibly have given the details of the occurrence and of the damage done to the house, etc., of his own knowledge had he not returned to the house first and then proceeded to the Police Station. In all these matters it is perfectly clear that the learned Additional Sessions Judge made a full and fair and adequate charge to the Jury finally conveying his opinion to the Jury that "It is impossible to believe that Chedi had no talk with Mahadeo and Musammatt Surji before he left the village. He must have had, because he himself was not present throughout the occurrence and many of the details given in the First Information Report must, and could only, have been derived from his parents."

Learned Counsel, appearing for the appellants, contends, however, that this dogmatic expression of the Judge's own opinion would rather take away from its weight and convincingness; the better course, and in fact the only proper course, for the learned Additional Sessions Judge was to place the direct evidence on the subject. He points out a passage from the deposition of Musammatt Surji in which she said, "Chedi also came back. One Bhutan of Lower Lowngaon came with him. Chedi went to the thana. It was about midday when he left." He also points out a passage from the deposition of Chedi in which he said, "I have known Bishu Tatwa for 10 years or so. I have known Bachhu and Baijnath for about five years. I have known Bajit Mian for the last four years. I went to see them occasionally at the hat or on the road I recognised them by their voices. They were Bajir, Bisu, Baijnath and Madhu, the accused. I asked why they were maltreating us but they went on shouting 'stop, you sala or we will kill you.'

On the strength of these two passages, one in the deposition of Chedi and the other in that of Musammatt Surji, learned Counsel contends that if the Judge had put these statements before the Jury which constituted the direct evidence in the case, instead of giving his inference in a dogmatic manner as above mentioned, the Jury would have been in a position from such direct evidence to come to right conclusions on the question as to whether the omission of the names from the First Informaation would not sufficiently establish the innocence of the accused in regard to any part in the dacoity in question. In other words, instead of telling the Jury that it was impossible to believe that Chedi had not returned home before proceeding to the thana the learned Additional Sessions Judge should have given the Jury *Musamm*at Surji's evidence to the effect that Chedi did come as a matter of fact and that he, therefore, had sufficient opportunity to know the names of the accused. Further, he argues that the evidence of Chedi himself that he had actually recognised the accused, if put to the Jury, would have led them at once to view with very great suspicion the First Information Report, the absence from which of the names of the accused would in that case be perfectly unaccountable.

A third contention which he raises is that the learned Sessions Judge was equally dogmatic in that portion of the charge where he discussed the question as to whether such a dacoity did actually take place or not. He expresses the definite opinion that a dacoity had in fact occurred at the place and on the date as alleged. The learned Additional Sessions Judge observed, "It is impossible to believe that his son would, if no dacoity had taken place at all, have lodged the First Information on which the present case was instituted."

He also said :

"It seems to me impossible not to believe that a dacoity was actually committed and that a reasonably veracious account has been given of what the dacoits did at Mahadeo's house."

After having so delivered the charge on the subject of the occurrence itself the learned Sessions Judge proceeded to remark that the real question at issue, however, was whether the four persons in the dock were among the dacoits. This according to the learned Counsel for the defence is denying the Jury the right to form their own judgment on the question as to whether a dacoity did take place as alleged. Having failed to infect them with his own belief so dogmatically expressed, it was not to be wondered that the learned Additional Sessions Judge was eventually surprised at the verdict of the Jury against all the accused.

These are the main objections on the ground of misdirection to the Jury. Barring these features which in his opinion are objectionable though perfectly unintentional, learned Counsel concedes that the charge is, as it reads, a charge for acquittal and the learned Additional Sessions Judge has clearly and unambiguously expressed his opinion that on the evidence adduced in the case it would hardly be possible to bring the charge home to the accused. It is difficult to judge from the heads of charge to the Jury which must necessarily be an abstract, and not a verbatim report of the summing up of the Court, as to whether the passages in question in the deposition of *Musamm*at Surji and Chedi were or were not placed before the Jury [Eknath Sahay v. Emperor (1)]. But the learned Additional Sessions Judge, in my opinion, has not merely in a dogmatic manner expressed his belief in the matter of Chedi's return home and also in the matter of Chedi's supplying himself with material facts for the First Information from his parents. In one portion of his summing up he observes, "It is not reasonable to suppose and there is evidence to the contrary, that *Musamm*at Surji did not communicate to her son before he left the village all that she knew of the occurrence and in particular of the identity of the dacoits."

The "evidence to the contrary" may certainly refer to the evidence of *Musamm*at Surji that Chedi came back home before going to the thana. I am, therefore, constrained to think that there is no substance in the contention that by omitting to refer to any material evidence in the case the Court prevented the Jury from arriving at the right conclusion. As I have already observed the summing up of the learned Additional Sessions Judge from beginning to end is so clearly in favour of acquittal that it would be straining too much to say that the Jury did not receive adequate assistance from the Court. It is only when the non-direction is such that there are grounds for thinking that the Jury by reason of it may have been put on the wrong track and made to arrive at a wrong conclusion that such non-direction can amount to a misdirection. I fail to see any such non-direction in the summing up.

Nor do I think that there is much force in the contention put forward that the opinion expressed by the learned Additional Sessions Judge that a dacoity in fact took place as distinguished from his opinion that it was highly doubtful whether the accused took part in it would amount to a misdirection. If any thing, it would, in my opinion, more pointedly refer to the innocence of the accused notwithstanding the fact, as it seems to have been established by the evidence, that a dacoity had taken place. The result, therefore, is that I do not think that there is any occasion for this Court to interfere on the ground of misdirection.

It remains now to consider the other contention, namely, that in the circumstances of this case the learned Additional Sessions Judge should have made a reference under s. 307 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. There are three things which appear clearly from the provisions of s. 307 and from the rulings thereon. First, it is entirely within the discretion of the Judge as to whether he should make a reference or not. Secondly, a reference is called for when the Judge "is clearly of opinion that it is necessary for the ends of justice to submit the case in respect of such accused person to the High Court" and he shall in that event submit the case accordingly, recording the grounds of his opinion. Thirdly, the Judge must disagree with the verdict of the jurors or of a majority of them. In the present case the learned Additional Sessions Judge took time to consider whether the case should be referred to the High Court under s. 307 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. He did so, as he states in his order, on a count of the fact that at the time he had a suspicion that the methods adopted by the Police had been reprehensible. Subsequently, he made a more careful study of the Police diaries and found that his suspicion was not well-grounded. Accordingly, he modified his original view and felt satisfied that the appellants had taken part in the offence charged against them. In these circumstances he recorded an order as follows:—

"Although, therefore, I still think that possibly the conviction of Bajit and Baijnath is against the weight of evidence on the record, I have modified my original view and am satisfied that these persons took part in the crime. There is thus no reason why a reference should be made to the High Court. I accept the verdict and convict the accused."

It is to be noted that although he was originally minded to dissent from the verdict, at the moment of the order he was certainly not in a position to dissent from it. On the contrary, he had fully satisfied himself as to the guilt of the accused. I fail to see how in these circumstances it could be a fit case for reference under s. 307. Learned Counsel for the appellants, however, urges that inasmuch as there was still some doubt in his mind as to whether the conviction of Bajit and Baijnath was not against the weight of evidence on the record the only course left to him was to submit the case to the High Court. Reliance is placed on the case of Empress v. Guruvadu (2) in which it is laid down that the discretionary power to refer cases under s. 307 should always be exercised when the Judge thinks that the verdict is not supported by the evidence inasmuch as a failure to do so results in the conviction of persons on evidence as to the sufficiency of which the Court is doubtful. The facts of that case, however, were different. The learned Sessions Judge in that case being doubtful as to whether the verdict was justified by the evidence thought that it was not incumbent upon him to send the case to the High Court observing that "probably there would be an appeal." The High Court in that case pointed out that the learned Sessions Judge should have remembered that there was no appeal on the facts when once the trying Court had accepted the verdict and based its conviction thereon; thus there was not justification for the failure to submit the case to the High Court on the ground that probably an appeal would be preferred. Another case upon which strong reliance has been placed is the case of Saroda Charan Mistri v. Emperor (3). In that case the Jury brought in an unanimous verdict of guilty under s. 302 of the Indian Penal Code in respect of one of the accused and under s. 328 of the Indian Penal Code in respect of the other accused. The learned Judge observed that there was no justification for the differentiation of the cases of the two accused and that if the accused were at all guilty they would then both be certainly guilty of murder. On this point, therefore, there appeared to be a clear, full and complete dissent on the part of the learned Judge from the verdict of the Jury. The other point involved in the case was as to whether or not the two accused knew that the drug they were administering to the deceased was poison. They had been given that drug by a third person as a medicine. The case of the defence was that the accused did not know while they administered the drug that they were administering poison. The Jury unhesitatingly rejected the case of the defence as to such absence of knowledge. The learned Judge was inclined to think that he would rather give the accused the benefit of the doubt. But ultimately when passing the order he observed that considering that the Jury had unanimously brought in a verdict of guilty he did not think he was justified in pressing "the slight doubts" that still remained in his mind to the extent of referring the case to the High Court under s. 307 of the Criminal Procedure Code. With reference to the last mentioned point the High Court came to the conclusion that the disagreement of the learned Judge with the Jury was not such a complete dissent as to lead him to consider it necessary for the ends of justice to submit the case to the High Court. But with reference to the former the High Court held that there was such a clear and complete dissent as to the liability of the two accused under the same section that he was obviously unable to do justice to the accused by accepting the verdict and, therefore, there was no option left to him but to refer the case to the High Court under the provisions of s. 307. The present case bears some resemblance to the case of Sarda Charan Mistr v. Emperor (3), in so far as it relates to "the slight doubts" that still remained in the mind of the Court. Such doubts have been expressed by the learned Judge in the words: "Possibly, the conviction of Bajit and Baijnath is against the weight of evidence on the record." In the next sentence, however, he observes, "I have modified my original view and am satisfied that these persons took part in the crime."

(2) 13 M. 343; 2 Weir 389; 4 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 951.

This takes the case completely beyond the scope of the provisions of s. 307 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. But it cannot be said that he disagrees with the verdict. Nor that he is clearly of opinion that it is necessary for the ends of justice to submit the case to the High Court. This principle has been affirmed in the later case Eran Khan v. Emperor (4), which lays down that "s. 307 quite clearly gives to the Judge a discretion in the matter, and it is only when he is clearly of opinion that it is necessary for the ends of justice to submit the case to the High Court that he shall so submit it. If he is not clearly of that opinion, his failure to submit the case is not a subject for interference by this Court on appeal."

In this connection it would be well to remember the principle laid down in one of the earliest cases of Jury trial in India: "If we are to interfere in every case of doubt, in every case in which it may with propriety be said that the evidence would have warranted a different verdict, then we must hold that real trial by Jury is absolutely at an end, and that the verdict of a Jury is of no more weight than the opinion of assessors," Queen v. Sham Bagdee (5). In the present case it was unexpected that the Jury should have returned a verdict of guilty by a majority of four to one. But the jurors are entitled to their own view of the case and the rule of law is not to disturb their verdict unless it be for special reasons and under special circumstances. The principle underlying that rule is well-expressed as follows: "We adhere generally to this principle, notwithstanding our large discretionary powers, first, on the constitutional ground of taking as little as possible out of the hands to which it has been primarily assigned by the Legislature, and secondly, because any undue interference may tend to diminish the sense of responsibility which it is desirable that a Jury should cherish," Reg v. Khanderav v. Rajirav (6).

The appeal must be dismissed and the convictions and sentences affirmed.

CRIMINAL REVISION No. 172-B OF 1927.

September 17, 1927.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 437—Revision—Finding of fact—Interference—Mere mistake of law—No injustice—Interference, whether legal—Appellate Court—Alteration of charge, legality of—Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), ss. 379, 409, 417, 420, 511—Theft, criminal breach of trust, criminal misappropriation and cheating, distinction between—Sentence, reduction of, when justifiable.

A Court of Revision has no right to disturb a finding of fact, even if it arrives at a different conclusion on an evaluation of the evidence. [p. 678, col. 2.]

It is not the duty of the Court of Revision to correct mere mistakes in law, which have no more effect than mistakes in grammar or spelling. The power of interference in revision is to be used only for the purpose of correcting injustice not mere illegality. [p. 679, col. 2.]

It is open to the Appellate Court to alter a charge to one under a different section and it should do so if another section applies to the facts, provided the accused knew all the facts alleged against him. [ibid.]

The distinction between theft, criminal breach of trust, criminal misappropriation and cheating is that in theft, the original taking is without honesty and without the consent of the owner and in criminal breach of trust it is with both. In obtaining property by cheating, the taking is dishonest but with the consent of the owner and in criminal misappropriation it is honest but without the consent of the owner. [ibid.]

A sentence of one year's rigorous imprisonment and a fine with further rigorous imprisonment for four months in default of payment of it, though legal under s. 420, Penal Code, is illegal, if the finding is altered in the Appellate Court to a conviction of attempting to cheat punishable under ss. 417 and 511 read together, under which the longest term of imprisonment that could be imposed substantively is six months and the longest that could be imposed in default of payment of fine is a month and a half. [p. 678, col. 2.]

A Court is not bound to reduce a sentence unless it appears to be heavier than the facts proved against the accused warrant, especially when the Courts below express the opinion that it is not so, even though the facts constitute a different offence for which the sentence passed is not a legal one. [p. 679, col. 2.]

Application for revision of a decision of the Sessions Judge, Amraoti, in Criminal Appeal No. 261 of 1927, dated the 12th July, 1927.

Mr. R. R. Jayvant, R. B., for the Applicant.

Mr. G. P. Dick, for the Opposite Party.

ORDER.—This, like most applications for revision in criminal cases, is nothing more than a second appeal in which no question of law whatever is raised but every finding of fact in which the Courts below concurred is attacked, not as obviously mistaken but on the ground that an evaluation of the evidence by this Court should and would lead it to a different conclusion. Even if that did happen, this Court would not have even the right to disturb the decisions at which the Appellate Court has arrived. It happens further that in this case the learned Sessions Judge did fall into a very obvious mistake of law in respect of the sentence, but that has passed unnoticed and was not mentioned in the application for revision.

The sentence maintained in the Sessions Court was one of rigorous imprisonment for one year and a fine, with further rigorous imprisonment for four months in default of payment of it. That sentence is perfectly legal under s. 420 of the Penal Code, under which it was passed, but in the Sessions Court the finding was altered to a conviction of attempting to cheat, punishable under ss. 417 and 511 read together. The longest term of imprisonment that could be imposed substantively under these two sections combined is six months, and the longest that could be imposed in default of payment of fine is a month and a half.

Now, though the applicant had no right to ask that the whole of the evidence should be examined by this Court for the third time, that has been done and it is found, as might be expected, that it leads inevitably to the inferences of fact which two Courts have already drawn from it. They are these. The accused, a cotton broker, had in his possession a number of bales of cotton belonging to the complainant. On the 25th of January the bales were weighed and found to consist of 129 akhas. (The akha is a unit, which has not been defined in the case, but seems to include both weight and quality.)

The bales were in two lots or stacks, one of 43 units and the other of 86. The accused made three entries in his nakal baki or day book, all in the name of the complainant, of 43 units, 74 units and 12 units. It is in respect of the 12 units of the last item that he has been found to have committed an offence. After the weighment he told the complainant's servant, who had not checked it, that the total amount was 117 units, which was 12 short of the truth. The servant doubted this and asked for the tak patti or weighman's tally, which the accused declined to give him, saying it was not necessary. The servant came back shortly afterwards with a friend and the accused repeated to them both the statement that the quantity of cotton was only 117 units and again declined to show them the weighman's tally.

On the 27th of January, two days after the weighing, the accused sold the lot of 43 units and credited the complainant with the price in his khataoni or ledger. Five days later, on the 1st of February, he sold the other lot of 86 units and credited the complainant with the price of 74 only. What entry was made at that time in respect of the remaining 12 units is uncertain, though it is clear that it was not a credit entry in favour of the complainant. (Before the ledger was produced in this case the page on which the entry of the 74 units appeared was removed and another substituted for it, showing the same entry and another just below it of the price of the 12 units, which was also credited to the complainant.)

During the next two or three weeks the complainant several times asked the accused for satisfactory evidence that his cotton had not amounted to more than 117 units, as he felt sure it had, and he asked in particular for the bill for ginning it which was with the accused, but the accused put him off from time to time by various falsehoods. On the first two occasions he said the bill had not yet reached him, on the third that he had already sent it by the hand of a messenger and on the fourth that it was lost. Eventually on the 22nd of February he gave the complainant a written receipt for the full amount of the cost of ginning his cotton, stating in it that the cotton consisted of 117 units. The complainant then went to the purchaser of the cotton, as he ought to have done and quite possibly had done earlier, and ascertained that 129 units had been sold as his.

The offence constituted by these facts is undoubtedly criminal breach of trust. There is no question of a mere attempt any more than there would be in a case of theft in which the stolen property was recovered or restored. The learned Sessions Judge seems to have been aware that s. 409 of the Penal Code really fitted the facts, but to have refrained from applying it because it was not mentioned in the charge. A perusal of Chap. XIX of the Criminal Procedure Code would have shown that this could and should have been done. The accused knew all the facts alleged against him, and probably knew nothing at all about the difference between the various sections that have been mentioned.

As this ignorance is not confined to accused persons it may be useful to state compendiously an easy method of differentiating between the offence of theft, cheating with delivery of property, criminal misappropriation and criminal breach of trust. That depends on whether the original taking was honest or dishonest and whether it was with the consent of the owner or without it. In theft the original taking is without honesty and without the consent of the owner, and in criminal breach of trust it is with both. In obtaining property by cheating the taking is dishonest but with the consent of the owner, and in criminal misappropriation it is honest but without the consent of the owner.

Now it is not the duty of this Court sitting in revision to correct mere mistakes in law which have no more effect than mistakes in grammar or spelling. The power of interference in revision is to be used only for the purpose of correcting injustice not mere illegality. For that reason, even if the view of the Sessions Court that the facts constituted no more than an attempt to cheat were correct, I should refuse to reduce the sentence in this case unless it appeared to be heavier than those facts warranted. A Magistrate and a Sessions Judge have expressed the opinion that it is not so, and I agree with them. But the real illegality in the case is in not passing the sentence under s. 409 of the Penal Code, and if any interference is required at all it would be to alter the finding to one of an offence punishable under that section. That however would be a matter for an academy of law, not for a Court of Law.

I decline accordingly to interfere at all with the decision of the Sessions Court, by altering either the finding or the sentence. To leave them both will do as little harm and to correct one of them as little good as to do the same thing in regard to a word that appears in the record with two different spellings.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 440—Revision—Omission to hear party—Second application, whether maintainable—Review—Duty of Counsel to see that application is placed before some Judge—Attempt to have application heard by another Judge, impropriety of—Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), s. 427—Mischief—Complainant, whether bound to prove his title.

No party has a right to be heard before any Court exercising its powers of revision under the Criminal Procedure Code although the Court may, if it thinks fit, hear any party either personally or by Pleader. [p. 680, col. 2.]

The fact that the Pleader for a party was not heard when a Court was exercising such powers is not, therefore, a ground for a second application for revision or for a review. [p. 681, col. 2.]

Kohna Ram v. Emperor (1) and Ram Nihore Umar v. Emperor (2), distinguished.

It is a good practice to hear Counsel in criminal references in matters of importance, but whether a matter is a matter of importance must be left to the discretion of the Judge hearing the reference. [p. 681, cols. 1 & 2.]

An application for review must come before the Judge who passed the decision which is to be reviewed, and the Counsel for review should ask that the application be put before the Judge who decided the matter. It is contrary to all propriety that a Counsel should put in an application for review and attempt to get it heard by another Judge by styling his application as an application in revision. Messrs. S. C. Goyle and A. P. Pandey, for the Applicants.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application for revision of an order of a Magistrate of the First Class of Ghazipur, dated the 4th October, 1926, convicting the applicant of an offence under s. 427, Indian Penal Code, and sentencing him to pay a fine of Rs. 10. The application in revision is based on the ground that the Deputy Magistrate before convicting the applicant of the offence of mischief was bound to find that the property in respect of which the mischief was alleged to be committed belonged to the complainant.

The matter has already been up in revision before this Court on a reference from the Sessions Judge of Ghazipur. It appears that when the matter was up before me on the reference from the Sessions Judge a vakalatnama had been filed by Mr. Pandey. Mr. Pandey was not called upon by me to argue or appear in the case. It is possible that I was not even aware of any Pleader having been engaged by the applicant. The reference by the Sessions Judge impugned the order of the Magistrate on precisely the same ground as that order is being impugned by the present application in revision. The consequence is that this application in revision is calling in question on certain grounds an order of a Magistrate which order was previously considered on a reference from the Sessions Judge impugning that order on precisely the same grounds. In these circumstances it is clearly for the applicant in respect of the present application to show reason why the application is maintainable.

Mr. Goyle who, though not appearing in respect of the previous application, appears on behalf of the applicant to argue the present application gives as the reason why, notwithstanding the matter having been already decided, this application in revision should and must be entertained the following. He says that Mr. Pandey had a right to appear in respect of the previous application, and consequently the decision on the previous application was bad because he was not called on to appear. He further adds that he has a right in law to appear, at any rate, to support the present application. Now s. 440 of the Criminal Procedure Code is very explicit on the matter. That section runs, "No party has any right to be heard either personally or by Pleader before any Court when exercising its powers of revision." It goes on to provide that the Court may, if it thinks fit, when exercising such powers hear any party either personally or by Pleader. Mr. Goyle maintains that this rule of law has been rescinded by a rule of practice in this Court. He refers to the case of Kohna Ram v. Emperor (1). That decision has no application to the present contention. It does not deal with the matter of an applicant being heard or not being heard by the mouth of his Counsel. It is however cited by Mr. Goyle in order to show that, though a matter has been up in revision and decided it may be brought up in revision again and the Court must decide it again. His contention, if allowed, would require this Court to hear an application in revision 100 times over. But the decision is no authority, for such a contention. In that case the Sessions Judge had reported a conviction for the purposes of enhancing the sentence. A Judge of the High Court entertained the revision and threw it out. Subsequently the applicant put in another application in revision to the effect that the conviction of the Magistrate was wrong in law. It was held that the application called in question a different matter to that dealt with by the Sessions Judge. The matter up before the High Court was clearly a new one and one that had never been up before. The case has no bearing on the present case. I have only been able to obtain two decisions bearing on the present matter at all. One is Ram Nihore Umar v. Emperor (2). In that decision Richards, J., said, "The Court is willing, as a rule, to get the help and assistance of legal gentlemen as amicus curiae" and refers to s. 440. This remark is very far from being authority for holding that the clear provision of s. 440 of the Criminal Procedure Code has been overlaid by any established practice that Counsel will be heard in revision cases. Each case must depend on the merits. Where a Sessions Judge has written a complete order setting forth his view and a reply has been submitted by the Magistrate concerned and the facts are clear beyond all doubt, it will not be my practice to call upon Counsel to appear even if they have filed an affidavit. Such a practice would be in direct conflict with the provisions of s. 440 which leaves me a discretion. It would also prevent revisional references being decided in Chambers. I see no reason for believing that in an ordinary case any particular Counsel is likely to present the case better than the Sessions Judge. Another decision is Queen Empress v. Haradhan (3). In that case it was held that in matters of importance the Calcutta High Court has always heard Counsel in criminal references. This is merely a statement of the practice of the Calcutta High Court but I consider that it is a good practice, and one which may usefully be followed in this Court. Whether a matter is a matter of importance must be left to the discretion of the Judge hearing the reference.

This application is really in effect an application in revision. It has been put in the form of another application in revision in order to avoid an objection that no review lies under the Criminal Procedure Code. I am not prepared to say that a Judge of this Court cannot review his judgment or decision. But it appears to me very clear that the application for review must come before the Judge who passed the decision which is to be reviewed. The application by Counsel for review in such a case should ask that the application be put before the Judge who decided the matter. It is contrary to all propriety that he should put in an application for review as if it could be heard by another Judge. By styling this application "an application in revision" this is what Mr. Goyle attempted to do.

This application was ordered by a Judge of this Court to be put up before me on certain grounds stated by him. The ground taken by him is that I could not have been aware that the present applicant was represented in the revision from the Sessions Judge. It is probable that I was not aware, and it is possible that if I had been aware I would have heard Mr. Pandey. But the case once having been decided the mere fact that I did not exercise a discretion to hear Counsel is no ground for a review. Before a review could be permitted, there would have to be shown some strong reason for altering the decision. No reason is shown in the present application. It merely reiterates the view which I hold was a wrong view of the Sessions Judge. The Magistrate had found that the applicant had pulled down a wall in the possession of another person for a long time without the slightest excuse for believing that the wall belonged to him (the applicant). When accused of mischief instead of saying that the wall was his or that he had believed it to be his, he said that the wall had fallen down, that he had nothing to do with its being pulled down, and then tried to put the complainant to proof that the wall was his. My brief order on the first application that possession is prima facie proof of title, and that the Magistrate had evidence on which he was justified in finding that the accused was out of possession, concludes the matter. In the view of the Sessions

Judge a total stranger may come and knock down the wall of my house, and when accused of mischief demand that I should produce my title deeds to prove that it was my wall.

The present application in revision is, however, rejected by me on the ground that the matter has been decided, and that there was no flaw in the previous decision. The contention of Mr. Goyle that there was a flaw because applicant's Counsel was not heard is rejected. Also his contention that he must be heard in this case is rejected. The application is dismissed.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), s. 405—Criminal breach of trust—No proof of conversion—Delay in remittance—Explanation available, effect of.

In a prosecution for criminal breach of trust delay in making remittance to the head office of moneys received, according to departmental rules is a circumstance to be taken into consideration and it may be, if there is no explanation, prima facie evidence of dishonesty. But where an explanation is available mere delay in making the remittance in the absence of proof of conversion or falsification of accounts is nothing more than evidence of breach of departmental rules. JUDGMENT.

ROSS, J.—This is an application by one Parmod Ban Behari Saran formerly Station Master of Ghorasahan on the Bengal and North-Western Railway who has been convicted of criminal breach of trust in respect of two sums of money, and has been sentenced to four months' rigorous imprisonment on each charge and also to pay a fine. There were originally three charges and on all of them the petitioner was convicted by the Magistrate, but the learned Sessions Judge, on appeal found that the second charge was not proved. The application is, therefore, concerned only with two charges the first of which is in respect of a sum of Rs. 168-13-0 and the second in respect of a sum of Rs. 234-11-0.

The first charge relates to freight of a consignment of sacks of betel nuts which was received by the petitioner at Ghorasahan Station on the 27th of August, 1926. The case for the prosecution is that the freight for this consignment amounting to Rs. 168-13-0 was paid on the 30th of August and was never remitted to the Head Office at Gorakhpur. The defence is that the freight was paid not on the 30th of August but on the 2nd of September and was remitted to Gorakhpur on the following day. The learned Sessions Judge has not placed reliance upon the merchant's account book tendered in proof of payment on the 30th of August and he says that the charge depends principally upon whether the prosecution has succeeded in showing that the money was not sent to Gorakhpur on the 3rd of September. Now it is common ground that on the 3rd of September a sum of Rs. 1,086-5-0 was remitted to Gorakhpur. The only evidence which could have shown directly what this sum was composed of would have been the cash book, but that evidence has disappeared and no secondary evidence of the contents of the cash book has been produced. It was stated by the learned Assistant Government Advocate that there was secondary evidence of the entries in cash book, but by some mistake it was not put on the record. The prosecution, therefore, fell back upon the entries in the Foreign Inward Delivery Book and the Local Goods Delivery Book from which could be ascertained what sums of money had been received on the 2nd of September and, consequently, ought to have been remitted to Gorakhpur on the 3rd, and they also relied upon a note made by Mr. Baker, an Inspector of Railway Accounts (Ex. 24-a) compiled from these books; and from these sources a statement was prepared by the learned Magistrate which accounts for this sum of Rs. 1,086-5-0 except as to Rs. 31-13-0. There are, therefore, two defects in the proof given by the prosecution. In the first place, it has not correctly and fully accounted for this sum of Rs. 1,086-5-0. There was admittedly a sum of Rs. 31-13-0 which remained unaccounted for and, consequently, the calculation made by the Magistrate for aught we know, may have proceeded on a wrong basis altogether. Secondly, the evidence does not show that sums were actually remitted to Gorakhpur, but what sums under the rules ought to have been despatched, and it is idle to offer this as proof that a particular item admittedly received was not included in that remittance. The fact seems to be that the evidence on which alone this charge could have been established has disappeared and the proof is consequently incomplete.

The other charge relates to a sum of Rs. 234-11-0 on account of freight of a consignment of sacks of salt. This is charged as a temporary misappropriation. According to the prosecution the freight was paid for this consignment on the 19th of May and admittedly the money was remitted to Gorakhpur by the petitioner on the 24th of June. The petitioner's case was that the freight on the consignment was not paid until the 23rd of June. Some of the entries in the Foreign Inward Delivery Book have been altered and it is impossible to say what they are intended to represent; but the date of the receipt of the goods has not been changed and there is no reason to suspect that it was not correctly entered as the 21st of May. If that be so, then the evidence of the merchant's books that the money was disbursed on the 19th of May does not amount to proof that the payment was actually made on that date. The learned Sessions Judge has stated the arguments for and against relying on these books and, as I understand his judgment, he came to no definite conclusion. At all events the merchant had admitted before the Police that he was uncertain whether he had made the payment himself or through his gomashta and it is quite possible, if his books are accepted, that the money was actually disbursed on the 19th of May, to his gomashta, although the goods were not ready for delivery till the 21st of May. But it is quite clear that the money could not have been paid on the 19th. What the Courts below have proceeded upon in coming to the finding of fact on this point is, first the improbability that perishable goods like salt would have been left lying at the station for a month, and secondly, that no demurrage was charged. Now there is nothing to show that salt is so perishable as all that, and, in this case, there is a peculiar circumstance, namely, that the goods had been assigned by the original consignee to another purchaser. This may have led to some enquiry by the authorities at the station in order to satisfy themselves that the delivery was being made to, the proper party and it is possible that this caused delay and would equally excuse demurrage. There is no evidence on this point, but the fact of the assignment, to which the learned Sessions Judge has not alluded to in this connection, is evidently a relevant fact in connection with this charge. A further question is whether even if the facts be accepted as stated by the prosecution, they would amount to proof of criminal breach of trust. The learned Assistant Government Advocate relied on the decision in Emperor v. Tulshidas Chhaganlal (1), where money had been retained for more than three months. But in that case there were facts which clearly distinguish it from the present. The accused in that case after being dismissed by his master, had made a claim on his master for a sum of Rs. 9 on account of wages and had admitted liability to the extent of only Rs. 10 or Rs. 11 notwithstanding the fact that he had previously received and not accounted for the subject-matter of the charge which was a sum of Rs. 107-9-9. This act in itself was a clear denial in his possession of the money and was, therefore, direct evidence of conversion. In the present case there is nothing to show that the petitioner had converted the money to his own use. There was no falsification of accounts. The delay in making the remittance is a circumstance to be taken into consideration and it may be if there is no explanation, prima facie evidence of dishonesty. But here there is the circumstance that there had been an assignment of these goods and, therefore, a possible explanation of the delay. In these circumstances it does not seem to me that the mere delay in making the remittance is evidence of anything more than a breach of the departmental rules.

I think, therefore, that neither of these charges has been established, and I would allow this application and set aside the conviction and sentence and direct that the petitioner be acquitted and released from bail. The fine if paid, will be refunded.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 110, 118, 417—Security proceedings—Order setting aside order to furnish security, whether order of acquittal—Appeal by Local Government, maintainability of—Evidence in security proceedings—Evidence of Police Officers of suspicion and of general repute, admissibility of.

The terms 'conviction' and 'acquittal' are wholly inapplicable to orders under s. 118 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. An order of a Sessions Judge setting aside an order of a Magistrate directing a person to furnish security for good behaviour is not, consequently, appealable under s. 417 of the Code. [p. 684, col. 2.]

In security proceedings the evidence of Police Officers should not be discarded altogether as of no value to prove bad character, although it has to be received with caution. [p. 684, col. 2. p. 685, col. 1.]

Suspicion in the mind of a witness is not admissible evidence in such proceedings although evidence of general repute is admissible. [p. 685, col. 1.]

The allegations in s. 110 of the Criminal Procedure Code can only be proved by direct evidence of people who have knowledge of facts to which they depose with the exception that in regard to all other clauses except cl. (f) of s. 110, a witness may give evidence of general repute. [p. 685, col. 2.]

Evidence of general repute is not hearsay evidence but direct evidence given on the basis of the witness's own knowledge of a fact. [ibid]

Criminal appeal from an order of the Additional Sessions Judge, Moradabad.

The Government Advocate, for the Crown.

Mr. Saila Nath Mukerji, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal on behalf of the Local Government against an order of a Sessions Judge setting aside the order of a Magistrate calling upon the opposite party to furnish security for good behaviour for a period of one year. A preliminary objection is taken that no appeal lies, and the importance of the objection lies in the fact that if no appeal lies, then the Local Government can only apply to this Court in revision, and the ordinary principle governing interference by this Court on the revisional side will be applicable; in other words, we shall have to be satisfied that the lower Court has erred, and erred prejudicially to the opposite party on some question of law, or has so grossly erred in the principles which it has applied to the weighing of the evidence that interference is called for.

We are of opinion that the objection must be sustained. Under s. 417 of the Code of Criminal Procedure the Local Government is only given the right of appeal against an acquittal. It is unnecessary to do more than to mention the sections to which we have been referred. They are as follows:—Sections 118, 406, 417 and 423 of the Code. We think that there cannot be the least doubt that the terms "conviction" "and acquittal" are nowhere applied throughout the Code to an order under s. 118, and that they are, in fact, wholly inapplicable. We think that this point is so clear that it is unnecessary to discuss it in greater detail; nor, in our view, does it require the support of authority. We may, however, mention that there are cases reported as Queen-Empress v. Phulla (1), Ali Mahomed Khan v. Tarak Chandra Banerji (2), Chand Khan v. Empress (3), which all bear on this point and favour the view that we have stated.

We have, therefore, limited our consideration of this case by the principles ordinarily applicable to cases heard on the revisional side. We have had placed before us the judgment of the learned Additional Sessions Judge, and it has only been possible, apart from the weight of the evidence, from the learned Government Advocate to make one serious criticism of that judgment. The learned Judge has in dealing with the prosecution witnesses excluded altogether from consideration the evidence of seven Police Officers holding that the evidence of such Police Officers "is of no value to prove bad character." In this we think that he is clearly wrong if he means that it is not entitled to consideration at all as being prejudiced evidence. If he had said that it must be received with caution, he would, of course, have been right, and with a little more caution than would be necessary in the case of ordinary witnesses who might prima facie be supposed to be independent, such as zemindars and other persons of respectable position unconnected with the prosecution of offences or charges of this nature. The learned Judge having then, in our view, been wrong in, as it were, cutting right out of the record this evidence, the next question that we had to ask from the learned Government Advocate was whether he was prepared to say that the evidence of those seven witnesses was so valuable that, if considered, it would turn the scale. We did not understand him to be prepared to describe that evidence in those terms, but we were invited to look at it, and we are not prepared to hold that there is anything so striking about it that it would justify us in reweighing the whole of the evidence on the record. There are a succession of statements that the accused is reputed to be a habitual thief, robber and dacoit, but in at least some of the cases the evidence is also weakened by the Police Officer being allowed to state that the opposite party in this case was "suspected" by him to be a bad character. It has been laid down a number of times that suspicion in the mind of a witness is not admissible evidence. There is nothing in the evidence of these witnesses so startling as to justify us in embarking on the course of reweighing the whole of the evidence. Again, however, for our personal satisfaction we have considered some of the evidence for the defence with a view to seeing whether it was strikingly of such a nature that the learned Judge's reliance on it was not guided by the exercise of a judicial discretion. It would be quite impossible to hold that of the first half a dozen witnesses whom we have read. They are men of position, and most of them had opportunities of knowing about the accused, and they speak to his good character. We could only reject that evidence by holding that they were deliberately committing perjury, and there is no ground for any such aspersion. The worst that can be said against them is that their sympathies are with the accused, because he has become a religious leader. It may be so, and quite probably is so, but there remains the fact that these persons who are respectable and hold responsible positions are prepared to testify to the good conduct of the accused since he left Jail. We see no reason, therefore, to be drawn into a reweighing of the whole of the evidence on the record. There is nothing in the evidence of the half a dozen witnesses whom we have examined on both sides to suggest that the Judge was wrong in his estimate, and we see no reason for interference.

Before we leave this case we think we should draw attention to the notice that was framed under s. 112 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. It is a long rambling production which covers more than a full page of printed foolscap. It refers only to cl. (a) of s. 110. It refers to burglaries and extortion neither of which terms occur in cl. (a) at all. It charges the opposite party with committing thefts, and does not charge him with that with which he should be charged, being "by habit" a thief. It tells him that he has been "strongly suspected" to have committed thefts etc. We have already noted that "suspicion" is not a legitimate basis for findings under s. 110. A witness may have suspicion against a person in respect of whom he is giving evidence, but if he has, he ought to be able to give the grounds for that suspicion, and the value of the facts stated can then be weighed by the Magistrate. The evidence which he can give of general reputation is a totally different matter. A witness can come into Court and say, "This man is by general reputation a habitual thief." Whether his evidence is worth anything will depend upon his position, his partiality or impartiality, and whether the defence have by cross-examination been able to show that the witness has no real grounds for saying that he has knowledge of the general reputation of the man in the dock. There should really be little difficulty in prosecuting these cases if the Police and the Magistrate keep clearly in view the terms of the various clauses of s. 110 and the provisions of s. 117 (4) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, and if they bear in mind that the allegations in s. 110 can only be proved by direct evidence of people who have knowledge of facts to which they depose with the exception that in regard to all other clauses except cl. (f) of s. 110, a witness may say "I know the general reputation of the man to be so and so." Such evidence of general reputation does not offend against the rule against hearsay evidence. This is not hearsay. It is direct evidence given on the basis of the witness's own knowledge of a fact—the fact that people are talking about this man in a certain way, the fact he has such and such a general reputation.

For the reasons we have given above we see no reason to interfere with the order of the learned Additional Sessions Judge setting aside the order of the Magistrate. The appeal as it has been described, that is, the application in revision, as we have held that it should be, is dismissed.

The bail bond will be discharged.

JUDGMENT.

Stuart, C. J.—This is a reference from the learned of Sessions Judge, Sitapur, suggesting that the conviction of Chandrika Singh should be set aside and that the fine paid by him should be refunded. Chandrika Singh is a zemindar in the Sitapur District. In the month of July, 1927, he was late with his land revenue instalment. He owed the Crown Rs. 344. In consequence, the Tahsildar of Sitapur issued a citation upon him under the provisions of s. 147, Local Act III of 1901 (Land Revenue Act) directing him to appear at the Sitapur Tahsil on the 12th July, 1927. He did not appear on that date, but he remitted on the 12th July, 1927, a sum of Rs. 160 and three days later he paid up the balance. The Tahsildar, however, thought fit to prosecute him under the provisions of s. 174 of the Indian Penal Code and the Deputy Magistrate who tried the case convicted him under that section and fined him Rs. 50. The learned Sessions Judge has submitted this reference upon the ground that there is considerable doubt as to whether such a conviction is legal and also upon the ground that, in any circumstances, as the man paid Rs. 160 on the date fixed for his appearance and the balance three days afterwards, the fine was excessive. I note at the beginning that we agree with the learned Sessions Judge on the second point. We consider that if an offence were committed by the applicant it was of a technical and venial nature. Upon the facts there is no reason to find that he was contumacious in his disobedience and it is my intention, in event of upholding his conviction to suggest the reduction of the fine to the nominal fine of Re. 1.

The point of law before us is one that requires our close consideration in view of the fact that there is a complete difference of opinion on it between the late Judicial Commissioner's Court of Oudh and a Bench of the Hon'ble High Court of Allahabad. In 1910 a Bench of the Judicial Commissioner's Court consisting of Mr. Chamier (now Sir Edward Chamier) and Mr. Evans decided in Ram Bali Singh v. Emperor (1) that a citation to appear issued under s. 147 of Local Act III of 1901 is an order to the defaulter to appear at the time and place named therein within the meaning of s. 174 of the Indian Penal Code and that intentional disobedience of it is an offence under that section. The decision in question does not contain full reasons. It is in the main a decision construing the words. There has been a recent decision in the Allahabad High Court, Emperor v. Bhirgu Singh (2), in which a Bench of the Hon'ble High Court consisting of Mr. Justice Dalal and Mr. Justice Boys decided that the issue of a citation to appear to an alleged defaulter under s. 147 of Local Act III of 1901 does not involve him in any legal liability to attend, and that non-compliance with it does not render him guilty of an offence under s. 174 of the Indian Penal Code. The view taken by these two learned Judges is shortly that the ordinary meaning of the word "citation" is that it is rather in the nature of an invitation to appear than of an order to attend. They thought that the meaning of the word "citation" as used in s. 147 of Local Act III of 1901 was similar to the meaning of the word 'citation' as used in the present ss. 235 and 283 of Act XXXIX of 1925 corresponding to s. 199 of Act X of 1863 and s. 250 of the same Act and s. 69 of Act V of 1881.

(1) 5 Ind. Cas. 805; 13 O. C. 55; 11 Cr. L. J. 250.

In deciding the question referred to us, I propose to look first at the wording of s. 147 the words of which are as follows:—

"When an arrear of revenue becomes due, a writ of demand calling on the defaulter to pay the amount within a time therein stated, or a citation to appear, may issue".

There is nothing in the section to prevent both "the writ of demand" and "the citation to appear" being issued simultaneously. I note first that the words used are "a citation to appear". The words used are more than "a citation". There can be no doubt as to the fact that the Board of Revenue considered that this section gave them the authority to order a person to appear, for the form of the citation to appear is as follows:—

"Whereas a sum of Rs.....on account of arrears of instalment in respect of.....is due against you, you are hereby directed (hidayat) that in case the entire arrears aforesaid and process-fee in respect of this summons are not paid immediately you should appear before this Court at... ..on..... Failure to attend shall be punishable under s. 174 of the Indian Penal Code".

The citation is headed in the vernacular 'sammons hazri.' It is true, as the learned Judges of the Allahabad High Court have stated, that the construction placed upon the section by Board of Revenue is immaterial and the declaration that failure to attend is punishable criminally is also immaterial in so far as the consequences of neglect to attend are concerned. But the words are of importance as showing that the Board of Revenue, on the assumption that they have authority to direct a defaulter to attend in person, clearly are exercising that authority. If they do not have the authority to order him to attend, the fact that they assert such authority is immaterial; but if they have authority to order him to attend the words used in the form place beyond any reasonable doubt the fact that they do so order him. This carries me on to the question as to whether the words "citation to appear" are or are not to be construed as an order to appear. The learned Judges composing the Bench of the Allahabad High Court to whose decision I have already referred have not laid the same stress which I lay on the words "citation to appear". They have laid stress rather on the word "citation" standing alone, and they have said that the ordinary meaning of the word "citation" is in the nature of an invitation to appear rather than of an order to attend. I do not know whence they derived that meaning. I have been unable to discover in Stroud's Judicial Dictionary any definition of the word "citation". The learned Judges of that Bench do not appear to have wished to look at the legal meaning of the word so much as the ordinary meaning of the word. For the ordinary meaning of the word I have referred to the 1926 Edition of Webster's New International Dictionary. The word 'citation' is derived from the Latin word citatio which is formed from the Latin verb citare, to cite. Webster gives the following meanings:

(1) An official summons or notice given to a person to appear, as before a Tribunal of Justice; hence, any summons; the paper containing such summons or notice.

(2) Act of citing a passage from a book, or from another person, in its own words; also, the passage or words cited; quotation; specific, Law, a reference to decided cases, or books of authority.

(3) Enumeration; mention; as, a citation of facts."

I am unable to discover from this that the word "citation" necessarily would ever mean an invitation. It is a summons or notice. I do not say that citation is necessarily an order to appear. I should prefer to consider it as a notice or an order to do something. The word 'summons' to which the learned Judges of the same Bench have made reference at length is also not necessarily an order to appear. A man may be summoned to appear, or he may be summoned to do an act which does not involve appearance. The word "summons" used by itself will not convey an indication as to whether appearance is or is not required. Similarly I should interpret the word "citation", and on this view proceed to consider the analogy which the learned Judges have drawn from the procedure under the testamentary law in India.

The citation to which they refer are: first the citation under s. 235 of the present Act XXXIX of 1925 which states that Letters of Administration with the Will annexed shall not be granted to any legatee other than an universal or a residuary legatee, until a citation has been issued and published in the manner hereinafter mentioned, calling on the next-of-kin to accept or refuse Letters of Administration; and the second citation to which they refer is the citation mentioned in s. 283 of the same Act where in application for Probate or Letters of Administration the District Judge may issue citations calling upon all persons claiming to have any interest in the estate of the deceased to come and see the proceedings before the grant of Probate or Letters of Administration issues. That section continues that the citation shall be fixed up in a conspicuous part of the Court house and also in the office of the Collector of the District and otherwise published or made known in such a manner as the Judge or the District Delegate issuing the same may direct. The ordinary method of publishing citations of this nature is by notice in a newspaper. Now it is to be noted that on the forms of these citations as used by this Court (and by most others) the citation is in the first place a notice. It is issued frequently not upon persons by name. It has a legal effect. Persons interested in the matter of the Probate or Administration, who have had an opportunity of seeing such a notice, are bound by their omission to object upon the date fixed. The citation is not only a notice, but it is a notice involving consequences in event of subsequent inaction. It is not "a notice to appear" but it is considerably more than an invitation. A refusal to accept an invitation involves no consequences. An omission to object after receiving this notice involves the consequence that consent is presumed. I look upon the use of the words "citation to appear" in s. 147 as meaning an order to appear. Why the word "citation" was used in this portion of Local Act III of 1901 I am in no position to decide. I should not go so far as to consider that any subtle meaning was indicated by the use of the word. It is, I think, too much to attribute significance to the use of individual word by the draftsman.

Why the word "citation" used in this Chap. VIII, whereas the word 'summons' is issued in s. 93 in Chap. IX, is possibly because Chap. VIII, is concerned with the purely fiscal act of collecting land revenue, which is in no sense a judicial or a quasi judicial act, and Chap. IX, is concerned with the procedure of Revenue Courts and Revenue Offices when exercising judicial or quasi judicial functions. Under Chap. VIII, the Tahsildar and the Collector are collecting revenue. They are not performing judicial functions. Under Chap. IX the Court of the Tahsildar and the Courts of the Assistant Collector and the Collector are directed to use a certain procedure in exercising judicial and quasi judicial functions. It may have been that the draftsman of the Act considered that an order to a person to appear before a Revenue Officer exercising fiscal functions was best called a citation to appear and that an order to such a person to appear before a Court exercising judicial or quasi judicial functions was best called a summons to appear. I am not in a position to decide the point and personally I consider it of very little importance. After giving full consideration to the views of the learned Judges composing the Allahabad Bench, I am unable to accept those views and accept the views of Sir Edward Chamier and Mr. Evans in the Oudh case. I, therefore, find that s. 147, when it gives a revenue official exercising fiscal functions authority to issue a citation to a defaulter to appear, gives him authority to order that person to appear, before him, and the person is obliged to appear before him if so ordered, under the penalty laid down by s. 174 of the Indian Penal Code which is in the following words:—

"Whoever, being legally bound to attend in person or by an agent at a certain place and time in obedience to a summons, notice, order or proclamation proceeding from any public servant legally competent, as such public servant, to issue the same, intentionally omits to attend at that place or time.....shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both".

These are the penalties for disobedience to obey an order of a public servant legally empowered to issue the order. The section continues that if the order comes from a Court of Justice the imprisonment may extend to six months and the fine may extend to one thousand rupees. I am satisfied that Chandrika Singh was legally bound to attend in person. I am satisfied that he intentionally omitted to attend and I consider that he was rightly convicted. I consider however that his offence was not of a serious nature and I propose that, while his conviction should be upheld, his fine should be reduced to Re. 1 and that the balance of Rs. 49, if paid by him, should be refunded.

Pullan, J.—In expressing my agreement with the judgment just delivered I have very little to add. Section 174 of the Indian Penal Code prescribes the penalty for omission to attend in obedience to a summons, notice, order or proclamation by a person who is legally bound to attend. The word "citation" is not used in the Penal Code and as far as I am aware the word had not at that time been imported into any Indian Statute. The word was introduced from the English Law in the old Indian Succession Act and Probate and Administration Act and is there used in a technical sense. These Acts have now been combined in the Indian Succession Act, XXXIX of 1925, and the word appears in ss. 235 and 283. In neither case is it used to mean an order to attend the Court or a direction to attend the Court. It gives certain parties an opportunity of attending the Court in order to put their own case before the Court and make their own claim, if they wish to do so. When the word is employed in the Land Revenue Act it has no such meaning. It undoubtedly means a direction of some kind to appear in Court and this appears to have been overlooked by their Lordships of the Allahabad High Court in the case cited. They have regarded this citation as being an invitation. If so, it is an invitation couched in unusual terms because the person invited was threatened with a prosecution under s. 174 of the Indian Penal Code, if he did not attend. I cannot myself regard this as an invitation. It was a direction to attend the Court. The word "citation" itself means a notice or a summons and it is probable that the draftsman of the Land Revenue Act was using it, not in a technical sense such as that employed in the Succession Act, but merely as a variant for a notice. The intention of the Court which issued this citation was that the man should appear and the Court was empowered to direct his appearance and, in my opinion, he was legally bound to comply with that direction. This being so I am of opinion that his failure to attend laid him open to punishment under s. 174 of the Indian Penal Code. I agree, therefore, with the view of law taken in the judgment which has just been delivered. As to the sentence I consider that the circumstances of the case do not call for severity and I agree in the proposed reduction of the fine to one rupee.

By the Court.—The order of the Court is that the conviction be maintained but that the fine be reduced to a fine of Re. 1 and that the balance Rs. 49, if already paid, be remitted to Chandrika Singh.

CRIMINAL REFERENCE No. 577 OF 1927.

Arms Act (XI of 1878), s. 22—'Delivery', meaning of—Delivery of arm for merely carrying it to licensed-holder, whether offence.

Delivery into possession contemplated by s. 22 of the Arms Act is such a delivery as to give the person into whose possession arm is delivered control over the arm and authority to use it as an arm. [p. 690, col. 2]

The licensed-holder of a gun can permit another person who is not so licensed to carry his gun. [ibid.]

A repairer of a gun who, under the directions of its licensed-holder, delivers it after repair to a person who is not licensed, for the purpose of merely carrying it to the licensed-holder is not, therefore, guilty of an offence under s. 22 of the Arms Act. [ibid.]

Criminal Reference made by the Sessions Judge, Kamaun.

ORDER OF REFERENCE.

Manzur Husain files an application in revision. The facts as found by the Magistrate are that Manzur Husain is licensed as a gunmaker. No license is required to repair arms, (vide r. 35 of the United Provinces Arms Rules and Orders). One Mohan Singh holds a license for a gun. He brought his gun to Manzur Husain for repairs, and he told Manzur Husain that when he had finished the repairs, he could return the gun either to Jagannath or to Partap Singh. He returned the gun to Partap Singh and the Sub-Inspector found it in the possession of Jagannath. Manzur Husain was accordingly run in under s. 22 of the Arms Act for delivering the gun into the possession of Partap Singh without previously ascertaining that Partap Singh was legally authorised to possess it.

I find myself unable to distinguish this case in principle from Queen-Empress v. Alexander William (1). In that case the facts were that Alexander William was carrying a gun for the purpose of having it repaired. The licensee of the gun appears to have been one Herbert Smith, and it was not stated that Alexander William was the servant of Herbert Smith. He had been convicted under s. 19 (c) of going armed. It was held that carrying arms is not an offence under s. 19 (c) unless there is an intention to use the arms.

In Queen-Empress v. Bhure (2) it was said, commenting on Alexander William's case (1), that he was not carrying a gun but a parcel.

Similarly in Emperor v. Harpal Rai (3) the facts were that Harpal Rai was sent with a pistol for repairs. He was convicted of going armed, and he was acquitted.

It is thus settled law that any person duly authorised by the licensee can carry arms to a shop for the purpose of repair. The question is whether this principle ought to be extended so as to lay down that the repairer may hand a gun to any person authorised by licensee to take it, without committing an offence under s. 22 of the Arms Act. A remark in Harpal Rai's case (3) suggests that there is a distinction between a gun which requires repair and, therefore, cannot be used, and a gun which has been repaired and is, therefore, an effective weapon. But I do not think that Alexander William's case proceeded on any such distinction. It seems reasonable that the owner of a gun, whose time may be valuable, should be able to send his servant to get the gun back after it has been repaired, and it was laid down in Harpal Rai's case (3) that no distinction ought to be drawn between a servant and a friend who is willing to perform service for the licensee. As far as the repairer is concerned, the essential matter seems to be that he should hand over the gun either to the licensee himself or a person authorised by the licensee who will, the repairer believes, immediately take the weapon back and give it to the licensee.

Therefore, from the facts of the present case, it would appear that the conviction is wrong. As the point of law involved is one of some importance, I propose to forward the record to the High Court with a recommendation that the conviction be quashed. But before doing so, the record will be sent, in the usual way, to the Magistrate for any explanation he may have to offer.

Mr. M. A. Aziz, for the Applicant.

The Assistant Government Advocate, for the Crown.

ORDER.—The learned Judge has explained the law on the subject in his Order of Reference and I agree with him. The applicant Manzur Husain is a licensed gunmaker and a certain gun was made over to him by Mohan Singh a licensed-holder to repair. Mohan Singh's direction was that after the gun was repaired, it may be made over either to Jagannath or to Partap Singh to bring over to Mohan Singh. The gun was repaired, and made over to both the persons authorised by the licensed-holder. Jagannath was carrying the gun and Partap Singh following him when a Police Officer arrested Jagannath with the gun and learning that he had obtained it from the applicant Manzur Husain, prosecuted the applicant under s. 22 of the Arms Act. The trial Court of a Magistrate recorded a conviction. The learned Judge has quoted cases in support of his view that delivery into possession contemplated by s. 22 of the Arms Act was such a delivery as to give the person into whose possession arm is delivered control over the arm and authority to use it as an arm. Manzur Husain made over the gun to Jagannath merely to carry it to its owner and not with any authority to use it as an arm. Even if Jagannath had misused his privilege and used the gun instead of carrying it to Mohan Singh, Jagannath would have been liable for unlicensed possession of the gun and not Manzur Husain under s. 22 of the Arms Act. A licensed-holder of a gun can permit another person who is not so licensed to carry his gun. The permission of the licensed-holder to Jagannath to carry the gun is proved and Manzur Husain was merely acting under the directions of the licensed-holder.

GOVERNMENT APPEAL NO. 2 OF 1927.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), ss. 143, 441—Criminal trespass—Unlawful continuance of occupation after unlawful entry, whether punishable—True owner's right to eject trespasser—Resistance to true owner—Offence—Person entering with permission of trespasser, liability of—Assembly to enforce right to possession by criminal force—Unlawful assembly—Liability of members of assembly.

A mere trespasser cannot, by the very act of trespass, immediately and without acquiescence, give himself possession, in the legal sense of the term, against the person whom he ejects, and the latter may, if he does not acquiesce, re-enter and restate himself provided he does not use more force than is necessary. Such a re-entry will be viewed only as a resistance to an intrusion upon a possession which had never been lost. [p. 692, col. 2; p. 693, col. 1.]

Browne v. Dawson (1), relied on.

The continuance in possession of the trespasser is a recurring wrong and constitutes a new entry every time that the true owner goes upon the land or as near to it as he dares, to make a claim to it. There is a fresh cause of action each time he is resisted although the point from which limitation will run may depend on the express provisions of the Law of Limitation. [p. 693, col. 1.]

Where an unlawful entry is followed by an unlawful continuance of occupation each time that the true owner goes upon the land or makes a claim under circumstances sufficient in law to constitute re-entry and the trespasser opposes him with the intention required by s. 441 of the Penal Code, a new offence under that section is committed and a new liability arises. [p. 693, col. 2.]

A person who unlawfully enters upon the property of another with the intention specified in s. 441 of the Penal Code can be convicted of the offence of criminal trespass even though he enters with the permission of another trespasser who has already unlawfully entered and occupied the property, where the owner has not acquiesced in the possession of the latter. [ibid.]

Even assuming that trespassers have a right to possession after they have once unlawfully entered, they will be guilty under s. 143 of the Penal Code, if they, being more than five in number, enforce that right by means of criminal force. [p. 694, col. 1.]

Government appeal against a decision of the Sessions Judge, Gaya, dated the 5th February, 1927, overruling that of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, Nawadah, dated the 20th December, 1926.

JUDGMENT.

Mullick, A. C. J.—This is an appeal by Government against the acquittal of eleven persons who were charged before the Sub-Divisional Magistrate of Nawadah with offences under ss. 143 and 452 of the Indian Penal Code. Sixteen persons were placed on their trial before the Sub-Divisional Magistrate who acquitted five and convicted the remainder sentencing the respondents Jhaman, Kesho, Bhola and Bandhu to six months' rigorous imprisonment and Akhal, Bhattan Kahar, Ganga Ram, Chakauri, Mahadeo, Canu and Hardeyal to three months' rigorous imprisonment each under s. 143 of the Indian Penal Code; no separate sentences were passed under s. 452 of the Indian Penal Code.

The occurrence arose out of a dispute relating to the property of Rai Jai Mangal Prasad Sahi who died in October, 1920, leaving a Will by which he appointed his Dewan Bundi Lal and others as trustees for the administration of his estate. He appears to have had strong religious convictions and to have dedicated all his immoveable property comprising several mauzas to certain Hindu deities giving by his Will directions to his trustees for the administration of the trust. The Probate of the Will was resisted by the testator's heirs; but the trustees finally succeeded in July, 1922.

On the 23th February, 1923, the Sub-Divisional Magistrate of Nawadah found that the heirs who in these proceedings have been styled as the Sahis were in possession and he directed the trustees under s. 107 of the Code of Criminal Procedure to give security to keep the peace. The trustees then applied for registration in the Land Registration Court, and after a reference to the District Judge under s. 55 of the Land Registration Act the question of possession was decided in their favour and delivery of possession was made by the bailiff of the Civil Court with the aid of the Military Police on the 8th September, 1923.

It has been found by the learned Sub-Divisional Magistrate that thereafter the trustees remained in undisturbed possession till July, 1926.

But on the 26th June, 1926, the Sahis filed a civil suit for declaration of title and possession. The plaint thereof was returned for want of adequate Court-fee and a review application is now pending against the Civil Court's order. Next, on the 1st July, the trustees, apprehending trouble, applied for Police assistance and two constables were sent to the zemindari kutcherry at Singer, commonly called Singer Garh (Singer Fort).

On the 10th July, notwithstanding the presence of the Constables, about 100 men belonging to the Sahis forced their way into the kutcherry and took possession with violence and turned out the servants of the trustees who were in possession.

An information was lodged before the Police and some of the trespassers have been convicted.

Next, on the 12th July an attack was made by the Sahis at a place called Chotha.

Next, on the 25th July, Kashi Singh, a peon in the service of the trustees, went to the Singer kutcherry to see whether the Sahis were still there. He found a large number of men armed with lathis who threatened to beat him. He then retired and in Mauza Chotha he met the Superintendent of Police with an Inspector and a Sub-Inspector. He laid an information and returned with the Police to the Garh. The Police found the main door locked from the outside and 4 or 5 men armed with lathis on guard. The voices of a large number were heard inside the kutcherry and those outside declined to allow Kashi or his fellow servants to enter and the respondent Ganga Ram threatened to murder Kashi's companion Bishun Lal. Thereupon under the orders of the Superintendent of Police Bandhu Nepali, Akal Dusadh, Ganga Ram, Chotu and Bhattan Ram were arrested and taken away. As the Superintendent of Police had only six armed constables with him he did not consider it safe to arrest those inside the kutcherry. But he returned on the 27th July with a large force and arrested the other respondents and some others. He found them inside the "garh" where a large number of lathis and a large quantity of brickbats were being stored.

The respondents have been charged with having between the 10th and the 27th July been members of an unlawful assembly the common object of which was to commit the offence of house trespass.

They have also been charged with having between the 10th and the 27th July committed house trespass by entering into Singer Garh which was in the possession of the trustees after having made preparations for causing hurt to the employees of the trustees.

On appeal the learned Sessions Judge of Gaya has found that on the Sahis having obtained possession of the kutcherry on the 10th July the respondents could not be convicted of committing criminal house trespass between the 10th and the 25th July by being in possession under the orders of or with the leave of those who entered on the 10th July.

He has also held that as the offence of criminal house trespass could not be committed, the common object charged did not exist and, therefore, there could be no conviction under s. 143 of the Indian Penal Code. He has, therefore, acquitted all the respondents.

The learned Sessions Judge finds, and I think there can be no doubt about it, that the trustees were in possession till the 10th July and that on that date their men were forcibly ejected by the employees of the Sahis among whom were the respondents Bhuttan Kahar and Chakauri.

The date when the respondents other than those two men entered the kutcherry has not been found by either Court. But they both seem to be of opinion that it was sometime after the 10th and before the 27th and that such entry was made with the leave and license or under the orders of the Sahis. I will accept that position.

Now the first question to be decided is who was in possession on the 25th and 27th July.

In my opinion it is quite clear that the trustees were in possession. "A mere trespasser" said Lord Denman, "cannot, by the very act of trespass, immediately and without acquiescence, give himself what the law understands by possession against the person whom he ejects, and drive him to produce his title if he can, without delay; reinstate himself in his former possession." [Browne v. Dawson (1)]. It depends on the facts in each case what can be considered to be reasonable delay.

(1) (1840) 12 A. & E. 624; 4 P. & D. 355; 10 L. J. Q. B. 7; 113 E. R. 950.

The owner may, if he does not acquiesce, re-enter upon the land and reinstate himself provided he does not use more force than is necessary. He must not commit a breach of the peace so as to render himself liable for an indictment under the Statutes of forcible entry and this entry will be viewed as a resistance to an intrusion upon a possession which he had never lost.

Therefore, possession being with him, he may, in India, prosecute the intruder for committing criminal trespass within the meaning of s. 441 of the Indian Penal Code provided the necessary intention exists and he may also if he secures a conviction apply to the Court for the ejectment of the intruder under s. 522 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

He may also resort to the preventive sections of the Code of Criminal Procedure, namely, ss. 107 and 145 of that Code.

If he takes the risk of a forcible entry and uses more violence than is necessary he will not be able to plead the right of private defence; but he cannot be sued by the trespasser who has entered by force or fraud either for recovery of possession under s. 9 of the Specific Relief Act or for ejectment upon the strength of his temporary prior possession. Section 9 requires legal possession and the owner who re-enters without delay has in law never lost possession. And when two persons are on a field each claiming it, he who has title is in law deemed to be in possession.

If the true owner acquiesces or acts otherwise, so that legal possession vests in the trespasser, then he must resort to the Civil Court and bring a suit either under s. 9 or in ejectment, or in trespass for damages. The continuance in possession of the trespasser is a recurring wrong and constitutes a new entry every time that the true owner goes upon the land or as near to it as he dares, to make a claim to it. There is a fresh cause of action each time he is resisted although the point from which limitation will run may depend on the express provisions of the Law of Limitation. This, I think, is the law both in India and England.

Now what is the position of a trespasser who has been convicted of an offence under s. 447 of the Indian Penal Code if he continues to remain on the land after a forcible entry against the true owner,

In England the Statutes of Forcible Entry provide punishment for forcible entry "with a strong hand or with multitude of people" even when the intruder has a right. They also make forcible detainer a substantive offence if proceeded by a forcible entry. Thirdly, they make forcible detainer after peaceable entry an offence (5 Richard II, Chap. VII; 15 Richard II, Chap. II; 8 Henry VI, Chap. IX). In my opinion s. 441 of the Indian Penal Code substantially reproduces the English Law. It provides that if the trespasser having entered lawfully remains unlawfully on the property with intent to annoy he will be said to commit criminal trespass. In my opinion no less punishable is an unlawful entry followed by an unlawful continuance of occupation. It may be said that the intruder or trespasser pays the penalty once for all upon conviction for the act of entry and that he cannot be again punished for continuance of occupation. I think the answer to this is that each time that the true owner goes upon the land or makes a claim under circumstances sufficient in law to constitute re-entry and the trespasser opposes him with the intention required by s. 441 a new offence under that section is committed and a new liability arises.

In this view of the case the respondents Bhattan Kahar and Chakauri who have already been convicted for trespass upon the kutcherry on the 10th July are again liable to conviction for having resisted the owner between that date and the 27th July.

Much more so are the other respondents liable to conviction for an entry subsequent to that date and it makes no difference that they entered with the permission of those who first occupied the kutcherry on the 10th.

The discovery of the lathis and the brickbats in the kutcherry is sufficient proof of the intention to annoy the trustees and there is also clear evidence of their threatening behaviour both on the 25th and the 27th. On both these dates the resistance offered to Kashi Singh was a dispossession in law. I fully believe the evidence of the witnesses for the prosecution as to the behaviour of the respective respondents on the 25th and 27th. There can be no doubt that their conduct even in the presence of the Police indicated an intention to annoy and intimidate.

The conviction under s. 452 of the Indian Penal Code, therefore, must be upheld.

With regard to the convictions under s. 143 of the Indian Penal Code the case is still clearer:

Assuming that the petitioners had a right to possession on the 25th and 27th, which, in my opinion, they had not, they committed an offence under s. 143 of the Indian Penal Code by enforcing that right by means of criminal force. They were members of an unlawful assembly within the meaning of s. 141 of the Indian Penal Code the common object being to enforce that right in a tumultuous and forcible manner.

It is true that this is not the common object charged and if we had taken a different view of the question of possession it might have been necessary to amend the charge.

But as I think that possession was with the trustees and the conviction under s. 452 of the Indian Penal Code was correct, I must also hold that there was no error in stating the common object to be to commit an offence under that section. In my opinion, the learned Sub-Divisional Magistrate was right in convicting the petitioners of an offence under s. 143 of the Indian Penal Code.

The sentences passed by the learned Magistrate were not unduly severe and being satisfied that the learned Sessions Judge has taken an erroneous view of the law I set aside the order of acquittal passed by him and restore the convictions and sentences entered and passed by the Sub-Divisional Magistrate. The District Magistrate will take the necessary steps to secure the arrest of the respondents and their re-commitment to proper custody.

Wort, J.—I agree.

"Quashing of proceedings" is a term of compendious connotation and the practical result of quashing is the setting aside or reversal of the order initiating the proceedings. This power is vested in the High Court under s. 439 read with cl. (1) of s. 423, Criminal Procedure Code. [p. 695, col. 2.]

The language of s. 561-A, Criminal Procedure Code, is wide and comprehensive and the High Court has jurisdiction to pass an order to set aside proceedings in a subordinate Court if the proceedings constitute an abuse of the process of the Court. [ibid.]

Any Single Judge of the Chief Court can exercise the jurisdiction which is conferred on a High Court by s. 561-A of the Criminal Procedure Code. [p. 696, col. 1.]

Though the limits of the jurisdiction under s. 561-A, Criminal Procedure Code, are very wide, yet as a rule of practice it will be exercised in exceptional cases only. [ibid.]

Sanction to prosecute certain officers of a Company was granted to the official liquidator on the 18th November, 1924. The official liquidator subsequently applied for public examination and for proceedings against them under s. 235 of the Companies Act. The Court declined to take proceedings until particulars of the charges against the officers were given. The official liquidator did not supply the particulars but filed a complaint against the officers in the Criminal Court on the 8th March, 1927, in pursuance of the sanction of 1924:

Held, that the conduct of the official liquidator in disregarding the order of the Court to specify the particulars of the charges, and making a complaint during the pendency of proceedings under s. 235 of the Companies Act was a clear attempt to divest the Court of its jurisdiction possessed under s. 237 of the Act, and that the High Court had power under s. 561-A of the Criminal Procedure Code to quash the criminal proceedings instituted against the officers. [p. 697, col. 2; p. 698, col. 1.]

Application under ss. 196 and 235 of the Companies Act (Act VII of 1913).

Mr. S. D. Saksena with him Mr. Harish Chandra who appears for Brij Bahadur Srivastava, Mahabir Sharma and Radhe Saran.

Mr. Ghulam Hasan for Balgovind and Jagmohan Lal.

Mr. H. N. Misra, for Jai Lal.

Mr. S. N. Roy, for Mr. S. C. Mittra, Liquidator.

Mr. J. Jackson for Captain Oursetji.

ORDER.—Sajjad Husain, Oursetji, Madho Narain Shukla, Brij Bahadur, Swami Dial Saksena and Mahabir Sharma have made applications in writing to this Court and during the progress of the hearing of those applications the following persons also appeared and made oral applications:—

1. Jai Lal, 2. E. A. Labanti, 3. Brijmohan Lal, 4. Balgobind, 5. Jiwan Nath Hukku, 6. Pura Chaud Kapur, 7. K. O. Bhalla, 8. Chaudhri Ram Narain, 9. Jagmohan Lal, 10. Radhe Saran and 11. Lal Bahadur.

The prayer of these applications both in writing and oral invokes the jurisdiction of the Court with which it is vested under the provisions of ss. 439 and 561-A of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898. The basic foundation is proceedings under the Indian Companies Act, 1913, taken by me in the matter of the liquidation of the United India Industrial Trust, Limited. The applications have, therefore, been entrusted to me by the Hon'ble the Chief Judge for disposal.

On the 8th of March, 1927, Mr. S. C. Mittra, who was appointed official liquidator of the Company mentioned above under the order dated the 30th of September, 1924, of the late Court of the Judicial Commissioner of Oudh, presented a complaint to the District Magistrate of Lucknow charging the persons mentioned above and Sri Krishna, P. D. Gaur, Madan Mohan Lal Bhatnagar and Chandra Bhan Shukla with offences punishable under ss. 120 B, 409 and 420 of the Indian Penal Code. The learned District Magistrate thereupon transferred the complaint to the Court of the City Magistrate of Lucknow for trial. The applicants are accordingly being prosecuted in the Court of the City Magistrate for the offences just now mentioned. Except some evidence under s. 202 of the Code of Criminal Procedure no evidence has so far been recorded in the Magistrate's Court mainly for the reason that the proceedings therein were stayed by an ad interim order of this Court.

The substance of the prayer of these applicants is that the criminal proceedings pending against them in the Court of the City Magistrate be quashed. I have no doubt that this Court has jurisdiction to quash the proceedings in the exercise of its powers conferred by s. 439 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. I was entertained at the Bar with the argument that the Code of Criminal Procedure does not provide for any "quashing of proceedings" of a subordinate Court by the High Court. The argument, it seems to me, is a piece of pure pedantry. The word "quash" is not a banned word—see ss. 215 and 232, Criminal Procedure Code. "Quashing of Proceedings" is a term of compendious connotation and the practical result is the setting aside or reversal of the order initiating the proceedings. The power of so doing is clearly vested in the High Court under s. 439 read with cl. (c) of sub-s. (1) of s. 423 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. Section 439 in terms says that the High Court may, in its discretion, exercise any of the powers conferred on a Court of Appeal by s. 423. Clause (c) mentioned above is as follows:—

"In an appeal from any other order, alter or reverse such order."

The power under cl. (c), therefore, is the power of altering or reversing an order. Clause (d) also gives jurisdiction to make any consequential or incidental order that may be just or proper.

The Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, has recently been amended by s. 156 of the Code of Criminal Procedure (Amendment Act), 1923. This amendment has introduced a new section in the Code. Section 561-A is the new section and is as follows:

"561-A. Nothing in this Code shall be deemed to limit or affect the inherent power of the High Court to make such orders as may be necessary to give effect to any order under this Code, or prevent abuse of the process of any Court or otherwise to secure the ends of justice."

The language of the new section is wide and comprehensive. According to that section the High Court has inherent jurisdiction to make an order as may be necessary to prevent abuse of the process of any Court or otherwise to secure the ends of justice. There can be no doubt that criminal proceedings in a subordinate Court constitute process of the Court and if the High Court comes to the conclusion that the process is being abused the new law invests the Court with the jurisdiction of passing an order to set aside those proceedings so as to prevent the abuse. Reference in this connection may be made to a decision of three Judges in Nripendra Bhusan Ray v. Gobinda Bandhu Majumdar (1). This Court has never been driven off that jurisdiction and has frequently exercised it. The case of Parakh v. Emperor (2) decided by the Hon'ble Sir Louis Stuart, C.J., is a recent illustration.

Having reached to the conclusion that the High Court has jurisdiction it follows that any Single Judge of this Court can exercise the said jurisdiction. "High Court" according to the definition in cl. (j) of s. 4 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, means the highest Court of Criminal Appeal or Revision for any local area. According to s. 9 of the Oudh Courts Act, 1925, the Chief Court shall be the highest Court of Criminal Appeal and Revision and according to s. 10 of the same Act the jurisdiction of the Chief Court may be exercised by a Single Judge of the Court. Besides this the Chief Court of Oudh is expressly included in the definition of a 'High Court' in cl. (j) of s. 4 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

The limits of the jurisdiction are very wide indeed as the language employed by the Legislature in enacting ss. 439 and 561-A of the Code of Criminal Procedure shows; but though the jurisdiction exists and is wide in its scope it is a rule of practice that it will only be exercised in exceptional cases. I have come to the conclusion that the case before me is exceptional in its nature and that I should exercise my jurisdiction in respect thereof.

The circumstances are as follows:—

The United India Industrial Trust Ltd. was put under compulsory liquidation under an order dated the 30th of September, 1924, of the late Court of the Judicial Commissioner of Oudh and as already stated Mr. S. C. Mittra was appointed official liquidator. Among other things the "official liquidator shall have power, with the sanction of the Court to institute any criminal prosecution in the name and on behalf of the Company"—(s. 179 of the Indian Companies Act, 1913). One of the arguments in the case is that the official liquidator not having obtained the sanction of the Court has acted ultra vires of his powers in instituting criminal prosecution mentioned above. In reply to this argument the official liquidator shows an order of the 18th of November, 1924, of the late Court of the Judicial Commissioner of Oudh granting him sanction to institute a criminal prosecution. It is contended on behalf of the applicants that the sanction purporting to have been granted by the order of the 18th of November, 1924, is not enough in law and that it should be specific as to the charge for and as to the person against whom it is granted.

Having regard to the opinion which I have formed as to the merits of the case after protracted hearing and prolonged consideration, I do not think it is necessary to decide this pure question of law and I decline to do so. The fact remains that the sanction which the official liquidator obtained under the order of the 18th of November, 1924, was not availed of until after circumstances grave in their character and which have a serious bearing on the case had come to happen as I shall presently state.

On the 3rd of January, 1925, the official liquidator through his Counsel, Mr. S. N. Roy, made an application under s. 196 of the Indian Companies Act, 1913, for the public examination of 11 persons connected with the Company under liquidation. Their names are as follows:—

1. P. D. Gour, 2. Sri Krishna, 3. E. A. Labanti, 4. Balgobind, 5. J. N. Mukerji, 6. Ram Narain, 7. Jai Lal, 8. K. O. Bhalla, 9. N. K. Shavakshaw, 10. Puran Chand and 11. K. S. Sajjad Hussain.

On the 11th of February, 1925, a Bench of the late Court of the Judicial Commissioner of Oudh consisting of Mr. (Now Mr. Justice) Dalal and myself passed an order that the official liquidator should file a list of questions which he desires to be answered by the persons mentioned in his application. When those questions are placed before the Court then the Court shall decide whether they should be served on those persons or whether they should be summoned to appear in Court for open examination. One month's time was allowed to the liquidator to comply with this order. Afterwards the time was extended on several occasions. Finally on the 16th of September, 1925, I ordered issue of summonses for public examination under s. 196 of the Indian Companies Act, 1913, to the following persons:—

1. P. D. Gour, 2. Sri Krishna, 3 E. A. Labanti, 4. Balgobind, 5. K. C. Bhalla, and 6. N. K. Shavakshaw.

In pursuance of the above order E. A. Labanti, Balgobind and one other person with whom we are not concerned were examined in open Court on the 25th of January, 1926. On the 16th of September, 1926, the official liquidator made another application. In this application he repeated the prayer for summonses for public examination of certain officers of the Company and also "that the opposite parties or such of them as may be found to be liable for having misappropriated or misapplied the funds of the Company be ordered to make good the sums misappropriated or misapplied by them." This last-mentioned prayer was in accordance with the provisions of s. 235 of the Indian Companies Act. On the 28th of September, 1926, the order made by the Court on the application just now mentioned was as follows: "I order the liquidator to state particulars of charge under s. 235 of the Indian Companies Act as against each of such persons and to support that statement by affidavit. Until this is not done I decline to issue summonses. 15 days' time is allowed for this purpose".

The time granted under this order was subsequently extended on the application of the official liquidator. In spite of this the order was never complied with. Had it been complied with the procedure according to the provisions of the Indian Companies Act would have been the institution of proceedings under s. 235 and on the determination of those proceedings the Court would then have proceeded under s. 237 of the Indian Companies Act to inquire as to whether "any past or present director, manager, officer or member of the Company has been guilty of any offence in relation to the Company for which he is criminally responsible". In the event of the inquiry yielding result in the affirmative the Court would have directed "the official liquidator to prosecute for the offence." Instead of complying with the order of the Court and allowing the law to take its normal course the official liquidator institutes the criminal complaint mentioned above.

The file of the criminal case is before me. It shows no trace of any intimation having been conveyed to the District Magistrate of the fact that proceedings under s. 235 of the Indian Companies Act which may result in criminal prosecution under s. 237 of the same Act were pending in this Court. The official liquidator and his Counsel both stated before me that no such information was given to the District Magistrate. I am convinced that had this information been given to the District Magistrate he would certainly have awaited the result of the impending inquiry in proceedings before this Court. Be that as it may, the conduct of the official liquidator in disregarding the order of the 28th of September, 1926, and making the criminal complaint during the pendency of the proceedings in this Court is a clear attempt to divest this Court of its jurisdiction possessed under s. 237 of the Indian Companies Act. For reasons of public policy the High Court cannot permit such an attempt to succeed. This, therefore, reveals the exceptional nature of this case.

The principle upon which I propose to act in this case was enunciated by Buckley, J., (afterwards Lord Justice Buckley) in In re London and Globe Finance Corporation, Limited (3). That was a converse case where the Crown had refused to institute a criminal prosecution and Buckley, J., proceeded to act under s. 167 of the Companies Act, 1862, (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89). (This section is the same as s. 237 of the Indian Companies Act, 1913); and ordered the Official Receiver to institute a criminal prosecution. He said: "Under these circumstances it seems to me that I ought not to allow my judgment to be influenced even by the fact that the highest authority at the Bar, and the first law officer of the Crown, has thought proper to decline to put the public prosecutor in motion. I must accept the responsibility of determining the question before me for myself".

Therefore I have heard arguments on the merits of the case of these applicants for five days. Documentary evidence in possession of the liquidator and in possession of the several applicants was read to me in the course of the arguments. On behalf of the official liquidator statements of witnesses whom he proposes to produce in support of the criminal prosecution were also read and the conclusion at which I have arrived will now be stated.

Having regard to the criminal prosecution now pending in the Court of the City Magistrate of Lucknow it will not be in the interest of justice that I should state my reasons for quashing this prosecution in favour of some and allowing it to continue as against others but this is the conclusion at which I have reached. I accordingly quash or set aside the pending prosecution against the following persons:—

1. K. S. Sajjad Husain, 2. Cursetji, 3. Ram Narain, 4. Madho Narain Shukla, 5. Swami Dayal Saksena, 6. Mahabir Sharma, 7. Lal Bahadur Mathur and 8. Jiwan Nath Hukku.

I further direct that the said criminal prosecution shall proceed in accordance with law against the following persons:—

1. Sri Krishna, 2. Balgobind Rastogi, 3. E. A. Labanti, 4. Jagmohan Lal Rastogi, 5. Jai Lal, 6. P. D. Gour, 7. K. O. Bhalla, 8. Brij Bahadur Srivastava, 9. Brij Mohan Lal, 10. Chandra Bhan Shukla, 11. Puran Chand, 12. Madan Mohan Lal Bhatnagar and 13. Radhe Saran Agarwal.

This order should at once be communicated to the City Magistrate, Lucknow, for compliance.

Appeal from a decision of the Sessions Judge, Muzaffarpur, dated the 2nd April, 1927.

Mr. B. C. De, for the Appellant.

Mr. C. M. Agarwala, Assistant Government Advocate, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.

Mullick, A. C. J.—This case comes before us on a reference under s. 374 of the Code of Criminal Procedure by the Sessions Judge of Muzaffarpur and also on appeal by the prisoner Lalji Dusadh alias Lalji Mallah.

The appellant is alleged to have robbed and killed a young man named Abdul about 8 p. m. on the 9th November, 1926. For the robbery he was charged under ss. 392 and 397 of the Indian Penal Code and tried by a Jury of five. For the offence of murder he was charged under s. 302 of the Indian Penal Code and tried by the Sessions Judge with the help of the above Jurors sitting as Assessors.

The unanimous verdict of the Jurors in the trial for the offences under ss. 392 and 397 was that the appellant was guilty. The opinion of the Assessors on the charge of murder was to the same effect.

The learned Sessions Judge, agreeing with the Assessors, has sentenced the appellant to death for the offence of murder. Agreeing with the Jurors he has also found the appellant guilty of the offences under ss. 392 and 397 but he has passed no separate sentence.

The appellant is thirty years of age. His home was in Mauza Mushari in the District of Muzaffarpur and he belonged by birth to the Mallah caste. About two years before the murder he was outcasted in consequence of an intrigue with a Dusadh woman named Kanchania who lived in Mauza Madhopur in the same District and he became a Dusadh. He lived with her for two or three months in Madhopur and then emigrated to the District of Dinajpur taking her with him and one infant child. Later his mother joined him with his other child and thereafter for 5 or 6 months in 1926 he worked as a labourer in the service of one Anjor Sahai in Mauza Nashipur in the District of Dinajpur.

The deceased Abdul was twenty-five at the time of his death. He came to Dinajpur when he was quite a child and worked there for about twenty years. He was a Goala by caste and the name given to him by his parents was Munia, but he became a Mussulman later on and took the name of Abdul. He lived at Nashipur and worked first as a grass-cutter and then as an agricultural labourer.

On the 8th November Lalji with his wife, mother and two children started from Dinajpur for Madhopur. Abdul accompanied them and the evidence is that Lalji told him that he would get him married as he had no wife. At about 11 A. M. on the 9th the party arrived at Shekra Station which is ten miles from Madhopur. There was some trouble about Abdul's ticket. Apparently it could not be found and the result was that he had to leave his bundle behind containing some brass utensils, a chaddar, some clothes and some rice.

We have no evidence as to the subsequent movements of Abdul till about 9 P. M. when he arrived bleeding from several wounds on the head and body at the bathan (cattle pen) of Hitan Missir of Salaha which is about one mile from Madhopur. Adhin Goala, who has a neighbouring bathan and had come out to feed his cattle, saw Abdul go and sit in Hitan Missir's bathan. Adhin's cries brought Hitan Missir to the bathan. The chaukidar Chauhuddi was next fetched and other people came. Whether Abdul was able to make any coherent statement is a matter of controversy in this case and will be discussed later. The President Panch, Ramphal Tiwari, was then fetched and drew up a short report which he handed over to Chauhuddi. Chauhuddi arrived at the Muzaffarpur Police Station at 7 A. M. on the 10th and laid an information before the Writer Head Constable, Sudhist Narayan Singh, who was in charge. The Head Constable arrived at Salaha about 8 A. M. and found that Abdul was dead. He sent the body to Muzaffarpur for post mortem examination and was engaged the whole day in making investigations.

On the bank of a circular piece of water called a "man" 250 paces from the bathan of Hitan Missir, the Head Constable found large patches of blood and a bundle containing two nets, some cotton thread, a pen-knife, a razor, a medicine bottle and a dhoti. Near the bundle was a small stick made of jute wood. It is in evidence that the nets belonged to the appellant Lalji.

On the 11th November, the Sub-Inspector of Muzaffarpur took charge of the case and the appellant was arrested about 1-30 P. M. In consequence of a statement made by him, his wife Kanchania delivered up to the Sub-Inspector Rs. 39 and gold coin of the Muhammadan period in India which she was carrying upon her person. Also in consequence of information given by the appellant the "man" was searched, and in water about thigh deep a heavy hasua was found.

On the 13th the appellant was produced from Jail before a Deputy Magistrate at Muzaffarpur in order that his confession might be recorded. The appellant, however, did not make a confession but he made an exculpatory statement in which he admitted that he had come with Abdul to Shakra and had then walked with him as far as the village of Titra (four miles from Shakra) where he had parted company with him. According to the appellant Abdul said that he was going to Muzaffarpur but it does not appear that Abdul had any home of his own at Muzaffarpur. The appellant says his mother halted on the 9th November in the house of a Dusadh at Titra. Where he and his wife slept on the night of the 9th there is nothing to show, but on the 10th Abdul says he slept at the house of Sirtaj Singh of Madhopur.

It appears that the Police found Kanchania in the house of her father at Madhopur on the 11th and, on information given by her, Lalji was found in a kharour (field of high grass) in Madhopur about half a mile or a mile from that house.

I do not think that there is any reason for doubting that the deceased Abdul came with Lalji from Dinajpur where they had been working together and that he was last seen in his usual health at Shakra Station about 11 A. M. on the 9th November.

The "man" on the bank of which the blood was found is on the way from Shakra Station to Madhopur. It is on the boundary between Mauzas Baikutpur and Salaha and is about one mile from the house of Kanchania's father. It is 6 or 7 miles from Shakra and 2 or 3 miles from Titra where the appellant says he halted for a little time with Abdul. There are no houses anywhere near. The blood on the ground has by analysis been found to be human.

The witnesses Adhin and Hitan who next saw Abdul live in Salaha. Those who came afterwards live either in Salaha or Baikutpur or Madhopur.

Girdhari and Anjor, the two Dinajpur witnesses, identified as Lalji's the two nets found in the bundle which was discovered near the blood patches on the bank of the 'man'. It may be said that one cannot rely on this identification as there do not appear to be any special marks, but, on the other hand, the accused was originally a fisherman by caste and would be expected to know how to make nets and there is nothing to show that the two Dinajpur witnesses are deposing falsely. Girdhari and Anjor also establish that the gold coin handed over to the Police on the 11th by Kanchania belonged to Abdul. It is an old Badshahi coin and not likely to be easily mistaken. Girdhari deposes that Abdul told him that he had bought it from a man called Kalhu Nonia for Rs. 26 and that he wanted to sell it; also that he had bought it to have it threaded to wear round his neck. Anjor also identifies the coin. The man Kalhu Nonia from whom the coin is alleged to have been bought has not been found. With regard to the hasua found in the "man" on the 11th both Girdhari and Anjor identify it as the appellant's. They say that, although it is an ordinary hasua, they recognize it by the handle and by the blade and that Lalji used to cut bamboos with it in Dinajpur. It is a heavy weapon and capable of causing the injuries from which Abdul died.

These injuries were five severe wounds on the head and two slight wounds on the right shoulder. The Civil Surgeon deposes that death was due to shock and hæmorrhage caused by the wounds, especially those which caused the fracture of the skull.

Except the statement of the deceased which is alleged to have been recorded by the President Panch, Ramphal Tiwari, there is nothing to show where the deceased lived. In this statement it is recorded that he stated that his home was at Madhbalia, Thana Masrakh, District Chapra. If that is correct, then Shakra was not the station where Abdul would, in the ordinary course, have alighted and there is no reason why he should have gone to Muzaffarpur. It will be remembered that the appellant in his statement before the Magistrate on the 13th November said that he last saw Abdul in Titra when Abdul said that he was going to Muzaffarpur. I think this statement is only partially correct and that Abdul was with him up to the time of the assault. There is no evidence to show where the appellant spent the night of the 9th and I think the prosecution might with advantage have called Kanchania even though she is the appellant's wife. The appellant stated in his statement before the Committing Magistrate on the 22nd December, 1926, that he went to Sirtaj Singh on the 10th. This man might also with advantage have been called and so also Ramdhani, the father of Kanchania. If the prosecution did not consider that these witnesses could be relied upon to speak the truth, they should have asked the Court to examine them and the witnesses could have been cross-examined by both sides.

The trial was also defective in another respect. I find that the inquest report which the Writer Head Constable drew up immediately on arrival at the bathan of Hitan Missir states that the name of the deceased was not known. As the evidence given in Court is that before he died the deceased gave his name, his father's name and his address to the President Panch, the Writer Head Constable should have been asked the reason for the omission in the inquest report. He should also have been asked why, if it was known then that Lalji was the man who had committed the murder, no attempt was made to arrest him on that day. The Writer Head Constable appears to have been very active in examining witnesses in the neighbouring mauzas, for he deposes that he did not return to Muzaffarpur till midnight. The prosecution should also have given evidence as to when the Dinajpur witnesses were examined for the first time by the Police so as to show that the dying declaration alleged to have been made by Abdul could not have been fabricated to accord with any information obtained from these witnesses.

The above omissions on the part of the prosecution have thrown considerable doubt upon the genuineness of the dying declaration made by the deceased and the learned Judge has not relied upon any of them; but I think there is internal evidence to show that the witnesses who depose to them are not intentionally giving false evidence. In the first place none of them are men of the appellant's caste. It is contended that the appellant had to leave his village because he had become a Dusadh and had formed an intrigue with Kanchania; but that did not affect men like Adhin Gope, Hitan Missir, Chauhuddi Gope, Dwarka Gope, Pirthi Kandu, Jag Lal Koeri, Bishundeo Missir, Nabu chaukidar (a Mussulman) and the President Panch, Ramphal Tiwari.

Adhin and Hitan who were the first to question the deceased, depose that Lalji's name was mentioned then; but Chauhuddi chaukidar does not support this and in his information at the Police Station he does not mention Lalji at all but merely states that the deceased had said that he had been attacked by his companion who had snatched away his necklace. The learned Judge has explained to the Jury and the Assessors that probably Adhin and Hitan were speaking from inferences drawn from facts subsequently ascertained and were actuated by a mistaken zeal in the cause of public justice.

We know that Chauhuddi was at the Thana at 7 o'clock in the morning of the 10th so that he must have left home at the latest about 3 o'clock. He says in his first information that the President gave him the report at 11 P. M.; but he must have got it earlier because the President deposes that the second statement was made about half an hour after the first and in this document the President writes that it was recorded after the chaukidar had left. Abdul died after the President came home. There is no evidence as to the hour. Nabu chaukidar deposes that he was left in charge and that Abdul died soon after the President left.

The medical evidence shows that it was not impossible that the deceased might have lived for three or four hours; but that no definite opinion can be given.

I think the evidence shows that the first statement was recorded about 10 o'clock and the second about half past ten and that Chauhuddi chaukidar had by then already left with the first report. It is clear from the first information that Chauhuddi must have left for the Thana before the man died. The chaukidar was not asked when he arrived at the Thana. The first information states that it was recorded as soon as the chaukidar arrived, but it appears from the chaukidar's evidence that he must have arrived during the night or that he halted somewhere on the road. The chaukidar states that he left after the Panch went home; but this is, in my opinion, a mistake. I have no doubt that all that the deceased did say to those who came before the chaukidar left for the Thana was that he had been attacked by his companion and that a gold haulduli was snatched from his neck. A "haulduli" is a necklace of stones and a gold haulduli is obviously a misnomer for a gold coin worn as a locket; but the chaukidar had to make the best of what the deceased said and it was either his mistake or the deceased's. The chaukidar also states that by his conversation the deceased appeared to be a man from another part; but that he could not state his name and address. I think the chaukidar spoke the truth in his information to the Police and that up to that time Lalji's name had not been mentioned. This is further corroborated by the written report sent by the President in which the President says merely that the wounded man could not give any satisfactory reply to his questions.

The second report written by the President has been attacked by the defence as a pure fabrication. This report shows that the deceased gave his name as Abdul and his father's name as Somer Ali, and his home as Mauza Madhbalia, Thana Masrakh, District Chapra, and that the deceased had been possessed of Rs. 62 and one mohur worth Rs. 26 and that his assailant was one Lalji whose house was in the District of Muzaffarpur. I cannot believe that a man of the President's standing and so many disinterested witnesses could have deliberately assisted in the fabrication of a piece of false evidence such as this. The President's explanation is that the man was given a drink of water after the chaukidar left and then revived sufficiently to give these details. If these details had not been given I do not see why Lalji was arrested at all on the 11th. It certainly seems to be a fact that on the 10th the President told his chaukidars to keep Kanchania under observation and if he knew nothing then about Lalji's connection with the deceased his action cannot be explained. Further, the Writer Head Constable himself deposes that he got the second report at 10 o'clock in the morning on arrival at the village. The value of the gold mohur is put down as Rs. 26 in the second report and it is extremely unlikely that the President put down this figure out of his own head; the same applies to the figure Rs. 62 which was given as the amount which Abdul brought from Dinajpur. The price of the gold mohur was not known to any one except the two Dinajpur witnesses and they appear to have been examined by the Police long afterwards. It is also difficult to see how the President got the deceased's father's name and address unless it was given by the deceased himself. There is a village called Majhulia but no village called Madh-balia and Majhulia is now no longer in Thana Masrakh. If the President had fabricated the document he would not have made a mistake about the name of the village and the Thana. The circumstances show that the information given in the second dying declaration was obtained from the deceased.

There is, of course, the fact that the Writer Head Constable did not put down the name of the deceased in this inquest report and also the fact that he did not arrest Lalji on that day. In the absence of any explanation, the only conjecture that I can make is that he did not trust the accuracy of the second report and of the witnesses who supported it.

In my opinion the learned Judge has erred on the side of over-caution and both the reports drawn up by the President are genuine.

But, apart from the statements made by the deceased, the circumstantial evidence is quite sufficient to support the conviction.

The deceased came with the appellant as far as Shakra and started from that station in his company. He is not seen again but his hasua is found in the "man" one mile from the house of the appellant's father-in-law. The appellant's bundle is found on the bank of the "man" and the earth close by is stained with human blood. Immediately upon arrest on the 11th the appellant makes a statement in consequence of which the deceased's gold coin is found in the possession of the appellant's wife and is given up to the Police at his request and the accused's hasua is found in the "man." Also the appellant gives no account of where he went after he parted company with the deceased and where he slept on the night of the 9th; and his statement that he left the deceased at Titra must be false.

The learned Vakil for the appellant has attacked the evidence regarding the finding of the hasua. He says that Hira Dusadh, the man who got into the water and found the weapon, is at enmity with the appellant and put the weapon there. It is suggested that Hira is the headman of the Dusadhs of Madhopur and bears a grudge against the appellant for having misconducted himself with Kanchania. There is no evidence to support this suggestion. The evidence conclusively shows that when he was asked by the Sub-Inspector where the weapon was, the appellant took the Sub-Inspector to the "man" and the weapon was found after some delay. The learned Vakil objects to the admissibility of that part of the statement which refers to the weapon as the one used for attacking the deceased; but, in my opinion, s. 27 of the Indian Evidence Act is quite clear upon this point. It is contended on the authority of some cases that the prosecution is only entitled to prove that the accused in answer to a certain question gave information which led to the discovery of the weapon; but common sense requires that the discovery should be connected with and be relevant to the investigation. The omission to connect the weapon with the offence would render the provisions of s. 27 of the Indian Evidence Act wholly nugatory. The whole confession of a prisoner in Police custody cannot, of course, go in, but where the confession includes a statement that a weapon was used for committing the offence charged, that part of the confession can certainly go in if it leads to the discovery of the weapon. The most recent case on this point is In re Sogiamuthu Padayachi (1).

For the same reason evidence could have been given to show that the appellant stated immediately upon arrest that he had given the deceased's gold mohur and money to his wife. But as the record stands at present all we have got is that the appellant made a certain statement and that in consequence of that statement the gold mohur and Rs. 39 were given up by Kanchania.

But even on the record as it stands the discovery of the gold coin in Kanchania's possession taken with the other evidence in the case conclusively shows that the appellant was the person who caused the death of the deceased.

The learned Vakil has also taken a point that it was not permissible to the Crown to have the statement of the appellant recorded under s. 164 of the Code of Criminal Procedure on the 13th as the statement was not a confession. The answer to this is that the accused was sent up to have his confession recorded and that he gave the Police to understand that he would make a confession. After a night in Jail he changed his mind, and when he appeared before the Magistrate it was open to him to say that he would make no statement; but he did not follow this course; he was warned and notwithstanding that he proceeded to make a statement. This statement is certainly evidence of conduct.

A further legal point is taken with regard to the dying declarations.

It is contended that so far as the charges for the offences under ss. 392 and 397 are concerned the dying declarations are not admissible under s. 32 (1) of the Indian Evidence Act inasmuch as the cause of the deceased's death does not come in question in the trial of those charges. It is contended that on this point the Indian law is the same as the English Law and that a dying declaration as to the cause of the death is only admissible when the causing of the death is the subject of the charge. I cannot agree with this view. The words of s. 32 are very wide and it is not necessary that the charge should be one of homicide. The evidence as to the cause of death was relevant to the charge of robbery and consequently, the cause of death, that is to say, the assault committed by the appellant, came in question in the trial. Before the Indian Evidence Act was enacted it was held in Queen v. Bissorunjun Mookerjee (2) that there was no necessity in India for following the very narrow rule of English Law and that a dying declaration could be used as evidence in a charge of rape. One of the illustrations to s. 32 of the present Indian Evidence Act expressly provides for such evidence where the charge is not culpable homicide but rape.

Moreover, in this case the dying declaration was also admissible under s. 8 of the Indian Evidence Act as a part of the res gestæ. A statement made by the deceased immediately after the robbery regarding the robbery and also regarding the assault committed in the course of the robbery was admissible though the person who made it cannot be called to depose to it on oath. The truth in ss. 8 and 32 of the Indian Evidence Act may overlap in some cases, but they provide for different and distinct conditions. A statement, for instance, which would not be admissible under s. 8 may be admissible under s. 32.

The result, therefore, is that, in my opinion the Assessors and the Jury were right in the view which they took of the guilt of the appellant. The appellant is guilty both of robbery and murder. Having regard to the injuries there can be no doubt that it was his intention to cause such injuries as would in the ordinary course cause death. His motive was robbery and he appears to have attacked his victim from behind without giving him a chance of protecting himself. I agree with the learned Sessions Judge that the sentence of death is the only possible sentence and the order of the learned Judge must, therefore, be confirmed.

The conviction for the offences under ss. 392 and 397 are also affirmed but it is unnecessary to pass any separate sentence for these offences.

The appeal is dismissed.

(S. 704, cols. 1 & 2.

Messrs. L. K. Jha and K. N. Jha, for the Appellant.

Mr. C. M. Agarwala, Assistant Government Advocate (with him Mr. R. K. Jha), for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.

Mullick, A. C. J.—This is an appeal under s. 476-B of the Code of Criminal Procedure. The appellant Kari Gope was an applicant in a proceeding under Act XIV of 1920 in which the respondent Mahanth Manmohan Das was summoned to appear before the Court on the 13th November, 1926.

It is alleged by the appellant that on the 11th November, 1926, summons was duly served upon the respondent and was refused by him. The respondent denies service and says that he was not at home and that the affidavit of the peon as well as the affidavit of the identifier were intentionally false.

The learned District Judge has after inquiry found that the appellant who was the identifier intentionally made a false affidavit and he has filed a complaint for his prosecution for an offence under s. 193 of the Indian Penal Code.

There is evidence to show that the affidavit made by the appellant was false. All the witnesses for the prosecution were not examined by the Court and it is not necessary at this stage to say more than this that there is a prima facie case which must be investigated.

There is, however, a point of law taken which requires notice. It is urged that the affidavit of the identifier was not required for the purpose of proving service of summons upon the defendant, that it was a voluntary declaration and that no prosecution for giving false evidence can be based upon it. Anything that we may say will not debar the appellant from raising the point at his trial, and, therefore, it will be sufficient here to say that our present view is that the prosecution for offences under ss. 193 and 199 of the Indian Penal Code will lie. The affidavit was sworn before an officer competent to take affidavits and the appellant was bound to state the truth. It may be that the peon's affidavit was sufficient and that no affidavit was required from an identifier; but if the affidavit was intended to be used in a judicial proceeding, then the offence of fabricating false evidence within the meaning of s. 193 was complete. It makes no difference that the affidavit was voluntary. Voluntary statements made without any intention that the statement may appear in evidence in a judicial proceeding are not offences; so it has been held that a verification in a document not requiring to be verified is no offence; also that false statements made in an application for re-hearing of an ex parte decree or for a new trial in a Small Cause Court were not criminally punishable. The statements in themselves were not evidence and acquired no extra weight by being verified.

The affidavit in question is also punishable under s. 199. It is clear that the Court was authorised under the Circular Orders of the High Court and O. XIX of the Civil Procedure Code to receive an affidavit from an identifier as evidence of the fact of service of summons. Section 199 is wider than s. 192 and applies to every kind of affidavit which the Court is bound or authorised to receive. The Civil Procedure Code and the Circular Orders of the High Court authorise the Court in this instance to receive the affidavit in question.

The result, therefore, is that the appeal will be dismissed and the proceedings will be continued from the stage at which they were left.

Wort, J.—I agree and have nothing to add.

for the Accused.JUDGMENT.

Madhavan Nair, J.—The facts are briefly these: the accused encroached on road No. 18 within the limits of Milattoo village which vested in the District Board, Tanjore, and notice was served upon him under s. 159 (1) of the Local Boards Act to vacate the encroachments. This was disobeyed and he was convicted by the Sub-Magistrate, Papanasam, in C. O. No. 240 of 1925. He preferred no appeal against this conviction. He did not, however, remove the encroachment, and, as the offence continued, the present case was brought against him under ss. 159 (1) and 207 (2) of the Madras Local Boards Act. The Stationary Sub-Magistrate of Papanasam found him guilty and fined him Rs. 61. This conviction was set aside on appeal. This present appeal has been preferred by the Public Prosecutor against the acquittal of the accused by the Joint Magistrate of Kumbakonam.

Prosecution Witness No. 2, the Local Fund Road Maistry, deposed that the encroachment in question lies outside the line of avenue trees on the road and on land which was acquired for road conservancy purposes and that there is no obstruction to traffic. The conviction was set aside by the learned Joint Magistrate mainly on the ground that the public road as defined by s. 3 (18) of the Local Boards Act means the actual road over which the public have a right of way and that none of the clauses of s. 3

(18) is wide enough to include a road poramboke used for conservancy purposes. I think that the conclusion of the learned Magistrate is based upon a misreading of s. 3 (18). Sub cl. (c) of that section says a public road includes land which lies on either side of the roadway up to the boundaries of the adjacent property. The land which is in question in this case clearly comes within this description. It is registered as “road poramboke” and is vested in the District Board. The Public have a right of way over every part of land registered as road poramboke. The fact that the encroachment does not cause any obstruction to the public does not in the slightest degree affect the case. The District Board which owns the public roads has every right to ask those who encroach upon them to remove the obstruction.

It was argued on behalf of the accused that he has perfected his title to the land in question by adverse possession for over 30 years. This ground was raised in the grounds of appeal to the lower Appellate Court but in the judgment we find no discussion of the point. The judgment is confined exclusively to a consideration of the question whether the encroachment was on the public road as defined in s. 3 (18). It appears to us that this point has not been pressed before the learned Magistrate; I agree with the Sub-Magistrate that the evidence does not conclusively show that the case of adverse possession has been made out by the accused.

In these circumstances I set aside the acquittal and convict the accused of the offence under ss. 159 (1) and 207 (2) of the Madras Local Boards Act and sentence him to pay a fine of Rs. 61, or in default to suffer simple imprisonment for two months.

Reilly, J.—I agree. In regard to the definition of a “public road” in the Madras Local Boards Act it appears to me that, prima facie the public have a right of way over every part of every road poramboke. Therefore, if we find a piece of road poramboke which lies between the roadway and the boundary of adjacent property, that will be a public road as defined in the Act unless it is shown that in some way the public have lost their right of way over it.

It is only after the examination of all the evidence a complainant wants to adduce that a Magistrate can come to a conclusion that the case is false and vexatious, and though a Magistrate is entitled to discharge the accused at any stage, he cannot award compensation to the accused without examining all the complainant's witnesses.

Petition, under ss. 435 and 439 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, praying the High Court to revise the order of the Court of the Deputy First Class Magistrate, Saidapet, in C. O. No. 56 of 1926.

ORDER.—This is an application to revise the order of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate of Saidapet awarding compensation to the accused in a case brought by the petitioner. The learned Magistrate disposed of the case after hearing only five of the prosecution witnesses and he did not care to examine the rest of the evidence as he thought that the remaining witnesses would not materially help the case. In these circumstances, he was not justified in awarding compensation to the accused. It is only after the examination of all the evidence the complainant wanted to adduce that he could come to the conclusion that the case is false and vexatious. No doubt he was entitled at any stage to discharge the accused, but that would not be a ground for awarding compensation to the accused. I, therefore, set aside the order of compensation and direct the amount if recovered, to be refunded to the petitioner.

Where an application for license to take out a procession is granted subject to the condition that no member of the procession carries a lathi or sword, it is the duty of the licensee to see not only that no member of the procession carries a lathi or sword at the commencement of the procession but also that no one subsequently joins the procession with such weapons. He cannot be heard to say that they joined without his permission and that he was in no way responsible for them. [p. 707, col. 1.]

Per Wort, J.—The fact that there is a provision in s. 30-A of the Police Act giving power to the authorities to stop any procession which violates the conditions of a license does not excuse the licensee from controlling the persons who may join the procession. [ibid.]

Mr. Sultan Ahmed, Government Advocate, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.

Mullick, Actg. C. J.—The petitioner has been sentenced to a fine of Rs. 100 under s. 32 of the Police Act (V of 1861). It is admitted that the petitioner took out a license for a procession to proceed from Bakarganj to Patna City, one of the conditions of which was that no member of it was to carry a lathi or a sword. The Inspector of Police joined the procession at Muradpur which is some distance from the starting point and found that some of its members were carrying swords and doing lathi play. He asked the petitioner to stop the lathi play but the petitioner made some unsatisfactory reply in the vernacular of which the English translation in the record is "they would play".

It is urged on behalf of the petitioner that he was only responsible for seeing that no member of the procession carried a lathi at the time the procession started and that he was not called upon to control those who joined it on the way.

In my opinion that is not a correct view of the law. The object of a license under the Police Act is to ensure the preservation of public order and clearly the licensee must undertake the duty of maintaining order throughout the course of the procession. He takes the risk, as he must do, of persons joining the procession on the way and of circumstances arising which will require him to compel them to conform to the terms of the license. He cannot be heard to say that they joined without his leave and authority and that he was in no way responsible for them. If they get out of hand he should break up the procession or ask the assistance of the Police.

But here the petitioner declined to assist the Police and merely said that the lathi play would go on. In my opinion the inference is irresistible that the lathi players were members of the petitioner's assembly and that they were contravening the terms of the license with his permission if not under his direct orders. The conviction and sentence will, therefore, be affirmed and this application dismissed. The Police might, no doubt, have declared the procession to be an unlawful assembly and called upon it to disperse but because they did not exercise that power the petitioner is not relieved from his duty.

Wort, J.—I agree. It has been argued that by reason of the provisions of s. 30-A of the Police Act, which gives Magistrates, District Superintendents and Inspectors of Police power to stop any procession which violates the conditions of a license, the licensee is thereby excused from controlling the persons who may have joined the procession and over whom the licensee states he has no control. This, however, is clearly fallacious. The section referred to gives the power to the officers mentioned to stop a procession in spite of the procession having been licensed, and thus gives them a power which they otherwise would not have in law as already indicated. This does not excuse a licensee from strictly complying with the conditions of his license, and, in the view which I take of the facts of this case and of the law, the conditions of the license were broken and the licensee was, therefore, properly convicted.

Ebrahim Dawoodji Babi Bawa v. King-Emperor (2) and Bishan Singh v. Emperor (3), relied on.

Mr. Tun Byu, Assistant Government Advocate, for the Crown.

Mr. E. Maung, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—In Criminal Regular Trial No. 51 of 1926 of the Court of the Township Magistrate of Kayan, the respondent was tried for an offence punishable under s. 19 (e) of the Arms Act for going armed with a clasp knife (Ex. 1), on the 2nd of April, 1926.

The case for the prosecution was that on that day the respondent went to a monkey show near the bazar at Kayan carrying the knife opened in his hand and interfered with the show. When examined by the Magistrate he admitted that he had the knife with him, but stated that it was in his pocket and was not held open in his hand. On the charge under s. 19 (e) of the Arms Act being framed against him, he pleaded guilty and stated nothing in his defence. Consequently, the learned Magistrate convicted him of the charge and sentenced him to suffer three months' rigorous imprisonment. From this conviction the respondent appealed to the Court of Session, Hanthawaddy, in Criminal Appeal No. 123 of 1926, on the ground that he was too drunk to know anything on the occasion which gave rise to charge, and that the witnesses for the prosecution did not state that he had the knife in his hand.

According to s. 412 of the Criminal Procedure Code, it was obviously not open to the respondent to appeal against the conviction. The Sessions Court, however, remarked that the respondent had been convicted of carrying a dagger, and that, as the weapon was merely a large sailor's claspknife, it set aside the conviction and sentence and acquitted the respondent.

As, under s. 412 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, no appeal lay from the conviction, the order of acquittal made by the Court of Session was made without jurisdiction. Even if the proceeding was regarded as a revision, the Court of Session would still have no jurisdiction to set aside the conviction. It is this order of the Appellate Court which is now appealed against by the Local Government.

It is clear that the order of acquittal under appeal must be set aside as being made without jurisdiction. The question now remains whether, by going armed with the knife in exhibit, the respondent committed an offence punishable under s. 19 (e) of the Arms Act. It resolves itself into a question whether this knife is "arms" within the meaning of s. 4 of the Act.

The definition of "arms" in the Act runs thus:—

"arms" includes firearms, bayonets, swords, daggers, spears, spear-heads and bows and arrows, also cannon and part of arms, and machinery for manufacturing arms."

It is not contended in this case that the knife in exhibit can be described as a dagger; but the above definition does not purport to enumerate exhaustively all kinds of weapons which are arms, so that it is clear that, beyond the list of weapons mentioned in this definition, there could be arms.

In the case of Crown v. Ngà Hmat Kyan (1), Mr. Justice Thirkell White, Chief Judge, and Mr. Justice Fox, held that a claspknife does not fall within the ordinary natural meaning of the word "arms", but it was pointed out that the purpose for which an implement is primarily intended regulates whether it would in ordinary parlance be spoken of as an arm, and if it is not designed for use as a weapon of offence and defence, although it may be used as such, then it is not an arm.

(1) 1 L. B. R. 271.

In the report of the case, the size of the claspknife is not mentioned, but it is apparent that the ruling does not purport to lay down as a hard and fast rule that no claspknife would fall within the meaning of the word "arms."

The same learned Judges dealt with the same question in regard to a claspknife in the case of Ebrahim Dawoodji Babi Bawa v. King-Emperor (2), wherein they re-affirmed the criterion laid down in the case of Crown v. Ngà Hmat Kyan (2), but held that dagger-shaped knives of the kind produced in the case fell within the definition of "arms," although they might be called claspknives. Those knives were of the following description:—The steel blade was five and one-fifth of inches long, six-elevenths of an inch broad, was shaped and pointed as a dagger is shaped and pointed and was fitted to a long handle in the way in which the ordinary pen and pocketknife is fitted, that is to say, it turned over into the handle and when open and shut it was held by a spring.

As regards the criterion, it is clear that the purpose for which an implement is primarily intended regulates whether it should be deemed to be arms. In the present case, the knife has a blade $5\frac{1}{2}$ inches long with a pointed end, and it is fitted to a long handle and turns over into the handle, and there cannot be any room for doubt that the primary purpose for which such an implement is manufactured is to supply weapons to persons who want efficient stabbing instruments. It is extremely difficult to conceive of any domestic purpose for which such an instrument would be necessary or useful. It is a sort of weapon which, though not called a dagger, would be as effective as a dagger in its use.

In the case of Bishan Singh v. Emperor (3), a knife with a tapering blade, sharp throughout one edge and only towards the point of the other, which is attached to a cross-guard and handle, and which can be used for stabbing and cutting, was held to be "arms" within the meaning of the section.

The fact that the blade of the knife in the present case appears to be less tapering, and that there is no cross-guard to it, does not appear to me to make any real difference to the solution of the question. In my opinion, the knife under consideration is an instrument which does fall within the meaning of the term "arms" in s. 13 of the Act. That being so, the respondent's conviction by the learned Magistrate was correct, and I restore the same.

As regards the sentence I take into consideration the fact that it is not uncommon to come across claspknives of the kind for sale in the bazaars which might most probably have led the respondent to think that there was no prohibition against the arming of himself with such a knife and also the fact that he was in custody during the trial in the Magistrate's Court and has been in custody in connection with this appeal. I would, therefore, restore only half of the term of rigorous imprisonment passed by the Magistrate. In the result this appeal is allowed and the respondent is convicted and sentenced under s. 19 (e) of the Arms Act to suffer one and a half months' rigorous imprisonment, the period to be computed from the date of the Magistrate's sentence and the period of imprisonment undergone after the Magistrate's sentence should be counted towards the imprisonment now passed.

EMPEROR—OPPOSITE PARTY.

Indian States (Protection against Disaffection) Act, 1923, s. 3—Offence under s. 3—Accused's right to prove truth of his allegations—Criminal trials—Inconsistent defences, legality of.

A person who is accused of an offence under s. 3 of the Indian States (Protection against Disaffection) Act, 1923, is entitled to adduce evidence to prove that the allegations made by him are true inasmuch as he has a right to plead extenuating circumstances such as a worthy motive in mitigation of the penalty which may be imposed on him in the event of his conviction and for making good such a plea it may be necessary for him to show that the allegations are true. [p. 710, col. 2.]

An accused person is entitled to set up inconsistent defences. [p. 711, col. 1.]

Criminal revision petition from an order of the District Magistrate, Amritsar, dated the 20th June, 1927.

Mr. Muhammad Alam, for the Petitioner.
Mr. Abdul Rashid, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.

Coldstream, J.—Santa Singh, petitioner, is being prosecuted in the Court of the District Magistrate, Amritsar, under s. 3, of the Indian States (Protection against Disaffection) Act, 1923, to be referred to hereinafter as the Act of 1923, in respect of a writing under the title, "Patiala's Zulum No. 1" published on 26th January, 1927, in the newspaper called the Sacha Dhandora, Amritsar, of which the petitioner is alleged to have been at the time the editor, printer and publisher.

A charge was framed against Santa Singh on the 16th of June. Santa Singh put in a written statement denying that he was the editor, printer and publisher of the Sacha Dhandora and that he was in any way responsible for the publication of the offensive article. He also denied that the article had brought the Maharaja of Patiala into hatred and asserted that the object of the writer of the article was simply to draw the attention of Government to the existing state of affairs and to provoke Government to an enquiry. The allegations were true and would be proved to be true, and their publication was in the public interest.

Santa Singh put in a list of 45 witnesses whom he wished to be summoned in his defence. On the 20th June the District Magistrate recorded an order under s. 257, Criminal Procedure Code, refusing to summon any of these witnesses on the ground that the only purpose for which they were summoned was vexatious. Against this order Santa Singh had petitioned under the provisions of s. 439 of the Code.

The petition came before Broadway, J. For the petitioner Counsel relied upon Emperor v. Raj Pal (1), arguing that evidence proving the truth of the allegations would be relevant as showing the intention of the writer as well as relevant on the question of sentence to be passed in the event of conviction. On behalf of the Crown the petition was opposed by the learned Government Advocate who contended that the judgment cited was not a correct exposition of the law. In view of this contention Broadway, J., referred the matter to a Division Bench and the petition is accordingly before us. We have heard Mr. Muhammad Alam for the petitioner and the Government Advocate for the Crown.

The learned District Magistrate has held that the petitioner's application for the summoning of his witnesses could only be for the purpose of vexation, because, as the District Magistrate puts it, it was obviously no answer to the charge of an offence defined as this offence is defined, to plead that the allegations made were true and he saw no reason to call witnesses whose evidence could not affect the point to be decided. He remarked that in this case he would not accept the position that truth could be considered in mitigation of the offence since the accused out of his own mouth and by the cross-examination of his Counsel stood before him as an illiterate yokel who, whether he was or was not the publisher of the Sacha Dhandora, was in any case in no position to examine with due care and caution the evidence in support of what he was alleged to have published, and to say, that having examined it, he believed himself to be publishing what was true.

To establish the charge as framed by the District Magistrate against the petitioner in this case it has to be proved that by publishing the article the petitioner: (a) did bring into hatred or contempt the Maharaja of Patiala; or (b) did excite disaffection towards him, or that by publishing the article he (c) intended to bring the Maharaja into hatred or contempt; or (d) intended to excite disaffection towards him. The prosecution, who have closed their evidence, have not attempted to prove (a) or (b) and it will be for the Magistrate to decide whether the petitioner intended to bring the Maharaja into hatred or contempt or excite disaffection towards him. There can be no doubt that intention is an essential ingredient of the offence described in the Magistrate's charge and Mr. Muhammad Alam, who has referred to a number of rulings under ss. 124-A and 153-A, Indian Penal Code, has argued that the question of the truth of the allegations made in the article must be regarded as a relevant matter not only on the question of punishment but as relevant to show the intention of the publication and, therefore, relevant on the question of whether any offence was committed. I do not think it proper at the present stage of this prosecution, necessary in view of the order I propose to pass, to express any opinion either as to the correctness of the learned Magistrate's view that a plea of truthfulness cannot be an answer to a charge under s. 3 of the Act of 1922 or to discuss the soundness of the principles enunciated by Martineau, J., in Emperor v. Raj Pal (1). That judgment was in a case under s. 153-A, Indian Penal Code, which is a different offence from the one made punishable under s. 3 of the Act of 1923.

I do not think that the District Magistrate acted rightly in refusing to allow the petitioner an opportunity of proving the truth of the allegations in the article, for the publication of which he is being prosecuted. There can be no doubt that the offence with which he is charged may be visited with penalties of varying severity, imprisonment which may be simple or rigorous, for one day or for five years, with or without fine or with fine alone, and it cannot be disputed that the petitioner has a right to plead extenuating circumstances such as a worthy motive in mitigation of the penalty to be imposed in the event of conviction and that for the purpose of making good that plea it may be necessary for him to show that the offensive allegations were true. The learned Government Advocate is unable to cite any authority in support of his contention that in a case of this kind such a plea in mitigation of his offence is not open to the accused.

Before Broadway, J. Dr. Muhammad Alam stated that the alternative defence set up by his client (namely the denial that accused was in any way responsible for the publication of the offensive article) was a foolish one. Dr. Muhammad Alam has during the present proceedings before us filed a written statement (which has been placed on the record) explaining that what he said before Broadway, J., was said on the understanding that the accused had really signed a declaration under the Press and Registration Act; his present instructions are that the accused still denies that he signed any such declaration and Dr. Muhammad Alam desires us to record his statement that in case it is not proved against him (that he signed a declaration) the petitioner considers his defence to be a valid one.

The effect of this action by Dr. Muhammad Alam is to revive both defences and the learned Government Advocate protests against the proposal that the petitioner should be allowed to put forward two pleas apparently hopelessly inconsistent, namely (a) that the petitioner did not publish the offending article and (b) that the circumstances in which it was published mitigate the offence, and he urges that the District Magistrate's order should be upheld in view of this inconsistency. There is, however, good authority for the view that an accused person cannot be barred from setting up inconsistent pleas. I need refer here only to two rulings of Division Benches of the Calcutta High Court; Kali Prosad Banerjee v. Emperor (2) and Nagendra Chandra Dhar v. Emperor (3), in the latter of which it was remarked that, while there can be no doubt that by setting up an inconsistent defence the case for the accused becomes considerably weaker, there is nothing illegal in setting up an alternative and inconsistent defence. For these reasons I would set aside the order of the District Magistrate.

It is possible that the District Magistrate, after reviewing the matter with reference to each witness cited, may still find that some of the witnesses named have been cited for the purpose of vexation or delay or for defeating the ends of justice. If so he may, of course refuse, to issue process against those witnesses after recording the grounds for his refusal; or it may happen that after calling and hearing some of the witnesses the District Magistrate may find himself convinced that the remainder have been cited merely for the purpose of vexation etc. In this case it would be open to the District Magistrate to refuse to summon them after recording his reasons. Dr. Muhammad Alam states that he withdraws the application for summoning His Highness the Maharaja of Patiala. As regards witnesses outside the jurisdiction of the Court (for instance, prisoners in the Patiala Jail) he proposes to ask for proceedings under s. 503, Criminal Procedure Code.

Tek Chand, J.—I agree in the order proposed.

CALCUTTA HIGH COURT.

CRIMINAL APPEAL No. 333 OF 1927

AND

CRIMINAL REVISION No. 7 OF 1927.

November 9, 1927.

Present:—Sir George Claus Rankin, Kt.,
Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Chotzner.
AHAMADAR RAHMAN—APPELLANT

versus

DWIP CHAND CHOWDHURY—

RESPONDENT.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V. of 1898), s. 476-B—Appellate order directing complaint to be made, whether appealable to High Court—Complaint, what amounts to.

No appeal lies from an order passed by an Appellate Court under s. 476-B of the Criminal Procedure Code, directing a complaint to be made. [p. 713, col. 1.]

Per Rankin, C. J.—The policy of the law as laid down in s. 476-B, Criminal Procedure Code, is this that whenever there is a decision by a Court upon an application that a complaint shall be made—whether that decision be one way or another—there is one appeal from it and no more than one appeal. It matters nothing whatever what the result of the appeal may be. If any particular person is for the first time ordered to be prosecuted by the superior Court his remedy after that is to take his defence before a Jury or a Magistrate according to the nature of the case. Two Courts and only two are to deal with this preliminary question as to whether a person shall be prosecuted or not. [p. 715, col. 1.]

Somabhai Vallabhaji v. Adit Parshotam (1) and Mahomed Idris v. Emperor (2), followed.
• Ranjit Narayan Singh v. Ram Bahadur Singh (3) and Fauzdar Rai v. Emperor (4), not followed.

A District Judge, in making a complaint, after giving his reasons for holding that there was a good prima facie case ordered as follows:—"I, therefore, direct the prosecution of A. Let a copy of this order be sent along with the records to the proper Magistrate as a complaint".

Held, that although in some cases a more formal and fuller document may be required, there was a proper complaint in the circumstances of the case. [p. 715, cols. 1 & 2.]

Criminal appeal against an order of the District Judge, Chittagong, dated the 5th March, 1927, directing the prosecution of the appellant under ss. 476-476-B, Criminal Procedure Code.

Mr A. K. Fazlul Huq, Babus Debendra Narain Bhattacharji and Tarapada Banerji, for the Appellant.

Mr. Khundkar and Babu Narendra Kumar Das, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

Rankin, C. J.—This is an appeal from an order, dated the 5th of March, 1927, and made by the District Judge, Chittagong, under s. 476-B Criminal Procedure Code. It appears that the appellant was a tenant to and tehsildar of a certain party.

He, in the course of his duty, appears to have collected rents due to his masters and there was certain litigation between the parties. In 1924 the masters brought certain rent suits for arrears in respect of the years 1920 to 1923 against the present appellant and his co-sharers. He pleaded full payment as regards the rent of 1920 and part-payment as regards the later years and on this latter point he supported his case by producing two dakhilas, Ex. A and Ex. A-I. It is said that Ex. A is a dakhila emanating from the Sudder Cutchery and Ex. A-I was given by one Mahendra under orders of the Sudder Cutchery. Be that as it may, the Munsif in whose Court the suit was brought decreed the rent suit in full and appears to have made an observation that the dakhilas were suspicious. Thereupon the plaintiffs in the case made an application to the Munsif under s. 476, Criminal Procedure Code, asking him to take steps by making a complaint to institute prosecution of the present appellant for producing in evidence these documents known by him to be false, in other words, for perjury and forgery. The case itself—the rent suit—went on appeal to the District Judge, but the Munsif's finding was affirmed on the 10th of July, 1926. Thereupon the petition asking the Munsif to make a complaint to the Magistrate was revived and a miscellaneous case was started and the parties commenced to contest the question whether the Munsif's Court ought not to make a complaint against the present appellant. How far they contested it on the merits is doubtful, because it would appear that in the end, on the 7th of December, 1926, the application of the plaintiffs-landlords was dismissed for default. Taking that order of dismissal for default as being in the words of s. 476-B a refusal to make a complaint, the plaintiff's-landlords appealed against it to the District Judge who on the 5th of March, 1927, made the order against which the present appeal is brought. By his order the learned District Judge gives certain reasons which appear to him to amount to good prima facie proof that the dakhilas were forgeries. He goes into the questions of the counterfoils, the numbers of the counterfoils and so on. He comes to the conclusion that there is a good prima facie case not only that they were forgeries but that the present appellant used them knowing them to be forgeries.

In the present appeal the first question that arises is whether in a case like this an appeal lies to the High Court or not. That question depends upon the words of s. 476-B, Criminal Procedure Code. What is said is that in a case where the first Court in dealing with an application to lodge a complaint refuses to lodge a complaint and an appeal is taken to a superior Court which decides to make a complaint there is a further right of appeal from that; because s. 476-B having operated to give an appeal from the order of the first Court dealing with the matter operates all over again when the second Court decides that a complaint should be made. Mr. Fazlul Huq, the learned Advocate who appears for the appellant, does not contend that, if in such a case as this the superior Court had dismissed the appeal thereby refusing to make a complaint and agreeing with the Court below, from such an order a right of appeal to the High Court would lie. He contends that it makes all the difference that the order of the superior Court was an order which for the first time amounted to the making of a complaint. He agrees, too, that if in the first Court a complaint had been made and on appeal the appeal had been dismissed, no further appeal would lie to this Court. He contends that in the particular case where the first Court having refused to make a complaint a superior Court differs and does for the first time make a complaint then s. 476 B operates to give what is in effect a second appeal. There is some authority upon this question and it is very important that the matter should be rightly decided. The question is whether the intention of the Legislature was to give one appeal from every decision upon an application for an order that a complaint shall be made, or whether the intention of the Code is not merely to give that right but in addition to give a right to one appeal from every order directing a complaint.

In my judgment it is desirable to refer to the three cases in which this matter has been dealt with. The first case to which I would refer is the case of Somabhai Vallabhbhai v. Adit Parshottam (1). That case was one in which a Subordinate Judge decided to make a complaint. The language used by the Subordinate Court was language applicable to the old Code, but in fact the first Court decided to make a complaint. On appeal the superior Court, namely, the Sessions Judge reversed that order and re-called the complaint. Thereupon an appeal was brought to the High Court and the decision of Macleod, C. J., and Shah, J., was to the following effect:—"From that order in effect directing withdrawal of the complaint the petitioner has filed an appeal. The first question is whether the appeal lies. We are clearly of opinion that no appeal lies under the provisions of the Code against an order made by the Court to which the Court making a complaint is subordinate."

It is quite true that in that particular case the superior Court had refused to make a complaint and had set aside the order directing a complaint to be made. The learned Judges do not seem to me to proceed upon that at all. They proceed, I think, upon the principle that on the true construction of s. 476-B there is no provision for an appeal to be taken from the order made by the superior Court.

The next case to which I would refer is the case of Mahomed Idris v. Emperor (2). In that case there had been a Subordinate Judge's order refusing to make a complaint and there had been an appellate order under s. 476 B directing a complaint to be made; so that it was a case exactly on all fours with the present case; and when an appeal was taken to the High Court of Lahore the matter was referred to a Bench for decision. The Appellate Bench decided in this way:—"The question referred to us in this appeal and in Appeals Nos. 233 and 286 of 1924 is whether an appeal lies to this Court from an appellate order of the District Judge making a complaint which the Subordinate Judge might himself have made under s. 476 of the Criminal Procedure Code. Section 476-B of the Code gives a right of appeal only when a Court has made or refused to make a complaint under s. 476 or s. 476-A, and neither of those sections relates to a complaint made by a Court on appeal from an order of a Subordinate Court refusing to make a complaint."

It appears to me, therefore, that the High Court of Lahore has proceeded upon the same principle as the High Court of Bombay, namely, that under s. 476-B there is evidently an intention to give one appeal from the decision of the first Court which deals with an application that a complaint should be made. Whether the appeal results in granting the application or refusing the application, there is one appeal and only one appeal provided for by s. 476-B.

The case, however, in which the matter has been most fully discussed is a case which is in favour of the present appellant. That is the case of Ranjit Narayan Singh v. Ram Bahadur Singh (3). The learned Judges there take the view that if the superior Court acting under s. 476-B decides in a particular way or for the first time decides to make a complaint which the lower Court has refused to make, then the section having once operated proceeds to operate all over again because the order made by the superior Court in such a case is itself in order making a complaint; and, therefore, an order making a complaint having been made and made for the first time s. 476-B has a second lease of life and operates upon that to give in effect a second appeal. In so deciding the learned Judges appear to have been in agreement with a previous case Faujdar Rai v. Emperor decided by Mr. Justice Mullick in the same High Court but which is not, so far as I know, reported*. They do, however, cite in full for the present purpose the dicta of Mr. Justice Mullick and it appears that an application was made to a Sub-Deputy Collector to make a complaint against one Faujdar Rai directing his prosecution for the offenses of using a forged document and giving false evidence. The Sub-Deputy Collector refused to take any action. The complainant appealed to the Collector under s. 476-B. The Collector disagreed with the Sub-Deputy Collector's view and himself made a complaint. Thereupon Faujdar Rai appealed to the Divisional Commissioner by way of second appeal and the Divisional Commissioner held that no such appeal was competent. The matter came to the High Court before Mr. Justice Mullick and he took the view that the second appeal to the Commissioner was competent. The reasons which he gives are as follows:—"Section 476-B of the Code of Criminal Procedure appears to contemplate that if an Appellate Court sets aside the order of the original Court, the party prejudicially affected has a right of appeal to the Court to which appeals from that Appellate Court ordinarily lie."

The view taken by Mr. Justice Mullick was, so far as I can see, not that it depended upon whether the superior Court decided to make a complaint or decided for the first time to make a complaint, but merely upon whether the Appellate Court set aside the order of the original Court. In Ranjit Narayan Singh v. Ram Bahadur Singh (3), that was not the view which the Appellate Bench appears to have adopted. The view that it adopted is this that if an order for a complaint to be made is made by the first Court and upheld by the second Court no further appeal lies, but if such an order is refused by the first Court and a complaint is made by the second Court, then an appeal lies: not by reason of any express provision to that effect at the end of s. 476-B but by reason that the section operates upon the same subject-matter over again, this being a complaint within the meaning of the opening words of the section.

In my judgment it is unsound to hold on the language of s. 476-B that any such distinction was intended. Section 476 B gives a right of appeal first to a person aggrieved because any Civil, Revenue or Criminal Court has refused to make a complaint. It also gives it to any person against whom such a complaint has been made; and if this section is to operate upon the same subject-matter twice so as in effect to produce more than one appeal from the first decision upon an application to direct a prosecution, I think it applies indifferently whether the effect of the second Court's order is to make a complaint or to refuse to make a complaint. In the present case now before us the Munsif refused to make a complaint. The only meaning of the appeal to the District Judge was to ask him to make a complaint. It was in his decision to make a complaint or not to make a complaint. If he had refused to make a complaint and upheld the order of the Munsif I fail to see why he would not have been as much within the opening words of the section as he was when he decided to differ from the Munsif, and to make a complaint. It seems to me to be erroneous to say that if he makes a complaint he does so not under s. 476-B but under s. 476 while if he refuses to make a complaint under s. 476 he does so under s. 476-B. Section 476 applies, in the case of a "superior Court," i. e., a Court superior to the Court in which the offence took place only after a complaint is made under an authority not given by that section. Section 476-B applies to a complaint made or refused by a Court acting under the authority conferred upon it by s. 476 or s. 476-A. Hence the words used are "has refused to make a complaint under s. 476 or s. 476-A, etc." The reference to s. 476 is in almost identical terms at the conclusion of s. 476-A and 476-B and had the Legislature intended to produce the result now contended for on behalf of the appellant it would have provided specifically for an appeal when a complaint is made by a Court acting under the powers conferred by s. 476-B.

Prima facie s. 476 B deals first of all with a Court and then with the Court to which the former Court is subordinate which is called the superior Court. In my judgment it is misconstruction of the section to suppose that when the superior Court has acted under the section and the section has taken its effect the same matter is to be subjected for the second time to a process exactly of the same character with the result that one provision in general terms for an appeal operates twice.

It has been pointed out to us that under s. 476-A, if this matter had not been canvassed in the Munsif's Court at all, the District Judge might have made an order that a complaint should issue. In that case he would have been dealing with the matter for the first time and it is clear on the terms of s. 476 B that an appeal would have lain from his decision. It is important to point out that an appeal would lie from his decision equally whether he refused to make a complaint under s. 476-A or whether he made a complaint under s. 476. There would be no difference at all according to the result or nature of his order. There would be one appeal from the Court which is dealt with the matter for the first time. I fail altogether to see how this shows it to be correct to construe s. 476-B as though it were intended to take operation upon the same case twice over.

It has been suggested that the language at the end of the section assists the appellant's case, namely, the wording where it is said that if the superior Court makes such complaint the provisions of s. 476 shall apply to the complaint. That is quite clear and necessary. The accused can be sent in custody to a Magistrate. The superior Court in such a case can bind over any person to give evidence before a Magistrate. The Magistrate must proceed according to law and so forth. There can be no doubt that s. 476 must apply. But, as I ventured to point out in the course of the argument, that is a very different thing from saying that s. 476-B must apply all over again.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the policy of the law as laid down in s. 476-B is this that whenever there is a decision by a Court upon an application that a complaint shall be made—whether that decision be one way or another—there is one appeal from it and no more than one appeal. It matters nothing whatever what the result of the appeal may be. If any particular person is for the first time ordered to be prosecuted by the superior Court his remedy after that is to take his defence before a Jury or a Magistrate according to the nature of the case. Two Courts and only two are to deal with this preliminary question as to whether a person shall be prosecuted or not. If the second Court is against the present accused he must look to the Jury for his safety.

This being a proceeding in a civil case, a Rule has been obtained under s. 115 of the Civil Procedure Code asking us to interfere with the order made and the learned Advocate for the appellant asks us upon this Rule to take action because he says that the learned Judge's order is not a proper complaint and that he has not recorded a finding that it is expedient in the interest of justice that the appellant should be prosecuted. When we come to look at what is absolutely required by the Criminal Procedure Code, it does not seem to be illegal to deal with the matter as the learned District Judge has done. Having given his reasons holding that there is a good prima facie case he says: "I, therefore, direct the prosecution of Ahamadar Rahman. Let a copy of this order be sent along with the records to the proper Magistrate as a complaint." That seems to me to be sufficient under the Criminal Procedure Code. In some cases a more formal and fuller document may be required, but in this case I am not prepared to hold that it is not a good complaint. The learned Judge says: "I direct the prosecution of Ahamadar Rahman." It is true that he has not used the exact words of s. 476 as indeed he should have done; but, in my judgment, there can be no doubt that he has come to the conclusion that it is expedient in the interests of justice. After all the question is whether or not this man used forged documents knowing them to be forged documents and gave evidence which was perjured evidence before a Court of Law. If it appeared to the learned Judge that there was a prima facie case against him of that character, then in the absence of very special circumstances it would be in the public interests that that matter should be investigated before a competent Magistrate.

In my judgment, therefore, the appeal fails and must be dismissed and the Rule must be discharged.

Chotzner, J.—I agree.

CRIMINAL MISCELLANEOUS PETITIONS NOS. 223
AND 224 OF 1927.

April 29, 1927.

Present:—Mr. Justice Wallace.

In re V. A. GOPAL NAIR—ACCUSED—PETITIONER.

Criminal trial—Proceedings before Bench Court—Application for transfer on ground of difficult question arising—Procedure.

If a Bench Court thinks that a case pending before it should be transferred to the file of some other Court, on the ground that the case involves difficult questions which cannot be properly tried by a Bench it should move the matter officially and not leave it to the party to move.

Petitions for transfer of B. C. No. 2456 and 2454 of 1926 from the file of the Court of the First Class Bench Magistrate, Calicut, to that of any other Court in the District.

FACTS.—Out of a dispute concerning possession and ownership of a paramba, two criminal cases, a case and a counter case, arose for trial before the First Class Bench Magistrate, Calicut, the complainant in B. C. No. 2454 of 1926 being the accused in B. C. No. 2456 of 1926 and vice versa.

The complainant in B. C. No. 2454 of 1926 contended that the facts disclosed an offence under s. 392 triable by a First Class Magistrate, that the case involved difficult questions of law which could not be conveniently tried summarily by a Bench Court and applied to the Bench Court for initiating proceedings for transfer. The President of the Bench Court recommended transfer of the proceedings to the Sub-Divisional Magistrate. But the latter without notice to the complainant refused to transfer and dismissed the petition.

The petitioner then moved the District Magistrate who transferred the petition to the Additional District Magistrate for disposal but the latter likewise rejected the petition without notice to the petitioner and without hearing him.

The petitioner thereupon applied to the High Court for transfer of the proceedings to the file of some Sub-Divisional Magistrate.

Mr. K. P. Ramakrishna Iyer, for the Petitioner.

The Public Prosecutor, for the Crown.

ORDER.—I am not prepared to transfer the cases on the grounds shown. If the Bench itself thinks that the cases should be transferred, it should move the matter officially and not leave it to the party to move.

The petitions are dismissed.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act 7 of 1898), ss. 12, 529 (e)—Trial by Magistrate of offence not committed within his circle of jurisdiction, validity of.

The trial of an offence by a Magistrate who is otherwise competent to try the same is not invalid merely because the offence was not committed within the circle of the jurisdiction of the Magistrate. Such an irregularity is excused by the provisions of s. 529 (e) of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

Kunj Behari Lal v. Lauva (1), distinguished.

Criminal appeal from an order of the Sessions Judge, Etah.

Mr. Panna Lal, for the Applicant.

Mr. M. Waliullah, Assistant Government Advocate, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—The point of law urged in this application for revision is that the Magistrate who tried the case had not jurisdiction to do so. The offence was not committed, within the circle of the jurisdiction of the Magistrate. He was, however, competent, according to his powers, to try a charge under s. 182 of the Indian Penal Code. The learned Sessions Judge has pointed out that this irregularity is excused by the provisions of s. 529 (e) of the Code of Criminal Procedure. On behalf of the applicant my attention was drawn to a judgment of this Court in the case of Kunj Behari Lal v. Lauva (1), in which it was held that under s. 12 of the Code of Criminal Procedure only the Magistrate to whom the District Magistrate has allotted a particular area could take cognizance of offences committed in that area. There, however, the question did not arise as to what was to happen when a Magistrate, not having jurisdiction, tried a charge. In my opinion the section quoted by the learned Sessions Judge applies. I do not think that the sentence is severe, and dismiss this application.

Madras Abkari Act (I of 1886), s. 55 (1)—'Sell', meaning of—Actual delivery to buyer, whether necessary.

It is not necessary to constitute a 'sale' within the meaning of s. 55 (1) of the Madras Abkari Act that there should be an actual delivery of the thing sold to the buyer.

A person accepted the price of a bottle of brandy and brought the bottle to be handed over to the buyer but was arrested before he had actually handed it over to the buyer:

Held, that there was a sale within the meaning of s. 55 (1) of the Madras Abkari Act.

Appeal under s. 417 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, against the acquittal of the accused by the Sub-Divisional First Class Magistrate, Chittoor, in C. A. No. 14 of 1927.

Mr. E. Krishnamurthi, for the Accused.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal by the Government against the order of the Sub-Divisional First Class Magistrate of Chittoor acquitting the counter-petitioner who was convicted by the Second Class Magistrate of Madanapalle under s. 55 (1) of the Abkari Act. The learned Sub-Divisional Magistrate found the facts as alleged by the prosecution but acquitted the counter-petitioner solely on the ground that there was no delivery of the brandy bottle to the buyer. Under s. 55 (1) of the Abkari Act of 1886 it is an offence for any one to sell any liquor or any intoxicating drug in contravention of the provisions of the Act. The word "sell" is not defined; but "sale" or "selling" is defined as including any transfer otherwise than by way of gift. The contention of the Public Prosecutor is that for the purpose of a sale it is unnecessary that there should be actual handing over of the property sold. Under the Contract Act there can be a sale without actual delivery of the goods sold. I do not think that the word "sell" in s. 55 of the Abkari Act is used in any sense different from that used in the Contract Act. A sale is complete as soon as the price is paid or agreed to be paid for the goods. It is not necessary for a completed sale that there should be an actual delivery of the thing sold. In this case there is satisfactory evidence which is accepted by both the lower Courts that the counter-petitioner took some money through his son from P. W. No. 3 and brought out a half brandy bottle, and when he was actually handing over to P. W. No. 3 he was arrested by P. W. No. 1. Taking the money and bringing the bottle out for the purpose of handing it over to P. W. No. 3 constitute an offence under s. 55 (1) of the Abkari Act. I, therefore, set aside the order of acquittal passed by the Sub-Divisional Magistrate and impose a fine of Rs. 50 on the counter-petitioner and in default of the payment of fine two weeks' simple imprisonment.

*Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 342—
Transfer of Magistrate—De novo trial—Succeeding Magistrate's duty to examine accused again—Omission to examine—Illegality.*

Where the Magistrate trying a case is transferred and the accused demands a de novo trial, the succeeding Magistrate is bound to examine the accused again under s. 342 of the Criminal Procedure Code, and failure on the part of the Magistrate to do so will vitiate the trial.

"It is not only a rule but a principle of law that the Magistrate who tries a case in the sense of 'decides' it, must give the accused an opportunity of explaining any points which may have been made against him and must hear what he has to say."

Criminal revision from an order of the Sub-Judge, Lahore, dated the 13th June, 1927.

Mr. Barkat Ali, for the Petitioner.

JUDGMENT.—Akhtar Mohammad had been convicted of being in illegal possession of charas and sentenced to two years' rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 200. On appeal the sentence of imprisonment was reduced to one year.

The facts as found are that this man had been selling charas to the labourers on Ganda Singh Wala Canal. An application for revision has been admitted, and the first point urged by Mr. Barkat Ali is that there is an incurable irregularity in the proceedings in that after all the evidence had been recorded and the charge framed, the accused having previously been examined, the Magistrate was transferred and his successor took over the case. The accused applied for a de novo trial and after the witnesses had all been summoned he changed his mind to this extent that he asked to have certain witnesses only examined, and this was done. The second Magistrate relied partly on the evidence recorded by himself and partly on that recorded by his predecessor.

In my opinion there has been no irregularity on this point but my view is of no consequence for there is a much more serious defect, which, I think, vitiates the whole proceedings. In spite of the fact that the accused asked for de novo proceedings and did actually re-call the more important witnesses the Second Magistrate never examined him under s. 342. It does appear to me to be not only a rule but a principle that the Magistrate who tries a case in the sense of "decides" it, must give the accused an opportunity of explaining any points which may have been made against him and must hear what he has to say, and it is not sufficient for the predecessor-in-office to have done so.

The application for revision is accepted and as the accused has undergone more than four months' imprisonment, I do not think it necessary to order a re-trial.

Police Act (V of 1861), ss. 30, 32—Notification under s. 30—Occasion for notice passing away—Notice, whether continues to operate—Contravention of notification—Conviction.

A notification under s. 30 of the Police Act prohibiting processions without a license cannot be held to be operative after the occasion which called for the notification has passed away.

The accused were convicted under s. 32 of the Police Act for having promoted and directed a procession without a license on the 19th March, 1927, in contravention of an order promulgated by the Superintendent of Police under s. 30 of the Act on the 18th July, 1926, preceding the Mohurram festival of 1926 :

Held, that the order of the Superintendent of Police had ceased to be operative in March, 1927, and the conviction of the accused was illegal.

Rule against the judgment and order of the Sessions Judge, Jessore, dated the 23rd April, 1927, refusing to take action under s. 438, Criminal Procedure Code, against the order of the Sadar Sub-Divisional Officer, Jessore, dated the 30th March, 1927.

FACTS.—The petitioners were fined Rs. 50 each under s. 32 of Act V of 1861 for being promoters and directors of a sankirtan party which passed through the roads of the Town of Jessore on 19th March, 1927, without taking out a license from the Jessore Superintendent of Police though the Superintendent of Police on 18th July, 1926, preceding a Mohurram festival, had passed the following order under s. 30 (2) of Act V of 1861 :—"Whereas I am informed that in the judgment of the District Magistrate all processions, religious or otherwise within the Municipal area of Jessore Town, are likely to cause breach of peace, it is notified for the information of the public that I do hereby require under s. 30 (2) of the Police Act V of 1861 that all persons directing or promoting such processions shall apply to the Superintendent of Police, Jessore, for a license for the said processions within the said area and that on failure to comply with this requirement, the defaulters will be dealt with in accordance with law."

The case of the accused was that they were not aware of the notification issued by the Superintendent of Police.

Mr. S. K. Sen (with him Babus Bhudhar Haldar and Nagendra Kumar Dutt), for the Petitioners.

JUDGMENT.—No cause is shown. We have examined the record for ourselves and we are satisfied that the conviction of the petitioners is illegal in the circumstances stated. There was undoubtedly a notification under s. 30 of the Police Act in 1926, but that could not be held to be operative after the occasion which called for the notification had passed away. In this view of the matter the Rule is made absolute, the conviction and sentence of the petitioners are set aside and the fine, if paid, be refunded.

Conviction set aside.*

Madras Local Boards Act (XIV of 1920), ss. 171, 173, 176, 177, 188, 212—Private market before commencement of Act—Refusal of license by Local Board, legality of—Disobedience of order—Offence.

A person who owned a private market before the commencement of the Madras Local Boards Act of 1920, is entitled to the grant of a license under s. 171 of the Act, subject only to such conditions as are prescribed by s. 173. [p. 719, col. 1.]

An order of the Local Board merely refusing license to such a person does not come under s. 212 (11) of the Madras Local Boards Act and is illegal and ultra vires, and unless and until a legal order is passed, his application for license cannot be considered to have been properly disposed of and the owner cannot be convicted under s. 175 of the Act. [p. 720, col. 1.]

Per Jackson, J.—A private market is a private property and an Act to consolidate the law relating to Local Boards can hardly be an Act of confiscation. [p. 719, col. 1.]

Refusal to function under an Act is not passing an order under the Act. An order must be intra vires and an order ultra vires is no order at all. [p. 719, col. 2.]

Per Thiruvengkatachiar, J.—Where no action is taken under s. 176 of the Madras Local Boards Act, a refusal to grant a license to the owner of a private market cannot be justified under s. 177 of the Act. [p. 720, col. 2.]

Petition under ss. 435 and 439 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, to revise the judgment of the Court of the Stationary Sub-Magistrate of Poonamallee, in Calendar Case No. 450 of 1926.

Mr. M. S. Venkatarama Aiyar, for the Petitioners.

The Public Prosecutor, for the Crown.

ORDER.

Jackson, J.—The three petitioners have each been fined Rs. 5 by the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, Saidapet, (confirming on appeal the judgment of the Sub-Magistrate Poonamallee) under ss. 175 and 207 of the Madras Local Boards Act XIV of 1920, for selling fish in an unlicensed private market.

Admittedly the petitioners were owners of a private market before the commencement of the Act. That being so, they were entitled to the grant of a license subject only to such conditions as regards sanitation etc., as the Union (s. 188) might impose. That is the clear meaning of ss. 171-173.

"The Board shall grant the license applied for subject only to such regulations" etc., and it is difficult to see how anything else could have been enacted. A private market is a private property and an Act to consolidate the law relating to Local Boards could hardly be an Act of confiscation. At the same time it is clearly within the Board's competence to see that such property is enjoyed without detriment to public health.

Under s. 212(11) it is provided that if orders on an application for license are not communicated to the applicant within 30 days after the receipt of the application by the President, the application shall be deemed to have been allowed for the year. The petitioners seem to have applied for the year 1926-1927, and on the 8th May, 1926, the Board passed the resolution that a license cannot be granted and communicated this information to the petitioners.

It is contended by the learned Public Prosecutor that this is an order on the application such as is contemplated by s. 212 (11). The petitioners argue, on the contrary that an order on an application must be a legal order within the terms of the Act and an announcement that the Board declines to perform its statutory duty is no such order. This seems to be a valid plea. The Board is bound to grant a license and if, when it receives the application in due course, it confines itself to saying that it will not grant the license it is tantamount to passing no order on the application. Refusal to function under the Act is not passing an order under the Act. The order must be intra vires and an order ultra vires is no order at all.

In these circumstances the conviction cannot be upheld. It is set aside and the fines are ordered to be refunded.

Thiruvengkatachiar, J.—I agree with my learned brother that the conviction in this case should be set aside; and as the question is one of some importance I shall add a few words. The Madras Local Boards Act of 1920, permits only the keeping open of a private market which was in existence before the commencement of that Act, and no new private market can be opened after the commencement of that Act. The owner, occupier or farmer of any private market has to take out annual license without which he cannot keep open the market. The license has to be applied for not less than six weeks before the commencement of the year for which it is required. If no order on the application for license is communicated to the applicant within 30 days after the receipt of the application by the President of the Board concerned, the application shall be deemed to have been allowed for the year or for such less period as is mentioned in the application and subject to the rules, bye-laws, regulations and conditions ordinarily imposed. (See ss. 171, 173 and 212, sub-s. 11). In the case before us, the applicants have been convicted for selling fish in a private market which was unlicensed on the date of the sale, viz., May 15th, 1926. It is not clear upon the evidence when the application for license for the private market for the official year 1926 1927, was put in. So far as I can see, it was put in on the 23rd April, 1926, which would be after the commencement of the official year. Upon that petition, the Union Board passed the proceedings of the 8th May, 1926, refusing the license applied for and a copy of the resolution was communicated to the petitioners and the same presumably reached them within 30 days from the date of the application. The learned Vakil for the applicants, therefore, has raised no ground that the appellants are entitled to the benefit of the last part of s. 212 (sub-s. 11). His contention on behalf of the appellants is that the order refusing the license is illegal and ultra vires, and that unless and until a legal order is passed, the application for license cannot be considered to have been properly disposed of and hence the appellants cannot be convicted under s. 175.

Section 171 (3) which is relied on says:

"The Taluk Board shall grant the license applied for subject only to such regulations as to supervision and inspection and to such conditions, as to sanitation, and drainage, etc. as the Taluk Board may think proper."

It is argued that under this provision the Taluk Board, though it may impose conditions in the interests of public health, has no power to refuse the license and that, therefore, the refusal of the license cannot be held to be a valid exercise of the powers conferred on the Union Board. The learned Public Prosecutor, on the other hand, contends that under sub-s. 3 of s. 171 it is open to the Union Board to refuse a license when in its opinion, the conditions of the market are such that the license should not be granted. The language of s. 171 (3) is by no means happy, but on the whole I think that the contention of the appellants is the correct one. The conclusion is supported by the provisions of ss. 176 and 177 of the Act. Under s. 177, the Board may refuse to grant to the applicant the license applied for, only when it has served a notice on the owner, occupier or farmer of the private market to do any of the things mentioned in the cls. (a) to (f) of s. 176 and he fails within the period and in the manner laid down in the said notice to carry out any of the works mentioned in s. 176. In the present case no such action was taken by the Board under s. 176, and the refusal to grant a license cannot, therefore, be justified under s. 177. The reason given in the resolution of the 8th May, 1926, is that the license cannot be issued because in the opinion of the District Board the location of the private market at that place is detrimental to the health of the city itself. It is, no doubt, within the province of the Board to close any private market if in their opinion it ought not to be continued in the interests of public health; but in such cases they have to do one of two things. They may give a notice to the owner under s. 176 to carry out such works as may be considered necessary for rendering a private market a suitable one or they should acquire the owner's rights in the private market under the Land Acquisition Act as provided in s. 180. Otherwise, it would be, as observed by my learned brother, confiscating private rights without compensation, which intention cannot be imputed to the Legislature. The Board's resolution of the 8th May, 1926, has ignored all these provisions and the Board has refused the license alleging merely that they consider it undesirable that the market should be kept open there. I agree, therefore, that the order of the Board cannot be supported as legal one passed in the exercise of their powers and that the conviction should be set aside.

Several accused persons were all charged under s. 121-A of the Penal Code with conspiring to deprive His Majesty the King of the Sovereignty of British India, of conspiring to wage war against the Government and of conspiring to overawe the Government by means of criminal force. Apart from the conspiracy to effect these objects there was disclosed on the evidence a conspiracy to commit dacoities either accompanied by murder or not accompanied by murder and consequently certain of the conspirators were liable to punishment under s. 120-B of the Penal Code for being party to a criminal conspiracy to commit offences punishable with death or transportation for life. The actual participants in these offences were separately charged and the accused were all jointly tried on these charges:

Held, that the joinder of the charges was regular and legal as all the offences formed part of the same transaction. [p. 728, col. 1.]

Where a Magistrate who has conducted the Jail identifications happens to be the Committing Magistrate, ordinarily his evidence should be taken for the first time in the Court of Session by calling him as a Court witness. But the fact that a Magistrate took the unusual course of going into the witness-box during the committal proceedings will not vitiate the committal or the subsequent trial. [p. 729, cols. 1 & 2.]

Section 10 of the Evidence Act renders admissible in cases of conspiracy much evidence which is not ordinarily admissible. The provisions of the said section are much wider than those of the English Law and under the section anything said or written by any conspirator in reference to the common intention of the conspiracy after the time when such intention was first entertained by any conspirator is a relevant fact as against each of the persons believed to be so conspiring as well for the purposes of proving the existence of the conspiracy as for the purpose of showing that any such person was a party to it. [p. 729, col. 2.]

The evidence of accomplices is always admissible and is always relevant but under a very old practice of the Courts in England such evidence is accepted only with great caution and after the closest scrutiny, and is not usually accepted against any individual person unless it is corroborated. Although it is not illegal to convict on the uncorroborated evidence of an accomplice, there is a consensus of opinion that a conviction on the uncorroborated evidence of an accomplice is rarely justifiable. The practice in India is the same as the practice in England. [p. 730, col. 1.]

Evidence in corroboration must be independent testimony which affects the accused by connecting or tending to connect him with the crime. In other words, it must be evidence which implicates him, that is, which confirms in some material particulars not only the evidence that the crime has been committed, but also that the prisoner committed it, although it is not necessary that there should be confirmation of all the circumstances of the crime. [p. 731, col. 1.]

The corroboration need not be direct evidence that the accused committed the crime; it is sufficient if it is merely circumstantial evidence of his connection with the crime. [ibid.]

When a witness who has made an identification in Jail is unable to identify in the Court of the Committing Magistrate or of the Sessions Judge or in both, his evidence of identification, though weak, is not inadmissible in evidence. In such cases outside evidence is admissible to prove that the witness did make such identification and the circumstances in which he made it, though the question as to what weight may be given to it will depend on the facts of each case. [p. 732, col. 1.]

Abdul Wahab v. Emperor (10), relied on.

Nagina v. Emperor (9), dissented from.

A confession of a co-accused in a case of conspiracy is admissible in evidence against all the accused under the provisions of s. 10 of the Evidence Act. It can also be taken into consideration against his co-accused under s. 30 of the Act. [p. 734, col. 2.]

The gravity of a robbery is not extenuated by the fact that it was committed not for the personal gain of the robbers but solely in order to obtain funds for the furtherance of a political cause which the robbers had at heart. [p. 787, col. 1.]

JUDGMENT.—Between the 28th and the 31st of January, 1925, a four-page printed pamphlet was circulated secretly by post and by hand in the United Provinces and other parts of India. This pamphlet bore the name of no printing press. The heading was "The Revolutionary—An Organ of the Revolutionary Party of India". It was called the first number of the first volume, and bore the date of the 1st January, 1925.

This was the first paragraph :

" 'Chaos is necessary to the birth of a new star' and the birth of life is accompanied by agony and pain. India is also taking a new birth, and is passing through that inevitable phase, when chaos and agony shall play their destined role, when all calculations shall prove futile, when the wise and the mighty shall be bewildered by the simple and the weak, when great empires shall crumble down and new nations shall arise and surprise humanity with the splendour and glory which shall be all its own."

In continuation it was stated that a new power had come into existence in India, that power being the revolutionary movement amongst young men, which in spite of all opposition would eventually triumph. This movement had withstood repression for twenty years. It was now stronger than ever before, and its prospects were brighter. The writer then proceeded to justify the movement on the ground that India was ruled without justification by foreigners whose authority rested on domination by the sword. The sword of these foreigners was to be met by the sword of the Indians.

The writer then proceeded to declare the "immediate" object of the revolutionary party which was "to establish a Federal Republic of the United States of India by an organised and armed revolution." Under this Republic there would be universal suffrage, nationalisation of railways, mines, leading manufactures and the shipping industry. The Legislature would control the executive. The aims of the revolutionary party were stated to be international rather than national "and in this respect it follows the footsteps of the great Indian Rishis of the glorious past and of Bolshevik Russia in the modern age." There would be equal rights for all communities, general co-operation and a spiritual recognition of the realities of life.

The writer continued that the time was not ripe for the disclosure of the policy and the programme of the party. The party reserved to itself freedom to associate or not to associate with the Indian Congress. Then follow the words : "But this party views all constitutional agitations in the country with contempt and ridicule." After some amplification of this idea came the following passage—

"Young Indians ! Shake off your illusions, face realities with a stout heart, and do not avoid struggles, difficulties and sacrifices. The inevitable is to come. Do not be misguided any more. Peace and tranquillity you cannot have and India's liberty can never be achieved through peaceful and legal means. The following memorable words of a great English author Mr. Robertson may serve to make the wise men of India wiser still.

"The movement and programme of reform was mainly the achievement of Irish and Protestant leaders to whom British statesmen had revealed the fatal secret that England could be bullied but not argued into justice and generosity'. (England under the Hanoverians, page 197). 'Indian public leaders are still ignorant of this 'fatal secret' or else they are foolishly wise to ignore it."

The writer then proceeded to dispute the accuracy of the view that Indians were unable to drive the British out of India by force of arms. The pamphlet concluded as follows :—

"A few words more about terrorism and anarchism. These two words are playing the most mischievous part in India to-day. They are being invariably misapplied whenever any reference to the revolutionaries is to be made because it is so very convenient to denounce the revolutionaries under that name. The Indian revolutionaries are neither terrorists nor anarchists. They never aim at spreading anarchy in the land, and, therefore, they can never properly be called anarchists. Terrorism is never their object and they cannot be called terrorists. They do not believe that terrorism alone can bring independence and they do not want terrorism for terrorism's sake, although they may at times resort to this method as a very effective means of retaliation. The present Government exists solely because the foreigners have successfully been able to terrorise the Indian people. The Indian people do not love their English masters, they do not want them to be here; but they do help the Britishers simply because they are terribly afraid of them; and this very fear resists the Indians from extending their helping hands to the revolutionaries, not that they do not love them.

"This official terrorism is surely to be met by counter-terrorism. A spirit of utter helplessness pervades every strata of our society and terrorism is an effective means of restoring the proper spirits in the society without which progress will be difficult. Moreover the English masters and their hired lackeys can never be allowed to do whatever they like, unhampered, unmolested. Every possible difficulty and resistance must be thrown in their way. Terrorism has an international bearing also because the attentions of the enemies of England are at once drawn towards India through the acts of terrorism and revolutionary demonstrations and the revolutionaries are thereby able to form an alliance with them, and thus expedite the speedy attainment of India's deliverance. But this revolutionary party has deliberately abstained itself from entering into this terrorist campaign at the present moment even at the greatest provocation in the form of outrages committed on their sisters and mothers by the agents of a foreign Government, simply because the party is waiting to deliver the final blow. But when expediency will demand it the party will unhesitatingly enter into a desperate campaign of terrorism, when the life of every officer and the individual who will be helping the foreign rulers in any way will be made intolerable, be he Indian or European, high or low. But even then the party will never forget that terrorism is not their object, and they will try incessantly to organise a band of selfless and devoted workers who will devote their best energies towards the political and social emancipation of their country. They will always remember that 'the making of nations requires the self-sacrifice of thousands of obscure men and women who care more for the idea of their country than for their own comfort or interest, their own lives and the lives of those whom they love.'

President, Central Council,
The R. P. of India."

Vijay Kumar was a fictitious name.

Many copies of this pamphlet are proved to have been distributed over districts in the United Provinces between the 28th and the 31st January, 1925. Other copies are proved to have been distributed in other Provinces. Inspector Nestor has proved that three hundred and six copies were received in eighteen districts in this Province and handed over to or recovered by the Government Authorities. The recipients were for the most part school masters and school boys. In all cases the source from which these pamphlets had come was not revealed.

About a month previous to the distribution of these pamphlets (that is to say on Christmas Day of 1924), an armed gang robbery (or dacoity) was committed in Bamrauli, a large village in the Pilibhit District, adjoining the border of the Shah-jahanpur District. The house of Baldeo Prasad, a money-lender and sugar factory owner, was attacked by a gang of twenty or twenty-five men about an hour after sunset. Fire-arms were in possession of certain members of the gang and operations commenced with gun fire. Baldeo Prasad climbed up to the roof of the house, and, finding that certain dacoits were ascending the ladder from the courtyard to the roof, endeavoured to resist them. A shot was fired at him which hit him in the neck. He then rushed from his roof to the roof of the house of a neighbour, and while running was shot again. Neither wound was fatal, and he survived. Villagers assembled and made an attempt to disperse the dacoits by throwing bricks at them. The dacoits fired many shots at them. Mohan, a Bamrauli resident, who was a village wrestler, challenged the dacoits to come down and fight the matter out as between man and man. A dacoit fired at him at close quarters, shot him through the abdomen, and killed him instantaneously. Six other men in addition to Baldeo Prasad received wounds from fire-arms, none of which were fatal. The dacoits pillaged the house and eventually made good their escape with Rs. 1,600 in cash and some three thousand to four thousand worth of ornaments, leaving behind them one man shot dead and seven men wounded.

On the 9th March, 1925, a similar armed dacoity was committed in Bichpuri, another village in the Pilibhit District. The victims on this occasion were Toti, a well-to-do Kurmi cultivator with a holding of some thirty-six acres; his brother Behari and their wives and children. A gang of over fifteen men raided their house between 9 P. M. and 10 P. M. Some of the members of the gang were in possession of fire-arms. The dacoits used considerable violence on the inmates and employed torture. One of them seized Toti's young son, placed the edge of a knife at his throat and threatened to cut his throat, if Toti did not disclose where his money and valuables were concealed. The boy was not, however, seriously injured. Toti was nearly throttled. The point of a knife was placed against each of his eyes and he was threatened with blindness if he did not give up his property. He was not blinded but he received a cut under one eye. Finally a cloth soaked in oil was inserted between his legs. The cloth was then set alight. In spite of this maltreatment he disclosed very little. The dacoits managed to secure Rs. 800 or Rs. 900 worth of property. Only a few shots were fired on this occasion. Two men received injuries from fire-arms, one of whom Sham Lal subsequently died. The other Dulli recovered. The dacoits made good their escape with the stolen property.

On the 24th May, 1925, a third armed dacoity was committed at Dwarkapur in the Partabgarh District on the house of a certain Sheoratan Vaish. His house was attacked between 8 P. M. and 9 P. M. by eight or nine men who had fire-arms and other weapons. Sheoratan was bitten in the arm, struck three times over the head with a hatchet, and robbed of property worth about Rs. 2,000. The dacoits used fire-arms freely. A villager called Ram Saran was shot dead and four other villagers received wounds from fire-arms. The dacoits made good their escape with the stolen property.

On the 9th August, 1925, a fourth armed dacoity was committed. This dacoity was of a character unusual in India. A Railway train known as the 8 Down was proceeding on the broad gauge line of the East Indian Railway on its way towards Lucknow. It left Kakori Railway Station which is eight miles from Lucknow shortly after 7 P. M. When it had reached a place a mile the other side of the distant signal a man pulled the communication cord of the alarm signal in a second class compartment and the train was brought to a stand-still. Certain persons, some of whom were armed with fire-arms, got out of the train. When the guard descended to inquire the cause of the stoppage certain men got into the brake-van. The guard was thrown down, overpowered and threatened with death. A heavy safe containing Railway takings was heaved by some of these men out of the brake-van on to the permanent way. The safe was broken open with tools which had clearly been brought for the purpose. While some of the men were breaking open the safe, others posted themselves on each side of the train. Cries were raised by the dacoits that their object was not to injure private persons but to take "Sarkari property." This would mean either the property of Government or the property of the Railway Company. They also informed the passengers that any passenger who left the train would do so at the risk of his life. A fusillade of shots was maintained on each side of the train. Most of the passengers accepted the warning and remained inside. A Muhammadan legal practitioner Ahmad Ali left his carriage in spite of the warning. He got on the permanent way and was shot dead. In about half an hour the safe was opened and its contents consisting of Rs. 4,553-3-6 were abstracted. The dacoits then decamped with the plunder having escaped interference. The train then proceeded on its way to Lucknow.

It was not until after the commission of the train robbery that the existence of a conspiracy, the organ of which was "The Revolutionary" and the fruits of which were these four dacoities, was suspected by the Police authorities. No theory was evolved until the deputation of Mr. R. A. Horton, a Superintendent of Police of the Criminal Investigation Department, to investigate occurrence of the 9th August, 1925. He took charge of this investigation on the 14th August, 1925. For reasons (which, as will be seen later, were justified) he turned his attention to the actions of certain suspects, and after interception of correspondence, communication with his own department and Criminal Investigation Departments in other Provinces, receipt of secret information and inquiries based on information received, he issued warrants of arrest on the 28th September, 1925. Certain arrests took place under these warrants. Amongst the persons arrested were two men called Banarsi Lal and Banwari Lal and a boy called Indu Bhushan Mittra. As a result of the statements made by Banarsi Lal, Mr. Horton formed the opinion that the dacoities in Bamrauli and Bichpuri and the train dacoity were the work of persons engaged in a conspiracy against British Rule. He subsequently on internal evidence formed the opinion that the Dwarikapur dacoity was also the work of the same gang. Statements made by Banwari Lal and Indu Bhushan Mittra confirmed his opinion in respect of the train dacoity.

As a result, the Local Government, U P., issued sanction (Ex. P-2) on the 2nd December, 1925, for the prosecution of twenty-four persons and sanction (Ex. P-7) on the 23rd December, 1925, for the prosecution of three other persons, and sanction (Ex. P-341) for the prosecution of one more person. Saiyid Ainuddin, a First Class Magistrate, was appointed Special Magistrate in respect of the committal proceedings. He framed charges against twenty-one of these persons on the 16th April, 1926. These twenty-one persons were tried by Mr. Hamilton, Sessions Judge, appointed specially for the purpose. He decided the case by a judgment dated 6th April, 1927. The recording of the evidence in that case took about eight months. In that case Mr. Hamilton convicted the following persons on charges under the following sections—

He acquitted Hargovind and Sachindra Nath Biewas. The trial of a man called Damodar Sarup was postponed owing to his illness. Mr. Hamilton sentenced Ram Prasad Bismil, Rajendra Nath Lahiri and Raushan Singh to death subject to confirmation by this Court and also to other sentences. He sentenced Sachindra Nath Sanyal to transportation for life. He sentenced the remainder to various terms of imprisonment.

Ram Prasad, Rajendra Nath Lahiri and Raushan Singh appeal against their convictions and sentences. The references in confirmation are also before us. Jogesh Chandra Chatterji, Suresh Chandra Bhattacharji, Vishnu Saran Dublis, Manmatha Nath Gupta, Govind Charan Kar, Makundi Lal, Ram Kishan Khattri, Prem Kishan Khanna, Raj Kumar Sinha, Ram Dulare Trivedi, Ram Nath Pande and Parnawesh Kumar Chatterji also appeal.

The Local Government has applied for enhancement of sentences on Jogesh Chandra Chatterji, Suresh Chandra Bhattacharji, Vishnu Saran Dublis, Manmatha Nath Gupta, Govind Charan Kar and Makundi Lal. Parnawesh Kumar Chatterji has since withdrawn his allegations of innocence, admitted the justice of his conviction and thrown himself on the mercy of the Court, Sachindra Nath Sanyal, Bhupendra Nath Sanyal and Banwari Lal have not appealed. The period in which they could have filed an appeal has now expired. Ashfaqullah Khan and Sachindra Nath Bakhshi are persons whose prosecution has been sanctioned by the Local Government. They were not apprehended in time to take their trial with the persons already mentioned.

Ashfaqullah Khan was committed by Saiyid Ainuddin, Special Magistrate, on the 14th December, 1926. Sachindra Nath Bakhshi was committed by the same Magistrate on the 9th March, 1927. They were tried together by Mr. J. R. W. Bennett, Special Sessions Judge, and convicted by him in a judgment dated 13th July, 1927. Ashfaqullah Khan has been convicted on charges under ss. 121-A, 120-B and s. 396 of the Indian Penal Code, and sentenced to death subject to confirmation by this Court and to other sentences. Sachindra Nath Bakhshi has been convicted on the same charges and sentenced to transportation for life. Ashfaqullah Khan has appealed. The arguments in his Appeal No. 380 of 1927 were heard by this Bench on the 3rd and 4th August, 1927, before the consideration of this judgment. Sachindra Nath Bakhshi has not yet appealed but there is still time within which he can appeal.

The conduct of the cases in Mr. Hamilton's Court and the conduct of the appeals in this Court have been distinguished by incidents which are exceptional in the hearing of criminal cases in Oudh. As all the persons tried by Mr. Hamilton were charged with offences punishable with death, the Local Government, in compliance with a practice that was introduced a few years ago, offered every one of the accused persons legal assistance. Some of the accused persons took advantage of this offer, others provided themselves with Counsel who were remunerated privately. The accused persons took in some instances the peculiar position of retaining a Counsel for a short period, then discarding him and replacing him by another Counsel or defending the case in person. After discarding the Counsel he was frequently employed again. The procedure was a procedure not to be commended. It placed the Court in a position of very great difficulty and no advantage was gained by its adoption. The result was an unavoidable friction and protraction of the proceedings. Further the hearing of the case in Mr. Hamilton's Court was considerably delayed by resorts to hunger striking. Objections which were frequently of a most frivolous character were lodged in very great numbers. The most pertinacious of the accused persons was Ram Prasad. When the appeals were filed the three appellants Ram Prasad, Rajendra Nath Lahiri and Raushan Singh, who were sentenced to death subject to confirmation by this Court, became entitled, under a practice of the Local Government which has been in force for some years, to legal assistance at the expense of the Crown. The appellants, who had not been sentenced to death, were not under this practice entitled to legal assistance at the expense of the Crown. But as a special case the Crown has allowed those, who did not appoint private Counsel, legal assistance and paid for it. Ram Prasad in his petition of appeal demanded as of right to select his own Counsel. He stated that he would only be satisfied if he was represented by a gentleman called Mr. Gobind Ballabh Panth; and, if he were not represented by Mr.

Gobind Ballabh Panth, he demanded that he should be allowed to argue his appeal in person. The Crown approached Mr. Gobind Ballabh Panth and offered him the brief. He refused to accept it on the fee that the Crown was ready to pay. The Crown then approached Mr. L. S. Misra, a Barrister at-Law of seven years standing, offering him the same fee which had been offered to Mr. Gobind Ballabh Panth. Mr. Misra accepted the brief. Ram Prasad submitted a petition from the Jail stating that he refused to accept Mr. L. S. Misra as his Counsel and refused to instruct him. He demanded that he should be allowed to argue his appeal in person. Under the practice which has been prevalent in the late Court of the Judicial Commissioner and of this Court without interruption, convicts appealing from Jail in the manner that Ram Prasad appealed, are not permitted to argue their appeals in person. It is clear that a rule of practice has to be laid down to cover all cases. If one convict is permitted to argue in person, all convict appellants should be permitted to do so. The practical difficulties against permitting them to do so would be very great. There are some five hundred convict appellants who appeal to this Court in the course of a year, and the difficulties of arranging for their escorts from Jail to the Court and for their return would be formidable. But the objection to permission to convict appellants arguing in person is founded in the main not on convenience but on their own interests. It is our opinion that practically no Indian convict will gain anything by arguing his appeal in person. All such persons have had full opportunity of stating their cases in the lower Court. If they were permitted to argue their appeals they would usually do themselves more harm than good. In the particular case of Ram Prasad, if he had argued his appeal in person, he would have exposed himself to having to answer objections which his lawyer could answer without implicating his client. Ram Prasad, however, withdrew in the end his objections to Mr. L. S. Misra, subsequently instructed him, and finally expressed his confidence in Mr. Misra's advocacy. In addition he has written himself, and supplied written arguments which we have had printed and which cover seventy-six printed pages. These arguments have been considered by us. Rajendra Nath Lahiri at first applied to be represented by Mr. R. F. Bahadurji, Barrister-at-Law. Mr. Bahadurji had left India before these appeals came on for hearing. He subsequently asked that he should be represented by Mr. H. C. Dutt, Barrister-at-Law. Mr. H. C. Dutt was appointed to represent him. Raushan Singh in his petition of appeal demanded that he should be represented by Dr. J. N. Misra. Dr. J. N. Misra was appointed to represent him. Both Mr. H. C. Dutt and Dr. Misra argued on behalf of Rajendra Nath Lahiri and Raushan Singh, their fees being paid by the Local Government. But in addition to these gentlemen, Mr. Chatterji, a leading Counsel of the Calcutta Bar, assisted by Mr. Chaudhri who is also a Counsel from Calcutta, argued the appeals on behalf of these two persons. Of the remaining appellants Prem Kishan Khanna was represented by Mr. John Jackson, a leading Counsel of Lucknow. Vishnu Saran Dublis was represented by Mr. Kapil Dev Malaviya from Allahabad. The above gentlemen were private Counsel. Mr. H. N. Misra appointed by the Crown appeared for Ram Nath Pande, Surash Chandra Bhattacharji, Ram Dulare, Raj Kumar, Makundi Lal and Parnawesh Kumar Chatterji. Mr. N. C. Dutt appointed by the Crown appeared for Manmatha Nath Gupta, Ram Kishan, Jogesh Chandra and Govind Charan Kar. There was a suggestion made by Ram Prasad Bismil that the Counsel appointed by the Crown had not been given a sufficient opportunity of studying their briefs. There is no foundation whatever for this suggestion. The Counsel in question were given a sufficient time for the study of their briefs. It is quite clear that the time allowed was sufficient, as we were pleased to note that in every instance the cases had been prepared with the greatest care, and the learned Counsel engaged had mastered the facts and the law in a manner which did them considerable credit.

There are certain preliminary points of law of which we can dispose at the beginning. These points were raised by the learned Counsel. Mr. Chatterji took objection to the joinder of charges under ss. 121-A and 120-B and maintained that this joinder vitiated the trial. We are not of opinion that there was any irregularity in the joinder of these charges, and we consider that on the facts it was not necessary to frame separate charges. The accused persons were all charged with conspiring to deprive His Majesty the King of the Sovereignty of British India, of conspiracy to wage war against the Government, and of conspiring to overawe the Government by means of criminal force. They were, therefore, rightly charged under s. 121-A. Apart from the conspiracy to effect these objects, there was, however, disclosed on the evidence a conspiracy to commit dacoities either accompanied by murder or not accompanied by murder, and thus certain of the conspirators were liable to punishment under s. 120-B for being party to a criminal conspiracy to commit offences punishable with death or transportation for life. The actual participation in dacoities with murder formed ground for separate charges and the joinder of all these charges was regular and legal, as all these offences formed part of the same transaction.

Some objections were taken as to the non-calling of witnesses. These objections will be dealt with when we come to the appeals of individual accused. It is sufficient to state here that in no case have these objections been substantiated. These are all the legal objections that were argued by the learned Counsel at the Bar. All other objections were withdrawn.

We have, however, to consider certain legal objections which were taken by Ram Prasad Bismil in his written arguments to this Court or taken in the Court below and not pressed here. It is unnecessary to take Ram Prasad's objections as disclosed in his written arguments in great detail as his learned Counsel Mr. L. S. Misra has dealt sufficiently with them. Ram Prasad's objections are mainly contained in a comprehensive attack upon Mr. Hamilton, upon Pandit Jagat Narain the learned Counsel who has appeared for the Crown both in Mr. Hamilton's Court and in appeal, upon Mr. Horton, upon the Police and practically upon everybody who has had any connection with the case. He has not only suggested that Mr. Hamilton was not impartial but he has suggested that he was deliberately dishonest. He has made similar attacks upon every one else. We have been through the very lengthy record, the mass of applications and the whole of the protracted proceedings and after examination of everything we are convinced of the following facts. The preparation of the case in so far as it was made by the Police Authorities was throughout in the hands of Mr. Horton who made himself personally responsible for the production of every piece of evidence. We here state our appreciation of the industry and capacity shown by Mr. Horton in the collection of the evidence. The skill displayed in its presentation deserves the highest appreciation. The conduct of the case was in the hands of Pandit Jagat Narain, a very senior and very competent Counsel. We appreciate highly the manner in which Pandit Jagat Narain conducted the case. But our appreciation is not only of the ability with which the case was put up. Our highest appreciation is reserved for the scrupulous fairness with which it was presented against the individual accused persons. The prosecution, if we may say so, was, almost ultra-scrupulous. It refused to press a single point unless it felt itself on the surest ground. Mr. Hamilton showed exemplary patience and an absolute impartiality in his handling of the case. He showed very high gifts in his appreciation of the evidence which he weighed with care. The learned Judge and the Crown Counsel were exposed to a series of studied impertinences from certain of the accused persons, and we are constrained to express our disapproval of the conduct of certain of the Counsel for the defence. We have in our mind a particular passage in a written objection filed by a member of the Lucknow Bar in which he transgressed the rules of conduct that should distinguish a Counsel in addressing a Judge. The allegations and aspersions made by Ram Prasad have been considered carefully by us and we find them to be absolutely baseless. The extraordinary impertinence displayed by this accused is apparent from an application which he filed on the 26th January, 1927, in which he withdrew his defence witnesses. This application is as follows:—

"Sir,

I have been watching the case from day to day and every new day brought home to me new instances of gross partiality on your Honour's part. I was not astonished; because the attitude of the Government was apparent to all concerned when it appointed you as the trial Judge in this case (The Kakori Conspiracy Case). But still I thought each day that perhaps I may be biased, that perhaps I was judging too hastily, that possibly this day will be the last bitter day. But my hopes always proved to be illusive. I found you showing more interest in establishing the prosecution case than the prosecution Counsel himself. In fact in good many instances you had put questions in such a suggestive form that the prosecution Counsel himself felt ashamed to put those questions. You almost always interrupted the defence cross-examination so obstinately that there remained no other alternative, except either to come to blows with you or to submit to your high-handedness with flushed faces and blood curdling in one's veins."

There is much more in the same strain. The only point of law raised by Ram Prasad in his written arguments which is worth considering in detail is an objection to the committal. His objection is based on the following fact. Saiyid Ainuddin, as has already been stated, was appointed as Special Magistrate. One of his duties in connection with the proceedings was supervision of Jail identifications. He conducted all the Jail identifications in person. As it was known that the appellants would criticise the conduct of the Jail identifications it was clear that Saiyid Ainuddin would be required to give evidence on oath as to the manner in which they were conducted. Ordinarily his evidence would have been taken for the first time in the Court of Session. The method adopted would be to call him as a Court witness. But Saiyid Ainuddin, in order to give the defence a better opportunity of preparing their criticisms on the conduct of the investigation, took the unusual course of going into the witness-box during the committal proceedings. This course was unusual. There is a precedent for a similar procedure in Emperor v. Nanhe (1). A learned Judge of the Allahabad High Court refused to set aside a conviction in a case in which a Magistrate had actually given evidence before himself in a case which he subsequently convicted himself. It certainly would appear to be open to objection for a Magistrate to decide on the value of his own evidence but where the Magistrate, as here, had not to decide but solely to commit, there is nothing objectionable to the course adopted by Saiyid Ainuddin and it is clear that the result so far from prejudicing the accused persons assisted them in their defence. We do not find that this action taken by Saiyid Ainuddin has either vitiated the committal or the trial. We here leave the general objections on points of law. It is to be noted that the only objections pressed by Counsel in this appeal were the objections as to the joinder of the charges and as to the non-calling of the witnesses in certain instances. As we have said we shall deal with the latter point later.

Before we proceed with the remainder of the judgment we think it desirable to express our appreciation of the admirable manner in which the appeals have been argued before us. The learned Counsel for the appellants have argued fairly and have argued capably. The reply on behalf of the Crown could not have been better. We wish to say a special word as to the assistance that the Court has received in comprehending the record and examining the documents from Mr. Khairat Nabi, Rai Saheb Durga Prasad and Khan Saheb Saiyid Hasan specially deputed officers of the Criminal Investigation Department who have worked in open Court assisting us in dealing with the documentary evidence.

We have first to make some general observations as to the method which we have adopted in approaching certain portions of the case. We are not dealing here with controversial points, as there has been no controversy on these questions. The first point that we have to note is the construction to be placed upon the provisions of s. 10 of the Indian Evidence Act. This section renders admissible in cases of conspiracy much evidence which is not ordinarily admissible under the Indian Law. The provisions of the section are wider than those of the English Law. Under it anything said, done or written by any conspirator in reference to the common intention of the conspiracy after the time when such intention was first entertained by any conspirator is a relevant fact as against each of the persons believed to be so conspiring as well for the purposes of proving the existence of the conspiracy as for the purpose of showing that any such person was a party to it. The illustration shows the width of the provisions of the section. It is laid down that where a person is shown prima facie to be a conspirator, evidence that a second conspirator procured arms, a third collected money, a fourth persuaded persons to join the conspiracy, a fifth published writings advocating the object, a sixth sent money to a seventh, and an eighth wrote a letter giving an account of the conspiracy is relevant as evidence and admissible against him to prove his complicity though he was ignorant of all these events and although the persons in question were strangers to him.

We have next to state the manner in which we have approached the evidence of accomplices. The evidence of accomplices is always admissible and is always relevant but under a very old practice of the Courts in England such evidence is accepted only with great caution and after the closest scrutiny, and is not usually accepted against any individual person unless it is corroborated. Although it is not illegal to convict on the uncorroborated evidence of an accomplice, there is a consensus of opinion that a conviction on the uncorroborated evidence of an accomplice is rarely justifiable. The practice in India is the same as the practice in England. We have followed that practice in this case, but while following the practice we have considered very carefully a comparatively recent pronouncement of the Court of Criminal Appeal in England consisting of the Chief Justice and four other learned Judges which is reported in R. v. Baskerville (2). The facts in appeal were these. A male person was convicted of an offence punishable under s. 11 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, with two boys. The only direct evidence of the commission of the acts charged was that of the boys themselves who on their own statement were accomplices. The only corroboration of the boys' statements was contained in the contents of a letter sent by the prisoner to one of the boys enclosing a Treasury note for ten shillings. The words of the letter were capable of an innocent construction. This letter was, however, considered sufficient corroboration and the conviction was upheld. In the judgment in this appeal their Lordships have stated the law in the following words:

"There is no doubt that the uncorroborated evidence of an accomplice is admissible in law: see R. v. Atwood (3).

(2) (1916) 2 K. B. 658; 86 L. J. K. B. 28; 115 L. T. 453; 80 J. P. 446; 60 S. J. 696.

(3) (1788) 1 Leach 464; 168 E. R. 534.

But it has long been a rule of practice at Common Law for the Judge to warn the Jury of the danger of convicting a prisoner on the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice or accomplices, and, in the discretion of the Judge, to advise them not to convict upon such evidence; but the Judge should point out to the Jury that it is within their legal province to convict upon such unconfirmed evidence: R. v. Stubbs (4), In re Meunier (5).....

"As the rule of practice at Common Law was founded originally upon the exercise of the discretion of the Judge at the trial, and, moreover, as it is anomalous in its nature, inasmuch as it requires confirmation of the testimony of a competent witness, it is not surprising that this rule should have led to differences of opinion as to the nature and extent of the corroboration required, although there are propositions of law applicable to corroboration which are beyond controversy. For example, 'confirmation does not mean that there should be independent evidence of that which the accomplice relates, or his testimony would be unnecessary': R. v. Mullins (6), per Maule, J. Indeed, if it were required that the accomplice should be confirmed in every detail of the crime, his evidence would not be essential to the case, it would be merely confirmatory of other and independent testimony. Again, the corroboration must be by some evidence other than that of an accomplice, and, therefore, one accomplice's evidence is not corroboration of the testimony of another accomplice: R. v. Noakes (7).....

...After examining these and other authorities to the present date, we have come to the conclusion that the better opinion of the law upon this point is that stated in R. v. Stubbs (4) by Parke, B., namely, that the evidence of an accomplice must be confirmed not only as to the circumstances of the crime, but also as to the identity of the prisoner. The learned Baron does not mean that there must be confirmation of all the circumstances of the crime; as we have already stated, that is unnecessary. It is sufficient if there is confirmation as to a material circumstance of the crime and of the identity of the accused in relation to the crime. Parke, B., gave this opinion as a result of twenty-five years' practice; it was accepted by the other Judges, and has been much relied upon in later cases. In R. v. Wilkes (8) Alderson, B., said: 'The confirmation which I always advise Juries to require, is a confirmation of the accomplice in some fact which goes to fix the guilt on the particular person charged. You may legally convict on the evidence of an accomplice only, if you can safely rely on his testimony; but I advise Juries never to act on the evidence of an accomplice, unless he is confirmed as to the particular person who is charged with the offence'.....

"We hold that evidence in corroboration must be independent testimony which affects the accused by connecting or tending to connect him with the crime. In other words, it must be evidence which implicates him, that is, which confirms in some material particular not only the evidence that the crime has been committed, but also that the prisoner committed it.....

"The corroboration need not be direct evidence that the accused committed the crime; it is sufficient if it is merely circumstantial evidence of his connection with the crime."

We have next to make some general observations on the manner in which the Jail identifications were conducted. The practice adopted in this case was that when a person had been arrested charged with complicity in the conspiracy he was removed from the place of his arrest to a Jail where he was in the custody of Jail officials and not of Police officials. After a certain period he was placed in a line which consisted partly of suspects but mainly of persons who were not suspected of complicity in a crime. All these persons were dressed in a manner which would prevent witnesses from recognizing a suspect by peculiarities of costume. Witnesses to the offences were then called in one by one. Saiyid. Ainuddin was present at all identification proceedings. No two witnesses were allowed to communicate with one another. As each man completed his observation of the persons in the line he was put in a place where he could not communicate with any one else. As far as possible persons were selected of the same class and position in life as the suspects. The suspects were permitted to change their places in the line from time to time. They were permitted to alter their personal appearance by changing their clothes or by shaving, or having their hair cut or in other manners. After the identification proceedings were over Saiyid Ainuddin prepared a note embodying the results. These notes have been proved in the case. Saiyid Ainuddin has been examined as a witness and cross-examined at great length. In this Court no suggestion has been made by any learned Counsel that these identification proceedings were unfair in any respect, but before the learned Sessions Judge sweeping allegations were made against the honesty of the identification proceedings. Our conclusion as to the manner in which the identification proceedings were conducted is that they were conducted most carefully and absolutely honestly and that every precaution was taken to prevent dishonest or careless identification. In fact our criticism is that in a desire to protect the interests of the suspects the learned Magistrate was possibly inclined to place difficulties in the path of honest identifying witnesses.

We have here to touch upon a point which arises out of the identifications. There have been occasions in this case in which witnesses who identified in Jail a suspect in connection with a particular offence were unable subsequently to identify that suspect either in the Court of the Committing Magistrate or in the Court of the Sessions Judge or in both. It was argued in the Court below (although it was not argued here) that evidence of identification in the Jail could not be treated as subsequent independent evidence in the trial as such identification amounts to statements either expressed or implied made by certain persons that the individuals whom they pointed out were persons whom they recognized as having been concerned in a particular crime. Such statements not having been made on oath and having been made in the course of extra judicial proceedings they were admissible not as substantive evidence in the case, but merely as evidence to corroborate or contradict their statements in Court and as such were not admissible in evidence. The authority for this proposition is a decision of a Bench of two learned Judges of the Allahabad High Court which is reported as Nagina v. Emperor (9). With great respect to the learned Judges who decided that appeal we are of opinion that although there is much that is correct in their observations the decision has omitted certain necessary qualifications. Reading the decision as it stands, it would almost appear that the learned Judges laid down that in no circumstances was the evidence of such identification admissible. We cannot accept that conclusion. In our opinion if it is proved that the victim of a certain dacoity was present at Jail identification proceedings, and there stated in the presence of a third party that he identified a certain person as having taken part in the dacoity, it is permissible to produce evidence in a subsequent case that he made such an identification even if he has failed to identify that person in Court. In certain cases it might be impossible for a witness to identify again in Court. After having made the Jail identification the witness might lose his eye-sight and in such a case it would not be physically possible for him to repeat his identification. In a subsequent case in Abdul Wahab v. Emperor (10) another Bench of the Allahabad High Court supplemented the decision in Nagina v. Emperor (9) by pointing out how such an identification could be proved in evidence. We agree with the conclusion of the learned Judges in the latter case. It is noted in the present case that when a witness who made an identification in Jail was unable to repeat it in Court, outside evidence has been called to prove that the witness did make such identification and the circumstances in which he made it, and we find that evidence of this nature is admissible. The question as to what weight is to be given to this evidence will be decided in the individual cases of each particular appellant. Obviously, when a man has made an identification in Jail proceedings and has been unable to repeat that identification in Court, his evidence of identification will be weakened but in the circumstances which we have detailed the evidence is admissible. Its value will be considered separately.

Finally, we have to state the method in which we have approached the evidence as to the handwriting of particular appellants. The method adopted of proving the handwriting in this case has been by the production in some instances of witnesses who have proved that they were acquainted with the handwriting of the appellants. The main evidence, however, has been the evidence of a certain Mr. Stott, a gentleman who is employed by the Government of India to report upon questions of handwriting. The course adopted has been to prove by outside evidence that a certain document is in the handwriting of a particular appellant.

The handwriting of the documents which the prosecution has endeavoured to prove against him has been compared by Mr. Stott with proved or admitted handwriting. We may call the latter handwriting the standard handwriting. Mr. Stott made his comparisons privately but repeated and explained them in open Court. We have examined Mr. Stott's evidence carefully and are satisfied that Mr. Stott is competent to express an opinion upon the points to which he has deposed. We have been particularly struck by the fact that he does not rely upon fanciful theories, and that his comparison is the comparison of a practical intelligent man with a wide experience of the subject based upon conclusions which appeal to practical men. We have not, however, accepted Mr. Stott's opinion as final. In every instance we have ourselves compared the handwriting of the documents proposed to be proved with the standard handwriting of the particular appellant. We have used Mr. Stott's evidence to assist and supplement our own observations. We have derived much benefit from his observations but our findings are based upon what we have observed for ourselves. In every instance we find ourselves in agreement with Mr. Stott.

The evidence in this case is voluminous, and the points are not always easy to grasp. Very many questions of fact and law have been discussed. Every important point which was raised before the trial Court has been argued at length by the learned Counsel for the appellants and the learned Counsel for the Crown. We have already touched on some of these questions and reference will be made in detail later to many more, but we are not attempting to make a reference to all the arguments. It would be impossible to discuss every question raised, unless the judgment were permitted to extend to an undesirable size. Arguments of a transient character will not receive special comment in this judgment. No advantage will be gained by discussing them. It is to be remembered that the arguments in these appeals have lasted for sixteen working days. The arguments have been concentrated arguments. There has been little reiteration or repetition. Although we shall not discuss every individual argument, there is not a single argument advanced before us which has not been considered.

We shall first state the evidence as to the existence of the general conspiracy. Where that evidence is the evidence of accomplices, we shall note the corroboration mainly as to the existence of the conspiracy, but we shall forestall some of the conclusions at which we have arrived in respect of corroboration as to the individual conspirator. Wherever in this portion of the judgment we state the conclusion that the evidence of an accomplice is corroborated as against an individual conspirator our reasons for the conclusion will be found in detail in that portion of the judgment which deals with his individual case.

The first witness is the accomplice Banarsi Lal who was arrested in this case and subsequently given pardon. Banarsi Lal is a Hindu of Shahjahanpur, a carpenter by caste. He was not a working carpenter, his father having amassed a competence as a contractor. He is now a man of about thirty years of age. His father died when he was seventeen leaving him over Rs. 50,000 in cash and immovable property. He was a spendthrift and dissolute on his own admission and in four years he had wasted practically all his means. In 1921, after he had lost the greater part of his money he engaged in politics and became Secretary to the Local Congress Committee in Shahjahanpur. In connection with his political activities he became acquainted with Ashfaqullah and Ram Prasad. We note here that in this appeal we shall refer to the evidence on the record against Ashfaqullah. By the adoption of this course we are not prejudicing Ashfaqullah in any way. We have already heard his appeal and the conclusions at which we arrive against him in this appeal are the conclusions at which we have arrived against him in his own appeal which will be decided with this appeal. As, however, Sachindra Nath Bakhshi has not yet appealed and there is still time for him to do so, we have refrained from considering the evidence against him in this case, and we have not allowed any discussion upon it. As far as Sachindra Nath Bakhshi is concerned we know nothing as to what he is alleged to have done and have naturally formed no conclusions one way or another in respect of him. Ram Prasad is a man who is now about twenty-eight years of age. His home is in the Gwalior State but for many years he has been residing in Shahjahanpur. We are not prejudicing him by stating that he has been largely engaged in political activities. He has himself pressed on the notice of the Court that he has been largely engaged in political activities, and attributes his prosecution to the fact that these political activities have rendered him an object of undeserved suspicion. Ram Prasad has been for some time carrying on business as the manager of a firm in Shahjahanpur which deals in silk. He had also other business interests. Ashfaqullah is a Pathan of good family and some social position. He is about the same age as Ram Prasad. He resided in Shahjahanpur living on his own means and not engaged in any employment. Ram Prasad and Ashfaqullah and Banarsi Lal were according to Banarsi Lal's evidence great friends. They went together to the meeting of the Congress at Ahmadabad in 1921. Ram Prasad used to lend books to the other two. These books were books extolling revolution as the solution of life. In 1922 the three friends went to the meeting of the Congress in Gaya. Another person present at the Congress was Prem Kishan Khanna, appellant. Prem Kishan is now about twenty-six years of age. He is the son of an Indian Engineer who is on the Staff of the East Indian Railway. He has been working for some years as a contractor in Shahjahanpur.

In 1924, according to Banarsi Lal at the end of the hot weather or at the beginning of the rains, (that is to say about July) a man who has been identified as the appellant Jogesh Chandra Chatterji, came to Shahjahanpur. He passed himself off under names which were clearly fictitious, "Roy Mahasha" or "Roy Dada". This man is a resident of a village in the Dacca District of Bengal. A meeting was held in the house of Ram Prasad at which there were present Jogesh Chandra Chatterji, Ram Prasad, Ram Dulare appellant, Ashfaqullah, Banarsi Lal and a tall man about whom nothing is known. Ram Dulare is a youth who lives in Cawnpore. He apparently does not earn his own living. According to Banarsi Lal this meeting was to discuss the formation of a branch of a revolutionary society in Shahjahanpur. The organisers of this society were Jogesh Chandra Chatterji, Ram Dulare and the tall man. It was decided to form this society. Ram Prasad was appointed provincial organiser. Ashfaqullah was appointed his assistant. Banarsi Lal was enrolled as a sympathiser. According to Banarsi Lal Roy Mahasha had said that the English were to be slain and turned out of India by force and an Independent Indian Republic was to be established. He said that all the public of India was to be armed and to be made acquainted with the aims and objects of this Revolutionary Society. He also said that the money required was to be obtained by dacoities. It was to be collected for getting arms and for propaganda. The propaganda was to be by pamphlets, books, leaflets and other printed matter. Ram Prasad and Ram Dulare were present and supported Roy Mahasha with their remarks. Roy Mahasha said names should not be given or asked and any harm caused by a member to the Society would be punished by death."

A few days afterwards Raushan Singh appellant appeared on the scene. Raushan Singh is a Thakur who has some interest in landed property in a village in the Shahjahanpur District. He is now a man of about thirty-six years of age. Raushan Singh had previously known Ram Dulare. He was an old friend of Banarsi Lal.

We now leave for the present the evidence of Banarsi Lal and come to a statement made by Banwari Lal. Banwari Lal, as has already been said, was one of the accused in this case. He made a full confession on the 3rd January, 1926, before the Special Magistrate. He retracted this confession before the Special Magistrate on the 20th March, 1926. He stated before the Committing Magistrate on that date that he had made this confession under the promise of a pardon, but that, as he was not satisfied with the terms offered him he refused to repeat it. He stated that the confession was absolutely untrue, and had been made by him solely in order to get easily out of the case. On the 18th December, 1926, he resiled from that position before the Sessions Judge. He there stated that his original confession was absolutely true, as far as it went, but that in it he had omitted to mention the name of one accused person as a member of the conspiracy because he wished to shield that person. He said that he had retracted his confession before the Magistrate at the request of Ram Prasad who said it would be to the profit of the remaining accused if he did so. He continued:—

"At first I was unwilling but when Ram Prasad said that it was the opinion of the Counsel that it should be retracted then I agreed. He also said that he had no hope that Banarsi would retract but he had hopes about me and so I agreed. He also said that Mr. Chaudhri will be Counsel for me so I retracted."

He admitted that all the allegations made by him against Mr. Horton were untrue. He was subsequently convicted and sentenced to five years' rigorous imprisonment. He had not appealed and the period in which he could appeal has now expired.

This confession is admissible in evidence against all the appellants under the provisions of s. 10 of the Indian Evidence Act. It can also be taken into consideration against them under the provisions of s. 30 of the same Act. According to this confession he is a Kayasth, aged now about twenty-four, a resident of Osah in the Rae Bareilly District. His father is an estate manager. When he was about sixteen he left the Government High School at which he was a pupil, to show his sympathy with the non-co-operation movement and joined various Nationalist institutions. He worked for the Partabgarh Congress Committee and went to Jail for six months as a result of his activities. Afterwards he lived for some time on and off in Allahabad. According to this confession he met Jogesh Chandra Chatterji in 1923. In Allahabad Jogesh Chandra Chatterji informed him that there were revolutionary societies in the making. Banwari Lal wished to go to Lahore to join the Tilak School of Politics but on Jogesh Chandra's advice he went to Partabgarh to see if he could establish a branch of the Revolutionary Society there.

We now return to Prem Kishan Khanna. On the 31st March, 1924, Prem Kishan Khanna obtained an arms license for possession of a Mauser automatic pistol of German manufacture. This pistol was a .300 loading a magazine containing ten cartridges. He was in a good position to obtain the license, owing to the position held by his father as an Engineer in the superior service of the East Indian Railway Company.

It is proved and admitted that on the 7th August, 1924, Ram Prasad purchased fifty cartridges from the firm of P. N. Biswas and Co., Licensed Dealers in arms and ammunition at Cawnpore. He purchased these cartridges on the authority of Prem Kishan's license. The purchase was made by Ram Prasad in person. The fifty cartridges in question were made up in clips containing ten cartridges each. The cartridges were of German manufacture "Deutsche Waffen Fabrik Mauser." The cartridges were of metal. On the base of each cartridge are the following letters and figures:

Ram Prasad had under the rules to sign in a register as purchaser. He signed the register. He did not sign his own name. He signed the name of "Prem Kishan." This is admitted.

The significance of this incident will be seen when the evidence as to the commission of the dacoities is considered.

On the 18th October, 1924, Jogesh Chandra Chatterji was arrested in Calcutta as a suspicious character. He was arrested by members of the Calcutta Police force. We shall consider the circumstances of his arrest when we consider his individual case. We note here that we are satisfied that on his arrest a paper (Ex. P-198) was found on him. The following was written on this paper in a handwriting unknown—

"A meeting of the P. C. was held on the 3rd October, 1924, in which five among six attended and the following resolutions were passed:—

"1. Keeping in view the fact that more or less efficient representatives acting as or in capacity of district organizers are already posted in the following districts:

"Benares, Allahabad, Partabgarh, Cawnpore, Lucknow, Fatehpur, Jaunpur, Jhansi, Hamirpur, Farukhabad, Mainpuri, Etawah, Agra, Aligarh, Muttra, Bulandshahar, Meerut, Delhi, Etah, Bareilly, Pilibhit, Shahjahanpur, Muzaffargarh.

"The remaining districts of these Provinces be thus divided among the said organizers so long as sufficient number of efficient men are not available to act as district organizer in each district.

"I. Benares, Mirzapur, Ghazipur, Balia, Jaunpur, Azamgarh, Basti, Gorakhpur, Rai Bareilly.

(Sic) "III. Jhansi, Banda.

"II. Cawnpore, Rai Bareilly, Gorakhpur, Unao.

"V. Meerut, Saharanpur, Dehra Dun, Almora, Bijnour, Badaun, Moradabad.

"VI. Shahjahanpur, Nainital, Gahrwal, Lakhimpur, Sitapur, Hardoi.

"VII. As at present there is no member to represent the Fyzabad division consisting of Fyzabad, Bahraich, Gonda, Bara Banki and Sultanpur it is resolved that a suitable member be sent there to take charge of the centre at the earliest opportunity.

"2. That at least rupees one hundred (considered to be the least expenditure in case of dire necessity at present) be raised by subscription from members and sympathisers of the following centres:—

"Benares, Cawnpore, Jhansi, Aligarh, Meerut, and Shahjahanpur, the sum being contributed equally by each centre.

"(a) That at least a subscription of annas four be realised every month from each member of the Association.

"(b) That the above resolution is to be given effect to within the next two months.

"3. That the meeting recognises that the total number of its members up to the present time is about one hundred, the following being the total strength in each centre: Benares 19+Cawnpore 22+Jhansi 15+Aligarh 12, Meerut (not yet received), Shahjahanpur 8.

"4. That the meeting is of the opinion that the following immediate steps be taken as regards its propaganda through newspapers and magazines which can be utilised by the members of different centres:—

- "(a) To set up a campaign against the C. I. D. activities.
- "(b) To set up a campaign against the repressive laws and measures.
- "(c) To criticise the Congress activities that hinder the work of the Association.
- "(d) To preach social revolutionary ideas and communistic principles.
- "(e) To collect stories, episodes and other materials for publication.

"That instead of 5 departments as mentioned in the General Constitutional Rules and Regulations, only 2 departments be set up at present:—

- "(a) Propaganda to be guided by Nos. 1, 3 and 5.
- "(b) Collection of funds and arms by Nos. 2, 4 and 6.

"7. That all the General Constitutional Rules and Regulations be enforced to their entirety except the 6th resolution which was accepted after amendment for the present.

"8. That every possible care be taken as regards the secrecy of the activities of the Association.

"9. That every district organizer should try his best to help the local clubs and associations started with principles which may directly or indirectly promote the cause of revolution and to try to become members of the Congress and take part in its activities whenever advisable putting in view the rules of the Association.

"10. That every district organiser should make arrangements to visit neighbouring villages and labour centres with the object of gaining their sympathy.

"11 That to provide workers with work it is necessary to divide the district activities into three channels—

- "(a) Village works.
- "(b) Secret works.
- "(c) Local social functions and activities connected with clubs and associations."

The Bengal Police did not follow up the clues contained in this document. It is unfortunate that they did not do so. This much, however, should be said to explain their inaction. There was nothing upon this paper to show where the meeting of "P. C." (Provincial Committee) was held and there was nothing to show who were the members. About that period the Criminal Investigation Department in Calcutta and in fact the whole of the Police force of Calcutta were very actively occupied in the suppression of movements connected directly with their own Province. This afforded considerable excuse for delay in communicating the arrest to the Police of this Province.

The next witness whose evidence we shall consider is also an accomplice who was arrested in this case. A pardon was subsequently tendered to him. He is a Bengali youth called Indu Bhushan Mitra. In 1924 he was fourteen years old. He was then residing with his father Dr. H. D. Mitra, Health Officer of Shahjahanpur and was studying in the High School at Shahjahanpur. Ram Prasad made his acquaintance and lent him books. He says:—"The effect caused by my reading those books was that the English were ruling India by force and by a revolt they should be driven out of India by force". Ram Prasad showed him the rules of the Revolutionary Society. These are the rules which Mr. Hamilton calls the "Yellow Leaflet". We shall state what they were at a later place. He also gave him a copy of the "Revolutionary" to read. As a result of Ram Prasad's conversation, the perusal of these books and "The Revolutionary" he wished to join the Society. Owing to his youth he was not accepted as a working member but he was employed by Ram Prasad as a person to whom letters of a compromising nature were to be sent. On receipt of these letters he handed them over to Ram Prasad. He knew that the letters were intended for Ram Prasad by the fact that there was a special mark under the name of the post town "Shahjahanpur." The letters were addressed to Indu Bhushan Mittra. He received a large number of letters.

According to Banarsi Lal the members of the Shahjahanpur Branch of the Revolutionary Society were only Ram Prasad, Ashfaqullah and himself. Banarsi Lal stated that Prem Kishan, Raushan Singh, Indu Bhushan and a man who has since been acquitted and to whom reference need not be made, were friends and associates of Ram Prasad, but that as far as he knew none of them were members of the Society. Indu Bhushan Mittra has, however, stated that he considered himself a member of the Society and that he understood that, in addition to Ram Prasad and Ashfaqullah, Prem Kishan and Raushan Singh were also members of the Society. He added that he did not know that Banarsi Lal was a member. Banarsi Lal has deposed that the members used assumed names amongst themselves. He was called "Babua", Ram Prasad was called "Anant Parkash" and other names. Ashfaqullah was called "Kunwarji" or "Warsi". He introduced the names of two other appellants who, he said, were members of the party but who did not belong to Shahjahanpur. One of these was Manmatha Nath Gupta, and the other was Ram Kishan Khattri. He said that these men used to visit Shahjahanpur. Manmatha Nath Gupta is a youth who resides in Benares and was studying there in a privately managed school in which Damodar Sarup was a master. Manmatha Nath Gupta was known under the name of "Nawab." Ram Kishan Khattri is a young man from the Central Provinces. He is a resident of Chanda. He has stated that he has now become a religious ascetic. He was known under the name of "Garga Ram." According to Ex. P-193 the Province was to be divided into revolutionary centres each with head-quarters. According to the prosecution there was a centre in Benares to which belonged Rajendra Nath Lahiri appellant, Manmatha Nath Gupta, Ram Nath Pande appellant, Raj Kumar Sinha appellant and Damodar Sarup. Rajendra Nath Lahiri is a man who is now about twenty-four or twenty-five years old. He occupied himself in Benares partly as a student at the Hindu University and partly assisting in a shop belonging to his brother. The shop is a medical dispensary known as "Star & Co." Manmatha Nath Gupta has already been described. Ram Nath Pande is a schoolboy at Benares. Raj Kumar Sinha is a resident of Cawnpore but at that time he was reading as a student in the Central Hindu College. He is now a man of about twenty-one years of age. Damodar Sarup was a master at the Kashi Vidya Pith, a privately conducted school in Benares. Manmatha Nath, as has already been stated, was studying at this school. We have had to consider certain facts about Damodar Sarup, although he has not been convicted in this case. He has neither been convicted nor acquitted. From the commencement of proceedings he starved himself with the result that his health became so seriously affected that it was not considered desirable to proceed with the case against him. We do not consider that the fact that he has deliberately prevented a decision by his own act, is a sufficient reason for ignoring his connection with the case. But we shall, as far as possible, avoid an expression of opinion as to his guilt or innocence. We have here to add the names of two other persons. Parnawesh Kumar Chatterji is one. He is a youth residing in Jubbulpur who has been convicted and has appealed but who has subsequently withdrawn his defence. The other is Kunwar Bahadur who is one of the witnesses. He is a young man who has not been prosecuted, a great friend of Banwari Lal. He has given evidence against Banwari Lal. Although he has not been prosecuted, he is on his own showing an accomplice. He sympathised with the movement and used to receive letters and money-orders on behalf of Banwari Lal.

When Parnawesh Kumar Chatterji was arrested a post card (Ex. P-171) was found in his possession. It is dated the 11th November and was received in November 1924. The following is a translation of its contents:—

"Dear Parnawesh,

"Just received your letter. From reading your last letter it seems that your mind is still full of remorse. Dear Parnawesh, this is not right. My condition has become similar on looking at the circumstances. But a faint light of hope has appeared amidst hopelessness.

"I have secured one carpenter who will prepare the thing. But I have not yet told it to Kashida. Remember that he is to be paid his labour and expenses. One will be prepared within nine or ten days. But I have nothing with me. However, I shall manage anyhow to purchase the first one. I am thinking what will happen next. I want to have your advice in the matter. You are a business man. So I write to you about this petty matter. Hope you will not mind it. It is useless to speak to Kashida—because he too is penniless. Do not forget to write how your work is going now. If no work has been accomplished, write to me anything. I take delight in reading your hand writing. My love to you.

Yours,
Anil."

We find this post card to have been in the handwriting of Manmatha Nath Gupta.

Kunwar Bahadur has deposed that it was a practice among the conspirators to veil their meaning by the use of expressions which meant something definite to the recipient that was not borne out by the words. He says:—

"Banwari Lal read out some of the letters. I remember the expressions. How is mother? Father is passing through station, meet him there. Banwari Lal explained that 'How is mother' meant how is the work of the society going on and 'father' was the Central Organiser. He was the Central Organiser of the Revolutionary Society."

It is a fair inference apart from Kunwar Bahadur's evidence that these documents have an inner meaning. It is not clear what the reference is to the "carpenter" who is to "prepare the thing." It is, however, noticeable that some six weeks after this post card was received the "Revolutionary" was circulated, and it is in evidence as will be seen later that funds were required for the printing. The reference to the "carpenter" may be a reference to the printing of the "Revolutionary." Subsequent evidence will show that both Manmatha Nath Gupta and Parnawesh Kumar Chatterji were on what may be called the secretarial staff of the revolutionary organisation.

On the 28th November, 1924, Rs. 10 were sent by money order (Ex. P-96) to Banwari Lal in the name of Kunwar Bahadur from Cawnpore. The name of the remitter is signed N. Prasad. We find it proved that the handwriting of the money-order is that of the appellant Suresh Chandra Bhattacharji who signed the money-order as N. Prasad. Suresh Chandra Bhattacharji is a man who is now about twenty-eight years of age. He resides in Cawnpore where he works as Assistant Editor of a newspaper.

On the 25th December, 1924, to Bamrauli dacoity took place. We shall refer to this dacoity later grouping it with the other dacoities. On the 2nd January, 1925, a money order for Rs. 15 was sent to Kunwar Bahadur on behalf of Banwari Lal from Dasasumadh, a quarter of the Benares City. It purported to be sent by Kashi Nath Bajpeyi of Benares. We find it proved that the handwriting on this money-order was that of Rajendra Nath Lahiri. Banarsi Lal has deposed that at the end of 1924 or the beginning of 1925, that is to say, directly after the commission of the Bamrauli dacoity, the following incident occurred. We give it in his own words:—

"When I again met Ram Prasad it was that he came to my house. He gave me some ornaments mainly silver and gold. He told me to melt them, sell the metal and give him the proceeds. He gave them to me as I had a sarrafi shop. I did so and sold the metal for some Rs. 500. It was the end of 1924 or the beginning of 1925. He did not tell me where he had got the ornaments nor did I ask.

"When I next saw Ashfaqullah I told him about this and he said the ornaments came from a dacoity and Rs. 500 cash had also been got. I did not ask for particulars nor did he give any. He did not name any of the perpetrators save Ram Prasad and himself."

As has already been stated the "Revolutionary" was circulated between the 28th and the 31st January, 1925. Kalka Prasad, Sub-Postmaster of the Kamacha Sub-Post Office, Benares City, has proved that on the 21st January, 1925, five registered packages were posted from Kamacha: one was addressed to Gopi Nath Shukla, Cawnpore, the second was addressed to Banarsi Lal Kokash, Shahjahanpur, the third was addressed to Parnawesh Chatterji, Jubbulpur, the fourth was addressed to Kunwar Bahadur Srivastava, Rae Bareilly, and the fifth was addressed to Kundan Lal, Sitlaganj, Partabgarh District. He has proved the despatch from his registers. It is in evidence that the receipt for the first package was given by a man called Suraj Bali on behalf of Gopi Nath on the 24th January, 1925. That receipt is Ex. P-53. The receipt for the second package was given by Banarsi Lal, the accomplice, on the 23rd January, 1925. That receipt is Ex. P-17. The receipt for the third package was given by Parnawesh Chatterji, the appellant, on the 23rd January, 1925. That receipt is Ex. P-134. The receipt for the fourth package was given by Kunwar Bahadur, the witness, on the 24th January, 1925. That receipt is Ex. P-61. There is no evidence to connect the fifth package with the conspiracy. To understand the reference to Gopi Nath and Suraj Bali it is necessary to examine the evidence of Gopi Nath. He is also an accomplice. Gopi Nath, who is otherwise known as Gopi Mohan, is a young man residing in Cawnpore who makes his living as a private tutor. He has deposed that he was an intimate friend of Ram Dulare, appellant, and of Suresh Chandra Bhattacharji, appellant, and he worked for Ram Dulare, who to his knowledge was a member of the revolutionary party as a recipient of letters in the same manner that Indu Bhushan worked for Ram Prasad. These recipients of letters are known amongst the revolutionaries as "post offices" or "post boxes." Now we have it from an independent witness Suraj Bali that he received this package which was addressed to Gopi Mohan, and Gopi Mohan's evidence indicates very clearly that this package contained copies of "The Revolutionary". Banarsi Lal definitely states that his package contained copies of "The Revolutionary." In respect of Parnawesh Chatterji there is no evidence that his package contained copies of "The Revolutionary." Kunwar Bahadur, however, has deposed that his package contained copies of "The Revolutionary." Banarsi Lal has deposed that he assisted in distributing the copies of "The Revolutionary." There are a very large number of witnesses who proved the distribution of "The Revolutionary" in these Provinces.

We have here to consider the authorship of "The Revolutionary." The learned Judge Mr. Hamilton has at his original page 100 of his judgment discussed this question and has arrived at the conclusion that Sachindra Nath Sanyal, who has not appealed, was the author of "The Revolutionary." Pandit Jagat Narain has argued before this Court in favour of the conclusion that Sachindra Nath Sanyal was the author of "The Revolutionary." We consider that it is established on the evidence that Sachindra Nath Sanyal was the author of "The Revolutionary." The point is of no importance as against him as he has not appealed, and the point is of practically no importance as against the appellants. On our findings it is established beyond reasonable doubt that "The Revolutionary" was issued by some of the conspirators in furtherance of the purposes of the conspiracy, and as far as the appellants are concerned it is of no importance who was the author. On the 6th February, 1925, Rs. 10 were sent by money order to Kunwar Bahadur on behalf of Banwari Lal from Dasasumadh by a person who called himself, K. P. Srivastava (Ex. P-95). We find that the handwriting on the money order is that of Rajendra Nath Lahiri. On the 19th February, 1925, Rs 15 were sent by money order to Kunwar Bahadur on behalf of Banwari Lal. The money order Ex. P-94 was sent again from Dasasumadh by a person who called himself K. P. Srivastava. We again find that the handwriting was the handwriting of Rajendra Nath Lahiri.

On the 25th February Sachindra Nath Sanyal was arrested in Calcutta. He was subsequently convicted by Courts in Bengal. As we have stated already he has not appealed in this case. On the 9th March, 1925, the Bichpuri dacoity was committed and on the 24th March, 1925, the Dwarkapur dacoity was committed. We shall refer to these dacoities in their places. At the end of June or the beginning of July, 1925, Banarsi Lal deposed that he saw Rajendra Nath Lahiri in Ram Prasad's house in Shahjahanpur. At the end of July or the beginning of August 1925 Manmatha Nath Gupta and six or seven other men arrived according to Banarsi at Shahjahanpur. Ram Prasad told Banarsi to provide them with accommodation. He had not room in his own house but took a house from a certain Kishan Lal. Kishan Lal corroborates this fact. These men are stated by Banarsi Lal to have been Manmatha Nath Gupta, Rajendra Nath Lahiri, Banwari Lal, Makundi Lal and others. This is the first occasion on which reference has been made to Makundi Lal appellant. Makundi Lal is a man who is now over thirty years of age. He apparently does no work. He resides in Aurayya in the Etawah District. On the 3rd August, 1925, Makundi Lal sent from Shahjahanpur a [money order Ex. P-378 to his wife Lachmi Bai who was then living in Benares. Upon the coupon which was to be kept by the addressee he wrote "I am well. It will take one week more. Your well-wisher Makundi Lal. Do not be anxious at all." Shortly before the 9th of August, 1925, these men left Shahjahanpur with Ram Prasad and Ashfaqullah. On the 9th August, 1925, the train dacoity was committed. This will be referred to in another place.

After Mr. Horton was put in charge of the investigation his attention was attracted to Shahjahanpur as he had heard that some of the notes stolen in the train dacoity had been traced there. Suspicion fell on Ram Prasad and it was subsequently stated that Indu Bhushan was suspected of being his "Post Office." In consequence Mr. Horton got into communication with Khan Sahib Idris Ahmad, Head Master of the Shahjahanpur High School, in which Indu Bhushan was studying, and arranged with Khan Sahib Idris Ahmad that he should open letters addressed to Indu Bhushan, take copies of the contents, reclose the letters, deliver them to Indu Bhushan and inform the Police of what the letters contained. Khan Sahib Idris Ahmad complied with these instructions. Letters were intercepted. The contents of the following have been placed upon the record. Exhibit P-138-A.

This is dated the 4th September, 1925. It bore the post mark of Dasasmedh. It is as follows:—

"My dear friend,

"Yours of the 1st instant. I sent the introduction letter already. I think by this time you have received them. I have written to Kali Babu to come at the time. He will come no doubt.

"You have not written anything about Lalaji. I am really surprised. There is no able man to represent No. 7 and he thinks he is the fittest man and he has got resources in that side too. He will be able to have his assistants in a short time in that side. I proposed to him and he is ready. Now he is anxious to go to the assembly. If I do not take him with me he will be wounded, and he has been already wounded by some persons. I am now in a false position. If you do not object I shall take him too with me.

"Please reply sharp, I am really anxious. Badri has not yet left—he hopes to in a short time. Bidyarthi (Bidyarthi) (name not intelligible) has come back from his place with an excuse. When I meet you I shall tell you everything. Do not use the name in which you generally write to me and others. It has come into the notice of interested persons: change it and use some other name.

Yours,
Jawahir Lal."

Exhibit P-140 is as follows:—

"My dear brother, Hardwar.

"Arrived here safely. I am enjoying sound health. If you want to see me, come as sharp as you can, for perhaps I will have to go to take my landed property within a week.

"Enquire me freely at Pt. Atmaswarup Ji's Guru Mandal. My B. C. to you and all my friends. The atmosphere of this place is also all right.

"Please come very soon.

Yours,
(Sd.) Narendra."

Exhibit P-141:

"Vaishya Orphanage, Meerut."

Dated 9th September, 1925.

"My dear brother,

"Everything is all right. All arrangements about the Executive Committee of the Orphanage are complete. The Updeshak at Lahore has promised to attend the function. You are requested to intimate to your friends to put up in various Dharamshalas. Jain Dharamshala is in the way to the Railway Station. Dharam Das Dharamshala is just near the clock tower and Ganga Rai's Dharamshala is near Queja Ganj.

"The place of the function has been after due deliberation fixed at my own place.

Yours,
Supdt. V. O."

Here the heading "Vaishya Orphanage, Meerut" was apparently a printed heading. The word "Updeshak" means lecturer. "Queja Ganj" probably means Qaisarganj, a well known quarter of Meerut.

Exhibit P-142 undated received on the 12th September is as follows:—

"My dear brother,

"Received your kind favour. I am enjoying sound health. Do not be anxious for me so much, kindly mind well I will not go without taking your permission. But come as soon as possible. Up to this time I have not taken visit of him (My Guru) he will come to-day or to-morrow morning.

"After meeting him I will settle whether I will have to go to take my property or not. If he will order me to go with him to take my property, my position will be very awkward. Still anyhow I will detain. But you must come on 16th morning here.

"(You must start by Dehra Dun Mail on 15th night) I will be on station platform on that morning.

Tell my B. C. to my friends.

Yours,
Narandra."

It will be remembered that all these letters were letters intended for Ram Prasad. Mr. Horton further received from a Police informer whose name he preferred not to disclose Ex. P-482. This is as follows :—

Shahjahanpur,
8th September, 1925.

"My dear Undel,

"We are all right. Perhaps you are aware of the fact that the shradha ceremony of our grandfather will be celebrated on the 13th instant (Sunday) and your presence is quite necessary, consequently I request you to reach No. 1 on the fixed time and oblige.

Yours as ever,
Rudra.

"P. S.—Kindly start on the 12th instant direct for Delhi and from there you can get the train very easily. You will find me in the Orphanage."

This letter is proved to be in the handwriting of Ram Prasad. At the same time the Calcutta Criminal Investigation Department were intercepting letters. They were intercepting letters that were being despatched to K. C. Guha, Engineer and Contractor, 48 Sankaripara Road, Bhawanipur, Calcutta. They took copies of the contents of these letters and photographed them. Three important letters of this class were Exs. P-210, P-211 and P-212 which are translations of Exs. P-200, P-202 and P-204. K. C. Guha gave evidence. He denied all knowledge of any of these letters and said that he had never received them. A relation of his called P. C. Guha, a student in Calcutta, has stated that he used to take these letters which were addressed to K. C. Guha and deliver them to persons whom he could not identify. He said that these two persons had met him on the road and that he agreed to hand them letters addressed to Mr. K. C. Guha for payment. He received twenty to twenty-five rupees, and handed over the letters accordingly. Exhibits P-210, P-211 and P-212 are clearly three of these letters. The letters were in Bengali. It is proved from the photographs of the letters and the envelopes that they are in the handwriting of Rajendra Nath Lahiri. The following are the letters :—

Exhibit P-210.

"To my dear,

"It is very wrong of you, brother, that you did not write any letter since you left long time ago. I am very angry with you. However, if you reply to this letter soon, the degree of my anger will lessen a bit.

"You did not write anything whether the 'sarees' had been purchased and if you had received the 'sample' phials of the medicine. I cannot express how much anxious the mistress of the house has been for the sarees." Perhaps you and Kamini Kaka will both be sorry to learn another news. Aunt's sickness has increased much. She may be somewhat relieved if you can send Kamini "Kaka" immediately on receipt of this letter with leave for two weeks. In case Kamini Kaka cannot, come then you yourself come very soon with all the news of your house. If you have already got the 'sarees' then don't forget to bring them, and if not, come without them. Please see, brother, that you don't forget to bring the text books of my son for which money was already given by me. The progress of the boy's school has been daily on the increase yet the boy is going without books. I am all right, how are you all? My hearty love to you. Immediately on receipt of this letter, you come yourself or send Kamini Kaka, you should bring with you the travelling expenses both for coming and going back, the condition of the aunt is not good, don't make much delay in coming. The end.

"To my dear,

4th September, 1925.

"I informed you about aunt's illness about a day or two back. I wrote you to come immediately on receipt of that letter but now I find that it will do if you come after a few days more. Therefore 'Kamini' Kaka or you must reach here by the 10th of this month. Mind that there be heavy loss in case you don't come. See, brother, that you do not forget to bring with you the articles, as asked for in the previous letter, viz., the text books of my son, the 'sarees' of my wife, and the 'sample phials' of medicine. If you cannot bring the sarees and sample of medicine then you must reach here by that date with all news of the house. The pecuniary condition of your brother (the writer) is known to you hence don't forget to bring with you the travelling expenses for coming and going back as also something extra for pocket expenses. The condition of my daughter is not good. My wife is doing well. Shall be glad to learn your welfare. My namaskar to you. The end.

"Brother,

"I am in receipt of your reply to my first letter. It is a matter of regret that you have not been able to understand the purport of my letter. I have written you another letter if even in that my idea has not been clear it is for this reason that I sit to write again.

"At present it may be managed without the 'sarees'. You or 'Kaka' should reach here by the 10th instant. There is a meeting. In that the presence of either you or 'Kaka' is desirable. In that meeting there will be discussions on many important matters. One of you must come.

"To day is 7th, you will probably get the letter on the 9th, if you start that day you will be able to reach on the 10th: It will do if you reach by the express which arrives at Moghulserai in the night of the 10th. I am well, and shall be glad to learn your welfare. My love to you. The end.

As a result of observations made on these letters Mr. Horton surmised that a meeting of the Provincial Central Committee of the society would take place on the premises of the Vaishya Orphanage, Meerut on the 13th September, 1925. He accordingly despatched Sub-Inspector Brahma Singh, an officer attached to the Criminal Investigation Department, to Meerut requesting the Superintendent of Police of Meerut to depute some one (not a Police Officer) to accompany Sub-Inspector Brahma Singh on his duties in Meerut to show him his way and to be in a position to corroborate his statements. The Superintendent of Police at Meerut deputed a Jat called Pheru Singh to accompany Sub-Inspector Brahma Singh. The main duties of Sub-Inspector Brahma Singh were to watch the Vaishya Orphanage and observe whether there was anything in the nature of a clandestine meeting there, and if so, who were taking part in it. Sub-Inspector Brahma Singh reached Meerut on the 13th September, 1925, at 8 A.M. He went to the Assistant Superintendent of Police at Meerut and was given Pheru Singh to accompany him. Pheru Singh took him to the Vaishya Orphanage. The two men remained outside the main gate of the Orphanage and maintained a strict observation on the premises taking care to keep themselves unobserved. They did not always remain together. One or the other occasionally left to get food or for other purposes. Nothing was observed during the day of the 13th September, until shortly before sunset when eight men came out of the residential quarters of Vishnu Saran Dublis appellant who is the Superintendent of the Orphanage and took the main road to the north. They returned in about an hour and a half. At that time both Sub-Inspector Brahma Singh and Pheru Singh were present. Among these eight men were Ram Prasad, Rajendra Nath Lahiri, Damodar Sarup and Vishnu Saran Dublis.

After these eight men had re-entered the residential quarters of Vishnu Saran Dublis, Sub-Inspector Brahma Singh and Pheru Singh went away. Next morning Sub-Inspector Brahma Singh arrived first and remained watching outside the gate. About 6 A. M. before Pheru Singh arrived Sub-Inspector Brahma Singh saw Ram Prasad and Rajendra Nath Lahiri come out of the Superintendent's residential quarters, stop outside a few moments and re enter the quarters. Pheru Singh was not present at the time. When Pheru Singh came Sub-Inspector Brahma Singh went away for a short time. While he was away Ram Prasad was seen by Pheru Singh to leave the Superintendent's quarters and go towards the city. He did not return. After Sub-Inspector Brahma Singh had returned Sub-Inspector Brahma Singh and Pheru Singh saw at about 10 A. M., two other men coming from the direction of the city and going into the Superintendent's quarters. One of these men was the appellant Suresh Chandra Bhattacharji. Sub-Inspector Brahma Singh went away again to get some food. While he was away Pheru Singh saw Suresh Chandra Bhattacharji leaving the quarters with the same man. They did not return. Sub-Inspector Brahma Singh left at 4-30 P. M., to go to the Railway Station. Pheru Singh remained. After Sub-Inspector Brahma Singh had gone at about 5 P. M., five men came out of the house one of whom was Rajendra Nath Lahiri. They did not return. In addition to the evidence of Sub-Inspector Brahma Singh and Pheru Singh there is the evidence of Sheo Charan Singh, a joint Secretary of the Vaishya Orphanage, which proves that there was no meeting of any committee connected with the Orphanage on the 13th or 14th September, 1925. Balapat Rai, a Travelling Ticket Inspector, proves that a man returning from Meerut required an extension ticket and that that man gave his name as Damodar Sarup. Head Constable Iftikhar Uddin, Police Constable Sarju Dayal, and Sub-Inspector Hari Kisban have given evidence which shows that Suresh Chandra Bhattacharji who was at that time under Police surveillance went to Meerut on 13th September, 1925, arriving there at 7-30 A. M. on the 14th September. Suresh Chandra Bhattacharji admits that he was in Meerut that day.

Mr. Horton considering that the evidence justified the issue of warrants issued warrants for the arrest of certain persons on the 24th September, 1925. As a result arrests were made on the 26th September, 1925, of the following appellants—Govind Charan Kar, Ram Prasad, Manmatha Nath Gupta, Suresh Chandra Bhattacharji, Ram Dulare Trivedi, Raushan Singh and Vishnu Saran Dublis. Other warrants were not executed as the persons named were not found. No warrants were issued for the arrest of Prem Kishan Khanna but the Shahjahanpur Police arrested him as a result of what transpired during the search of the house of Ram Prasad.

No previous reference has been made to Govind Charan Kar. It is not proved that he visited either Shahjahanpur, Benares or Cawnpore. He is a Bengali from the Dacca District in Lower Bengal and is a man now of about thirty years of age. For some weeks prior to the date of the train dacoity he had been residing in the Rameshwar Hindu Hotel in the Aminabad Quarter of Lucknow under the false name of D. N. Chaudhuri. He professed to be a commission agent for the sale of German razors and other goods. Jadu Nath Singh, a student in the Church Mission School, Lucknow, was living in the same hotel. Govind Charan Kar approached this boy, and lent him books containing revolutionary ideas. Jadu Nath Sen became a "Post Office" for Govind Charan Kar. After the commission of the train dacoity Jadu Nath Sen became frightened. He told his school master Jagannath Prasad certain facts as to what had happened and as a result there was communication with the authorities and a warrant was issued for the arrest of Govind Charan Kar. He was arrested by Sub-Inspector Ashfaq Hussain at 8 A. M., on the 26th September, at the dispensary of a certain Dr. Lahiri close to the Aminudaula Park. Certain articles were found upon him. One was a fountain pen of a make known as the "Apollo" fountain pen. This pen as will be seen later is proved to be the property of Rajendra Nath Lahiri and its possession connects Govind Charan Kar with Rajendra Nath Lahiri. After the arrest of Govind Charan Kar he was taken to his room in the Rameshwar Hindu Hotel. Many articles were found in the room the most important of which was a printed pamphlet Ex. P-280 which was found in a cupboard in the room. This is the pamphlet which Mr. Hamilton calls the

When Ram Prasad was arrested in Shah-jahanpur there was found in addition to other property a letter in his handwriting Ex. P-41. This letter was under a pillow in his room and was clearly intended to be despatched to a person who was apparently Rajendra Nath Lahiri. These are the contents of the letter—

When Ram Dulare was arrested there was found in his room a post card Ex. P-5 which had been sent to him by Gopi Nath the approver while Ram Dulare Trivedi was at Allahabad attending a Rally of Boy Scouts. This post card refers to a letter from Niranjana which the writer says may be urgent but which he cannot send to him. The letter came from Bengal. On the 27th September, 1925, Ram Nath Trivedi was arrested and his house was searched. Two copies of this Yellow Leaflet were found at his house. Further there was found Ex. P-162. This was in the handwriting of Rajendra Nath Lahiri. It is called the "Twelve Points." These are the contents:—

"1. A list of non-co-operators of the district is to be prepared and their present attitude of mind is to be studied.

After the arrest of Ram Nath Pande a letter arrived from him which was opened by Rai Bahadur J. K. Mukerji, Deputy Superintendent of Police. This letter is Ex P-43. These are the contents:—

Shahjahanpur,
26th September.

"Dear brother,

"Rudra's (R. P.) house has been searched and he is arrested this morning. Many papers and documents, lists of name addresses including the address of this letter are found. A letter to you asking for the following books is taken by the Police.

"1. India in transition, 2. Mukti Kon Pathe, 3. Biplab Bali, etc.

"Be careful.

(Sd.) Indu."

Indu Bhushan Mittra admits that this letter is in his handwriting. Indu Bhushan has given evidence explaining how he came to send the letter. He says that he was present at the time of Ram Prasad's arrest and that Ram Prasad had communicated to him unobserved by the Police Officers that he was to warn the intended recipient of Ex. P-41 and that he sent this letter accordingly.

On the 30th September, 1925, Indu Bhushan Mittra was himself arrested. Exhibit P-45, a paper in which he had written out himself a prospectus for a society which he wished to form, and a large amount of revolutionary literature were found in his house. Between the receipt of Ex. P-142 and Indu Bhushan's arrest more letters had arrived addressed to him as the Post Office of Ram Prasad and these letters had been opened by Khan Saheb Idris Ahmad and copies taken. The letters in question were Exs. P-143, P-144 and P-145. They run as follows:—

Exhibit P-143.

"My dear friend,

"The orphan whom I intended to send for carpentry training won't be able to proceed towards the shop owing to his engagements in his house. Either you or I must go to the shop. Kali Babu the proprietor of the shop has not sent any letter as yet. As soon as he writes to start one of us must go. So please decide and reply soon. If you have no leisure I may go as I will have ample time during my long vacation.

"We are all right here quite hale and hearty.

"My love to you.

Yours,

(Sd.) Mathura Prasad."

Exhibit P-144.

"My dear brother,

"I left Moradabad in the morning and got down at Hathras in the evening to see a friend of mine. He has been suffering from malarial fever and has grown very weak. He got very angry on me because I have altogether forsaken him. It means that I did not take any work from him. He pressed me very much and I have promised him to take some work from him in near future. He hopes to get stronger within few days. I, therefore, request you to let me know 15 days beforehand the fixed date for the tournament and the exact directions in clear language as to lead him to the proper place. I hope to send two or three players at least one of whom is an expert man. He will be of a great use to you. All is well. I hope you will not forget to send an intimation to me.

Yours brotherly,

(Sd.) Brij Kishore or Brij Kishan."

Exhibit P-145.

"My dear friend,

"I received your letter to-night. Yours and Kali Babu's have arrived at the same time. He has written to reach him on 26th morning. I think you will have my letter on 24th and if you can start on the same day by mail you can arrive here the same day, and after taking his address &c., you can start on 25th morning and reach him in time.

"Owing to the importance of the business I shall wait for you up to 24th night, if you do not come by that time I shall start on 25th early in the morning. Otherwise we shall lose the profit of the business and hope to come back auditing the books after 15 to 20 days. In the meantime if you come here please see Lalaji, Nawab, and Quicksilver to gather everything of this place. Quicksilver has some business which you will be able to know when you ask him.

"Business centres are very good according to his version and others where we shall have large profit. Mool Ram said that his time of interview has not yet arrived, he expects the time to be at least after 15 to 20 days.

"Kartick is the usual time he said. He has taken up an employment. Quicksilver has gone out for a fortnight. If you come here you can put up with Lalaji, a good and suitable place for you.

"I have forgotten Badri's old address. I shall ask Nawab if he knows he will write to you in time.

"The things which Vidyarthi brought have been locked up in a gentleman's room who is expected to come by the middle of next month.

"After my going if you come to this side please bring my shirt and pen from Chaudhuri.

"Old Panditji is absent from this place. Rewah gentleman has gone to his father's place and he is expected to inform everything in a short time. If he is ready Lalaji will write to you for the gun, please send it in time so that we may have them. Nawab Sahib is too kind to me now. He is all right. My grandfather is suffering from an attack of influenza you know. I am always at trouble for these old men and women in my family, for these reasons I cannot give you my time, all are alright quite hale and hearty.

Yours affectionately,

(Sd.) Mathura."

It is to be noted that none of these letters reached Ram Prasad for the following reasons. They were not delivered to Indu Bhushan owing to the closing of the school for the Dusehra holidays until after Ram Prasad had been arrested. Exhibit P-143 and Ex. P-145 are shown by general evidence to have been sent by Rajendra Nath Lahiri. As will be seen later Rajendra Nath Lahiri was subsequently arrested in Calcutta in a house which was being used as a Bomb factory. Exhibit P-143 would show that Rajendra Nath Lahiri had intended to send some man unknown to Calcutta to train in bomb making. As this man was unable to go he wrote to Ram Prasad that either he or Rajendra Nath should go. As Ram Prasad was not able to answer the letter Rajendra Nath went. Exhibit P-145 contains two passages of importance. One of them brings the letter home to Rajendra Nath Lahiri. That is the passage "After my going if you come to this side please bring my shirt and pen from Chaudhuri." We have already noted that when Govind Charan Kar (known as D. N. Chaudhuri) was arrested he was found in possession of a fountain pen and there is evidence to which we shall advert later which proves that this fountain pen was the property of Rajendra Nath Lahiri. The other important passage is "The things which Vidyarthi brought had been locked in a gentleman's room who was expected to come by the middle of the next month." It would be seen that the "things" in question were two rifles and the handle of an entrenching tool which were found locked up in a room which had been taken by Raj Kumar Sinha. After the arrest of Indu Bhushan Mitra a letter arrived addressed to him which was taken by Khan Sahib Idris Ahmad and handed over to the Police. This letter is Ex. P-147. It is as follows:—

Exhibit P-147.

"My dear brother,
 "Arrived here safely. Don't be anxious for me. I am enjoying sound health. The progress of this place is daily increasing. I have made connection with other college students. I will reach to my destination within this week. Sir, you will have to send for me ten rupees more after reaching there. Just now reply by the following address, kindly tell my best compliments to all my friends.

Yours as ever,
 (Sd.) Narendra."

Chanda,
 1st October 1925.
 On the back,
 "My address:—

C/o M. S. Khattri,
 Cloth Merchant,
 Chanda."

This letter has been proved to be in the handwriting of Ram Kishan Khattri, appellant. It further shows that Ram Kishan used to write under the name of Narendra and thereby connects Ram Kishan with

Ex. P-140 and Ex. P-142. On the 31st October, 1925, Raj Kumar Sinha was arrested in Cawnpore. At the time of his arrest he scribbled off four letters in Bengali of which the Police took possession. These are they:—

Exhibit P-309-A.

Dated 31st October 1925.

"My dear Modak,
 "I am going. When I write this letter our house is being searched. My brother will come to you with this letter. You will make him understand everything about my room. I think it is best to have the room emptied now. I have Rs. 10 with Prahlad Das. You will get every information from Kiranda. Please take care, no article is damaged or lost. My brother will stay there for a day or two. My mind is very much disturbed about my room there. I shall remain extremely anxious until I get news about it. Now farewell.

Raj Kumar."

Exhibit P-309-B.

Dated 31st October 1925.

"Brother Sushil,
 "All on a sudden to-day I have to go away from your midst. If I say I am going to Jail I think you will be astonished. But it is a fact, I am going to Jail, why, even that I do not know. Well don't think your Raju is very anxious on that account. My only anxiety is that at home mother will be worried to some extent. If you can manage, please come to Cawnpore and console mother a bit.
 (Two lines scratched out.)

Please accept my regards.

Exhibit P-309-D.

"To all my friends,
 "Brothers to-day all on a sudden, I have to go away from your midst. I do not know when I shall meet you again. Accept my love, all of you.

"Brothers. Do not forget your friend.
 Farewell then.

Raj Kumar."

Before his arrest in Cawnpore the Police had searched a room in Benares which he had taken on rent and left locked up. Their attention had been drawn to this room by the passage in the letter Ex. P-145 as to the things brought by Vidyarthi. In this room were found a Sherwood rifle and a Winchester rifle and the handle of a military entrenching tool.

Ram Kishan Khattri had been previously arrested in Poona on the 18th October, 1925.

The warrant for the arrest of Rajendra Nath was unserved. His whereabouts were unknown. On the 10th November, 1925, he was, however, arrested in Calcutta, in a house known as Dakshineshwar House. He was arrested at 5-30 A.M. He was in the house between the door and the staircase leading to the roof. The Police had gone to search the house for suspects in the Train dacoity case. They had not suspected that the house itself was a centre of revolutionary activities. When the house was searched there were found in it a live bomb, a cast-iron shell resembling a mill's grenade, a loaded revolver, a pistol, cartridges, gun powder, explosive chemicals and there were also found certain masks. Rajendra Nath Lahiri is proved to have been convicted in respect of the discovery of these explosives. The judgments convicting him have been placed upon the record. We consider that we should not use these judgments against him in this case. We are entitled to use and do use the fact that he was arrested in this house in which there were a large number of explosives. The house may fairly be called a Bomb Factory. But we have not considered the judgments against him as in our opinion, their consideration would have taken us into matters unconnected with the case before us.

On the 2nd November, 1925, there occurred an explosion in Allahabad. Bhupendra Nath Sanyal, a younger brother of Sachindra Nath Sanyal, was then a student in Allahabad. He has been convicted in this case and has not appealed. The evidence in respect of this explosion is that Bhupendra Nath Sanyal had been inciting some of his friends towards the revolutionary party and that taking some of his friends out for a walk one day he had shown them explosives. He gave some of these explosives to a friend to carry and while they were walking there was an accident and his friend was severely burnt. On the 11th December, 1925, Parnawesh Kumar Chatterji was arrested in Jubbulpore. Two important drafts were discovered in his possession. These drafts were Ex. P-166 and Ex. P-167. They are also variations of the revolutionary rules (The Yellow Leaflet) There is an important variation in Ex. P-166 for, whereas Ex. P-280 states that funds, should be collected generally by means of voluntary subscription and occasionally by contributions exacted by force, Ex. P-166 states "funds should be collected generally by means of voluntary subscription and occasionally by robberies, i. e., when subscriptions are not coming or a large sum of money is required instantly which cannot be had by voluntary subscription." Exhibit P-166 and and Ex. P-167 are for the most part typewritten. There are some interlineations in handwriting. There was also discovered in the possession of Parnawesh Kumar Chatterji a Corona Typewriter. We are satisfied that Ex. P-153, Ex. P-166 and Ex. P-167 were all typewritten from this Corona Typewriter. The connection between Manmatha Nath and Parnawesh Kumar Chatterji is further shown by the fact that Ex. P-171, the post card in the handwriting of Manmatha Nath Gupta, was found at the time of the search in the possession of Parnawesh Kumar Chatterji.

On the 11th of December, 1925, Bhola Nath handed over to Police Officers a trunk which had been left with him by Banwari Lal. In this trunk were a rifle, a pistol and some cartridges. Banwari Lal was arrested on the 12th December, 1925.

Makundi Lal was arrested on the 6th January, 1926.

The remaining evidence as to the existence of the general conspiracy is partly in the evidence of the approvers and accomplices who have been already mentioned, partly in the evidence of others and partly in the evidence of corroborating witnesses. We have already referred to the evidence of Kunwar Bahadur. He gives evidence which connects Rajendra Nath Lahiri with Banwari Lal. Jagdish Chandra is an important witness. He is a youth who lives opposite to Ram Prasad's house in Shah-jahanpur. Ram Prasad approached him and lent him books of a subversive nature, but the witness had not joined the Revolutionary Society at the time that Ram Prasad was arrested. Ram Prasad undoubtedly hoped that he would join, as we find that in the letter Ex. P-41 Ram Prasad suggested that letters could be sent to him to the care of this youth. Jagdish Chandra has deposed that he used to see Ashfaquallah and Prem Kishan Khanna entering Ram Prasad's house and that after they had entered the house the doors used to be locked. Ram Charan lived in the house of Benarsi Lal in Shahjahanpur. He deposed to having seen Manmatha Nath Gupta and Ram Kishan Khattri visiting Banarsi Lal. Gauri Shankar is a priest in a temple in Shahjahanpur. He deposed to having seen Manmatha Nath Gupta and Ram Kishan Khattri in the company of Banarsi Lal. Ram Lal is a Shahjahanpur man who was in charge of what is known as a Tikasar. This is a rest house. He deposed to Manmatha Nath Gupta having stayed in the rest house.

In order to connect Govind Charan Kar with the conspiracy Mahesh Narain Sinha was called to corroborate Jadu Nath Sen. He is a shorthand writer who at one time lived in the Rameshwar Hindu Hotel. Govind Charan Kar approached him, but did not succeed in enlisting him as a member of the Revolutionary party. He has deposed to having seen Banwari Lal in the company of Govind Charan Kar. Kunwar Bahadur's evidence connecting Rajendra Nath Lahiri with Banwari Lal is corroborated by Dwarka Prasad. The evidence showing the connection of Bhupendra Nath Sanyal with the conspiracy is mainly that of Ram Chandra Chatterji, Gopi Pada Shastri and Rishi Kesh Bhattacharji.

We now come to the evidence as to the dacoities. The first dacoity was the Bamrauli dacoity which was committed on the 25th December, 1924. Bamrauli is a large village about four or five miles from the Zindpura Railway Station on the metre gauge line between Shahjahanpur and Pilibhit. Zindpura is nineteen miles from Shahjahanpur. Bamrauli is a place of sufficient importance to be mentioned in the Gazetteer of the Pilibhit District. It was originally a small town but is not as prosperous or as populated as it was in former days. The population is, however, still more than two thousand and it is not a place so small as to justify the conclusion that every inhabitant of Bamrauli would know every other inhabitant. The evidence as to the commission of the dacoity in Bamrauli is very strong. The principal witness is Baldeo Prasad, a man on whose house the dacoity was committed. Other witnesses who may be mentioned as proving the commission of the dacoity are Lalta Prasad, who lives next door to Baldeo Prasad, Jagannath, son of Baldeo Prasad, and Kalka Prasad and Kanhai who came to the scene, while the dacoity was being committed. Ram Dayal, the chaukidar of the village, did not approach the scene closely. He made the first report of the occurrence of the dacoity. This is Ex. P-388. He had seen the attack from some little distance. His report ends with the words "some times more light is visible on the roof and in the house as if fire is lighted."

The evidence in support of the conclusion that this dacoity was committed by members of the revolutionary conspiracy and in pursuance of the object of the conspiracy is as follows:—

It is proved by the evidence of Sub-Inspector Chatter Singh that the following articles were found on the scene of the dacoity:

Seven '300 empty metal cartridge cases bearing the mark on the base

D W M

K 403 K,

Five empty '450 cartridge cases,

Two loaded '450 cartridges intact,

One '450 loaded cartridge misfired.

The significance of the discovery is this. Dacoities are not infrequent in the United Provinces. Dacoities in which fire-arms are used form the minority. As the criminals who commit dacoities are usually villagers, and as such villagers cannot usually obtain access to small bore rifled fire-arms and would have great difficulty in obtaining ammunition for small bore rifled fire-arms, it is almost unknown for such fire-arms to be used in the commission of dacoities in this Province. Here the discovery of these cartridges and empty cartridge cases on the scene of the dacoity indicate that small bore rifled fire-arms were used and this fact is very significant. What is even more significant is that seven empty cartridge cases were found of the exact make which had been purchased by Ram Prasad on the 7th August, 1924, from P. N. Biswas & Co., in Cownpore. The cartridges of this manufacture were not cartridges which it was easy to procure in the United Provinces or anywhere else in India. They were of special manufacture by a German firm and were not stocked in large quantities.

Certain of the men who committed the dacoity were considered by witnesses from their appearance not to be villagers but townsmen. Baldeo Prasad has deposed that some of the dacoits spoke in the language of villagers and some in the language of townsmen and that the townsmen wore khaki clothes with English shaped shoes and in some cases short knicker bockers and puttees. Lalta Prasad has deposed that he also considered some of the dacoits to be townsmen and Kalka Prasad stated that that was also the result of his observation. He said he knew the difference between villagers and townsmen from their clothes and from their method of talking and the method in which they cut their hair.

The dacoits used lights of an unusual kind at the time they committed the dacoity. Baldeo Prasad deposed that something was turned on Mohan Lal which looked like a candle and gave a great light. Lalta Prasad deposed that the "candle things" which the dacoits lighted suddenly, lighted up without matches. Kalka Prasad deposed that the dacoits had a thing which they lighted and that the best light was the light which they had. Kanhai deposed that the dacoits had lights which gave at times more light and gave at times less. We have already noted the passage in the first report in which the chaukidar at the very commencement said that sometimes more light is visible on the roof and in the house as if fire is lighted. These villagers were persons who had never been in a position to see an electric torch. The description which they give of the light used by the dacoits is a fairly accurate description of an electric torch. Banarsi deposed that an electric torch was used in the Bichpuri dacoity.

We have already adverted to Banarsi Lal's evidence in which he states that shortly after Christmas 1924 Ram Prasad gave him ornaments of silver and gold to melt. We have in evidence Ram Prasad's accounts with the Shahjahanpur branch of the Allahabad Bank. The copies of the accounts are Exs. P-191 and P-192. These accounts show that although Ram Prasad had paid nothing in cash into his private account between the 22nd of May, 1924, and Christmas 1924, he paid in on the 29th December Rs. 100 in cash, on the 2nd January, 1925, through Deokinandan Rs. 100 in cash, and on the 5th January, 1925, Rs. 550 in cash.

Finally we have found in this case that Raushan Singh participated in the commission of this dacoity and we have found in Ashfaqullah's Appeal No. 380 of 1927, (which we are deciding with these appeals) that Ashfaqullah also took part in the commission of this dacoity.

We now come to the evidence in respect of the Bichpuri dacoity which was committed on the 9th March, 1925. The evidence as to the commission of this dacoity is again overwhelming. We need only refer to the evidence of Toti Kurmi, the man upon whose house the dacoity was committed, the evidence of his brother Behari, who was present at the time that it was committed, and the evidence of a woman called Rani who was present at the time that it was committed.

The evidence to show that this dacoity was committed by a gang which included some of the conspirators and was committed in pursuance of the objects of the conspiracy is as follows:—

Banarsi Lal has deposed that he himself took part in the commission of this dacoity. He deposed that Ram Prasad had told him that a dacoity would have to be committed as funds were required. When Banarsi Lal asked him what had become of the money which had been obtained from the sale of the melted ornaments, Ram Prasad replied that all that had been spent on printing copies of the "Revolutionary." Banarsi Lal continued that he agreed to join and that he with Ram Prasad, Ashfaqullah, Manmatha Nath Gupta, Ram Kishan Khattri and others went by train from Shahjahanpur to the Sherganj Railway Station which is on the metre gauge Railway between Shahjahanpur and Pilibhit. Other men also accompanied them. They descended at Sherganj Railway Station where they met other persons ten or twelve of whom were local bad characters who had been recruited to assist in the commission of the dacoity. The intention of the gang was originally to commit a dacoity on the house of a man in a village other than Bichpuri. When the gang approached that house it was found that a large party was taking place and that many people were collected. It was thought too dangerous to commit a dacoity on that house, so at the suggestion of one of the bad characters a move was made to Bichpuri village and the house of Toti Kurmi was attacked and robbed. Banarsi Lal's evidence has been corroborated, as will be seen later. We need only add at present to show the connection of the dacoity with the revolutionary conspiracy that we have found in these appeals that Ram Prasad, Manmatha Nath Gupta and Ram Kishan Khattri participated in the commission of this dacoity and have found in Appeal No. 380 of 1927 that Ashfaquallah also participated in its commission.

We now come to the Dwarakapur dacoity which was committed on the 24th May, 1925. The evidence of Sheoratan, the man on whose house this dacoity was committed, corroborated as it is by the evidence of other witnesses, establishes absolutely the fact of its commission. Although none of the appellants have been convicted of participation in this dacoity, no one having been identified, there is evidence which shows that it was committed in pursuance of the revolutionary conspiracy. It is proved that there were discovered on the scene of the dacoity :—

One loaded Mauser cartridge of
D W M
the K K mark, 403

One empty cartridge of the same pattern,
One misfired 300 cartridge of K. B. make,
One empty cartridge, 300 of G. G. & Co., 763,

One empty cartridge of the same make, and
One empty fired cartridge 765 of the D W M
mark K K

479-A

There was also found the head of a military entrenching tool. The head is of the usual pattern, one side being capable of use as a pick and the other as spade or shovel. The dacoits had used this tool in order to dig up the floors and walls to discover the property. It will be remembered that in the locked room of Raj Kumar Sinha there was found a handle. Mr. Horton tried the handle to see if it would fit this head. It fitted perfectly. We have made the same test and we find that the handle and the head are made to fit one another. It is true that such military entrenching tools can be procured fairly easily in India since the War, as they were issued in very large numbers during the War, but the fact is nevertheless noticeable.

We now come to the Train dacoity which was committed on the 9th August, 1925. There is a mass of evidence to prove the commission of this dacoity, and it is established beyond doubt that it was committed.

It is only necessary to refer to the evidence of Jagannath Prasad who was a guard on the train. The murder of Ahmad Ali is proved by the evidence of Mirza Ahmad Shah, Saiyid Jan, and Police Constable Lachhman Ram.

The evidence to show that this dacoity was committed by the members of the conspiracy and in pursuance of the objects of the conspiracy is as follows :—

Banwari Lal in his retracted but subsequently repeated confession has deposed plainly as to having taken part in the commission of the dacoity and as to a large number of the other conspirators having taken part in the commission of the dacoity and as to the dacoity having been committed in pursuance of the objects of the revolutionary conspiracy. There is the following other evidence :—

Radhe Lal is the manager of the Ohhedi Lal Dharamshala in the Aminabad quarter of Lucknow. This is a rest house for the use of persons making a temporary stay in Lucknow. Such persons have to sign a visitor's register. Radhe Lal has proved that on the 7th of August, 1925, a party of six males stayed at the Dharamshala. They left on the 8th. One of the members signed in the register under the heading of the names and description of the party, "Din Dayal son of Chandra Manohar, caste Brahman, of Moolganj, Cawnpore" accompanied by five boys. Object of visit "For education." This entry is Ex. P-476-B. Later on on the 8th the same party returned and the same man made a similar entry at Ex. P-476-A. They did not return after the 9th. We find it proved that both these entries were in the handwriting of Ram Prasad.

Alamnagar Railway Station, which is on the broad gauge line of the East Indian Railway, is three miles from Lucknow Central Railway Station. Kakori Railway Station is five miles further on. Both Alamnagar and Kakori are within easy access of Lucknow City. Public conveyances which can be procured for hire ply between Lucknow and Kakori and Lucknow and Alamnagar. There are metalled roads to both places. On the 8th of August, 1925, Mendu Lal, who is employed at Alamnagar Railway Station, and Baiju, who is a porter at the Alamnagar Railway Station, deposed that three Indians of a respectable class who were wearing European clothes came to the Railway Station and entered into conversation with the Station staff at sometime between 7-30 P. M. and 8 P. M. His evidence is corroborated by Sital Prasad, Assistant Station Master. Kallan, an ekka driver, was that evening at Alamnagar Station looking for passengers. He deposed that three Indians who were wearing European clothes came to him at the Alamnagar Station and asked him to drive them to the chauk, a central part of Lucknow City. He agreed to drive but asked for a rupee as his fare. They offered him six annas and as they refused to give more he refused to take them. He has identified these three men as Ram Prasad, Banwari Lal and Suresh Chandra Bhattacharji. After Kallan refused to take the men he drove his empty ekka towards Lucknow. On the way he passed Police Constable Ram Sunder Singh who was patrolling on the road. He told him that he did not like the looks of the three men who had tried to engage his ekka and went on his way. Police Constable Ram Sunder Singh has deposed that later on he saw eight or ten men going down the road. He asked them who they were and where they were going. They said that they were medical students at the King George's Medical College, Lucknow. He identified Banwari Lal as one of those men. It would appear from this that the three men in question had been joined by five others.

There are two villagers Desi and Jodha of Amethia which is close to Kakori. They have given evidence of seeing young Indians in European clothes in the precincts of Amethia the day before the dacoity. They are, however, uncertain as to the date.

We now come to the events of the 9th August, 1925. Three boys Badlu, Kalwa and Sitalwa of Amethia village were grazing cattle about a mile from the Kakori Railway Station when they observed ten or twelve Indians collected near a bridge who were evidently endeavouring to keep their presence concealed. They were seen at about 2 P. M. They stayed till about 4 P. M. moving from one place to another and then went away in the direction of Kakori.

Sarju Prasad is the manager of the Kashmiri Hindu Hotel in the Aminabad quarter of Lucknow. This hotel is about two hundred yards distant from the Ramshewar Hindu Hotel and a little over a hundred yards from the Chhedi Lal Dharamshala. On the 10th August, a man came to the Kashmiri Hindu Hotel and registered his name as "Banarsi Lal Agarwala of Shahjahanpur Katia." He stated that he was visiting Lucknow for treatment. He arrived at 8 A. M. and went away after a day or so. The entry is Ex. P-26. It is clearly proved that Banarsi Lal was not in Lucknow. The entry in question is proved to be in the handwriting of Makundi Lal appellant.

There is internal evidence that the dacoits were fully acquainted with the fact that money would be found in a safe of a particular make and that they came equipped with tools capable of forcing it. The safe in question is of a standard pattern. These safes are made by the East Indian Railway Company in their own workshops in Lucknow. It weighs something over two hundred weight, and a certain amount of skill was necessary to heave it from the brakevan on to the permanent way. There were recovered on the spot two pairs of blacksmith's tongs, two cold chisels and one heavy axe complete with a head which weighs over seven lbs. and one axe head in a broken shaft which weighs five lbs. The appearance of the safe shows that the persons who were trying to open it had cut certain rivets and forced other rivets in. They were not able to remove all the rivets holding the lock. They then prised the metal door open and in so doing forced a portion of it back. The method adopted was clearly by the use of cold chisels held in the tongs and by the hammering of them in and by prising using the chisels or the axe edges as wedges. The dacoits may have had other tools apart from those which they left behind. It is noticeable to show the skill with which the crime was committed that this heavy safe was removed from the brake and forced open in about half an hour. The dacoits made clear from the commencement that their intention was to rob State property and not to rob private persons. Banwari Lal's confession of course makes the whole matter clear if accepted as we shall show later. It is amply corroborated in material particulars. Banarsi Lal in his evidence deposed that after the commission of the Train dacoity he saw Ashfaquallah who told him that the dacoity had been committed by himself and other members of the gang

This is not very important in view of the other evidence upon the point. The account given by Banarsi Lal as to the details of the dacoity differs on material points from the account revealed by the evidence which we have considered. It does not, however, follow in any way either that Ashfaqullah gave Banarsi Lal a correct account of the manner in which the dacoity was committed or that Banarsi Lal remembered the details accurately.

We now come to the discovery of property on the scene of the dacoity. There were found one loaded brass cartridge and 11 empty brass cartridge cases of the K K pattern. There were found 403

D W M

six empty 300 cartridge cases of a mark R. M. S. and two empty 300 cartridge cases of mark 1914. Finally we have found upon the evidence in these appeals that Ram Prasad, Rajendra Nath Lahiri, Manmatha Nath Gupta, Govind Charan Kar, Makundi Lal, Raj Kumar Sinha and Banwari Lal participated in the commission of this dacoity and we have found in Appeal No 380 of 1927 that Ashfaqullah also participated in the commission of this dacoity.

We now come to the evidence corroborating the accomplices in respect of the general conspiracy. The first man whose evidence we shall consider is Banarsi Lal. We find his evidence as to the organization of the conspiracy and specially as to the participation of Jogesh Chandra Chatterji in the conspiracy corroborated strongly by the discovery of Ex. P-198 in the possession of Jogesh Chandra Chatterji at the time of his arrest. It was through Banarsi Lal that the Police obtained information that copies of the "Revolutionary" had been posted from Benares. As we have already seen the evidence of the Sub-Post Master Kalka Prasad and the evidence of the entries in the Post Office registers and other evidence establish the same fact. He deposed that he posted copies of the "Revolutionary" from certain places. Post marks upon certain covers corroborate this statement. He deposed that he rented a house in which he collected members of the party who had assembled before the Train dacoity. He is corroborated here by Kishan Lal, the owner of the house. He first gave the clue to the Police that certain members of the party had stayed in a Dharamshala near the Amin-ud-doula Park in Aminabad. He did not give the name of that Dharamshala. Banwari Lal revealed the name. The Dharamshala was the Dharamshala of Chhedi Lal where it is established from the entries in the register that Ram Prasad stayed with five other persons giving his name as Din Dayal. He informed the Police Authorities that his own name had been entered in the register of the Kashmiri Hotel. It is proved that his name was so entered and that the entry was in the handwriting of Makundi Lal. Until he gave the Police information no one had suspected that the Bamrauli dacoity was the work of the revolutionary gang. It was on this information that the Police were able to work out the remaining evidence in connection with the Bamrauli dacoity. Until he gave information no one had suspected that the Bichpuri dacoity was the work of the revolutionary gang. The fact that he took part in the Bichpuri dacoity is established very strongly by the evidence of Saiyid Ainuddin, the Special Magistrate. When he stated that he had taken part in the Bichpuri dacoity Saiyid Ainuddin took him on the 10th November, 1925, to Bichpuri. Banarsi Lal guided him from Sherganj to Bichpuri, showed him on the way the house he had stated the dacoits had originally intended to rob, and after the arrival at Bichpuri communicated distinguishing points in the locality which could not possibly have been known had he not taken part in the dacoity. Further he picked out the two rifles which were discovered in the room of Raj Kumar Sinha from amongst several other rifles as the rifles which had been used in the Bichpuri dacoity. He had stated in his evidence that on his return from the Bichpuri dacoity he had met a certain legal practitioner of Shahjahanpur and had travelled with him. Shiam Lal, the legal practitioner in question, has corroborated this.

In respect of Indu Bhushan Mittra the main evidence of corroboration is to be found in the contents of the letters which are proved to have passed through his hands as "post box", but in addition his evidence is strongly corroborated by the discovery of the letter Ex. P-43 which he wrote to Ram Nath as "post box" of Rajendra Nath Lahiri. His evidence is further corroborated by the fact that a large number of revolutionary books were found in his possession and is also corroborated by the evidence of Jagdish Chandar.

The evidence of Kunwar Bahadur is corroborated by the fact that he received certain money orders from members of the revolutionary party on behalf of Banwari Lal. It is further corroborated by the fact that he signed the receipt Ex. P-61 in respect of the parcel which arrived from Benares. His evidence is also corroborated by the evidence of Bhola Nath.

The evidence of Gopi Nath is corroborated by the fact that letters and one post card from Gopi Nath to Indu Bhushan's brother were found in the house of Indu. These are Exs. P-48, P-49 and P-50. His evidence is also corroborated by the discovery in the possession of Ram Dulare of the post card Ex. P-59 sent by Gopi Nath to Ram Dulare. It is further corroborated by the fact that Suraj Bali signed Ex. P-53, the receipt for the parcel from Cawnpore, signing the receipt on behalf of Gopi Nath.

The evidence of Jadu Nath Sen is corroborated by Jagannath his Head Master and is further corroborated by the evidence of Sita Ram and Mahesh Narain Sinha.

We now come to the evidence of Banwari Lal. We do not consider that this man has disclosed all he knows and in some cases he has clearly, in our opinion, omitted to mention the names of persons whom he desired to shield, but the statements in his confession are corroborated in regard to the general conspiracy to a satisfactory extent. In respect of Jogesh Chandra Chatterji his evidence is corroborated by the discovery of Ex. P-198 in Jogesh Chandra Chatterji's possession, and also by his identification of Jogesh Chandra Chatterji, a circumstance which would be surprising if he was not telling the truth.

From the information given in his confession the following facts were discovered for the first time. All these facts were subsequently proved by outside evidence. Rajendra Nath Lahiri had sent money to him in the name of Kunwar Bahadur. Banwari Lal lived in Benares under the false name of Tara Singh. This is proved from Ex. P-480 A. Ram Prasad had been at Benares the first week of June, when money was paid to Rajendra Nath Lahiri.

His confession in so far as it relates to the commission of the Train dacoity is corroborated by the following facts:—

(1) It was on the information that he gave that it was discovered that money order Ex. P-92 had been sent by him to Himmat Bahadur.

(2) It was on the information that he gave that it was discovered that Makundi Lal had sent a money order from Shahjahanpur to his wife.

(3) It was on the information which he gave that it was discovered that Ram Prasad had written his name as Din Dayal in the Ohhedi Lal Dharamshala register.

(4) It was on the information that he gave that it was discovered that the debris of the property stolen in the dacoity had been thrown into a well in the Victoria Park, Lucknow. The evidence upon this latter point will be found in the deposition of Inspector Govind Behari which is corroborated by the evidence of Mr. Horton. Inspector Govind Behari has deposed that a mass of articles which were of no value to the dacoits that had been stolen at the dacoity were found on the information of Banwari Lal in a well in the Victoria Park. Mr. Horton was present at the time of its discovery.

The evidence of these accomplices has accordingly been corroborated sufficiently to enable it to be considered upon its intrinsic value. We here state our conclusion as to the value of the evidence. Banarsi Lal is, in our opinion, a reliable witness. He was to a considerable extent in the secrets of the party though he was not in the inner circle. We do not consider him to be a reputable or respectable person and we are not impressed by his protestations of repentance. We consider that he has made his revelations in order to save himself; and that his frequent assertions that the methods adopted by the conspirators went against his conscience savour of hypocrisy. There is, however, this much to be said in his favour. He did his best to give information which would otherwise not have been obtained. He had nothing to gain by informing the Police that the Bamrauli and Bichpuri dacoities were the work of the conspirators. This much is clear that he did not actually take part in the Train dacoity. We consider that his action in making the confession was probably influenced by the fact that Makundi Lal had entered his (Banarsi Lal's) name in the register of the Kashmiri Hotel. It is very difficult in a case of this kind to know what the actual feelings of members of the party are to one another, and Banarsi Lal may well have been sore in respect of occurrences which we know nothing about. After a careful consideration of his evidence we accept it. He has not been broken down on any material point in the course of a very long cross-examination. He is undoubtedly a bad man but we consider that we can rely upon his evidence.

Indu Bhushan Mittra was a small boy when he was first drawn into the movement. We are not sure that he is really very penitent. We consider that his action in warning Rajendra Nath Lahiri after Ram Prasad's arrest was not consistent with a genuine determination to lead a new life. His ruling motive in making the confession was to our mind to save himself but we see no reason to distrust his evidence. He was also exposed to a lengthy cross-examination which has failed to discredit him.

Kunwar Bahadur is somewhat older than Indu. He is a young man of much the same type. He has not been broken down in cross-examination and we see no reason to distrust his evidence.

Gopi Nath is a feeble person who is nearly blind. He was never likely to have been a valuable member of any party. His evidence has not been broken down in cross-examination and we see no reason to distrust him.

Jadunath Sen appears to us to be a respectable little boy who has told the truth. Although technically an accomplice he had gone very little into the matter and we consider that his evidence requires very little corroboration. He has not been broken down in cross-examination.

We find Banwari Lal's confession in the main reliable.

We have now stated the case of the prosecution in respect of the general conspiracy and the dacoities and we now come to the case for the defence.

Not one of the eight learned Counsel who addressed the Court argued that the evidence for the prosecution had failed to establish the existence of the general conspiracy. We put the point clearly to every one of them and we asked in particular Mr. H. N. Misra who had appeared in the Court below to discuss the prosecution evidence in respect of the general conspiracy. He addressed us on that subject for the greater part of day, but he criticised very little and did not put forward the suggestion that this evidence had failed to establish the existence of a general conspiracy. All that the learned Counsel argued was that their own respective clients were not proved to have taken part in the conspiracy. Criticism was directed to the evidence in respect of the meeting at the Vaishya Orphanage in Meerut. It was argued that the evidence of identification was unreliable, and that even if the evidence of identification were reliable, the evidence as a whole was insufficient to establish that a meeting of a revolutionary nature had taken place at Meerut.

Mr. Chatterji and Dr. J. N. Misra argued on behalf of Raushan Singh that there was not sufficient reliable evidence to justify the conclusion that the Bamrauli dacoity was the work of the conspirators. They laid great stress upon the fact that certain persons were tried after a Police inquiry by the then Sessions Judge of Pilibhit (an officer who has since retired) on a charge of complicity in the dacoity and that they had been acquitted. They endeavoured to establish from evidence given in that case that the suggestion that some of the dacoits in that dacoity were townsmen and that an electric torch had been used were subsequent additions which had found no place in the original story. They also argued that the failure to prosecute Raushan Singh in the first instance (although his name had been mentioned as one of the dacoits) showed that the dacoity was not the work of revolutionaries. It was not, however, argued that the Bichpuri, Dwarkapur and the Train dacoities were not the work of revolutionaries.

No attempt was made to meet the evidence for the prosecution in respect of those dacoities.

Our conclusions on the main evidence as to the existence of a general conspiracy are these:— We find that it is proved overwhelmingly that a conspiracy came into being in the United Provinces in July, 1924 to deprive the King-Emperor of the Sovereignty of British India, and that the persons who were controlling the conspiracy as the inner circle further conspired to commit dacoities in which fire-arms were intended to be used, in order to obtain funds with which to purchase arms and ammunition, and to carry on revolutionary propaganda. We find that the evidence clearly shows that those persons contemplated that fire-arms should be used in order to enable the dacoities to be committed effectively and with impunity, that they foresaw and realised that murder was a probable and likely consequence of those dacoities and that thus it is established that there was within the conspiracy to deprive the King-Emperor of the Sovereignty of British India a conspiracy to commit dacoities with murder.

In respect of the meeting at the Vaishya Orphanage at Meerut we find after having heard the arguments of the learned Counsel and considered the evidence for the defence, which has been produced upon the point, that certain members of the revolutionary party amongst whom were Ram Prasad, Rajendra Nath Lahiri and Suresh Chandra Bhattacharji collected at Meerut in the residential quarters of Vishun Saran Dublis in the Meerut Orphanage and there held a secret meeting taking precautions to conceal their presence. We believe the evidence of Sub-Inspector Brahma Singh and Pheru Singh whom we find to be reliable witnesses. Their identifications were in each instance supported by their picking out the man identified from a crowd in the Jail and repeating the identification in Court. The only construction which we can place upon the documentary evidence on this point is that the meeting was a pre-arranged meeting of the Revolutionary Society. We find that an attempt was made to mislead by stating that on the 13th September, 1925, the date of the meeting, there was to be an innocent meeting of a Committee of the Orphanage, whereas no such meeting was in contemplation and whereas no such meeting was held. We interpret the reference in the intercepted letters sent by Rajendra Nath Lahiri to the unknown person in Calcutta as a request to that person to join this meeting. The letter Ex. P-482 which was in the handwriting of Ram Prasad requesting the recipient to attend a meeting at the Orphanage on the 13th September 1925 of the shradh ceremony of their grandfather.

was a summons to this meeting in Meerut. The shradh ceremony amongst Hindus is a ceremony held usually annually in which surviving male relations offer oblations to the memory of deceased male ancestors. There could have been no such ceremony in which Ram Prasad and the unknown recipient of the letter could have shared and the use of the word Orphanage is very significant. We shall refer later to the incident of the Meerut meeting in connection with those of the appellants who we find participated in it.

There can be no doubt as to the fact that the Bamrauli, Bichpuri, Dwarkapur and Train dacoities were committed. The evidence that the Bichpuri and Train dacoities were committed in pursuance of the objects of the revolutionary conspiracy is very strong. We are satisfied that the Dwarkapur dacoity was also committed in pursuance of the objects of the conspiracy. That conclusion does not materially affect any of the appellants as none of them have been proved to have taken part in the commission of that dacoity and as far as we are concerned in respect to the conclusion as to conspiracy to commit dacoities with murder, it would be sufficient to establish, as has been established, that the Bichpuri and Train dacoities were committed in pursuance of the conspiracy.

We come finally to the decision as to whether the Bamrauli dacoity was committed in pursuance of the objects of the conspiracy. This point is of importance in connection with the appeal of Raushan Singh and will be considered again when we are dealing with that appeal. Here it is sufficient to note generally the arguments of Raushan Singh's learned Counsel. The fact that certain persons other than the appellants before us were tried by the Sessions Judge of Pilibhit for complicity in this dacoity and acquitted is absolutely irrelevant and immaterial. We do not propose to examine that point as there is no force in it. It is clear from the evidence that has been rightly placed before us that at the time of the trial in Pilibhit the witnesses to the dacoity did not state explicitly that any of the dacoits were townsmen and they did not make any reference to facts which would have indicated to the learned Sessions

Judge trying that case that an electric torch had been used. But these omissions in no way support the suggestion that the statements, that townsmen took part in the dacoity, and that something of the nature of an electric torch was used by the dacoits, are untrue additions to the original story. The explanation of the omissions is a simple explanation which is not creditable to the intelligence of those members of the Pilibhit District Police who took part in the original investigation. The original investigation was perfunctory and unintelligent. The first point which we have to note is that in that investigation no officer considered the circumstance that no less than seven empty '300 brass cartridge cases, five empty '450 cartridge cases and three loaded '450 cartridges were discovered on the scene of the dacoity was in any way significant. The omission to observe this point says very little for the intelligence of the officers concerned. The discovery of these articles should have been sufficient to show a Police Officer of reasonable intelligence that the Bamrauli dacoity was not an ordinary dacoity. It should have shown him that amongst the dacoits were persons who were in possession of arms such as seldom or never find their way into the hands of the ordinary miscreant who commits crimes of this nature. It should have shown him something further. Even if rifled fire-arms of '300 and '450 bore had come into the hands of ordinary dacoits the provision of ammunition for such weapons would be very difficult. Some ammunition might be stolen but ammunition of this kind rapidly deteriorates and after a certain number of years becomes unserviceable. The difficulties in the way of ordinary criminals procuring ammunition of this class are almost insuperable, so the conclusion to have been adopted by a Police man of intelligence from the discovery of these articles was that the dacoits were not ordinary criminals but men of a superior class, in other words, that they were probably, as a villager would call them, "townsmen." But not the slightest attempt was made apparently to elicit from the persons who were present at the time of the commission of the dacoity who the dacoits were.

Again although in the first report the chaukidar who had seen the commission of the dacoity from some little distance had remarked on the peculiarity of the light used by the dacoits which was sometimes dim and sometimes bright, the Police responsible for the inquiry was satisfied in leaving these villagers to describe the lights used by the dacoits as "wax candles." A very slight use of the intelligence was necessary to show that wax candles would not be usually a satisfactory illuminant for the use of the dacoits in the commission of a dacoity. A villager who had never seen an electric torch and whose knowledge of artificial light used in a village (apart from the lights which he might have seen at Railway Stations and in towns) was confined to what he had seen would divide artificial lights into oil lights, torches and wax candles and what was not an oil lamp or a torch would be considered a "wax candle." Although in the investigation not a single piece of wax candle was discovered and no burnt matches were found, there was no attempt made in the examination of these village witnesses in the trial in Pilibhit to ask them as to why they believed the dacoits to have been using wax candles. We see no reason to suspect the statements made by these witnesses after an intelligent investigation had been made as to the speech, the costume and the lights used by the dacoits. In order to accept the conclusion pressed before us by Mr. Chatterji and Dr. J. N. Misra it would be necessary to find that there has been a dishonest attempt to add evidence for the purpose of this case and inasmuch as we are satisfied that the investigation of Mr. Horton and the subordinate Police Officers in this case has been scrupulously honest, we reject the argument. The failure to proceed against Raushan Singh originally in connection with the Bamrauli dacoity will be examined by us later when we come to the decision of his appeal. It is sufficient to say here that our finding is that the failure to proceed against Raushan Singh originally while it tells greatly against the Pilibhit Police Officers who investigated the case, does not tell in any way in favour of Raushan Singh. We find upon the evidence that the Bamrauli dacoity was committed in furtherance of the objects of the revolutionary party.

We now proceed to decide the appeals of the fifteen appellants separately.

1. Ram Prasad Bismil.

As we have already stated, this appellant is a full grown man, who up to the time of his arrest was in business in Shahjahanpur. The evidence against him in respect of the charges of conspiracy is contained largely in the evidence of Banarsi Lal and Indu Bhushan Mittra. If this evidence is sufficiently corroborated against him and believed, it shows not only that he was one of the conspirators, but that he was the provincial organiser for the Province and the head of the Shahjahanpur branch. It is unnecessary to discuss this evidence. It has been discussed already and it is a question only whether it should or should not be accepted against him. The first piece of evidence corroborating the evidence of these two accomplices is to be found in the fact (which Ram Prasad himself admits) that he purchased the fifty cartridges, to which reference has been made, on the 7th August 1924 at Cawnpore from the firm of P. N. Biswas & Co., using, in order to obtain the cartridges, the arms license of Prem Kishan Khanna and signing "Prem Kishan" in the register as the recipient of the cartridges. The corroboration further consists in the evidence that seven empty cartridge cases of this pattern were found on the scene of the Bamrauli dacoity, one empty cartridge case and one full cartridge case of this pattern were found on the scene of the Dwarikapur dacoity and eleven empty cartridge cases and one loaded cartridge of this pattern were found on the scene of the Train dacoity. He was acquitted on the charge of participation in the Bamrauli dacoity but on the evidence of Banarsi Lal, a short time after the commission of this dacoity, Ram Prasad gave Banarsi Lal ornaments to melt, and the evidence of Banarsi Lal in this respect is corroborated by the fact that Ex. P-191 Ram Prasad's private account with the Allahabad Bank at Shahjahanpur shows that shortly after the commission of the dacoity he paid in a total amount of Rs. 750 in cash into his account. The evidence that he was instrumental in circulating copies of "The Revolutionary" which is given against him by Banarsi Lal is not corroborated especially against him, but he is connected with "The Revolutionary" by the evidence of Indu Bhushan Mittra and the recognition by Indu Bhushan Mittra of "The Revolutionary" corroborates this evidence. The corroboration of the evidence of Indu Bhushan Mittra against him is in the main found in the fact that Indu Bhushan Mittra has been proved by evidence which we believe to have been acting as "post office" for some one, and that letters were received by Indu Bhushan Mittra, the contents of which have been proved and the internal evidence of which goes to show that they were intended for Ram Prasad as Indu Bhushan states they were. The contents of these letters corroborate Banarsi Lal's statement also. We have already detailed the contents of these letters. Exhibit P-138-A had apparently come from Rajendra Nath Lahiri. It was posted at Dasasummedh, a local Post Office in Benares (Rajendra Nath Lahiri lives in Dasasummedh). It contains the passages, "You have not written about Lalaji. I am really surprised. There is no able man to represent No. 7 and methinks he is the fittest man and he has got resources in that side too. He will be able to have his assistants in a short time in that side. I proposed to him and he is ready. Now he is anxious to go to the assembly. If I do not take him with me he will be wounded, and he has been already wounded by some persons. I am now in a false position. If you do not object I shall take him too with me."

Whether this letter was or was not written by Rajendra Nath Lahiri, its contents clearly indicate that it was written by some conspirator. It is suggested that "Lalaji" was Damodar Sarup. He may or may not have been Damodar Sarup but "Lalaji" was clearly a conspirator. "The assembly" in our opinion can only mean the meeting at the Vaishya Orphanage at Meerut. Exhibit P-140 is a letter from a person who was engaged in mysterious activities in Hardwar, and who writes under the name of "Narendra." A letter has been subsequently discovered in the handwriting of Ram Kishan Khattri in which he signs his name as Narendra. It is impossible, in our opinion, to form a conclusion other than that the "Narendra" of Ex. P-140 was a conspirator who was in Hardwar. Exhibit P-141 is a letter which purports to come from the Vaishya Orphanage, Meerut, and which was signed by some one who called himself the Superintendent (Supt). It refers to a meeting of the Executive Committee of the Orphanage when no such meeting was proposed and no such meeting ever took place, and requested the recipient to see that his friends put up in various Dharamshalas the place of the function having been after due deliberation fixed at the writer's own place. Exhibit P-142 is another letter from "Narendra" which is apparently arranging a meeting on the 16th September, 1925. Then there is Ex. P-143 to which we have already referred with peculiar reference to the orphan who was intended for carpentry training—a reference which we understand to mean that some person was required to go to Calcutta to study bomb manufacture. That person must either be the writer (who, in our opinion, was Rajendra Nath Lahiri) or Ram Prasad himself. The letter Ex. P-144 is also a letter written by a conspirator. It contains the passage, "I hope to send two or three players at least one of whom is an expert man." The reference can only be here to dacoits or manufacturers of bombs. Exhibit P-145, the letter from "Mathura" who on internal evidence of the letter was Rajendra Nath Lahiri is almost conclusive as to association in a revolutionary conspiracy between the writer and the recipient, and finally in this connection there is a letter Ex. P-147 received after Indu Bhushan Mittra's arrest which is proved to have been written by Ram Kishan Khattri. There is further the letter Ex. P-41 which, as we shall show afterwards, is proved to be in Ram Prasad's own handwriting which was found under the pillow at the time of his arrest. This letter was clearly intended for Rajendra Nath Lahiri being sent to Ram Nath Pande as his "post office." It commences, "You know that I am enjoying the pūja vacation as my school has been closed." Ram Prasad had no connection with any school. He was by trade the manager of a shop which sold silk. It continues, "If you receive any news from Kali Babu, please inform direct to my office only call me to your place from there I shall start." "Kali Babu" is clearly a revolutionary. The letter continues asking for the despatch of certain specified books some of which were of a revolutionary nature "and other books in English which you think proper, mostly of communistic ideas." It then suggested the name of Jagdish Chandra the boy who lived opposite to him as a new "post office." There was also found in his possession a slip of paper written in Hindi, Ex. P-259, which contains the names amongst others of Ash'aqullah, Banarsi Lal and Prem Kishan. There was also found in his possession, Ex. P-260, a memorandum of accounts.

Before we come to the evidence against him contained in Ex. P-482 we note our reasons why we are satisfied that certain documents are in his handwriting. We have considered the evidence of Mr. Stott in this connection, but in this particular instance there was no necessity to obtain the assistance of a handwriting expert for the similarities are so clear that we have been able to arrive at an independent conclusion without the slightest difficulty. The prosecution had considerable trouble in discovering any piece of handwriting which could be proved unmistakably as the handwriting of Ram Prasad. After his arrest he made every effort to avoid providing specimens of his handwriting. Although while under trial he submitted a very large number of written applications, he was always careful to have them written by a person other than himself, or to write them himself in Urdu, his Urdu handwriting not being in question. He gave it as his reason for this abstention that as he had hurt his wrist in wrestling, he had been unable for many years to write English without great difficulty. The value of the statement as to his having a permanently injured wrist can best be judged by the fact that after his conviction he submitted to this Court written arguments in his defence in English in his own handwriting which printed into seventy-six pages. But while endeavouring to avoid leaving any evidence of his handwriting on the record he made one slip. While he was in custody in the Shahjahanpur Jail shortly after his arrest he sent a petition which has been proved to be in his own handwriting, dated 6th September, 1925, to the Sub-Divisional Officer, Shahjahanpur, complaining that the local Jail Authorities had put him in solitary confinement and were describing him as dangerous upon his history ticket. This is Ex. P-512. We have found on the evidence that this clearly was in his handwriting, and it is by comparison of the handwriting here with the handwriting in the questioned documents, that we have arrived at the conclusion that Ex. P-41 and Ex. P-482 were also in his handwriting. Exhibit P-482 is the letter which was handed to Mr. Horton by an undisclosed informant. We have referred to it already. It was written by Ram Prasad to some one whom he calls Undel requesting him to be present at the shradh ceremony of their grandfather at the orphanage on the 13th September, 1925.

Exhibit P-601 contains some correspondence between Ram Prasad Bismil and the Allahabad Bank branch at Benares. He sent them a letter from Benares City on 2nd June, 1925, which emanated from house No. 78 Dasasumedh requesting them to direct their Shahjahanpur branch to remit Rs. 60 to the Benares branch and credit it to his account. The Bank complied and the Rs. 60 were paid at Benares. These facts are proved clearly by other evidence. The significance is in the evidence which proves that Rajendra Nath Lahiri resided at 78 Dasasumedh.

The evidence which connects Ram Prasad with the Meerut meeting is his clear identification by Sub-Inspector Brahma Singh and Pheru Singh combined with the evidence afforded by the documents to which we have already referred. There is further general evidence of corroboration against Ram Prasad in the evidence of Jagdish Chandra.

We now come to the Bichpuri and the Train dacoities in respect of which he has been convicted. In regard to the Bichpuri dacoity the evidence of Banarsi Lal is conclusive to prove Ram Prasad's complicity in the dacoity, if it is properly corroborated and believed. We need go no further in respect of the corroboration than the evidence of Behari, the victim of the dacoity, and Lila who was grazing cattle in the neighbourhood of Bichpuri on the night of the dacoity and saw certain men collected there. Behari picked Ram Prasad out of a crowd in Jail identification proceedings as one of the men who took part in the dacoity. He identified him again in Court. We have already detailed the circumstances in which these Jail identifications were held, and we need not repeat our remarks upon them here or elsewhere. Lila similarly picked Ram Prasad out of a crowd in the Jail but was unable to repeat the identification in Court.

In respect of the Train dacoity there is first the evidence of Banarsi Lal, which proves the collection of some of the dacoits in Shahjahanpur, and the arrangements made by Ram Prasad for their entertainment. Banarsi Lal took a house for the use of the conspirators. He is corroborated on this point by Kishan Lal.

We have next the evidence of Radhe Lal who proves that a certain person with five others stayed at the Ohhedilal Dharamshala in Lucknow from the 7th to the 8th of August, 1925, and again from the 8th to the 9th of August, 1925, and that the head of the party signed his name in the register at places Ex. 476 B and Ex. 476-A as Din Dayal of Cawnpore. It is proved to our satisfaction that the handwriting of these two entries is the handwriting of Ram Prasad. Kallan the ekka driver picked Ram Prasad out of a crowd in the Jail as one of the men whom he had seen close to the Kakori Station on the 8th of August, 1925, the day before the dacoity. He repeated the identification in Court. Badlu, one of the boys who were grazing cattle in Amethia on the day of the dacoity, identified Ram Prasad in the Jail as one of the men whom he had seen in the neighbourhood in suspicious circumstances. He was unable to repeat this identification in Court.

In addition there is against Ram Prasad the important evidence of a man called Abdul Wadud. We have not referred before to Abdul Wadud. He is a vendor of aerated waters and ice who travels on certain trains selling his goods. At the time of the Train dacoity he was in No. 8 Down and when the train came to a standstill he got out of his compartment to see what had happened. He was in a good position to identify persons who were present among the dacoits, as there was light in the sky at the time, and as a man who is accustomed to travelling by Railway trains, and whose work would make him somewhat more observant as to the features of the people he sees than many others, he was able to give evidence of identification somewhat more extensively than that given by other people. When we say that his work would make him more observant, we mean this. A seller of aerated waters and ice on a Railway train is continually going from one carriage to another sometimes in a very bad light, leaving glasses, coming back to collect them and for payment and seeing his customers from time to time.

Such a man would in the nature of his work be likely to become observant. He has identified altogether eight persons as having taken part in the dacoity. He made four identifications, which were not accepted, three of men who clearly had not taken part in the dacoity, and one of a man who, although he had not taken part in the dacoity, had a strong facial resemblance to Rajendra Nath Lahiri. He identified Ram Prasad as one of the dacoits. He picked him out of a crowd in the Jail, and repeated his identification in Court.

In addition there is against Ram Prasad the fact that Banwari Lal has implicated him as one of the ring-leaders in the dacoity. There is also the evidence of Sri Ram Pande, the Sub-Agent of the Allahabad Bank at Shahjahanpur to the effect that shortly after the Train dacoity Ram Prasad was in possession of funds. This is the evidence against Ram Prasad.

We now come to his defence. His defence before Mr. Hamilton, when it was not confined to accusations against the integrity of the Special Sessions Judge, the prosecuting Counsel and the Police, consisted mainly in a denial of nearly everything. Before the Committing Magistrate he refused to make any statement. Before Mr. Hamilton he made a full statement. He admitted that he had purchased the cartridges in Cawnpore on behalf of Prem Kishan. He said he purchased them to oblige Prem Kishan. That was all the explanation he offered on that point. He attacked Banarsi Lal upon the following points. He said that Banarsi Lal was Secretary of the Congress Committee and that he was Auditor and that in 1921 Banarsi Lal had taken certain English clothes belonging to Thakur Indra Bikram Singh to burn, as a mark of disapproval of the use of cloth other than Indian made cloth, and that Banarsi Lal had misappropriated certain of these clothes and used them for his own purposes. He further stated that Banarsi Lal had gone to the Ahmedabad Congress and there stolen a bucket and a lantern. He stated that Banarsi Lal had committed other acts of dishonesty and that he was also a drunkard. He said that he had made these accusations to the members of the Congress party with the result that Banarsi Lal had lost his reputation. He went on to say that Banarsi Lal had formed a gang of dacoits, and that he was committing dacoities on his own account. He said that for this reason he and Banarsi Lal were enemies. In respect of Indu Bhushan Mittra the case that he put forward was that Indu Bhushan Mittra's father was a Headmaster of a Government School and a Government spy. In respect of Banwari Lal he had only to say that Banwari Lal was acting under the orders of the Police. He made a violent attack upon the Criminal Investigation Department, and said that the reason why he had been implicated was because he had been writing to the newspapers suggesting that the Criminal Investigation Department were fabricating false cases throughout the Province, in order to prevent a reduction in their personnel. His case was that they were afraid that their number was going to be reduced, so they were bringing all the false cases that they could think of. He said that the Criminal Investigation Department in revenge for his attacks upon them has implicated him in a false case and names as his arch enemy a leading gentleman in the Department Khan Bahadur Tasadduq Husain. He stated that Mr. Horton was honest as far as he went, but that he was too stupid to be able to get at the truth. He concluded that he had no hopes of a fair trial in the Court of Mr. Hamilton. In respect of his handwriting his case was that he had never written the petition which was sent from the Shahjahanpur Jail. He stated that the Jailor had substituted for the petition which he had written a petition which was forged by a person unknown. When he appealed from Jail to this Court he first, as we have said already, requested that Pt. Gobind Ballabh Pant should be appointed to appear for him, or that in the alternative he should be allowed to argue his appeal himself. On the 13th May, 1927, he applied to this Court for various copies. On the 4th June, 1927, he sent an application stating that he had received the copies. On the 28th June, 1927, he applied to this Court from the District Jail, Gorakhpur requesting that he should be transferred to the Lucknow Jail. On the 7th July, 1927, he sent an application requesting permission to argue his appeal in person. On the 18th July, 1927, he applied to this Court, objecting to the appointment of Mr. L. S. Misra as his Counsel and demanding that he should be allowed to argue his appeal in person. A Bench of this Court refused his application to be permitted to argue his appeal in person, and informed him that he would be represented by Mr. L. S. Misra. On the 20th July, 1927, he submitted another application adding to it arguments which printed into seventy-six pages. On 21st July, 1927, he applied again to this Court stating that he had no complaints against the good faith and honesty of Mr. L. S. Misra, but that the time for preparation of the case was so short that no lawyer could go through the record of the case during that period. There was no justification for the latter remark. On 25th July, 1927, he put in an application to the effect that he now accepted Mr. L. S. Misra as his Advocate and left the conduct of the appeal in his hands. He had previously instructed Mr. L. S. Misra. On 6th August, 1927, he submitted a further petition in which, while not withdrawing his defence in any way, he quoted extracts from certain books on eugenics and other subjects with the object of showing that in no circumstances should he be sentenced to capital punishment. He uses these words in this application:

"Therefore, your humble petitioner prays for mercy only on the ground that he is repentant. This sense of repentance he had shown on 5th June, 1927, by submitting a memorial to His Excellency the Governor-in-Council for the United Provinces of Agra and Oudh. The copy of this memorial he might have sent to the Hon'ble Court but he is afraid that if it is submitted before a Court of Justice it will become a public document which will not be proper at this stage."

He has since sent other petitions but they do not add materially to the case. Before the learned Special Sessions Judge, he withdrew all his witnesses. We are unable to reconcile the various contradictions, inaccuracies and irrelevancies which permeate his private defence and, ignoring his conduct, and substituting for his own arguments the arguments that his learned Counsel Mr. L. S. Misra has advanced on his behalf we proceed to decide the appeal. Mr. L. S. Misra devoted a considerable period to a close criticism of the evidence against his client. He admitted that he was unable to justify the personal attack upon Banarsi Lal by anything which had been elicited in cross-examination of the witnesses. It is obvious that, if Banarsi Lal had been guilty of the conduct of which Ram Prasad alleged that he was guilty, there would have been no difficulty in obtaining evidence to prove such conduct. Ram Prasad has made an additional allegation, that he has been implicated in this case because, as a zealous supporter of the Hindu religion, he has incurred the enmity of Muhammadans. There is so foundation for the allegation that he has incurred the enmity of Muhammadans, but it is clear upon his own showing that he is a man who was largely connected with Indian politics and that his sympathies were on the side of the Hindus. Such being the case, he would have had no difficulty, if it were true, in proving that Banarsi Lal had been a traitor to his own side. He made no attempt, however, to prove this. After stating at first that he desired to call a large number of witnesses, he eventually withdrew them and he has no grievance as to the fact that his witnesses were not produced, for by his own act they were not produced. His personal attacks upon Indu Bhushan Mittra, Banwari Lal and others are equally unsupported, but his learned Counsel has criticised wherever he could criticise, and has pointed out some incidents which he urged tell in his client's favour. Upon the point of handwriting, he has been unable to say anything. The appellant's suggestion that the petition Ex P 512 was forged at the instance of the Police and prosecution is ludicrously untrue, and upon a comparison of the handwriting, his learned Counsel has been unable to say anything. He has pointed out to us that according to Banarsi Lal's evidence Banarsi Lal was given copies of "The Revolutionary" very early on the morning of 26th of January, and he has referred us to certain Police reports (Ex D-23 and others) which would go to show that Ram Prasad left Shahjahanpur that morning for Lucknow by a train that left at 5 A. M. Exhibit D-22 was the report of a certain Police constable Abbas Khan; Ram Prasad being at that time under Police surveillance and Abbas Khan being the constable who was entrusted with his surveillance. Police constable Abbas Khan admits having made this report. He made it at 5 P. M., but it is clear that no one had seen Ram Prasad leaving Shahjahanpur by the 5 A. M. train and Abbas Khan in making the report was evidently relying upon information which he had received from some body else. There is nothing to show that the information was correct, and we do not consider that Banarsi Lal's evidence has been in any way affected on this argument. In respect of his identifications he has endeavoured to make out that those identifications were obtained unfairly. He has completely failed to establish this point. His learned Counsel made only a faint hearted attempt to show that Ram Prasad had not taken part in the general conspiracy. He directed the greater part of his arguments to endeavouring to show that he had not taken part in the Bichpuri dacoity or the Train dacoity. We are satisfied that the identifications were honest identifications, and upon these identifications and the evidence of handwriting, we have no difficulty in arriving at conclusions on these appeals. Banarsi Lal undoubtedly took part in the Bichpuri dacoity. His evidence that Ram Prasad was a ring-leader in this dacoity might go far very little, if it stood alone. But it does not stand alone. The fact that Behari has identified Ram Prasad as taking part in the dacoity would alone be sufficient corroboration of Banarsi Lal's evidence upon the point. But in addition to Behari's evidence, there is the evidence of Lila and we are satisfied that Ram Prasad took part in the Bichpuri dacoity. The evidence against him in respect of the Train dacoity is even stronger. He has been unable to explain away the fact that the entries in the register of Ohhedi Lal Dharamsala are in his own handwriting. This fact alone shows that Ram Prasad was in Lucknow on 8th and 9th August, 1925. He has been unable to explain away his identification by Kallan, Abdul Wadud and Badlu. These identifications alone are sufficient to show that he took part in the Train dacoity. Upon the above evidence we find that he was rightly convicted upon all the charges on which he has been convicted by the learned Special Sessions Judge.

2. Rajendra Nath Lahiri.

As we have already stated this appellant is a full grown man who in 1924-25 was working in Benares in a dispensary which is conducted by his brothers and was also reading as a student in the Hindu College. The main evidence to connect him with the general conspiracy is that of Banarsi Lal, Indu Bhushan Mitra and

Kunwar Bahadur. He is further implicated in Banwari Lal's confession. He was an associate of Banwari Lal. He had relations with Ram Prasad who visited him at Benares and he is proved to have been present at the Meerut Orphanage meeting. He was eventually captured in a house in Calcutta which was a bomb factory. The corroboration of the evidence of the accomplices against him is very strong. In the first place Banwari Lal, Banarsi Lal and Kunwar Bahadur have all identified him out of a crowd in the Jail and also in Court. Indu Bhushan Mitra has also identified him out of a crowd in the Jail and also in Court. He has admitted that the handwriting which has been taken as his standard handwriting is his own. After a careful personal comparison of the documents which implicate him, and which are alleged to be in his handwriting we agree with Mr. Stott in the conclusion that those documents are in his handwriting, and the corroboration afforded by these documents is in itself sufficient to establish that he was one of the conspirators. We take in the first place the facts that on three separate occasions he sent money orders to Kunwar Bahadur, the money being intended for the use of Banwari Lal. On all these occasions he remitted the money orders under a false name signing himself either as Kashi Nath Bajpai or Kunwar Bahadur Srivastava. It is in evidence that he despatched from Rae Bareilly a suspicious telegram Ex. P-110 to Benares. The words of the telegram were, "Marriage postponed until further news." This is signed under the false name of Jugal Kishore. We further find that Ex. P-162 "The Twelve Points" is proved to have been in his handwriting. This shows that he had left with Ram Nath Pande certain points upon which information was to be required. These points were a list of non-co-operators in the District, the population of the District, the number of Policemen and other points which would not be desired by ordinary persons. We have again the evidence which connects him with Govind Charan Kar. This is contained in Banwari Lal's confession and there is corroboration here in the evidence of Mahesh Narain Sinha. There is the evidence that the letters which were intercepted in Calcutta addressed to K. C. Guha were in his handwriting. There are the intercepted letters to Ram Prasad and there is particularly in Ex. P-145 the remark "Please bring my shirt and pen from Chaudhuri". When Govind Charan Kar, known as D. N. Chaudhuri was arrested there was found in his possession an "Apollo" fountain pen and on the evidence of Batak Nath Dey, Sarat Chandra Mukerji, Kamal Indu Sanyal and Amar Nath Chakravarti all witnesses of Benares that pen was the property of Rajendra Nath Lahiri. He has been clearly identified as having been at the meeting at the Vaishya Orphanage at Meerut on 13th September, 1925. The evidence of Sub-Inspector, Bhupendra Nath Sarkar proves that he was arrested in a bomb factory in Calcutta. Thus the evidence of the accomplices is corroborated absolutely. Even in the absence of the evidence of the accomplices there is other evidence sufficient to justify the conclusion that he was a member of the conspiracy. He called no witnesses. His competent Counsel Mr. Chatterji of the Calcutta Bar and Mr. H. O. Dutt made practically no attempt to discuss the evidence connecting this appellant with the general conspiracy. It is true they did not admit that he had taken part in the conspiracy but they did not trouble to criticise the evidence connecting him with it.

We now come to his connection with the Train dacoity. According to the evidence of Banarsi Lal and Indu Bhushan Mittra he was one of the persons who collected in Shahjahanpur before the commission of the Train dacoity. This would go for very little in itself. He has further been implicated in Banwari Lal's confession as having taken part in the Train dacoity. This would not be sufficient in the absence of corroboration, but his complicity in the Train dacoity is established on evidence which in itself would be sufficient if it stood alone. As has already been said No. 8 Down was brought to a stand still by a passenger in a second class compartment pulling the alarm. Dr. Chandrapal Gupta was travelling in the compartment in question. He is a Medical Officer employed by the East Indian Railway Company whose duties are largely to proceed from one Railway Station to another on medical attendance on members of the staff. On the evening in question he was returning in that train from Balamau to Lucknow. At Kakori he left his compartment for a few minutes and on his return discovered that three Indian passengers— young men dressed in khaki shirts, short knicker-bockers and stockings—had taken places in the compartment. The compartment in question was a second class compartment. The train left Kakori and had proceeded about a mile and a half when the alarm chains were pulled. The chains were pulled on both sides by two separate men. Then, when the train stopped those three men got out of the train and took part in the dacoity. Dr. Chandrapal Gupta picked out Rajendra Nath Lahiri from a crowd in the Jail and identified him again in Court as one of the three men who were in the compartment. The evidence of Dr. Chandrapal Gupta, in our opinion, is very strong. It does not stand alone however. It corroborates the evidence afforded by the depositions of Banarsi Lal and Indu Bhushan Mittra and the statements in Banwari Lal's confession. The learned Counsel for this appellant have, as might be expected, directed their criticisms mainly against the evidence of Dr. Chandrapal Gupta. They have been unable to throw doubts on this gentleman's integrity. They have been unable to show that he is other than an intelligent witness. We have it then, that this intelligent and honest witness has picked out of a crowd in the Jail Rajendra Nath Lahiri as one of the three men who were in the carriage and repeated this identification in Court. The main argument of the learned Counsel was that Dr. Chandrapal Gupta might have made a bona fide mistake in identifying this appellant. The evidence as to how this identification was made is as follows.

When Dr. Chandrapal Gupta saw the appellant in the Jail he at once took hold of him, saying that he was one of the men in question. He then told Saiyid Ainuddin that he would have to think over the matter because Rajendra Nath Lahiri was not dressed in Jail in the clothes similar to those which he had been wearing in the Railway carriage and also because Rajendra Nath Lahiri when the witness saw him in the train had a moustache whereas the man before him had shaved his moustaches. In the witness box he stated before the Judge "I identify him here. After the dacoity I first saw him at the Jail identification. He has no moustache now. He had a very small moustache at the time of the dacoity. When I picked him out in the Jail he was not wearing the same clothes as in the dacoity and he had no moustache. I am absolutely certain now that I saw him in the Train dacoity." We thus have it that this witness identified the appellant at once as soon as he saw him in the Jail. He then thought over the question carefully in order to make up his mind whether his identification was or was not correct and after careful consideration decided that it was correct. As the witness is both intelligent and honest, it would, in our opinion, be difficult to get a better identification. We are satisfied upon this evidence that Rajendra Nath Lahiri took part in the Train dacoity and that he has been rightly convicted by the learned Special Sessions Judge on all charges.

3. Raushan Singh.

As we have already stated this man is a man of nearly forty years of age, who holds some landed property in the Shahjahanpur District. He was admittedly a friend of Banarsi Lal and also knew Ram Prasad. Banarsi Lal, while stating that Raushan Singh was a friend of Ram Prasad, was not of opinion that Raushan Singh was a member of the revolutionary party. Indu Bhushan Mitra, however, has given evidence that in his opinion Raushan Singh was a member of the revolutionary party. He says, "My reason for thinking that Raushan Singh was a member of the revolutionary society was that one day I went to fetch a book from Ram Prasad and Raushan Singh was there. I got a book which I think was 'Bolshevikon ke Kartut' (the deeds of the Bolsheviks). "He said to me, 'My child! why are you taking such books away? Do not read them!'" He said this laughing. He also was a frequent visitor to Ram Prasad. Also they used to speak together after closing the door.....I got a book, 'Life of Mazzini', from Raushan Singh, a fact which I had forgotten to state up till now. This has come back to me this very minute. I got this book in January, or February, 1925. I asked for this particular book from Ram Prasad and he said Raushan Singh could give it. Raushan Singh does not know English. Raushan Singh was in front of the house of Ram Prasad with the book and I got it from him there. It was in the street. I had asked for this book a week previously. I have seen Raushan Singh locked in with Ram Prasad more than once but I cannot say how often. He also used to sleep there often. I cannot give the date or month of any of these secret conferences. Once I saw Hargovind with Raushan Singh and Ram Prasad on such a secret talk. This is the only occasion on which I saw a third person with them. I do not remember how often I was told to go out.....The life of Mazzini which I got from Raushan Singh was really Mazzini ki Lekh and was written in Hindi".

This is the only evidence to prove that Raushan Singh was a member of the Revolutionary party with the exception of the evidence connecting him with the Bamrauli dacoity. The evidence connecting him with the Bamrauli dacoity is strong evidence of identification. Lalita Prasad who knew him before deposed that he saw him participating in the commission of the Bamrauli dacoity. Kalka Prasad and Kanhai who did not know him before identified him in Jail identification proceedings out of a crowd as one of the men who had taken part in the Bamrauli dacoity and repeated the identifications in Court. Puttu Singh who knew him before stated that he was present in Bamrauli on the morning of the dacoity.

Raushan Singh was defended by Mr. Chatterji of the Calcutta Bar and Dr. J. N. Misra. The first point taken by Mr. Chatterji was that it was not sufficient to justify the convictions in this case for it was to be proved that Raushan Singh had taken part in the Bamrauli dacoity, that it was necessary further to prove that he was a member of the Revolutionary party and that the dacoity had been committed in pursuance of the objects of that party. We have already decided in a previous portion of this case that the Bamrauli dacoity was committed in pursuance of the objects of the party and we should have arrived at that conclusion, even if we had found that Raushan Singh was not a member of the Revolutionary party. We agree, however, with Mr. Chatterji in the conclusion that, unless it is established that Raushan Singh was a member of the Revolutionary party the conviction against him of participation in the Bamrauli dacoity could not be upheld, as this Court would not have jurisdiction to convict him of participation in that dacoity, unless he were a member of the party.

The evidence in these matters is very closely interrelated. The evidence of Indu Bhushan is sufficient in itself, if corroborated and believed, to show that Raushan Singh was a member of the party. The reasons which Indu Bhushan gives in support of his conclusion that he was a member of the party are, in our opinion, sufficient, but Indu Bhushan's evidence requires corroboration. We see no reason to distrust him as far as Raushan Singh is concerned. His evidence has not been shaken in cross-examination and it has not been made out that Indu Bhushan has any reason for wishing to implicate Raushan Singh falsely. The corroboration will largely depend upon our finding as to whether Raushan Singh took part in the dacoity. He has called evidence to support his defence. The evidence against him has been criticised at length by his learned Counsel. The main points that they have taken are that in the previous case the proceedings resulted in an acquittal, that their client was not prosecuted originally, that upon their reading of the evidence it was not he who was present in Bamrauli on the morning of the dacoity, and that there was not sufficient light by which to make an identification. We have already dealt with the first argument in a previous portion of the judgment, and found that there is no force in the argument that other men were tried for complicity in this dacoity and acquitted. In regard to the second point the fact that Raushan Singh was mentioned at the commencement as having taken part in the dacoity tells strongly against him. The circumstance that he was not proceeded against has been explained by the Police Officer, who was responsible for not proceeding against him, as due to the fact that the Police Officer in question was given to understand during the investigation that Raushan Singh's name had been mentioned falsely on account of enmity. The Police Officer who was responsible for omitting to prosecute Raushan Singh was Sub-Inspector Ram Chandra Sharma. He has given evidence in this case. His attempt to explain his omission is absolutely unsatisfactory. He said, "I did not arrest nor prosecute Raushan Singh. I did not do so as people said that there was enmity. Before this occurrence I had heard nothing of such an enmity." We have never heard a more lame or more unsatisfactory explanation for failure to proceed against a man who had been mentioned by persons present at a dacoity as having taken part in it. A Police Officer in the position of Sub-Inspector Ram Chandra Sharma who had in his possession evidence that a certain man had been identified on the spot as having taken part in the commission of a dacoity was under an obligation to investigate the case against him further, and not to drop the case at its very inception on the ground of a possible defence. He has been unable to give any coherent explanation of what was the nature of the enmity to which he referred. The attempt in this case to prove enmity has been pitifully weak. The case put forward by the competent Counsel for Raushan Singh on the question of enmity can be reduced to the following short statement. There had previously been a fight between some relations of a man called Gajraj Singh in Bamrauli and some other persons. Lalta Prasad was not on good terms with those relations of Gajraj Singh. Raushan Singh's father's sister's husband Nathu Ram was a servant of Gajraj Singh. The fight had taken place three years before the commission of the dacoity. All that the learned Counsel are able to say is that when a dacoity was committed in the house of Baldeo, Lalta Prasad must have gone out of his way to accuse falsely Raushan Singh of having taken part in the dacoity, because Raushan Singh's father's sister's husband had been a servant of Gajraj Singh, and because Lalta Prasad was not on the best of terms with certain relations of Gajraj Singh. This was the best case that the learned Counsel were able to put up, and Sub-Inspector Ram Chandra Sharma was unable to produce anything as coherent. Nevertheless he refused to take action against Raushan Singh. Raushan Singh has put forward an explanation as to why he has now been implicated in this case. This explanation is not supported by evidence but we note what it is. He says that he had worked as a Police spy for the Special Police, who were engaged in the suppression of organized dacoity in the Pilibhit and other districts and that the fact that he worked as Police spy for these Police has caused him to incur the enmity of the District Police and the Criminal Investigation Department. There is everything to show that so far from having incurred the enmity of the District

Police the District Police shielded him when his name was originally mentioned. Absolutely no suggestion is made as to why the Criminal Investigation Department should go out of their way to implicate a Police spy on a false charge. There is, of course, no evidence to show that Raushan Singh is a Police spy. We have now sufficiently examined the facts as to why he was not proceeded against originally. In our opinion the conduct of Sub-Inspector Ram Chandra Sharma requires investigation and we trust that it will be investigated by the Police Authorities.

The next point taken up on behalf of Raushan Singh is based upon an inaccurate reading of the evidence, the suggestion being that Raushan Singh was not the man who visited Bamrauli that day but that another man visited Bamrauli that day. Upon this point it is sufficient to note the following evidence. Raushan Singh had originally relations in Bamrauli. He does not live in Bamrauli. He lives in a village in the Shahjahanpur District which is several miles distant from Bamrauli which is in the Pilibhit District. Puttu Singh deposed that Raushan Singh, who had some local knowledge of Bamrauli but who had been there very seldom in the past few years, came to Bamrauli on the morning of the dacoity and was seen by him at 8 A. M. Puttu Singh and Gajraj Singh have houses in the same enclosure. Raushan Singh had come to the house of Gajraj Singh. Baldeo Prasad had stated, that on the morning of the dacoity he had gone to the house of Puttu Singh to borrow a cart, and that he had seen in Puttu's compound a man of another village whom he did not know. The argument here is that the man of the other village whom he did not know was the man who took part in the dacoity, and was not Raushan Singh. There is no foundation for this suggestion. Lalta Prasad had deposed that he had seen Raushan Singh that morning in Bamrauli and saw him again taking part in the dacoity. He was the man who mentioned Raushan Singh's name to the Police. He said that when he saw Raushan Singh in the morning Shankar Singh, the son of Gajraj, was with him.

In respect of the fourth point we are clearly satisfied that there was ample light by which an identification could have been made. Sugar boiling was in process at the time. There was further a light from the fires and there was further the light of the electric torch.

The evidence produced by Raushan Singh in his defence has not succeeded in helping him. The evidence which attempts to prove enmity is not worth discussion. The evidence which he has produced to prove that he was in Bamrauli not on the day of the dacoity but on the day before is that of Gajraj Singh. We do not believe it. We accordingly find that it is proved that Raushan Singh participated in the commission of the Bamrauli dacoity. We have already found that the Bamrauli dacoity was committed in pursuance of the aims of the Revolutionary conspiracy. We find that Raushan Singh was an intimate friend of Ram Prasad, and we find on the evidence of Indu Bhushan Mittra that he used to have meetings with Ram Prasad behind closed doors and that his conduct was such as indicated that he was a member of the conspiracy. We have found in Appeal No. 380 of 1927 that Ashfaquallah who is one of the conspirators participated in the commission of the Bamrauli dacoity. We consider that these facts sufficiently corroborate the evidence of Indu Bhushan Mittra and we, therefore, find that Raushan Singh has been rightly convicted on all the charges on which he has been convicted by the learned Special Sessions Judge.

4. Jogesh Chandra Chatterji.

This man as has already been stated is a resident of Bengal of over thirty years of age. The evidence against him which shows that he was one of the conspirators is that of Banarsi Lal. He is also mentioned by Banwari Lal in his confession. If this evidence is accepted there cannot be the slightest doubt as to the fact that he was a member of the Revolutionary party. It is corroborated by the fact that both Banarsi Lal and Banwari Lal picked him out of a crowd in Jail Identification proceedings as the man to whom they referred. This evidence, however, is not the main evidence against him. The main evidence against him which corroborates the evidence contained in Banarsi Lal's deposition and Banwari Lal's confession is the evidence that when he was arrested on the 18th October, 1924, Ex. P-198 containing an account of the meeting of the Revolutionary party was found in his possession. This evidence not only strongly corroborates the evidence of the accomplices but in itself would be sufficient for his conviction if believed. It is as follows:—

Inspector Muhammad Ismail of the Bengal Criminal Investigation Department has deposed that he was on duty in the neighbourhood of the Howrah Bridge, Calcutta, on the 18th October, 1924. He saw Jogesh Chandra Chatterji in the precincts of the Howrah Railway Station. He says that he had heard his name before but did not know him before. He considered his behaviour suspicious and followed him over the Howrah Bridge to the junction of Harrison Road and Strand Road. There he apprehended him as a suspect and took him to a shop close to the place of the arrest where he searched him in the presence of two witnesses who were selected at random. Jogesh Chandra Chatterji was made to sit on a bench in front of the shop. While the Inspector was searching his inside pocket Jogesh Chandra Chatterji took a paper from his lower left hand outside pocket and let it fall on the takht (platform) beneath the bench.

This paper was Ex. P-198. We have already given the contents of this paper. If this story is believed, there cannot be the slightest doubt as to the guilt of the appellant. Kabiraj Bhuban Mohan Das, a search witness, was called to prove the discovery of Ex. P-198 from the possession of the appellant. He has corroborated Inspector Muhammad Ismail absolutely. In his statement before the Special Sessions Judge, the appellant put up the defence that Ex. P-198 had not been found in his possession. His case was that the Police Officers, who had arrested him, had brought this paper with them, and had planted it on him. He called the other search witness Kali Das Ghose in his defence. He also called two other witnesses to show that on certain dates he could not have been in the United Provinces. He was defended in this Court by Mr. N. C. Dutt who confined himself to criticising the evidence for the prosecution. He has been unable to explain how Banarsi Lal who is a resident of Shahjahanpur and Banwari Lal who is a resident of Rae Bareilly could have been in any position to identify Jogesh Chandra Chatterji as they did identify him, if they had not known him before. In respect of the discovery of Ex. P-198 Mr. Dutt has been unable to shake the evidence of the prosecution witnesses. Kali Das Ghose, the witness to the search who was called as a defence witness, has not supported the appellant's story. He says that he was a witness to the search and that he saw Ex. P-198, but that he did not see it drop from the appellant's pocket. He was clearly not in a position to see the paper drop from the appellant's pocket as it was dropped from the side of the appellant opposite to the side on which the witness was standing. Kabiraj Bhuban Mohan Das has stated that he saw the appellant let fall the paper and that he picked it up. His words are, "At the search while the Inspector was searching his pockets Jogesh let fall a paper on the takht on which I was sitting. I picked it up while both I and the Inspector tried to do so and I gave it to the Inspector." This was Ex. P-198. The appellant stated that when the paper was discovered he protested loudly. Kali Das Ghose has no recollection of his making any protest. The other two witnesses Profulla Chandra Chakrabarti and Jitendra Chandra Bhattacharji do not appear to us to be reliable witnesses and in no circumstances would their evidence be of great value. The appellant appears to have taken some exception to the fact that a certain witness whose evidence he desired was not called. We find there is no foundation for this objection. A summons was issued for the attendance of his witness. The witness who resided in Calcutta sent a medical certificate stating that he was unable to attend and no further steps were taken by the appellant to procure his evidence. The suggestion that Ex. P-198 was planted upon the appellant is apart from the evidence a suggestion which can hardly be argued seriously. On the date of the appellant's arrest the 18th October, 1924, neither the United Provinces Police nor the Bengal Police had any suspicion that there was a specific Revolutionary party in the United Provinces with an organization that had developed as far as the holding of meetings. As has already been noted, the clue afforded by Ex. P-198 was not followed up at the time. It is true that Rai Sahib Durga Prasad, Deputy Superintendent of Police in the Criminal Investigation Department, who has given evidence in the case, stated that he had heard possibly as early as July, 1924, that there was some sort of a Revolutionary society and that a man who called himself "Roy"—that is to say the appellant who passed under the name of Roy—was visiting the United Provinces. But he did not communicate his suspicions otherwise than in his confidential diaries to any one until the 19th November, 1924, (a month after the appellant's arrest and the discovery of Ex. P-198) when he warned the Superintendent of Police, Shahjahanpur, in Ex. P-658 of the possibilities of dacoities being committed by political criminals in the Shahjahanpur District. We believe the evidence of Banarsi Lal and the statement of Banwari Lal and we believe Inspector Muhammad Ismail and Kabiraj Bhūban Mohan Das as to the account which they give of the discovery of Ex. P-198. We accordingly find that the appellant Jogesh Chandra Chatterji has been rightly convicted on the charges on which the learned Special Sessions Judge convicted him.

5. Suresh Chandra Bhattacharji.

This man as we have already stated is a Cawnpore man who is employed as a sub-editor in a newspaper. He has been convicted on the charge of general conspiracy but acquitted on the charge of complicity in the Train dacoity. The evidence against him is partly contained in the evidence of Gopi Mohan who has deposed to his association with Ram Dulare appellant. We are satisfied that the entries in a certain note-book found at the time of his arrest are in the appellant's handwriting and from a comparison with the handwriting in this note-book we are satisfied that he despatched a money order, Ex. P-96, on 28th November, 1924 for Rs. 10 to Kunwar Bahadur with the intention that the money should be given to Banwari Lal. This money order was sent under the false name of "N. Prasad." The main evidence, however, against this appellant is in the evidence that he attended the meeting at the Vaishya Orphanage. He was not present at the Vaishya Orphanage on 13th September, 1925. The evidence of Police constable Sarju Dayal, which is corroborated by other evidence, shows that this appellant left Cawnpore on 13th September, 1925, and arrived at Meerut at 7-30 A. M. on 14th September, 1925. Police constable Sarju Dayal had been ordered to shadow this appellant to Meerut, Suresh Chandra being at the time a political suspect. He has deposed that he did follow him to Meerut. At Meerut the appellant went to a Dharamsala and then Police constable Sarju Dayal lost trace of him until the afternoon when he shadowed him back to the Railway Station and followed him to Cawnpore. Sub-Inspector Brahma Singh and Pheru Singh have deposed that Suresh Chandra Bhattacharji was one of the men who entered the Superintendent's residential quarters at the Orphanage at 10 A.M. on 14th September, 1925. Pheru Singh has deposed that Suresh Chandra Bhattacharji left these quarters at 2 P.M. Sub-Inspector Brahma Singh and Pheru Singh picked the appellant out of a crowd at Jail identification proceedings and identified him again in Court. He was defended by Mr. H. N. Misra. He admitted that he had left for Meerut on 13th September, 1925, and that he arrived there on 14th September, 1925, but he denied that he had ever gone to the Vaishya Orphanage. He called a large number of witnesses. His witnesses Dr. S. N. Sen, Sital Prasad, Mohit Kumar Mukerji and Hari Gopal Roy were to prove that he was in Cawnpore on the day when the Train dacoity was committed. As he has been acquitted on the charge of having participated in the commission of the Train dacoity, we need not discuss their evidence. His remaining witnesses were called to prove, that Gopi Mohan was not telling the truth. The evidence of Gopi Mohan against this appellant is comparatively valueless. We do not, however, believe the evidence of these witnesses. He has taken an objection that his brother whom he wished to call as a defence witness was not heard by the learned Special Sessions Judge. We note that he had ample opportunity of producing his brother as a witness during the period in which his witnesses were being heard, and that he abstained from calling his brother during that period, but wished to call him after his case was closed. We consider that the learned Special Sessions Judge rightly refused to hear that witness. At the time that it was proposed to call him the whole of the evidence was closed and arguments were about to commence. We see no reason to disbelieve the evidence of Gopi Mohan, though it does not prove very much against this appellant. We believe the evidence of Sub-Inspector Brahma Singh and Pheru Singh against him. We find that he visited in Meerut the residential quarters of Vishnu Saran Dublis in the Vaishya Orphanage and remained there between 10 A. M. and 2 P. M. on 14th September, 1925.

As we have already found, a secret meeting attended by members of the inner circle of the Revolutionary party was being held at that time in those quarters. The appellant has been unable to explain to our satisfaction what he was doing in Meerut at the time and it is very noticeable that though he has called a large number of witnesses he has called no witness to prove his activities in Meerut on that date. He has further been unable to explain why he should have sent a money order under a false remitter's name to Kunwar Bahadur. We consider that he has been rightly convicted on the charges on which the learned Special Sessions Judge has convicted him.

6. Vishnu Saran Dublis.

He is a full-grown man who was Superintendent of the Vaishya Orphanage at Meerut. He admittedly was in the Orphanage on 13th and 14th September, 1925, and, if the evidence of Sub-Inspector Brahma Singh and Pheru Singh against him is believed, he was receiving in his residential quarters men who are proved to have been members of the Revolutionary conspiracy and concealed their presence. If the evidence of these two witnesses be believed he has been rightly convicted of complicity in the conspiracy unless he can give a satisfactory explanation of these facts. We have already stated our conclusions that Sub-Inspector Brahma Singh and Pheru Singh have told the truth. We find them to be reliable and intelligent witnesses.

We have waited until we came to the appeal of the present appellant to consider the objections raised in defence against the evidence of these witnesses. The defence in the lower Court apparently assailed their evidence in every possible manner. They went as far as to suggest that Sub-Inspector Brahma Singh had never visited Meerut. As against Pheru Singh it was stated that he had hopes of entering Police service, and that, therefore, he was ready to tell any untruth which would oblige the prosecution. In this Court the position was modified and it was not suggested that either Sub-Inspector Brahma Singh or Pheru Singh were altogether dishonest witnesses, but it was suggested that they were partially dishonest and had embroidered their stories somewhat. It was suggested that they had not kept as strict a watch upon the Orphanage as they said they had. It was suggested that they would have no light in the evening by which to identify anybody. It was suggested that from the place where they stood they could have seen nothing. We have considered all these suggestions, and we find that there is no force in any one of them. Vishnu Saran Dublis is a man of some position in Meerut, and he clearly had no difficulty in procuring a mass of persons to give evidence in his favour. He has thus been able to procure the evidence of a coolie called Chhidda, who has deposed that just at the particular time that Sub-Inspector Brahma Singh and Pheru Singh were watching the premises, the Municipal lamp outside the premises was broken. It was broken shortly before the 13th September, 1925, and mended after a few months. It is only necessary to say that we do not believe Chhidda to be telling the truth.

The appellant's appeal was argued by Mr. Kapila Beva Malaviya of the Allahabad Bar who addressed us an intelligent and careful argument. He has, however, been unable to explain away the facts against his client. The defence evidence may be divided into two parts—evidence which does not help the appellant if believed, and evidence which, if believed, would help the appellant. The most respectable witnesses who have been called on behalf of the appellant are Pt. Debi Sahai, Mahabir Prasad, Har Sarup, Amar Singh and Nirmal Sarup, but there is nothing in their evidence which contradicts the story that Vishnu Saran Dublis had collected revolutionaries in his own residential quarters, and that a meeting was being held there by the members of the inner circle of the Revolutionary party. Even if these witnesses be believed their evidence would only show that Vishnu Saran Dublis was not always with his associates, and that he was carrying on his duties as Superintendent during business hours. This would not prevent his joining the deliberations outside his own business hours when he had his friends collected in his own private residential quarters. Baldeo Chaube, Mohan Lal, Durga Prasad, Murari Lal and Chhidda have given evidence which if believed would be of more value but we do not believe these witnesses. We believe Sub-Inspector Brahma Singh and Pheru

Singh. This being our conclusion on the evidence we now proceed to consider the remaining arguments raised by Mr. Malaviya. Mr. Malaviya's case was that even if the evidence of Sub-Inspector Brahma Singh and Pheru Singh were accepted as absolutely reliable, there was nothing to show that his client had been guilty of any offence. His first point was that these persons might have been collected in the appellant's residential quarters without his knowledge. Mr. Malaviya's arguments were usually better than this. We do not criticize him for taking any point which he considered might help his client, but this suggestion can hardly be entertained seriously. The residential quarters which are proved from a plan are fairly spacious. Combined with certain office accommodation which can be approached and which could be utilised out of office hours for the accommodation of guests they would provide for seven outsiders, Vishnu Saran Dublis and members of his household. But the space is not such as would render it possible for seven men to have been residing in those quarters without the knowledge of the appellant. His next point was that, even if those persons were residing in those quarters in the manner stated by Sub-Inspector Brahma Singh and Pheru Singh, and amongst those persons were Ram Prasad Bismil, Rajendra Nath Lahiri, Suresh Chandra Bhattacharji and Domodar Sarup, there was nothing to show that they were collected there for other than an innocent purpose. We cannot accept this contention. Having found as we have done, that Ram Prasad Bismil and Rajendra Nath Lahiri (apart from Suresh Chandra Bhattacharji and Damodar Sarup) were members of the conspiracy, and the evidence further showing that they were leading members of the conspiracy, and having further found from the documentary evidence that an important meeting of the Revolutionary party had been arranged at the quarters of Vishnu Saran Dublis in the Vaishya Orphanage at Meerut to commence on 14th September, 1925, the evidence of Sub-Inspector Brahma Singh and the evidence of Pheru Singh establish sufficiently that the persons on the premises of Vishnu Saran Dublis had collected in order to hold an important meeting of the Revolutionary party. We have formed no conclusion as to Ex. P-141 having been written by Vishnu Saran Dublis. We do not find that it was written by him. We have no evidence to support a finding that it was written by him. But this letter purported to come from the Vaishya Orphanage, Meerut. It was signed by a person who called himself the Superintendent, and that letter makes certain points very clear. It stated a complete untruth to the effect that there was to be an executive meeting of the Orphanage Committee on that date. It stated that a person who was called an "upadeshak" or lecturer from Lahore had promised to attend and it arranged for places where the persons who were coming to the Orphanage were to assemble and it further stated that the place had been after due deliberation fixed at the Superintendent's "own place." We have already referred to this letter and also to the other letters which indicate that a meeting of the Revolutionary society was to be held on that date in Meerut. When we have upon the evidence of Sub-Inspector, Brahma Singh and Pheru Singh the fact that as darkness was coming on, eight men, amongst whom were Ram Prasad, Rajendra Nath Lahiri and Vishnu Saran Dublis, emerged from the residential quarters of the last named; went away for an hour and a half, then returned to those quarters, and apparently remained there for the whole night, and that Suresh Chandra Bhattacharji with another man came to those quarters on the following day and stayed there for some hours, we can only form the conclusion that there was such a meeting in those residential quarters at that time. Mr. Chatterji on behalf of Rajendra Nath Lahiri and Mr. Malaviya on behalf of Vishnu Saran Dublis asked us to note that there were eight voluntary workers attached to the Orphanage and suggested that the eight men who were seen by Sub-Inspector Brahma Singh and Pheru Singh emerging from those quarters might have been the eight voluntary workers. We have examined this point and we find that there is no force in the suggestion and that in no circumstances could eight voluntary workers have been emerging from the Superintendent's quarters as darkness was coming on on the night of the 13th September, 1925, which was a Sunday night. After considering the arguments of Mr. Malaviya and giving them full attention we state again the conclusion which we have already stated that on the evidence it is clearly established that there was a meeting of the members of the inner circle of the Revolutionary Society in the quarters of Vishnu Saran Dublis at the Vaishya Orphanage at Meerut on 13th and 14th September, 1925. We are satisfied that Vishnu Saran Dublis had full knowledge of the meeting, that he was present at the meeting and that he took part in the deliberations. We find that he has been unable to explain away anything connected with these facts. We accordingly find that he has been rightly convicted on the charges on which the learned Special Sessions Judge has convicted him.

7. Manmatha Nath Gupta.

This appellant is a Bengali youth who resided with his father at 62, Ganesh Mahal, Benares. He was studying in a private institution in Benares in 1924 and 1925. At the time of his arrest he was a little over eighteen years of age. The evidence which shows that he was a member of the conspiracy is the evidence of Banarsi Lal and Indu Bhushan Mittra. This evidence, if accepted, establishes absolutely that he was a member of the conspiracy. He was known under the name of "Nawab." His handwriting has been proved from Ex. P-156 and Ex. P-449. The corroboration of the accomplices' evidence against him is to be found in the evidence of Ram Charan, Gauri Shankar, Ram Lal and Jagdish Chandra. Ram Charan, Gauri Shankar and Ram Lal, who are all Shahjahanpur men, deposed that they had seen him in Shahjahanpur. Further it is established to our satisfaction that he wrote the post card Ex. P-171 which was found in possession of Parnawesh Kumar Chatterji. This corroboration would in itself be sufficient but apart from that there is against him some very important evidence, which not only corroborates the evidence of the accomplices, but which in itself would be sufficient for his conviction. As we have already stated, when he was arrested there were found in his possession Ex. P-153, a typed excerpt from the Revolutionary Rules, and Ex. P-154, a translation in Hindi, proved to be in his handwriting, of Ex. P-153. It is further proved that Ex. 153 had been typed on the Corona typewriter found in the possession of Parnawesh Kumar Chatterji. He is proved to have taken part in the Bichpuri dacoity. Banarsi Lal has given evidence to that effect and this evidence has been corroborated by the fact that Gokul and Lila identified him in Jail identification proceedings (though they were unable to repeat the identification in Court) as a man whom they had seen in the neighbourhood just before the commission of the dacoity. He has also been proved to have participated in the commission of the Train dacoity. Banarsi Lal has deposed that he was present at Shahjahanpur when the appellant with other persons had collected to commit that dacoity. Banwari Lal in his statement before the learned Special Sessions Judge said that Manmatha Nath Gupta had taken part in the Train dacoity but that he had at first refused to mention his name as he wished to shield him. There is independent evidence that he took part in that dacoity. Abdul Wadud picked him out in Jail identification proceedings as one of the men who had taken part in the Train dacoity and repeated the identification in Court. Radhe Lal, the manager of the Chhedi Lal Dharamshala, identified him in Jail identification proceedings as one of the men who had stayed at the Chhedi Lal Dharamshala on the 7th, 8th and 9th August, 1925. Kallu, Desi and Sitalwa identified him in Jail identification proceedings as one of the men they had seen at Amethia. Radhe Lal, Kallu, Desi and Sitalwa were unable to repeat their identifications in Court. The appellant's statement before the learned Special Sessions Judge consisted of an assertion that Ex. P-153 and Ex. P-154 had been planted upon him at the time of the search of his house. He called, however, no witnesses to support this assertion, and nothing was elicited in cross-examination to justify it. He denied participation in the conspiracy or in the dacoities. He was represented before us by Mr. N. C. Dutt. Mr. N. C. Dutt commented on the evidence of Ram Lal. Ram Lal had deposed that he saw Manmatha Nath Gupta at Ram Lal's house at Tikasar on the Parewa. The Bichpuri dacoity was committed on 9th March, 1925. Mr. Dutt's suggestion was that the Parewa was on the morning of the 10th March, 1925, and that in those circumstances it would have been impossible for Manmatha Nath Gupta to have been at Bichpuri on 9th March, 1925, and in Shahjahanpur on the morning of the 10th March, 1925. Mr. Dutt was, however, under a misapprehension. The Parewa as we have ascertained from the calendar was on the 11th March, 1925. So Ram Lal's statement is not affected. We find that it is clearly established that Exs. P-153 and P-154 were found in the possession of the appellant. They alone are sufficient to prove in absence of an explanation that he was a member of the conspiracy. No explanation was offered. Mr. Dutt did not press his defence in respect of the complicity in the conspiracy. We further find that Ex. P-171 was in the appellant's handwriting. We believe the evidence of Banarsi Lal, Indu Bhushan Mittra, Ram Charan, Gauri Shankar and Ram Lal against him. Upon this evidence he was clearly a member of the conspiracy. In respect of the Bichpuri dacoity we find that the evidence of Banarsi Lal, corroborated as it is by the evidence of Gokul and Lila, sufficiently establishes that he took part in that dacoity. In respect of the Train dacoity we find the evidence of Abdul Wadud alone sufficient to establish that this appellant took part in the commission of the Train dacoity. It does not, however, stand alone. We accept the evidence of Radhe Lal, Kallu, Desi and Sitalwa as correct and as corroborating it. Banarsi Lal's deposition against him is sufficiently corroborated and Banwari Lal's final implication of him in his confession is also sufficiently corroborated. We accordingly find that the appellant has been rightly convicted by the learned Special Sessions Judge on all charges.

8. Govind Charan Kar.

This man is a resident of Bengal. He was at the time of his arrest about thirty years of age. It is proved that he was living under the false name of "D. N. Chaudhuri" in the Rameshwar Hindu Hotel. The main witness against him is Jadunath Sen whose evidence if accepted would be sufficient to establish the appellant's participation in the conspiracy. As Jadunath Sen is an accomplice his evidence requires corroboration. It is corroborated by the evidence of Jagannath Prasad, Jagannath Sen's Head Master, Sita Ram and Mahesh Narain Sinha. There is further ample other corroboration. At the time of Govind Charan Kar's arrest a fountain pen belonging to Rajendra Nath Lahiri was found in his possession. This is the pen to which reference has been made in the intercepted letter Ex. P-145. The most important evidence against this appellant, which alone would be sufficient to convict him in absence of explanation is the discovery. at the time of his arrest in his room in the Remeshwar Hindu Hotel of a copy of the Revolutionary Rules which has been described as the "Yellow Leaflet." He has further been found guilty of complicity in the Train dacoity. He was picked out of a crowd in Jail identification proceedings by Desi as one of the men seen by him at Amithia. Desi was not certain as to the date. We are of opinion that he is testifying as to what happened on the 8th August. After the dacoity there was found in the brake-van a khaddar chaddar or sheet bearing a particular washerman's mark. Lalta dhobi who washed clothes for the Remeshwar Hindu Hotel has identified this washerman's mark as being the mark used by the appellant for whom he had washed. Banarsi Lal had stated that when he saw Ashfaqullah after the commission of the Train dacoity Ashfaqullah told him that an unfortunate oversight had happened, namely, that a khaddar chaddar had been left behind. Banwari Lal in his confession stated that he had met the appellant on 8th August, 1925, in the Aminabad Park, at Lucknow and that after the Train dacoity he took notes of about Rs. 880 from the appellant in Lucknow and handed them over to Rajendra Nath Lahiri at the Railway Station at Allahabad. Mahesh Narain Sinha has corroborated. He knew Banwari Lal. He knew the appellant under the name of D. N. Chaudhuri. He deposed to having met Banwari Lal in the appellant's room in the Rameshwar Hindu Hotel. Jadunath Sen deposed that on 9th August, 1925, the date of the dacoity, he saw the appellant leave his room in the Rameshwar Hotel at about 4 p. m. and lock the door, and that when he went to sleep at about 9 p. m. the appellant had not returned. He deposed that he did not see the appellant until the following afternoon at 4 p. m., and that that day he went into his room where he ate sweets with him and that at the time when he was eating sweets he noticed that as the appellant moved there was a tinkling sound from his pocket as though he had a good deal of money in it. He deposed that he asked the appellant (using a slang expression) what he had struck his hand to or what had he struck, suggesting that the appellant had made a haul. The appellant was annoyed with him for asking the question.

Mr. N. C. Dutt represented the appellant in this Court. Certain witnesses were called on behalf of the appellant the purport of whose evidence was intended to show that the boy Jadunath Sen was telling an untruth when he stated that he had occupied a room in the Rameshwar Hotel on the same floor as the room which was occupied, by the appellant. It is difficult to understand how Jadunath Sen's evidence would have been affected seriously whether he occupied, as he stated he occupied, a room on the same floor as the room in which the appellant resided, or a room on a different floor to the floor in which the appellant resided. But we need not follow this point as we believe Jadunath Sen and do not believe the defence witnesses on the point. The main defence taken however, was not in respect of the charge of complicity in the conspiracy but in respect of the charge of complicity in the Train dacoity. Mr. Dutt on behalf of the appellant laid great stress on the entry in the meals register of the hotel which went to show that on 9th August, 1925, the appellant had taken his second meal in the hotel. The learned Special Sessions Judge refused to accept the defence as true upon this point, and has given sufficient reasons for refusing to accept it as true in his judgment from O. P. 46 onwards. Although the appellant's case on this point was supported to some extent by two receipts which were found at the time of his arrest, we are satisfied that the entry in the meals register is most suspicious, that the receipts had been prepared in advance to assist the appellant in event of his apprehensions, and that the learned Special Sessions Judge took a correct view upon this point. The preparation of the receipts to assist his defence would not have been a difficult matter, as there is every reason to suppose that the manager of the Rameshwar Hotel, Sheo Shankar Sahai was an active partisan of the appellant. The defence, however, upon this point is of little or no avail. We have it on the evidence of Jadunath Sen that the appellant did not leave his room in Rameshwar Hotel till some time between 3 and 4 P. M. on 9th August 1925. He would have had ample opportunity to arrive on the scene of the dacoity before it was committed if he had left the hotel even as late as 5 P. M. on 9th August, 1925. The distance from the hotel to the scene of the dacoity is not as much as eight miles and there is a metalled road the whole way, along which vehicles ply for hire. Ram Karan, called as a defence witness, who is a cook at the Rameshwar Hotel, has given evidence which shows that the second meal is ready for the inmates at any time between 4 P. M. and 9 P. M. Thus it could well be served half an hour before 4 P. M. In these circumstances even if the appellant had taken his second meal at the hotel on 9th August 1925, he could have easily eaten it and left the hotel in time to reach the scene of the dacoity, before the dacoity was committed.

The evidence of the appellant's complicity in the conspiracy is very strong. We believe that Jadunath Sen has told the exact truth. We have already found that the fountain pen belonged to Rajendra Nath Lahiri. It was found in the possession of the appellant. We find that Ex. P-280, "The Yellow Leaflet," was also found in his possession. He has been unable to give any satisfactory explanation of the evidence connecting him with the conspiracy. In respect of the evidence connecting him with the Train dacoity we see no reason to distrust Desi's evidence. He is very uncertain as to the date but clearly saw the man whom he identified as the appellant the day before the dacoity. We find that the appellant had left the Rameshwar Hotel shortly after 4 P. M. on the date of the dacoity and that he had not returned until after 9 P. M. We believe the statement of Banwari Lal, corroborated as it is that he met the appellant in the company of Rajendra Nath Lahiri the day before the dacoity and that after the dacoity he received Rs. 880 in notes from the appellant which he handed over to Rajendra Nath Lahiri. We find that a khaddar chaddar belonging to the appellant was found in the brake-van after the dacoity had been committed. We find that after the dacoity was committed Jadunath Sen noticed that the appellant had a good deal of money, the possession of which he refused to explain. It is true that Banwari Lal does not mention having seen the appellant taking part in the dacoity but as the dacoits were separated into several groups, some being in the brake-van, some being on the near side of the train, some being on the off side of the train and some being behind the train, the fact that Banwari Lal does not say that he saw him there does not assist him. We find upon the evidence that he participated in the commission of the Train dacoity and that the learned Special Sessions Judge has rightly convicted him on the charges on which he has been convicted.

9. Makundi Lal.

As we have already stated this appellant is a man of over thirty years of age from the Etawah District. The main evidence against him is in connection with the Train dacoity. But if this evidence is believed it is clear that he was also a member of the revolutionary conspiracy and not a chance associate in the commission of the dacoity. Banarsi Lal has deposed that Makundi Lal was one of the men who came to Shahjahanpur before the Train dacoity. He picked him out of a crowd in Jail identification proceedings and identified him again in Court. The evidence of corroboration of Banarsi Lal on this point is contained partly in evidence as to the appellant having sent on 3rd August, 1925, a money order Ex. P-378 for Rs. 5 from Shahjahanpur to his wife in Benares City. Attached to this money order was the coupon Ex. P-445 on which is written "I am well. It will take one week more. Your well-wisher Makundi Lal. Do not be anxious at all." He was identified as having taken part in the Train dacoity by the Guard Jagannath. Jagannath picked him out of a crowd in Jail identification proceedings as one of the dacoits. He repeated this identification in Court. He was also picked out of a crowd in Jail identification proceedings by Sitalwa as one of the men who were assembled in Amithia close to the Kakori Station shortly before the commission of the dacoity. Sitalwa was unable to repeat this identification in Court. It is further proved, Ex. P-26, that on 10th August, 1925, the day after the dacoity he took a room in the Kashmiri Hotel, Aminabad, Lucknow, and registered his name as Banarsi Lal Agarwala of Shahjahanpur. He confined himself to a general denial and called no defence witnesses. He was represented in appeal by Mr. H. N. Misra who confined himself to general criticisms. Banwari Lal does not mention this appellant by name as one of the men who took part in the Train dacoity, but the omission does not help the appellant. The appellant admitted that the money order Ex. P-378 was in his handwriting and that he was in Shahjahanpur on 3rd August, 1925. We believe the evidence of Banarsi Lal against him. We believe the evidence of Jagannath and Sitalwa against him. We find that the entry Ex. P-26 was in his handwriting. He has been rightly convicted by the learned Special Sessions Judge on the charges on which he has been convicted.

10. Ram Kishan Khattri.

This appellant is a young man who was about twenty-two years old at the time of his arrest. He is a resident of Chanda in the Central Provinces. According to his own statement he has for some time embraced a life of religion. He has been convicted of complicity in the conspiracy, and of having participated in the commission of the Bichpuri dacoity. Banarsi Lal has deposed that he was one of the conspirators who was known by the name of "Ganga Ram" and who visited Shahjahanpur and associated with Ram Prasad and the others. Banarsi Lal's evidence to this effect has been corroborated by Ram Charan and Gauri Shankar of Shahjahanpur who deposed that they had seen the appellant in Shahjahanpur. Gauri Shankar had seen him in the house of Banarsi Lal. Exhibit P-147 is proved to have been in his handwriting. This is the letter which arrived to the address of Indu Bhushan Mittra after his arrest and had thus come into the possession of the Police. It shows that Ram Kishan Khattri who signed himself "Narendra" had returned to Chanda and requested that Rs. 10 more should be sent to him. The contents of two previous intercepted letters Ex. P-140 and Ex. P-142 are signed "Narendra". In Ex. P-147 occurs the phrase, "Don't be anxious for us." Exhibit P-142 contains the expression, "Don't be anxious for me so much." The evidence which shows that he participated in the commission of the Bichpuri dacoity is the evidence of Banarsi Lal which is corroborated by the evidence of Toti, Gokul and Balkua. Toti was the victim in the Bichpuri dacoity. He deposed that he saw the appellant take part in the dacoity. Gokul and Balkua deposed that they saw the appellant close to the scene of the dacoity shortly before it was committed. Banarsi Lal, Toti, Gokul and Balkua picked the appellant out of a crowd in Jail identification proceedings and also identified him in Court. Behari, Toti's brother, picked him out of a crowd in Jail identification proceedings as having taken part in the Bichpuri dacoity. He was unable to identify him in Court. The appellant in his statement before the learned Special Sessions Judge made serious allegations against Mr. Horton which he made no attempt to prove. He called defence witnesses to prove an alibi. He was represented before us by Mr. N. C. Dutt.

Mr. N. C. Dutt confined himself to criticising the evidence for the prosecution. He laid no stress on the evidence for the defence. We find that the evidence for the defence is unreliable. We are satisfied that Banarsi Lal's statement against the appellant has been sufficiently corroborated and that it is true. We find that the evidence to prove that he participated in the commission of the Bichpuri dacoity is absolutely reliable. We, therefore, find that he has been rightly convicted on the charges on which he has been convicted by the learned Special Sessions Judge.

11. Prem Kishan Khanna.

This appellant is a man who has been working for some years as a contractor in Shahjahanpur. He is the son of an engineer who holds the position of an Executive Engineer in the East Indian Railway Company. Banarsi Lal has deposed that Prem Kishan Khanna was a Shahjahanpur man but stated that he did not know that he was a member of the Revolutionary society. Indu Bishan Mittra has, however, deposed that he considered Prem Kishan Khanna a member of the Revolutionary society. He said that Ram Prasad had at first denied that Prem Kishan Khanna was a member, but that afterwards he suspected that Ram Prasad's denial was not true, that he had noticed three or four secret confabulations between Ram Prasad and Prem Kishan Khanna, that he had entered a room in Ram Prasad's house, when he found Ram Prasad and Prem Kishan Khanna talking behind closed doors, and that when he entered the room the conversation used to stop. Prem Kishan Khanna, as has already been stated, was the owner of a Mauser automatic pistol for which he had obtained a license. Indu Bhushan deposed that Ram Prasad used to talk frequently about this pistol and praise it very highly. Jagdish Chandra deposed that he frequently saw Prem Kishan Khanna going into the house of Ram Prasad and that after he had gone in, the doors used to be closed. The remaining evidence against Prem Kishan Khanna is the evidence that he lent his license to Ram Prasad, in order to enable Ram Prasad to purchase the fifty cartridges of German make which were purchased on the 7th August, 1924, from P. N. Biswas & Co. at Cawnpore. We have already noted how cartridge cases of this make were discovered on the scenes of the dacoities. There is further evidence that at the time of Prem Kishan Khanna's arrest, he was found to be in possession of a pocket book in which there was the following entry in Urdu.—

"Alamnagar 205 Kanhaiya Lal."

The case for the prosecution in respect of this entry is that it must have some reference to the Train dacoity inasmuch as the dacoity was committed just outside the two hundred and fifth mile from Mughalsarai. There is a post on the spot marked 205. The appellant was represented before us by Mr. J. M. Jackson, Senior Counsel of the Lucknow Bar. He has argued that the incident of the purchase of the cartridges is of no significance. His case is that Ram Prasad and the appellant were great friends and that in these circumstances there was nothing surprising in the appellant asking Ram Prasad to purchase cartridges for him to save him the trouble of going to the shop himself, that he would naturally lend him his license, in order to obtain the cartridges, and that his client was not in a position to know that Ram Prasad had signed his client's name on the register. He argued further that the discovery of the empty cases on the scenes of the dacoities in no way showed that his client had lent his Mauser automatic pistol to the dacoits and that the cartridges used in the dacoities were the cartridges purchased by Ram Prasad, as the cartridges were of a kind commonly procurable which might have been purchased anywhere.

The first point taken by the learned Counsel is that, inasmuch as Ram Prasad and his client were great friends, Ram Prasad might have been ready to oblige his client. But his client had denied that Ram Prasad and he were great friends. When asked by the Committing Magistrate what he had to say in respect of Ram Prasad he said, "I had no association with Ram Prasad" and when asked how he had no association with Ram Prasad when he was present at the time that Ram Prasad was arrested, he said "I took no interest in Ram Prasad. I had stopped at his house on my way to the silk factory of Pt. Iqbal Narain Bakhshi. I saw a crowd at the house of Ram Prasad and stopped there." When the Magistrate asked him for an explanation as to the purchase of the cartridges he refused to answer the question. The appellant when he was examined before the learned Special Sessions Judge did not suggest that he was a friend of Ram Prasad, but when he was asked the following question:—

"Do you now wish to say anything about the purchase of Mauser pistol cartridges from Messrs. Biswas shop on your license on 7th August, 1924?" he gave the following answer:—

"I went to Cawnpore on that date and stopped at my house. In the bazar I met Ram Prasad accused and as it was necessary for me then to meet Mr. Mahabir Prasad, P. W. D. and to go back to Shahjahanpur I asked Ram Prasad to buy the cartridges for me and bring to me at the station. I met him at the train by which I was to return and he gave them to me."

We do not consider that the learned Counsel has given a satisfactory explanation as to this incident. It would be unusual for a man in the appellant's position ordinarily to hand over a pistol license to anybody. These licenses are granted very sparingly. The appellant was in a position, however, to obtain the license, owing to the fact that his father held a superior position in the service of a Railway Company. A man like the appellant who had received such a license should have been very careful to whom he handed it over. He was a Shahjahanpur man and on his own showing he knew who Ram Prasad was, though he was not intimate with him. His case is that he happened to be in Cawnpore, that he wished to buy cartridges, that he was in a great hurry and that he could not wait. This sounds to us an unlikely story. It would not have taken him a long time to have gone to the shop of Biswas and Co. He could have left the license, ordered the cartridges, and called back for them. He could have obtained the cartridges by post. Under the rules, if he had written to Biswas and Co., enclosing his license the cartridges could have been sent to him by post. So the incident is difficult to understand in ordinary circumstances. But if Ram Prasad and he were members of the same revolutionary conspiracy the incident is not difficult to understand. He has given no satisfactory explanation for his conduct. Further we do not agree with the learned Counsel that the discovery of cartridge cases of this pattern on the scenes of the dacoities does not connect these particular cartridges with the Revolutionary conspiracy. The learned Counsel has argued that these cartridges are very easily procurable. The evidence on the subject, so far as it goes, shows that these cartridges are not easily procurable. On their face they are of a special marking manufactured only by one firm in Germany. Mr. Horton has deposed that he had the greatest difficulty in obtaining similar cartridges.

In respect of the entry in the pocket book the learned Counsel has argued that in the first place the reference to Alamnagar is meaningless in reference to the Train dacoity as the post No. 205 is some miles from Alamnagar Railway Station and a little over a mile from Kakori Railway Station and that the entry has been satisfactorily explained by the evidence called on behalf of the appellant which is to the effect that "205 Alamnagar Kanhaiya Lal" refers to the address of a relation Kanhaiya Lal who was at that time residing in a house in the Alamnagar Muhalla of Sitapur City which bore the census number 205. Inasmuch as the learned Special Sessions Judge has found the appellant not guilty of complicity in the Train dacoity (a decision in which the Crown has acquiesced as it has not appealed against it) the force of the argument for the prosecution which is based upon this entry is considerably weakened. The only construction that it would appear to us possible to place upon the entry that could tell in favour of the prosecution would be that the note was a memorandum made to remind the writer that a certain "Kanhaiya Lal" (the name could, of course, be a fictitious name) was to be near mile No. 205 in the neighbourhood of Alamnagar. The dacoity was committed in the neighbourhood of telegraph post No. 204/21—there are twenty-four such posts to the mile—but number 205 would be a sufficient indication. It is, however, very difficult to understand even if this view were to be accepted why such an entry should be made by a person other than one of the persons who participated in the dacoity. We agree with the learned Special Sessions Judge that the appellant has been unable to explain this entry away satisfactorily. But the fact remains that the entry upon the finding that he did not participate in the commission of the dacoity carries us nowhere, and we thus do not propose to consider this portion of the evidence against him. As he has been acquitted in the Train dacoity and as we are not holding this entry against him the evidence which he called which was in the main to explain away this entry and to prove an alibi becomes immaterial. The case against him, however, remains that the evidence of Indu Bhushan Mittra stands corroborated by the evidence of Jagdish Chandra and stands corroborated, in our opinion, very strongly by the facts that he lent his license to Ram Prasad, that Ram Prasad purchased on this license fifty cartridges of a make difficult to procure in India, and that empty cartridge cases of the same pattern were discovered on the scenes of the dacoities. We are satisfied upon this evidence that the appellant was a member of the Revolutionary conspiracy. We are not, however, satisfied upon this evidence that he was privy to the conspiracy to commit dacoities either with or without murder. The conspirators desired arms and ammunition for revolutionary purposes as well for the purpose of committing dacoities. There is nothing to show that the appellant was more than one of the less important members of the conspiracy. Therefore, while considering that he has been rightly convicted on the charge under s. 121-A we would accept his appeal and acquit him on the charge under s. 120-B, Indian Penal Code.

12. Raj Kumar Sinha.

Raj Kumar Sinha is a Bengali youth who was about twenty at the time of the trial. His father lives in Cawnpore. He was pursuing his studies in Benares. The main evidence against Raj Kumar Sinha is in respect of the discovery of property in a room which he had taken on rent at Benares. He took this room on rent and then left it having locked the door. Prahlad Das proves having let him the room. When this room was broken open, there were found in it a Sherwood rifle, a Remington rifle and an entrenching tool handle. Banarsi Lal in the presence of S. Ainuddin picked out the Sherwood and the Remington rifles from among other rifles as two of the rifles which had been used in the commission of the Bichpuri dacoity. The entrenching tool handle found in the room is proved to fit the entrenching head which was left on the scene of the Dwarkapur dacoity. In addition to this evidence against him is evidence that at the time of his arrest he wrote in Bengali certain letters of which the Police took possession. We have already referred to these letters in a previous portion of our judgment. This is the evidence against him as to participation in the Revolutionary conspiracy. He has further been found guilty of participation in the Train dacoity. Abdul Wadud picked him out of a crowd at Jail identification proceedings as one of the persons who had participated in the dacoity. He repeated this identification before the Court. Kalua one of the herdboys picked him out of a crowd at the Jail identification proceedings as one of the men he had seen in Amethia close to the Kakori Station just before the dacoity. He repeated this identification in Court. Badlu, another herdboy, picked him out of a crowd at the Jail identification proceedings as one of those men but was unable to repeat the identification in Court. The appellant was charged with participation in the Bichpuri dacoity but has been acquitted on that charge. He called one witness to prove an alibi in respect of the Bichpuri dacoity, but as he has been acquitted on this charge we need not discuss the evidence of that witness. He desired to call at the very end of the proceedings Bijai Kumar Sinha in his defence. The learned Special Sessions Judge rightly refused to permit this witness to be produced, as the appellant had already closed his defence and as all defences were closed at that period. He has been represented in this Court by Mr. H. N. Misra who has been unable to explain away the discovery of the rifles and the entrenching tool handle or the statements in the letters which he wrote at the time of his arrest. In respect of the Train dacoity he points out that Mr. Horton and Pandit Jagat Narain did not press this charge against the appellant in the trial Court. It is correct that they did not press this charge against him, but we consider that their refraining from pressing this charge against him was based on a misapprehension of the value of the evidence against him. As we have stated in an earlier part of this judgment the prosecution in this case has been unnecessarily scrupulous. We might almost call it chivalrous. There has been a tendency on the part of the prosecution to press points in favour of the accused persons. While we greatly appreciate the spirit which prompted the desire to be as fair as possible we consider that in this particular instance it was carried too far. The learned Counsel has suggested that as the prosecution was not pressing the charge of complicity in the Train dacoity against the appellant his client may have been lulled into a false sense of security and thus failed to call evidence to meet the charge. We cannot accept this plea as on the face of it the conduct of the appellant shows that he was not lulled into a false sense of security. As we have noted he was charged also with complicity in the Bichpuri dacoity. The prosecution did not also press the charge against him of complicity in the Bichpuri dacoity. Nevertheless he called a witness to prove his alibi in that case thus showing that he was under no false impression as to the gravity of the charges against him. Upon the evidence the appellant is clearly proved to have been a member of the Revolutionary party. He is further clearly proved upon the evidence to have participated in the commission of the Train dacoity and he has been rightly convicted by the learned Special Sessions Judge on the charges on which he has been convicted.

13. Ram Dulare Trivedi.

The appellant is a young man, a resident of Cawnpore, Banarsi Lal and Indu Bhushan Mittra have given evidence against him which if accepted proves absolutely that he was one of the conspirators. Gopi Mohan has also given evidence against him which if accepted proves clearly that he was one of the conspirators. Exhibit P-46, a letter written by the appellant to Indu Bhushan Mittra's brother and Ex. P-47, a post card written by the appellant to Indu Bhushan Mittra and his brother which were recovered from the house of Indu Bhushan Mittra at the time of his arrest corroborate Indu Bhushan Mittra's evidence sufficiently. The evidence both of Banarsi Lal and of Indu Bhushan Mittra as against Ram Dulare Trivedi is corroborated by the fact that they were able to identify him. Gopi Mohan's evidence against him is not corroborated to any great extent. The appellant is represented before us by Mr. H. N. Misra. He called one witness whose evidence is of no value. We consider that it is established sufficiently against him that he was a member of the conspiracy. He was not altogether a minor member and we consider that it is established that he was privy to the conspiracy to commit dacoities. We, therefore, find that he was rightly convicted on the charges on which the learned Special Sessions Judge convicted him.

14. Ram Nath Pande.

Ram Nath Pande is a youth who was in a school at Benares. He has been represented before us by Mr. H. N. Misra. It is proved very clearly that the incriminating document Ex. P-162 written in the handwriting of Rajendra Nath Lahiri was found in his possession. It is further proved that Indu Bhushan Mittra wrote to him Ex. P-43 giving information as to Ram Prasad's arrest. The evidence against this appellant establishes sufficiently that he was a member of the Revolutionary conspiracy. He was the "post office" of Rajendra Nath Lahiri. There is nothing to show that he was privy to the conspiracy for committing dacoities and while upholding his conviction on the charge under s. 121-A we allow his appeal in respect of his conviction on the charge under s. 120-B, Indian Penal Code.

15. Parnawesh Kumar Chatterji.

During the hearing of the appeals Parnawesh Kumar Chatterji submitted to this Court the following petition in his own handwriting from which it will be seen that he not only admits the correctness of his convictions but that he has admitted complicity in the commission of a dacoity which had never been mentioned in the proceedings. This dacoity is said to have been committed in the Allahabad District, but there is no allegation in these proceedings that such a dacoity was committed or that the Revolutionary party was connected with it. The petition is as follows:—

"In the year 1923 I was living in the boarding house of Kashi Vidya Pith Sagra, and was reading in ninth class. Manmatha Nath Gupta was also reading in tenth class. One day he asked me my address and my ins and outs and said I have come to know your feelings and ideas that is why I asked your ins and outs. However we will meet every evening in the Carmichael Library. I went to the Library as I was told. There I met him and was given a book, life of Mazzini and Garibaldi. After reading this book I was given many other books Banglaya Biplav, Kanhai Lal, Khudi Ram, Jotindra Nath, Bandi Dwara. When I finished these books he began discussions about them. After a few days he said to me that there is still such kind of party, do you want to enter. I said yes. Because from the very boyhood I used to hear stories about revolutionaries, of their wonders and risks, of bombs and revolvers. When I accepted all he said to me then he said from this day you are the member of this party the branch of Dacca Anushoolan Samiti. Then I said how shall I be able to know that I belong to the party? He said you will have to work in recruiting department as I recruited you. After few days Manmatha Nath asked me if I want any teacher he can give one. But he will take Rs. 10. I consented and asked my mother too, she also gave permission. One day in the Library I met Jogesh Chandra Chatterji and Manmatha Nath Gupta introduced him to me. Daily he used to come and teach me. After a month or two he vanished. I do not know where he went. Then after some days he himself came to my house and said I am going back to my home. I had been to Gaya. So I have come to inform you. Then I gave Rs. 10 to him and he went away.

"After passing a month or two Manmatha Nath introduced me with Rajendra Nath Lahiri. He asked me if I am asked to go anywhere shall I go without asking question. I said yes. Then we came back and after a fortnight both Gupta and Lahiri came to me in the evening, asked me to come soon with a towel and a dhoti. I did as they said, then I and Manmatha Nath, with a lad unknown to me, went to the Railway Station and had three tickets for Allahabad. We reached Allahabad, there I came to know that we were going for dacoity. I was not at all surprised because I knew that occasionally revolutionaries do commit dacoities. And I was very anxious to see and hold a revolver, pistol, bombs, etc. When we reached Allahabad we settled in a Dharamshala. In the noon time Jogesh Chatterji with a lad (named Banwari Lal) came and had a talk with Manmatha and went away again both of them. At 2 o'clock we again went to the Railway Station and I and Banwari started to unknown place changing many stations, at last in the evening we got down in some unknown station, where many people were getting down from the train. Banwari began to follow them so did I, covering their faces and mine, they took me to a far distance from the Railway Station and reached near a house and some of them jumped in from the roof and opened the door, then we all entered the house. I was not at all in a sense at that time. Anyhow we came safely to our home. In the year 1924 I with all my family members came to Jubbalpur. From there I had connection with Manmatha through letters. In the end of year 1925 I received a registered parcel containing revolutionary leaflets. I burned them off. When I was returning from Bengal in the way I took the rules and regulations of the H. R. A. from Manmatha Nath.

I have seen the error of my ways and I am extremely sorry for any part that I have taken in the Revolutionary Society and I would have made my confession long ago excepting that I was threatened with life by some of my colleagues.

(Sd.) Parnawesh Kumar Chatterji,
24th July, 1927."

We find apart from this petition that Parnawesh Kumar Chatterji has been rightly convicted on the charges on which the learned Special Sessions Judge has convicted him. The question of his sentence will be considered later.

Before we consider the question of sentences, we propose to state in detail the findings, at which we have arrived upon the evidence. We find, that in the year 1924, certain persons in Bengal, amongst whom were Sachindra Nath Sanyal and Jogesh Chandra Chatterji, entered into a conspiracy of a revolutionary nature. In furtherance of the aims of this conspiracy, Jogesh Chandra Chatterji came to the United Provinces to recruit and to organize the movement. One of the meetings at which the organization was discussed and developed was held at Shahjahanpur about July 1924. There may have been other meetings at other places in the United Provinces. This much is certain. After July 1924 the movement in the United Provinces took a concrete shape. The central organization remained in Bengal, whence the policy was directed and controlled. Considerable powers were delegated to a provincial organization, two important head quarters of which were in Shahjahanpur and Benares. A meeting of this provincial organization was held in some place in the United Provinces in October, 1924. Jogesh Chandra Chatterji was arrested in Calcutta, with the proceedings of this meeting in his possession,

There may have been several other meetings of the provincial organization. The only other meeting which is proved to have taken place is the meeting at the residential quarters of Vishnu Saran Dublis in the Vaishya Orphanage in Meerut on the 13th and 14th September, 1925. It is not proved that there were activities in the United Provinces after the arrests of the 26th September, 1925.

The aim and methods of the conspirators are disclosed in a guarded manner in the "Revolutionary", and are disclosed specifically in the Rules of the Hindustan Republican Association. There is other evidence as to what these aims and methods were.

The ultimate aim is stated in the Rules as follows :—

"The object of the Association shall be to establish a Federated Republic of the United States of India by an organized and armed revolution."

The methods proposed for the attainment of this object were :—

(1) The recruitment of active members. The methods here were to be by the use of personal influence ("private conversation") upon individuals, and upon the masses by publications in the press, which was to include subsidized weekly newspapers, and through a secret press, by speeches from public platforms, by recitation of religious poems, and by the show of magic lantern slides. Emissaries were to be sent to villages, to factories and to coal mines to enlist the sympathies of agriculturists and labourers on the side of the revolutionary movement and to form organizations amongst them. Members were to utilize and influence the Congress and other public bodies towards the advancement of their objects.

(2) In order to provide the movement with the necessary striking force, arms and ammunition were to be manufactured in India. Members were to be sent abroad to obtain training as soldiers or munition workers so as to be able to conduct military operations or direct ammunition factories at the time of open rebellion, other members were to enlist in His Majesty's Forces in India. Every effort was to be made to arm all members. Co-operation was to be sought towards these objects from Indian revolutionaries outside India.

(3) In order to obtain the necessary funds to carry out the programme the organizers were to make every effort to collect subscriptions from members and sympathisers. But funds were also to be collected "occasionally by contributions exacted by force."

(4) The Central Council was to have absolute powers, and its principal function was "to supervise, adjust and co-ordinate the activities in the different Provinces of which it shall have full knowledge." "It was also to be in direct charge of the work to be carried out in countries outside India."

The exact steps leading to the desired armed revolution are not revealed in these rules, but provision is made for one possible eventuality :—

"In extreme cases of repressions by agent or agents of a foreign Government it shall be the duty of the Association to retaliate in whatever form it shall consider suitable."

The objects of the movement according to Indu Bhushan Mittra were :—

"To overthrow the British Government by an armed revolution and to establish an independent Indian Government in its place. The means were a revolt. For this revolt men and arms and ammunition were required. Men were to be obtained from the youths of India by societies and clubs as Libraries, Sewa Samitis, Athletic Clubs, Boy Scout Associations. Money was to be obtained by subscriptions from members and by dacoities. With such money, libraries, etc. were to be formed, preaching was to be arranged and arms and ammunition were to be bought."

We have considered the question whether the object of the conspiracy was in itself so impracticable as to justify a conclusion that the aims of the conspirators can be taken to be little more than the comparatively harmless vapourings of misguided men, some of whom were mere youths, such vapourings being begotten of a mistaken but honest conviction that all was not well in India. But we are unable to regard the movement as thus innocuous. The fact that the activities of these conspirators were confined to a period between July, 1924, and September, 1925, was in itself sufficient to prevent the organization reaching an advanced stage of development but we find sufficient indication that substantial progress was made in the period. Arms and ammunition are proved to have been collected, bombs are proved to have been found in the process of manufacture, and four gang robberies were committed. In every one of these human life was taken wantonly. Had the movement been allowed to continue undetected for a longer period, the results might have been very serious. There are many stages short of an armed revolution which could have been reached by the conspirators, at each one of which the public safety could have been more acutely affected.

One of the bad features revealed by the evidence as to the methods of the conspirators is the manner of recruitment of youths and the conversion of the recruit into the recruiter. The following are illustrations:—

We have it proved that Ram Prasad approached Indu Bhushan Mittra according to the latter's own words in the following manner:—

"There is a playing field next to the Arya Samaj building of which I have spoken. I used to play hockey there. Ram Prasad was learning Bengali and he asked me the meaning of words. He was there at the Arya Samaj chabutra. Ram Prasad can speak and understand Bengali, but cannot write save a very little. First he used to give me detective novels to read in Bengali. Later he also gave me books to read. These other books he first gave to me of his own accord and then I asked for them. Such books were Kanhai Lal Bandjiwan (second volume), 'Bangla Biplobbad' (Revolution in Bengal) in Bengali. In Hindi Balshevik ki Kartut and Rus ki Dadi Katharin..... I can understand and speak Urdu and can write it a little. The effect caused by my reading those books was that the English were ruling India by force and by a revolt they should be driven out of India by force."

After that Indu Bhushan Mittra, who was then barely fourteen years of age, was able to progress further. He formed a plan of constituting a club of boys at which they should be taught manly exercises in order to make them more efficient revolutionaries. He began to take a keen interest in the movement and made himself useful by receiving letters for Ram Prasad; but as he was arrested before he was sixteen years of age, his activities came to an end.

Ram Prasad similarly approached the little boy Jagdish Chandra who was about thirteen. Jagdish Chandra says:—

"Since about two years ago I have been a friend of Ram Prasad. My visiting him began when I was in the ninth class. I was then in bad health and Ram Prasad said I should do physical exercise and I should go to him and he would teach me. I had not gone to his house before that and it was this which began my going there. I went to his house and he showed me Ram Murti drill and I thought it hard. Then he told me to do press ups and rising exercises. I then did them at my own house.

"On this question of physical exercise we got into the way of conversing. Ram Prasad asked me if I read books that were not text books and I said I often read books from the school library. He then told me he would give me a book which I should read. I took the book called Swadhinta ka Pujari. I read it and returned it. The title means the worshipper of freedom. When he gave me the book he had asked me to return it. When I returned it he asked me what I had read and what effect it had made on me. I told him that the impression I had received was that every man should serve his country. The book was about the lives of Gandhi, Tilak, Gokhale and others.

"Then Ram Prasad said I should open a club and get books and newspapers for it. He said such books should be got as incited one to serve one's country. He said he would give the books and Indu Bhushan Mittra was to start such a club and I should help him. I knew Indu as he was my class-fellow. He is the witness in this case.

* * * *

"In the vacation I was away from Shah-jahanpur in Moradabad, Bareilly, etc. I returned at the beginning of July 1925.

"I met Ram Prasad and he again told me my health was bad and I should do physical exercises. The same day he gave me a book 'The Little Grandmother of the Russian Revolution' in English. I read it and it took me one or two months to finish it."

"Catherine was a woman who preached in the village against the rule of the Tsar and wanted to start a Republican Government. She was sent to Jail. When I returned the book he said there was need in India too to have a revolution and put up a Republican Government I said that revolution in India was impossible as we had no arms nor army. He said that he and his society collected arms and all arrangements would be made. I asked how they got arms and he said they were getting them by forcible means, that is to say, by taking them by force from those that had them.

"I asked him about the society and he said he would not tell me as I was still a boy. He told me not to tell this to anyone otherwise it would not be good for me."

Ram Prasad was arrested before he succeeded in enlisting Jagdish Chandra.

Indu Bhushan Mittra approached Jagdish Chandra also. This is the manner in which Govind Charan Kar ("Chaudhuri") approached Jadu Nath Sen, another school boy. Jadu Nath Sen says: "On my arrival from the holidays the next day I began to salute Chaudhuri and after two or three days we talked.

"The talk started as he came into my room and asked me who I was and whence I came. I said I studied at the Church Mission School and I told him what my father was. I asked him what he did and he said he was an agent. He said he was an agent of razors, knives, and underwear from Delhi. This he said later. The first day he said only that he was an agent.

"He asked me if I read novels on the first day. I said I had no time for that. He told me I should find time and read. Then he also told me that I should learn to deliver lectures.

"I said there was no need for me to lecture as I was a student. He told me then that I should learn at once. He told me I should go to the Ganga Prasad Library to read papers and novels. I said I had not time and I would go when I had time. This was all the talk the first day.

"On the second or third day we talked again. This took place in my room. Then he began to lecture to me about our country. He told me how freedom was to be acquired. For several days he kept on lecturing me on this subject. During the time of these lectures he gave me a book called 'Desh Udhār' (Salvation of our Country) in Hindi with Sanskrit in it. Sewn on to this was another book 'Ghulami ka Nasha' (The Drunkenness of Slaves). Chaudhuri made me read two pages of 'Desh Udhār'. Then he told me to keep the book and read it and take help from him when necessary, that is, to question him about it. Then he also lectured me about Swadeshi and foreign clothes. He told me I should wear country clothes which were cheap and not foreign clothes which were expensive and I should support home manufactures. I said I would wear what my father gave me. He also added that such a lot of grain was exported and the Indians were dying of hunger."

We find Bhupendra Nath Sanyal (who has not appealed) at the age of about nineteen perverting his fellow students in Allahabad.

But every incident connected with this conspiracy pales into comparative insignificance in the light of the evidence as to the four gang robberies with murder. These crimes came under the heading of "Occasional contributions exacted by force."

At Bamrauli the victim was a Brahman whose only importance in the eyes of the conspirators consisted in his possession of money, which they desired. The robbers indulged in an orgy of gun fire. One man Mohan was killed. Seven were wounded. The circumstances of the death of Mohan were these:—

Baldeo Prasad deposes:—

"Mohan Lal died in my village. He was killed that night. He was a wrestler and cultivator. He was one of the villagers who came with me. Mohan Lal shouted to the dacoits that if they were brave they should fight with him with bare arms or else give him too a weapon to oppose them. The dacoits on the roof told him to stand up and then they turned on him something which looked like a candle and gave a great light and they shot him in the side. He fell on the spot."

In the Bichpuri dacoity the victims were selected as the result of a change of plan. The original intention was to rob a house in different village but the conspirators finding that that venture would be attended with some danger turned under the advice of local bad characters to the house of Toti and Bihari, who claimed their attention solely because they were said to have money and to be less protected. Here torture preceded murder. Toti says:—

"Then Bihari was seized by the dacoits and brought where I was. Then the dacoits made me stand up and took me into the room and asked me to show them where the money was. I said I had none. Then the dacoits began to beat me. They also put a knife on the throat of my boy and said 'Cut his throat'. They said that without it I would not disclose my money. They also pressed my neck and put a knife to my eyes and said they would gouge them out if I did not tell. They also lit a cloth with oil between my legs. I was then in the verandah of my room. When I put out my hand to ward off the knife from my eyes I got a slight cut near the eye. My child did not have his neck cut as it was forbidden by one of the dacoits on the roof of Sobhi. I cannot say which of the two men on the roof prevented it."

Two men were shot. One Sham Lal died. This was the manner of his death. Sobha says:—

"I saw Sham Lal come out of his house and he asked me why I was standing there. I said that they had guns and we would be killed. Sham Lal said that they were only fire-crackers, not guns. Sham Lal advanced and abused one man and said he had recognised him. The man said 'If you have recognised me, take this.' Sham Lal turned and then he got a bullet in the buttocks and fell where he was struck. In fear I ran to the fields."

Sheoratan Bania of Dwarkapur similarly owed the attack upon his house to the fact that he had money which his assailants wanted. He was bitten in the arm and struck three times with a hatchet. One Dwarkapur villager was killed. Four were wounded.

In the Train robbery the attackers maintained a fusillade of shots on each side of the train. The unfortunate Ahmad Ali met his death in the following manner. His friend Mirza Ahmad Shah says:—

"Ahmad Ali got down and said he would see after his wife who was sitting in a different compartment. I told him not to go but he said he would come back at once. Our compartment was three to five coaches from the engine. This compartment was in front of the first and second class one. Ahmad Ali did not come back into the compartment before the train started."

He was shot dead apparently as soon as he got out.

Thus in a little over a year some of the accomplices of this conspiracy were the deaths of four men killed by fire arms, the wounding of twelve others with fire-arms and torture of a brutal nature.

Some attempt has been made to extenuate these atrocities by urging that the intention of the conspirators was never to murder, and that their desire was only to keep outsiders from interfering with their removal of the property and to save themselves from detection. It was further urged, that their activities might have been worse, and we have been referred to statements in the evidence to show that in the Bichpuri dacoity the action of the dacoits has some trace of humanity. These are the statements: Toti has already stated that when one dacoit threatened to cut his child's throat another dacoit forbade him to do so. Banarsi Lal's deposition is as follows:—

"When I went in, I found a man and a woman on a cot in a thatch in the yard and I threatened him. He did not disclose anything and I went elsewhere. There I saw a bad character pulling a woman by the hair and 'Quicksilver' held a kukri against the throat of a child, and said to Ram Prasad that he might be allowed to cut the throat of the child else the woman would not speak. Ram Prasad was on the roof there. Ram Prasad told him not to do so as the woman would speak anyhow. Ganga Ram and Nawab were taking property from the rooms. These things struck me unfavourably and I went in another direction. There was a room with fodder inside and a woman was hiding in the fodder. She had a child in her lap and there was another bigger child there. A bad character was seizing the woman by the breasts. I told the bad character, being very angry, that I would tell the captain (that is, Ram Prasad) what he was doing and the bad character went into another room and I went outside. By outside, I mean, outside the house."

"When I again went into the house I saw some bad characters feasting on molasses. I showed all these rooms to the Deputy Magistrate. Villagers outside collected round the house and began shouting and the bad characters by the order of Ram Prasad fired and he and Ashfaqullah fired from the roof. Ram Prasad said 'Havaldar! Warn the people three times and if they do not obey shoot them down.'"

"Ram Prasad from the roof shouted that he who wanted to die should advance, otherwise he should go back. Shots were fired all this time from the roof and from below. No pistols or revolvers were fired."

as Ram Prasad had told those who had them not to use them unless personally attacked."

'Quicksilver' is said to be the nickname of a conspirator against whom a warrant has been issued but who has not been apprehended.

It was further urged that these robberies were committed not for the personal gain of the robbers, but solely in order to obtain funds for the furtherance of the cause which they had at heart. These arguments should not, in our opinion, affect the question of sentence. It appears to us that the distinction in gravity between the act of a man who shoots because he desires to kill another, and a man who shoots to kill, because he desires that another man should not interfere with his committing a robbery, is too fine to form the basis for a difference in sentence and we can find nothing to make the robbery of inoffensive people, such robbery being accompanied by murder, appreciably excused by the fact that the perpetrators desired funds for the purpose of conducting revolutionary propaganda. It is established clearly that at every dacoity perpetrators went armed with lethal weapons with the intention of using these weapons, if there was any interference with the taking of the property of others, that as soon as they apprehended such interference or became anxious as to the chance of detection, they used their weapons with callous deliberation and with complete indifference to the loss of life caused.

Our conclusion is that the conspiracy was of a very serious nature, having as two of its proved effects—the deterioration and ruin of young and impressionable boys, and the ill-treatment, robbery and murder of country men of the conspirators against whom individually the conspirators had no possible ill-feeling or grievance. The men who are proved to have been in the inner circle who originated and instigated the commission of robberies with murders should receive exemplary punishment. Such men when proved in addition to have taken part in the commission of offences attended with the loss of human life deserve more stringent treatment. Men who were not in the inner circle but nevertheless took a leading part in the taking of life, should receive as stringent treatment as any. Those who are proved to have taken a minor part in the movement may in some instances be made the objects of clemency.

We have been asked to consider the youth of the appellants. We shall take their youth into account in the instances of those who are youths. But it is to be noted that the worst offenders are full grown men. At the time of the commencement of the trial,

Ram Prasad	...	was 28 years of age.

We have been asked to consider the penitence of certain individual appellants. We shall when deciding on the sentences take into account the question of penitence, where we believe that the appellants really are penitent, but we consider that in almost all instances there is no penitence, and the allegation has been added formally to the arguments.

Finally, it has been urged before us that at the worst the appellants are misguided men of good material who have taken a wrong course under a mistaken conception of their duty, and who will prove themselves worthy recipients of a wise clemency by a steadfast intention to lead a new life. There is, however, a circumstance in the case itself, which shows that there is danger in accepting this view. We have referred already to Sachindra Nath Sanyal, one of the inner circle and main promoters of the conspiracy. He has been sentenced to transportation for life and has not appealed against his conviction and sentence. He cannot appeal now. In view of the fact that he has not appealed he is not prejudiced by our stating a fact which appears on the record of the case: In 1916, Sachindra Nath Sanyal was convicted by a Special Tribunal at Benares of complicity in a revolutionary conspiracy and sentenced to transportation for life. He subsequently received an unconditional pardon as a matter of clemency. After his release in 1920 he wrote on his own admission the book called "Bandijiwan" or "The Prisoner's Life" which is on the record. It is a eulogy of his previous activities containing a definite incitement to others to commit similar crimes. He subsequently entered into this conspiracy as one of the main promoters.

We now come to the question of sentences.

(1) Ram Prasad.

We find this man upon the evidence to have been one of the most dangerous conspirators. He was the head of the provincial organisation in the United Provinces. He and Rajendra Nath Lahiri, in our opinion, formed the innermost provincial circle of the conspiracy. It was he, we consider, who organised the dacoities and issued the directions as to when death was to be caused and when death was not to be caused. We agree with the learned Special Sessions Judge that in the Bichpuri dacoity he was the captain and ring leader, that he directed when the firing was to take place and that he himself was using fire arms. He was again one of the main directors and controllers in the Train dacoity. He is a full-grown man of mature age, complete understanding, and distinct mental ability. He has utilized a not indifferent intellect towards the worst purposes. Now when the proceedings have come to an end he has made an almost abject appeal for lenient treatment. He has pleaded that if given a remission of all sentences he will be a good, loyal and useful citizen. He has withdrawn all allegations against persons in authority, and has to a large extent thrown his defence to the winds, although he has been careful to note at the same time that he does not withdraw a word of it. We do not believe in his repentance or in his sincerity. We consider that he is a man who, if he were let loose, would commit exactly the same crimes on his release. He has made in the course of his arguments a strong appeal for lenient treatment on the ground that it is not established that a shot from his weapon killed any one, but we are not disposed to consider this fact as of any consequence. He fired himself, he controlled the fire of others. It can only be taken that when he fired he understood the consequences of his act and it can only be taken that when he fired he aimed. The accuracy of his aim is unimportant. The gravity of this man's offences does not consist so much in the fact that he was engaged in a conspiracy to subvert the British Government. That is bad enough, but that offence is of minor importance in comparison with the other offences that he is proved to have committed. He has shown himself to be a deliberate callous murderer. He was ready to murder harmless fellow citizens against whom he had no possible grudge for the sake of his own objects. The Special Sessions Judge has very rightly sentenced him to death. We have already upheld his conviction on all charges and we dismiss his appeal, confirm the sentence of death passed against him in respect of the dacoity with murder committed at Bichpuri, and the dacoity with murder committed on the train. The result is that he will be hanged by the neck till he is dead. His remaining sentences will not be carried out if the death sentence is carried into effect.

(2) Rajendra Nath Lahiri.

This man stands second in depravity to Ram Prasad in this case. He and Ram Prasad formed the inner circle of the conspiracy. He was responsible for the policy of dacoity and the policy of murder. He is not as old as Ram Prasad but he has arrived at full intellectual maturity being as he is a man now of some twenty-five years of age. He has shown the greatest activities in all the objects of the conspiracy. He took part himself in the Train dacoity where he used fire arms. In the Train dacoity he was one of the ring leaders. We do not know which shot it was that deprived Ahmad Ali of his life, but every man who fired a shot on that occasion is equally deserving of the death penalty. We consider that the Special Sessions Judge took a correct view in sentencing this man to death. We dismiss his appeal, confirm the death sentence passed against him and direct that he be hanged by the neck till he is dead. The remaining sentences will not be carried out if the death sentence is carried into effect.

(3) Raushan Singh.

This man was not one of the inner circle. He is over thirty-six years of age. He is a villager rather than an intellectual, but it is clear that in the Bamrauli dacoity he was one of the ring leaders and he was one of the men who took part in the continuous firing which resulted in the death of one man and the wounding of seven others. In our opinion it would not be undeserved if every man who took part in the Bamrauli dacoity in which there was a guilt of firing had received the death sentence. It has not, however, been inflicted in every instance. In this case Raushan Singh is the only man who has been convicted of complicity in the Bamrauli dacoity. He has been rightly sentenced to death. We dismiss his appeal, confirm the sentence of death against him and direct that he be hanged by the neck till he is dead. The other sentences passed against him will not be carried out if the death sentence is carried into effect.

(4) Jogesh Chandra Chatterji.

We are satisfied upon the evidence that Jogesh Chandra Chatterji was one of the persons who originally conceived the idea of the conspiracy and that he was a member of what the rules call "The Central Council" which operated in Bengal. In these circumstances he must be held responsible for all the very serious offences committed by the conspirators. We consider that the Special Sessions Judge has passed on him too lenient a sentence. We enhance the sentences passed upon him under each section to sentences of transportation for life. They will run concurrently. His appeal is dismissed.

(5) Suresh Chandra Bhattacharji.

This appellant is a full-grown man who had a responsible position upon an Indian newspaper. We are satisfied that he was one of the inner circle in the Province and in these circumstances we consider that the sentences passed upon him by the Special Sessions Judge are inadequate. We enhance the sentences passed upon him under each section to sentences of ten years' rigorous imprisonment. They will run concurrently. His appeal is dismissed.

(6) Vishnu Saran Dubli.

We are satisfied that this man also was one of the inner provincial circle and his case appears to us to stand on the same footing as that of Suresh Chandra Bhattacharji. We enhance his sentences similarly to sentences of ten years' rigorous imprisonment on each charge. These sentences will run concurrently. His appeal is dismissed.

(7) Manmatha Nath Gupta.

Manmatha Nath Gupta is a youth, but he is a youth of singular precocity in crime. Not only is it established that he was one of the party to whom important secretarial work was committed but he is proved to have taken part in no less than two dacoities. The Government has applied for the enhancement of his sentences. We consider that if he had been an older man he should have received very much heavier sentences but in view of the fact that he is only a youth we do not propose to enhance his sentences. We do not propose, however, to reduce them. His appeal stands dismissed.

(8) Govind Charan Kar.

We look upon this man as a particularly dangerous member of the conspiracy. He had come from Bengal to work the conspiracy up. Not only had he done so but he took part himself in the Train dacoity. He is a man of about thirty and we consider that the Special Sessions Judge has passed too lenient a sentence upon him. We enhance the sentences passed upon him to sentences of transportation for life under each charge. These sentences will run concurrently. His appeal is dismissed.

(9) Makundi Lal.

Makundi Lal is proved to be not an important conspirator but he is proved to have been a very dangerous dacoit. He took a prominent part in the commission of the Train dacoity. The Special Sessions Judge has remarked about him that he is now at least thirty five and so the chances are that he will not in future join in other dacoities, and that as regards conspiracy he does not think that he has brains to do much himself. We do not consider, however, that the fact that the man is thirty-five years of age is sufficient reason for passing a light sentence upon him when he is proved to have taken a prominent part in a serious dacoity accompanied with murder. We enhance the sentences passed upon him to sentences of transportation for life on each charge. These sentences will run concurrently. His appeal is dismissed.

(10) Ram Kishan Khattri.

He has been convicted of conspiracy and has also been convicted of participation in the Bichpuri dacoity. He appears to us a dangerous man. He is not very old but he is not very young. He was at the commencement of the trial twenty-two years of age. The Crown has not applied for enhancement of his sentences. In the circumstances we could not enhance his sentences but we see no reason to reduce them. His appeal is dismissed.

(11) Prem Kishan Khanna.

The appellant is a man who was twenty-six years of age at the commencement of the trial. He had been working for some years as contractor. He is a man of good family and of good position. There is nothing to extenuate his joining a conspiracy of this nature and we see no reason to reduce his sentence on the charge under s. 121-A. We have already accepted his appeal on the charge under s. 120-B. This disposes of his appeal.

(12) Raj Kumar Sinha.

His case is not as bad as the case of Manmatha Nath Gupta. He is some years older than Manmatha Nath Gupta, but was not as prominent a conspirator as Manmatha Nath Gupta, but he is proved to have taken part in the Train dacoity. The Special Sessions Judge has sentenced him to sentences lower than those passed upon Manmatha Nath Gupta. We consider the sentences passed upon him neither too high nor too low. We accordingly refuse to reduce these sentences and dismiss his appeal.

(13) Ram Dulare Trivedi.

Ram Dulare Trivedi was one of the original participants in the conspiracy but since then has taken a very minor part; but he was one of the original conspirators and we see no reason to reduce his sentences. His appeal is dismissed.

(14) Ram Nath Pande.

We have already allowed Ram Nath Pande's appeal in respect of his conviction under s. 120-B. In respect of his appeal on the conviction under s. 121-A, we find that he took a minor part in the conspiracy and we reduce his sentence from five years' rigorous imprisonment to three years' rigorous imprisonment. His appeal is otherwise dismissed.

(15) Parnawesh Kumar Chatterji.

As has already been stated this youth has withdrawn all his protestations of innocence and we have only to consider his appeal on the question of sentence. While we are inclined to believe that he is sorry for what he has done, we cannot lose sight of the fact that he had important duties in the conspiracy and was clearly one of the men entrusted with secretarial work. We feel, however, that we should do something for him and we reduce the sentences passed upon him under each section to sentences of four years' rigorous imprisonment which will run concurrently. His appeal is otherwise dismissed.

CRIMINAL REVISION PETITION No. 1160
OF 1927.

November 21, 1927.

Present:—Mr. Justice Harrison.

LAL BADSHAH—COMPLAINANT—
PETITIONER

AND ANOTHER—RESPONDENTS.

Forest Act (VII of 1878), ss. 2, 39, 41—"Timber" and "forest produce," meanings of.

The words "timber" and "forest produce" in s. 41 of the Forest Act are used in the widest sense as given in the definitions to be found in s. 2 of the Act and not in the narrow and restricted sense specially introduced to define and limit the powers described in Chap. VII of the Act. [p. 791, col. 2; p. 792, col. 1.]

Petition for revision of an order of the Sessions Judge, Rawalpindi, dated the 8th of November 1926, affirming that of the Magistrate, First Class, Rawalpindi, dated the 5th of August, 1926.

Mr. Prakash Chandar for Mr. B. A. Cooper, for the Petitioner.

Diwan Ram Lal, Assistant Legal Remembrancer for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—One Lal Badshah is the owner of a private forest and is in the habit of importing his wood into Rawalpindi City and has not provided himself with a pass of the nature contemplated in s. 41 (c) of the Indian Forest Act of 1878. (4) was convicted by a Magistrate and his conviction was upheld on appeal by the District

Judge of Rawalpindi. On an application for revision being presented I took the view that the words "timber" and "forest produce" should be read as meaning the same thing both in s. 41 and s. 39 and that the restrictive definition contained in s. 39 governed also s. 41. At the hearing of the application for revision the Crown was not presented as is too often the case where a point of any importance or difficulty is involved. After this decision Lal Badshah proceeded to import more timber into Rawalpindi City without a pass, and in order, I am informed, to obtain a ruling of a Division Bench he was again prosecuted and acquitted. Unfortunately the period of limitation for the presentation of an appeal was allowed to elapse and naturally enough Lal Badshah continued to behave as before. His timber was confiscated on a third occasion and he, therefore, lodged a complaint under s. 61 of the Indian Forest Act. This was dismissed under s. 203, Criminal Procedure Code, and his application for a further enquiry was dismissed by the Sessions Judge of Rawalpindi. He now applies for revision of that order.

Whatever view may be taken of the meaning of the words "timber" and "forest produce" in s. 41, the first point to be decided is whether there has been vexatious and unnecessary action on the part of the Forest Officer, who confiscated the wood. Mr. Ram Lal points out that in order to test the previous decision given by me ex parte it was considered advisable to get a further pronouncement and it was thought that this could only be done, short of actual legislation, by enquiring another test case and, if possible, an appeal from an acquittal. By an oversight the chance was lost, and it was, therefore, considered necessary to take further action. On the other side it was urged that whatever necessity there may have been for taking action the second time, when the man had been acquitted the second time and no appeal from the acquittal had been presented, he should not have been harassed yet again. In my opinion there is no force in the further contention put forward by Mr. Ram Lal that because the officer taking action was a subordinate and the action was decided upon by his superior officer, the head of this department, he is absolved from all liability. He is absolved from all moral blame of course, but the section still applies if he has acted vexatiously and unnecessarily. Vexatiously ly he has acted in accordance with the meaning given by Webster to the word. Necessity is rather more difficult to determine. The initial mistake having been made of not taking advantage of the acquittal, I do not think it is going too far to say that in the interests of all involved legislation would not be justified until there had been two decisions or a decision of a Divisional Bench or at least a decision after a full hearing. It appears to me, therefore, looking at it from this point of view, that the action was necessary. The wood which was confiscated, Mr. Ram Lal tells me, will be returned at once to Lal Badshah and, therefore, I do not think any further action should be taken in the matter of his complaint.

I now come, to the merits and on reconsidering the matter I think there can be no doubt that my previous decision was wrong. The view there taken was that the power of the Local Government to levy duty having been restricted in Chap. VII to duty on timber produced in British India in which they have rights, and all timber brought from any place beyond the Frontier the same restriction must be held to govern their powers to control transit. The further restriction, which is to be found in Chap. VII making the levy of duty subject to the control of the Governor-General in Council is not to be found in Chap. VIII. The reason is obvious, namely, that duty is levied both on home grown and foreign timber and the matter is not wholly provincial. Chapter VIII, on the other hand, gives powers to the Local Government, without any control whatever, to regulate transit, and if, the illustrations giving the matters, regarding which such rules can be made be read carefully and I think it is clear from the internal evidence of these explanations themselves that such control must apply to all forest produce whatever its source of origin and to whomsoever it may belong. It would obviously be futile to make rules applying to rivers or roads, which could be ignored by private individuals using such roads and rivers. After the words "forest produce" in Chap. VIII s. 41, there is a full stop and the illustrations and explanations then follow. In Chapter VII s. 39 after the words "forest produce" there is no full stop and the words are qualified by the subsequent sub clauses. This points clearly, in my opinion, to the conclusion that the words "timber" and "forest produce" in

s. 41 are used in the widest sense as given in the definition to be found in s. 2 and not in the narrow and restricted sense specially introduced to define and limit the powers described in Chap. VIII. It is not a question of the impossibility of working the rules on any other interpretation of the words "timber" and "forest produce" but rather of the meaning of the actual words used in the two sections when read together. Duty on the nature of things is only levied on a very limited section of the timber to be made regarding the control and transit of all timber whether privately and wheresoever it may have been grown.

I dismiss this petition.

LAHORE HIGH COURT.

CRIMINAL APPEAL No. 1020 OF 1927.

November 18, 1927.

Present :—Mr. Justice Jai Lal.

SIRAJ-UD-DIN—CONVICT—APPELLANT

versus

EMPEROR—RESPONDENT.

Criminal trial—Recording of prosecution evidence piecemeal, legality of.

"In a criminal trial prosecution evidence should not be recorded piecemeal inasmuch as such a procedure would give every opportunity for succeeding witnesses to know what the statements of the previous witnesses are and on what lines the cross-examination of the witnesses is being conducted. [p. 793; col. 1.]"

Criminal appeal from the order of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, exercising enhanced powers under s. 30, Criminal Procedure Code, District Hissar, dated the 31st August, 1927.

Mr. Abdul Aziz, for the Appellant.

Mr. Feroze Din, for the Government Advocate, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—Siraj-ud-Din, appellant, aged 18 years according to his own statement and 20 years according to the Magistrate has been convicted by a Magistrate, First Class, with enhanced powers under s. 30 of the Criminal Procedure Code, under s. 376 of the Indian Penal Code for having raped Musammāt Bakhtawar, the daughter of Nabi Bakhsh, aged 13 or 14 years, on the forenoon of the 13th of April, 1927, and has been sentenced to seven years' rigorous imprisonment. He has appealed to this Court and I have heard Mr. Abdul Aziz who represented him and also Mr. Feroze Din Counsel for the Crown.

The case for the prosecution as stated at the trial is that Musammāt Bakhtawar was taking some tobacco for her father, who was working in the fields outside the village and when passing in front of a kotha she was suddenly seized by the accused, taken inside the kotha, thrown on the ground and ravished. It is alleged that when she was seized on the road she cried aloud and this attracted the attention of her father, Nabi Bakhsh, who actually saw the accused drag his daughter inside. Nabi Bakhsh thereupon ran towards the kotha and in the way met Nizam and Imam Din and all the three went and found the accused raping the girl. It is alleged that the kotha had no door and was not consequently shut, that the girl was actually crying when these witnesses reached the scene of the crime and that the accused left her when they reached there. An attempt was made to secure the accused but he made good his escape after he had been slapped by the father twice, but he left a shoe and some clothes at the spot.

The statement of Musammāt Bakhtawar is that the accused had a discharge before her father and his companions came to the spot. According to her the father was working at a distance of 20 or 25 paces from the place where she was seized, according to the father the distance was about 150 paces, but it is common ground that the place was visible from where the father was. It may also be mentioned that the mother and the brother of Musammāt Bakhtawar were also working with her father. It is further alleged that the ghagri of Musammāt Bakhtawar got stained with blood, as the girl bled as the result of the rape. This ghagri was secured by the Investigation Police Officer and sent to the Chemical Examiner, but no blood or semen was found thereon.

The matter was reported at the Thana five kos from the village at 7 P. M. and Musammāt Bakhtawar stated in that report that she was forcibly taken inside the kotha by the accused and was thrown on the ground and that the accused wanted to rape her; but on hearing her noise her father, Nizam and Imam Din came and released her, and thereupon the accused ran away leaving his shoe and clothes on the spot. She added that "if her father had not arrived the accused would certainly have violated her". In her cross-examination she was confronted with this statement, but she denied that she had made it and asserted that her statement at that time was the same that she had made at the trial. The learned Magistrate has tried to explain away this serious discrepancy between the two statements by remarking that the Head-Constable who recorded the statement was inexperienced, but the learned Counsel for the Crown has not supported the Magistrate in this connection and has admitted that, as a matter of fact, the statement recorded in the First Information Report is exactly as it was made by Musammât Bakhtawar. The learned Counsel, however, opined that Musammât Bakhtawar was not willing to state that she had been disgraced and it was for this reason that she minimized the circumstances of the assault on her. I am of opinion that the statement made in the First Information Report represents what Musammât Bakhtawar stated to the Head-Constable and this view is supported by the manner in which the report is recorded.

The eye witnesses have supported the case for the prosecution as put forward at the trial. Their testimony is almost consistent and is not open to any serious criticism. But the learned Counsel for the appellant has invited my attention to the facts that the evidence for the prosecution was recorded by the learned Magistrate piecemeal, with the result that there was every opportunity for each succeeding witness to know what the statement of the previous witness was and also on what lines, the cross examination of the witness was being conducted on behalf of the accused. There is force in this contention and the record discloses a disregard of the instructions of this Court as to the manner in which the evidence has to be recorded. I consider that there is justification in the complaint of the Counsel for the accused that his client has been prejudiced by the manner in which the evidence was recorded in this case.

The Medical evidence, however, has an important bearing on the case. The Medical witness has stated that the hymen of the girl was ruptured but that this rupture was not a recent one. He is also of opinion that it was not the first time that the girl had been subjected to sexual intercourse. He noticed one slight injury on the person of the girl and was of opinion that was due to forcible intercourse. But in cross-examination he admitted that the injury might be due to intercourse with the consent of the girl. Under these circumstances, in my opinion, it is not possible to hold that the Medical evidence supports the case for the prosecution. On the other hand, it tends to support the contention of the Counsel for the appellant that if there was sexual intercourse with the girl by the accused on the particular day it was with her own consent and, that, therefore, it was not a case of rape. The contention receives further support from the fact that the parents and a brother of the girl were working in a field about 150 paces from the scene of the occurrence and the place where the girl was seized by the accused was visible from there. It is unlikely that the accused would have dared to forcibly seize the girl under the circumstances. Moreover, it is alleged that on hearing her cries her father immediately ran to the scene of the occurrence and before his arrival the accused had practically finished the intercourse. This story, in my opinion, is improbable and is inconsistent with the allegation that the girl was raped.

The investigation in this case was not started till the 24th April whereas the offence is alleged to have been committed on the 18th of April and the matter reported at the Police Station the same day. The girl was not examined by the Medical witness till the 26th April. The accused naturally asserts under the circumstances that the case regarding him has been fabricated.

Though I am not prepared to hold that the accused did not have intercourse with Musammât Bakhtawar on the day of occurrence I am not satisfied that such intercourse was forcible or without the consent of the girl. It is not improbable, as contended by the Counsel for the convict that the girl was a consenting party and that when the matter became public, first a report of an attempt to rape or an offence under s. 34 of the Indian Penal Code was made at the Thana, but subsequently the story was developed, as stated at the trial.

Having regard to all the circumstances, I am of opinion that the accused is entitled to the benefit of doubt and accepting his appeal I acquit him and order his release forthwith.

EMPEROR—RESPONDENT.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 503—Witness residing in Native State—Issue of commission to examine witness to officer representing British Indian Government—Duty of such officer—Refusal to execute commission, legality of—Court's discretion to examine witness by commission or summons.

Once a commission has been issued by a District Magistrate or other Court mentioned in s. 503, Criminal Procedure Code, to an officer representing the British Indian Government in a Native State it is the duty of the latter either to proceed where the witness is or to summon such witness before him and to take down his evidence or to delegate his functions under the commission to any officer subordinate to him and competent to execute the commission, and in that case such officer must proceed to the place where the witness is or summon the witness before him and take down his evidence. But neither the Criminal Procedure Code nor any other law leaves it to the option of such officer to decline to execute the commission on the ground of inconvenience or some other similar cause. The fact that the powers to execute the commission cannot be delegated to a Magistrate subordinate to a State does not absolve such officer from the duty of executing the commission or of procuring its execution in accordance with law. The provisions of sub-s. (3) of s. 503, Criminal Procedure Code, are mandatory in this respect. [p. 795, cols. 1 & 2.]

It is for the Magistrate to decide whether he would summon witnesses residing in a Native State in Court to record their statements or whether he would issue a commission and if the Magistrate has decided upon the latter course it is not within the discretion of the Agent to the Governor-General to whom the commission is issued to decline to execute the commission on the ground that there exist other possible means for examining the witnesses. [p. 795, col. 2.]

Criminal appeal from the order of the Magistrate, First Class, exercising enhanced powers under s. 30, Criminal Procedure

Code, Multan, dated the 31st January, 1927. Mr. Des Raj Sawhney, Public Prosecutor, for the Respondent.

ORDER.—Sikandar, appellant, having been convicted and sentenced to six years' rigorous imprisonment under s. 379/75 of the Indian Penal Code appealed to this Court through the Jail. His appeal was heard by Skemp, J., who by his order of the 20th May, 1927, remanded the case to the Magistrate directing him to record the statement of the witnesses named by the appellant. The Magistrate was directed "to send for the appellant and ask whether he wishes a commission to issue to the Political Agent or other officer at Bahawalpur to examine the appellants' witnesses or have them examined under sub-s (4) of s. 503 in Bahawalpur State".

It appears that originally the witnesses, who are residents of the Bahawalpur State, were summoned by the Magistrate, but in spite of the service of the summonses on them they did not appear and consequently the Magistrate proceeded to deliver judgment holding that he "could not coerce the witnesses to appear against their will and could not issue warrants against them in Bahawalpur State".

After the order of remand had been received by the Magistrate he ascertained the names and the addresses of the witnesses from the accused and issued a commission for their examination under s. 503 of the Criminal Procedure Code to the Agent to the Governor-General, Punjab States, who is the officer representing the British Indian Government in Bahawalpur State. The Agent to the Governor-General, however, has returned the commission unserved with an intimation conveyed to the District Magistrate of Multan in his letter No. 4 J 5616 dated the 18th of August, 1927, 5-9-22 regretting his inability to comply with the request with regard to the examination of the defence witnesses on the ground that there is no resident Political Officer in Bahawalpur State, who can execute the commission. In this letter reference is made to a previous letter of the 18th of September, 1922, to the District Magistrate of Multan in which, for the same reasons, a similar commission was returned unexecuted by the Agent to the Governor-General, Punjab States.

After a careful consideration of the grounds mentioned by the Agent to the Governor-General, Punjab States, for his inability to execute the commission, I have arrived at the conclusion that such grounds cannot be supported by any provision of law.

Section 503 (1) of the Criminal Procedure Code confers the power, inter alia, on a District Magistrate, on being satisfied that such a course is necessary for the ends of justice, to issue a commission to a District Magistrate or a Magistrate of the First Class within the local limits of whose jurisdiction the witness resides to take evidence of such witness.

Section 503 (2) authorises the issue of a commission to the officer representing the British Indian Government in the territories of any Prince or Chief in India when the witness resides in such territory.

Then s. 502 (3) provides that such officer shall proceed to the place where the witness is or shall summon the witness before him and shall take down his evidence in the same manner as in the trial of warrant cases under the Criminal Procedure Code.

Sub-s. (4) of the section further authorises the officer representing the British Indian Government to delegate his powers and duties under the commissions to any officer subordinate to him whose powers are no less than those of a Magistrate of the First Class in British India.

It will thus be observed that the Criminal Procedure Code nowhere speaks of a Resident Political Officer in the territories of any Prince or Chief in India but of Political Officer representing the British Indian Government in such territories irrespective of the actual place of residence of the officer concerned and also that once a commission has been issued by the District Magistrates or the other Courts mentioned in s. 503 to an officer representing the British Indian Government in such territory it is the duty of the latter either to proceed where the witness is or to summon such witness before him and to take down his evidence, or to delegate his functions under the commission to any officer subordinate to him and competent to execute the commission and in that case such officer must proceed to the place where the witness is or summon the witness before him and take down his evidence. But neither the Criminal Procedure Code nor any other law, that I am aware of, leaves it to the option of such officer to decline to execute the commission on the ground of inconvenience or some other similar reason. The provisions of sub-s. (3) of s. 503 of the Criminal Procedure Code are mandatory in this respect.

It is, no doubt, proved as remarked by the Secretary to the Agent to the Governor-General in his letter of the 18th of August, 1927, that the powers to execute the commission cannot be delegated to a Magistrate subordinate to a Darbar, but that does not absolve the Agent from the duty of executing the commission or of procuring its execution in accordance with law.

In the previous letter to which reference has already been made the attention of the District Magistrate was invited to certain rules of this Court under which a letter or a precept of the nature of a summons may be sent to witnesses residing in the territories of the Princes or Chiefs in India through the Officers representing the British Indian Government. Presumably it is on account of this last suggestion that attention was invited to this previous letter. But, in this case, as I have already stated above, the Magistrate did send summons to the witnesses, all of whom were served but did not appear and, therefore, the issue of a letter or a precept of the nature of a summons through the Agent to the Governor-General, Punjab States, would have been of no use. In any case it is for the Magistrate to decide whether he would summon the witnesses in his Court to record their statements or whether he would issue a commission and if the Magistrate has decided upon the latter course it is not within the discretion of the Agent to the Governor-General to decline to execute the commission on the ground that there exist other possible means for examining the witnesses. It is, of course, assumed that Magistrates do not and will not issue such commission unnecessarily. In the present case the Magistrate in pursuance of the order of this Court decided to issue a commission to the Agent to the Governor-General, Punjab States, and I hold that officer was not entitled to refuse to execute the commission on the grounds stated by him.

I am under these circumstances constrained to send the case back to the District Magistrate with direction to return the commission to the Agent to the Governor-General, Punjab States, inviting his attention to the law on the subject as explained in his order and requesting him to execute the commission. When the witnesses have been examined, the Magistrate will comply with the order of remand dated the 20th of May, 1927.

Case remanded.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), s. 84—Insanity—Burden of proof—Evidence of insanity—Motive, mere absence of, effect of—Benefit of doubt—Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 464, 465, 469—Defence of insanity—Magistrate, when bound to order medical enquiry.

Where an accused person relies upon s. 84 of the Penal Code to escape the legal consequences of his act, the onus is upon him to prove that he was at the time when the act was committed, by reason of unsoundness of mind, incapable of knowing its nature or that what he was doing was either wrong or contrary to law. That onus may be discharged by producing evidence as to the conduct of the accused shortly prior to the offence and his conduct at the time or immediately afterwards; also by evidence of his mental conditions, his family history and so forth. If contemporaneous acts of his are proved to have been of such a nature as to indicate that he was quite incapable of forming rational views, that would be a strong element to show that at the time of the crime in question he was not capable of knowing that it was a wrongful act. [p. 797, col. 1.]

Although the fact that a murder has been committed in a particularly brutal and purposeless way for no motive whatsoever, is a circumstance which may be taken into consideration together with other material to enable a Court to decide whether or not the crime in question was committed at a time when the accused person was in such a state of mind that he was incapable of knowing the nature of his act, yet in the absence of other evidence mere want of motive for the crime is not sufficient to base an inference of unsoundness of mind for the purposes of defence under s. 84, Penal Code. [p. 798, col. 2.]

To attract the application of s. 84, Penal Code, it is not enough to establish a doubt as to the soundness of the mind of the accused at the time of the commission of the crime. This is not a kind of doubt of which the accused may be given the benefit. To entitle the accused to the benefit of the section the accused must satisfy the Court that his condition of mind was such that he was incapable of knowing the nature of his act or that what he was doing was either wrong or contrary to law. [p. 799, cols. 1 & 2.]

There is no provision of law in India making it incumbent upon a Committing Magistrate to order a medical enquiry upon a defence of insanity. It is only in cases where the accused appears to be incapable by reason of mental infirmity of taking his trial that this issue of insanity must be tried before the trial for the offence is proceeded with. Where the Magistrate is of opinion that the accused is sane at the time he has no alternative but to proceed in accordance with the provisions of s. 469, Criminal Procedure Code. [p. 799, col. 1.]

Criminal appeal from an order of the Sessions Judge, Rawalpindi, dated the 23rd April, 1927.

Mr. Abdul Rashid, Assistant Legal Remembrancer, for the Appellant.

Mr. Nihal Singh, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

Fforde, J.—Bahadur has been tried by the learned Sessions Judge of Rawalpindi for the murder of Musammam Amrit Kaur and Teja Singh, two children aged seven and four years respectively. The defence was that at the time the murders were committed Bahadur was insane. The learned Sessions Judge has accepted this defence and acquitted the accused.

The Crown now appeals against this acquittal, contending that Bahadur should have been convicted of murder and sentenced to death. The sole question which arises for determination in this appeal is whether or not Bahadur at the time when he killed Musammam Amrit Kaur and Teja Singh knew that what he was doing was either wrong or contrary to law. The circumstances of the crime are not disputed and may be stated very shortly.

Musammam Maya Devi was living alone with her two children at Turkwal while her husband was carrying on a shop keeping business at Kohala. On the morning of the 6th of February, 1927, while Musammam Maya Devi was absent from the house to answer a call of nature, Bahadur entered the room where the two children were, armed with a heavy stick, closed the door by a chain, and then proceeded to batter the small boy to death. The crying of the children brought neighbours upon the scene. The daughter in the meantime had managed to unhitch the chain and was attempting to open the door when Bahadur struck her. A man called Shahana, who had come on the scene on hearing a clamour, finding that Bahadur was inside the room and was refusing to allow anyone to enter, procured a thorn bush, forced the door open, and with the thorn bush in front of him proceeded to drive the accused back. The accused in the meantime struck blows with his stick at the thorn bush and, while being forced gradually back, tripped over a charpoy and fell to the ground. Shahana then snatched the stick from his hand and grappled with him. Other persons came into the room and helped in securing the culprit. By this time the boy was dead, but the little girl was still alive and died shortly afterwards of her injuries. The facts, as I have briefly narrated them, are not disputed.

Counsel for the accused urges that the circumstances of the murder, the fact that no motive for the crime has been proved, and the evidence of two witnesses of certain eccentric conduct on the part of the accused some months prior to the crime, and the further fact that the accused had at one time, not very remote, received some injuries to his head, all go to prove that the accused at the time he committed the act in question was incapable of knowing that he was doing wrong. This is the view which the learned Sessions Judge has adopted, but in my judgment it is a view which cannot reasonably be held on the facts of this case.

Where an accused person relies upon s. 84 of the Indian Penal Code to escape the legal consequences of his act, the onus is upon him to prove that he was, at the time when the act was committed, by reason of unsoundness of mind, incapable of knowing its nature or that what he was doing was either wrong or contrary to law. That onus may be discharged by producing evidence as to the conduct of the accused shortly prior to the offence and his conduct at the time or immediately afterwards, also by evidence of his mental conditions, his family history, and so forth. If contemporaneous acts of his are proved to have been of such a nature as to indicate that he was quite incapable of forming rational views, that would be a strong element to show that at the time of the crime in question he was not capable of knowing that it was a wrongful act. In the present case, however, no evidence has been produced or any contemporaneous acts of the accused. Nothing has been told us of his behaviour during the days immediately preceding the crime, but some evidence has been produced by which it is sought to prove that he behaved with remarkable eccentricity some time prior to the event in question.

The two witnesses, who have been called to prove this matter, are Nazra and Jahana. Nazra states that the accused had received serious injuries in his head in a fight and had been laid up for several months as a result of these injuries, that, after he had risen from his sickness, he had a drum beaten in the courtyard of his house, a large number of people had collected and he went about carrying a tray with Rs. 100 in it stating that anyone who had beaten him could help himself to the money. According to this witness, he also got a mirasi to stand on the roof of his house, beat a drum and give a challenge to all people who owned bullocks to bring their animals and have a fight with his cattle. This witness says that nobody accepted this challenge, because everyone knew that the accused was insane. This witness also says that a day prior to the present crime the accused went into mosque wearing cattle bells round his neck and that people kept him under control as he was mad. This witness gives the date of the first two incidents as five or six days before the murder and he states that the fight resulting in the injuries to his head occurred a year ago.

The next witness, Jahana, says that the fight took place in April of last year, (i. e. 1926) that the accused was ill for some months as a result of the injuries to his head and did not return to his work when he recovered. He says that a few days before the crime two Maulvis had visited the village, which attracted a large crowd of people from the Jhelum, Rawalpindi and Attock Districts and that Bahadur went to the mosque wearing bullock-bells round his neck and created a disturbance. This witness also refers to the incident of the drum beating and the challenge to the owners of cattle, and says it took place five or six days before the murder.

In regard to this evidence I may say, first of all, that the first witness admits that he is a collateral of the accused and the second witness admits that the accused is his son-in-law. Although the circumstances, which these witnesses depose to as showing the insanity of the accused, are alleged to have been of widespread notoriety, not a single independent witness has been produced to corroborate these two persons in respect of the matters which they have alleged. It seems incredible that, if on the day prior to the crime, the accused had entered a public place of worship in a fantastic manner, as he is alleged to have done, causing a public disturbance not a single person should have been available to give evidence of this fact. According to Jahana also, the incident of the drum beating took place five or six days before the occurrence. In respect to this no person from the neighbourhood has been called to give evidence on this matter. In my judgment the evidence of these two witnesses is not worthy of any credit whatsoever, and I cannot help expressing some surprise that it should have been treated seriously by the learned Sessions Judge.

Another matter which the learned Sessions Judge has relied upon as evidence of insanity is that "the accused behaved like a mad man when he was caught in the house of his victims as he rained a shower of blows on the thorn bush with which he was being pushed back." It seems to me that the accused in striking at this thorn bush did what a normal person would do who was trying to resist capture and who was being assaulted in such a manner.

The learned Sessions Judge has also considered the evidence upon the head injuries to the accused. There is no doubt that there is a scar on the accused's head showing that some time back he had received a fracture of the skull. But, apart from the evidence of his two relatives, there is nothing to show that these injuries to the head had resulted in any untoward act on the part of the accused or had incapacitated him in any way whatsoever.

The fourth matter relied upon by the learned Sessions Judge as evidence of insanity is the absence of motive for this crime. I may say that the motive alleged by the prosecution, sought to be proved by the mother of the children and by one Gurdial Singh, is not very satisfactory, inasmuch as Gurdial Singh's account of a complaint made to him by Musammat Maya Devi does not tally with the story which she herself has given. It may be that the accused had been importuning Musammat Maya Devi to become his paramour, as she alleged, but I am not satisfied that she did complain of this matter to Gurdial Singh before the crime in question. It must be borne in mind that this kind of conduct towards a married woman, who was living apart from her husband, is not a circumstance which a woman is likely to talk about, and, although it is quite possible that she is speaking the truth that the accused did molest and importune her, I am not satisfied that she complained of these acts to Gurdial Singh. However, even accepting the learned Sessions Judge's view that no motive for the crime has been proved, that in itself—the mere absence of motive—is not a sufficient ground upon which mania may be inferred. There is no doubt that the fact that a murder has been committed in a particularly brutal and purposeless way for no motive whatsoever, is a circumstance which may be taken into consideration, together with other material, to enable a Court to decide whether or not the crime in question was committed at a time when the accused person was in such a state of mind that he was incapable of knowing the nature of his act. As I have said in the absence of other evidence mere want of motive for the crime is not sufficient to base an inference of unsoundness of mind for the purposes of a defence under s. 84, Indian Penal Code.

Mr. Nihal Singh has argued that the learned Committing Magistrate should have ordered an investigation into the state of the accused's mind as soon as the defence of insanity was raised. For this contention I can find no authority. Section 469 of the Criminal Procedure Code provides that when an accused person appears to be of unsound mind at the time of inquiry or trial, and the Magistrate is satisfied from the evidence given before him that there is reason to believe that he committed an act which, if he had been of sound mind, would have been an offence, and that at the time of the commission he was, by reason of unconsciousness of mind, incapable of knowing the nature of the act or that it was wrong or contrary to law, the Magistrate must proceed with the case and commit the accused for trial to the Court of Session or High Court, as the case may be. There is no provision of law in India making it incumbent upon a Committing Magistrate to order a Medical inquiry upon a defence of insanity. It is only in cases where the accused appears to be incapable by reason of mental infirmity, of taking his trial, that this issue of insanity must be tried before the trial for the offence is proceeded with. That is provided by ss. 414 and 465 of the Criminal Procedure Code. In the present case it was not suggested that the accused was insane either at the time he came before the Committing Magistrate, or before he took his trial before the Sessions Judge, or at any period in the interval. His whole case is that he was suffering from such a condition of mind at the time of the crime that he was not capable of knowing the nature of his act or that what he was doing was either wrong or contrary to law. The learned Committing Magistrate refused an application by Counsel for the defence to hold an inquiry as to the state of the mind of the accused person. The Committing Magistrate in rejecting this application expressed his view that the accused was sane at that time, and upon that view the Committing Magistrate had no alternative but to proceed in accordance with the provisions of s. 469 of the Criminal Procedure Code. The learned Sessions Judge seems to think that there has been some dereliction of duty on the part of the Committing Magistrate in not ordering a Medical inquiry. This view of the learned Sessions Judge is, in my opinion, entirely contrary to the statutory provisions. The learned Sessions Judge also seems to have been of opinion that it was for the Crown to establish the sanity of the accused; but he does not seem to have realised that the onus was upon the accused to prove that he was suffering from such disability as is indicated in s. 84 of the Indian Penal Code. The learned Sessions Judge says that it may be argued that the fact that he was insane when he committed the murders has not been proved conclusively but still there remains the doubt that he may have been mad at the time. This is not a kind of doubt of which the accused may be given the benefit. In order to come within the provisions of s. 84 of the Indian Penal Code the accused must not leave the condition of his mind at the time of the commission of the offence in doubt, but must satisfy the Court that it was such that he was incapable of knowing the nature of his act or that what he was doing was either wrong or contrary to law. This, in my judgment, he has wholly failed to establish.

I am satisfied from the admitted facts of this case from the fact that the accused selected a time when the mother was absent from the house to batter to death these two unfortunate children; the fact that before starting upon his crime he chained the door from inside to prevent anyone entering; the fact that he went to the scene having armed himself with a dang; and the fact that when he was interrupted in the course of its perpetration he resisted capture—that he knew perfectly well that he was doing a wrongful act. Under these circumstances I am satisfied that the decision of the learned Sessions Judge is clearly erroneous, and I would accordingly accept the appeal for the Crown, set aside the verdict of acquittal, convict the respondent under the provisions of s. 302 of the Indian Penal Code of the murders of Musammam Amrit Kaur and Teja Singh and sentence him to death.

If it may now be the case that before the sentence is executed it appears to the Jail Authorities that the accused is insane, I have no doubt that proper steps will be taken to inquire into his mental condition. This is a matter, however, for the Local Government and not for this Court.

In a case where the President of a Bench of Honorary Magistrates is in a minority as to conviction or acquittal, the judgment should be written by some member of the majority since, otherwise, there will be a conviction based on an acquitting judgment, without any reasons for conviction which, under the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code the Bench is bound to set out.

Criminal trial—Prosecution and defence evidence divergent—Benefit of doubt.

Where the prosecution and the defence witnesses between whom there is not much to choose make two divergent statements about one and the same incident, the matter becomes doubtful and the accused is entitled to the benefit of doubt.

Criminal appeal from the order of the Magistrate, First Class, exercising enhanced powers under s. 30, Criminal Procedure Code, Gujranwala, dated the 17th August, 1927.

Mr. Khurshid Zaman, for the Appellants.

Pandit Bishen Narain, for the Government Advocate, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The facts of the case are fully set out in the judgment of the learned Magistrate. So far as Kalu is concerned, Mr. Khurshid Zaman has accepted the finding of the learned Magistrate and has only asked me to consider the question of sentence. I do not think that this is a case in which I should like to interfere. A man has been killed and Kalu is clearly responsible for it. He has not been treated with any severity by the Magistrate and I do not think that a sentence of seven years' rigorous imprisonment in his case requires interference.

The case of Madu his brother presents some little difficulty. It is true that his name was mentioned in the First Information Report which was lodged with fair promptitude by Amir, the son of Shahu deceased. But the fact remains that there is an unfortunate tendency among people of the class to which both the accused and the complainant belong to throw their net too wide so as to implicate in an offence as many friends or relations of the really guilty person as possible. So the mere fact that the name of Madu is mentioned in the First Information Report is not very material. The names of the witnesses are also given in the First Information Report and they have given evidence in the present case but the difficulty is that four witnesses have come forward in support of the defence and they unanimously state that Madu was not there. So far as the reliability of the two sets of witnesses is concerned, it cannot be said that the witnesses for the prosecution are decidedly superior to those for the defence. It is true that the learned Magistrate had all these witnesses before him and was in a more advantageous position than a Court of Appeal can be, in forming his opinion as to the credibility of the witnesses adjudged from their demeanour but after all it is not always an infallible test. When two sets of witnesses between whom there is not much to choose make two divergent statements about one and the same incident, the matter becomes, to say the least of it, doubtful. This is the case here.

I, therefore, give the benefit of doubt to Madu. I allow his appeal, set aside his conviction and sentence and order that he may be released forthwith. So far as Kalu is concerned, the appeal, as already stated, stands dismissed.

Railways Act (IX of 1890), s. 75—Risk Note Form B—Interpretation of note—Onus of proving dealings with consignment—Evidence of Railway servants, value of—Duty of Railway Company.

Under the new Risk Note Form B it is always safe for the plaintiff to give due notice to the Railway to disclose and, if not satisfied with the disclosure, to call upon the Railway to give evidence making this a portion of his pleas. On the other hand, it is desirable for the Railway, whether called upon or not to take the precaution of disclosing the dealings in pleadings and to inquire from the Court whether it would require further evidence thereon other than pleadings quoted by such relevant copies of entries from books as the Railway might think fit to put in with its pleadings or at the time of production of documents. [p. 802, col. 2.]

A Court should not disbelieve a Railway servant merely on the ground that he is a Railway servant and that, therefore, he is bound to state that he had done his duty. At the same time where possible the Railway should support the oral evidence of its servants by books which should be proved to have been duly kept. But before the Court can disbelieve the Railway servants the plaintiff must cross-examine those servants or otherwise prove that relevant books could have been forthcoming and that there was no reason for their non-production. If this is done it is, of course, open to the Court to disbelieve the oral evidence on the ground that the corroborative evidence of the books had not been produced in the case. [p. 802, col. 1.]

Petition, under s. 25 of Act IX 1887, for revision of the decree of the Judge, Small Cause Court, Delhi, dated the 10th January, 1927.

Mr. Jai Gopal Sethi, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—In this case the plaintiff sued the Secretary of State for India on the ground that he had delivered certain bales to the defendant Railway and two of these bales had not been delivered by the Railway. Various pleas were taken but they were evidently based on an entire misconception of the facts of the new form of Risk Note 'B'. As the form is new I propose in this case to point out possible constructions of the meaning of the form in order that the public and the Railway may be warned what sort of evidence should be led or expected of them in future cases. The Court below held that the Railway Administration had failed to explain how the consignment was dealt with when it was in its possession or control and it, therefore, held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover Rs. 258 and decreed accordingly.

The relevant words in the new Risk Note are as follows:—

"The Railway Administration shall be bound to disclose to the consignor how the consignment was dealt with throughout the time it was in its possession or control and if necessary to give evidence thereof before the consignor is called upon to prove misconduct but if misconduct on the part of the Railway Administration or its servants cannot be fully inferred from such evidence the burden of proving such misconduct lies upon the consignor."

It has been contended by the learned Government Advocate in revision that these words mean that the plaintiff in every such case should call upon the Railway to make the necessary disclosure and thereupon the Railway shall be bound to make the said disclosure and that if the plaintiff is dissatisfied with the disclosure or does not accept the truth of the disclosure made he can call upon the Railway to give evidence of its dealing with the consignment. If this evidence itself is sufficient to lead an inference of misconduct then the case can be decided against the Railway. If it is not so sufficient then it is open to the plaintiff to give evidence tending to prove such misconduct but if the Railway has not been asked to make the disclosure it is not necessary for it to give any evidence, or if it is not called upon to give any evidence it is not necessary for it to give evidence, and, therefore, the Court below was wrong in decreeing the plaintiff's suit without any proof of misconduct on the part of the Railway Administration or its servants. It is clear to me from the pleas of the Railway that the parties seem to have been under the impression that the old Risk Note Form was still being used and, therefore, the position of neither side was clearly grasped in the trial in the Court below. Counsel for the respondent has contended that the fact that the Railway tendered such evidence purporting to show how it dealt with the consignment proved that the Railway did realize its position. This, however, is not necessarily so. The Railway did not give evidence disclosing their dealings throughout the time that the consignment was in their possession or control. It seems to me that they were endeavouring to prove that there had been a loss of the consignment. This conduct could be explained by reference to the conflict of rulings under the old Risk Note Form as to whether it was sufficient for the Railway merely to plead loss or whether the Railway had to go further and prove loss before they could claim exemption under Risk Note Form 'B'. I, therefore, think that the best course in the circumstances is to remand the case for re-trial to the Court below and give both parties a chance of producing that evidence they may wish to. The plaintiff will be presumed to have called upon the Railway to give evidence as to how they dealt with the consignment throughout the time it was in their possession or control, and the Railway shall give such evidence as they may consider fit as regards this. In this connection I will point out that the Court should not have disbelieved a Railway servant merely on the ground that he was a Railway servant and that, therefore, he was bound to state that he had done his duty. It is obvious that in the majority of cases the Railway can produce no other evidence of how it dealt with the goods except by producing those of its servants who had dealt with the goods and to disbelieve the evidence of these servants on the ground that they naturally would not admit any dereliction of duty would be to cast an impossible onus on the Railway Administration. At the same time I would point out that where possible the Railway should support the oral evidence of its servants by books which should be proved to have been duly kept in the course of business. But before the Court can disbelieve the Railway servants the plaintiff must cross-examine those servants or otherwise prove that relevant books should have been forthcoming and that there was no reason for their non-production. If this is done it is, of course, open to the Court to disbelieve the oral evidence on the ground that the corroborative evidence of the books had not been produced in the case.

I now proceed to point out the possible construction of the new form of Risk Note in order that the parties may be warned, as I have said before, as to what their respective rights and duties are. It is possible to hold that it is initially the plaintiff's duty to call upon the Railway Administration to disclose the dealings with the consignment. It is also possible to hold that what the Risk Note clearly means is that the Railway should in its pleadings disclose how the consignment was dealt with. As regards the construction of the words "if necessary" it may be that it means that the plaintiff may call upon the Railway to prove either in its pleadings or its previous disclosure or it may mean that on the pleadings and facts stated it is for the Court to decide if it is necessary for the Railway to give evidence. In the circumstances I would, therefore, if I were plaintiff, give due notice to Railway to disclose and if not satisfied with the disclosure I would call upon the Railway to give evidence making this a portion of my pleas. On the other hand, if I were the Railway, then, whether called upon or not by the plaintiff, I would take the precaution of disclosing the dealings in pleadings and would enquire from the Court whether it would require further evidence thereon other than pleadings quoted by such relevant copies of entries from books as the Railway might think fit to put in along with its pleadings or at the time of production of documents. Both parties will then be in a position, whatever interpretation was given by the Courts to this Risk Note, to avoid the expense of re-trial and appeals or revisions. In the present case I as stated above, hold that the plaintiff may be presumed to have called upon the Railway to give evidence of its dealings and the Railway shall give evidence of such dealings and produce such evidence, oral or documentary, as it may think fit and the plaintiff shall then be at liberty to give evidence tending to prove misconduct if so advised. In my opinion, as at present advised if the Court is not satisfied that the Railway has given good evidence to prove its dealings with the consignment it is open to the Court to decree the plaintiff's suit on the ground that the Railway has failed to discharge statutory obligation. It must not, however, be taken to decide this point finally and it is open to the Court to hold that even if the evidence given by the Railway is not satisfactory it is still for the plaintiff to prove misconduct before the Railway can be saddled with responsibility. No order as to costs in this revision.

A suit for refund of money advanced as consideration for a marriage, on breach of the contract of marriage is, in reality, a suit for damages in respect of the breach of contract of marriage falling within the scope of Art. 35 (g) of Sch. II of the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act and is not triable by a Small Cause Court. [p. 803, col. 2.]

Revision against the order of the Small Cause Court Judge, Ramtek, dated the 5th August, 1926, in Small Cause Suit No. 285 of 1926.

Mr. K. P. Vaidya, for the Applicant.

Mr. M. R. Indurkar, for the Non-Applicant.

ORDER.—The first point raised in this application is that the present suit was not triable by the Court of Small Causes having regard to Art. 35 (g) of the Small Cause Courts Act. In the plaint it was alleged that Rs. 100 was advanced, so to speak, as consideration for marriage contract, as well as Rs 15 for expenses and Re. 1 as a pledge. On behalf of the plaintiff it was further pleaded that the Rs. 100 were paid, as per custom, with the object of defraying generally the expenses of the pat marriage.

I have been referred by the Pleader for non-applicant to the decisions in Jagornath Dutt v. Radha Sunder Ghose (1) and Giris Chandra Mahender v. Purna Chandra Dutt (2) to support the position that a claim like the present one for money advanced in respect of a marriage contract is recoverable in the Small Cause Courts. The ratio decidendi of these decisions seems to me to be that the suit is, in essence, one for a mere refund of money advanced, and not for compensation, having reference to s. 73 of the Indian Contract Act. In Kali Sunker Dass v. Koylash Chunder Dass (3), Pigot and Gordon, JJ., held that a suit to recover money spent in feeding relatives, in paying carriage hire and musicians in connection with a marriage, which fell through, was not cognizable by a Small Cause Court. I concur in this opinion.

For my own part and with all deference to the Judges who decided the Calcutta High Court cases quoted above, I am of opinion that, in essence, the present suit is, in reality, one for damages in respect of the breach of contract of marriage. It would be a reasonable construction to put on the contract in question that Rs. 100 was paid thereunder and that this sum, in reality, represented the amount of compensation which could be claimed if there was a breach of the contract. I do not think that, in the circumstances, the suit can properly be regarded as one for the mere recovery of a loan or refund of money advanced. The payment was inextricably connected with the marriage contract and it seems to me to follow that the suit for its recovery comes within the letter and the spirit of Art. 35 (g) of the Small Cause Courts Act. I am of opinion, therefore, that the suit was not cognizable in the Court of Small Causes.

It has, however, been urged on the strength of the decisions in Dholidas Ishvar v. Fulchand Chhagan (4), Venkata Kristnaya v. Lakshmi Narayana (5) and Devarayan Chetty v. Muthyraman Chetty (6) that the suit did not lie as the payment was contrary to public policy and void under s. 23 of the Indian Contract Act. These decisions so far support the proposition that a contract by which their father or their guardian is paid money in consideration of his giving his son or daughter in marriage is against public policy and cannot be enforced in a Court of Law. It was, however, pleaded in the present case on behalf of the applicant that there was a caste custom to make such a payment as we are concerned with, the underlying idea being that the money so paid would be used in meeting the expenses of marriage. I am not, however, prepared to accept the contention offered on behalf of the defendant-applicant in this connection. It may be that the guardian or parent, to whom such a sum of money had been promised in consideration of his giving his son or daughter in marriage, might not be able to recover the sum so promised on the ground that the agreement is void as opposed to public policy. Here, the position is entirely different. The plaintiff accepted the money in advance, and a suit can, in my opinion, lie to recover that money, there having been a breach of the marriage contract: cf. Srinivasa Aiyar v. Sesha Iyer (7) and Gulabchand Parachand v. Fulbai Harichand (8). I am of opinion, therefore, that the suit in the present case was not barred on the ground just considered.

A further question would, in any event, have arisen as to whether or not there was a caste custom to make such a payment in advance and also as to whether such a payment was intended to be used in defraying the expenses of the marriage. The suit, however, not being, in my opinion, cognizable by the Small Cause Court must fail. The judgment and decree, revision of which is sought, are reversed and the plaintiff's suit is dismissed. The plaintiff-non-applicant must bear the defendant-applicant's costs in both Courts.

Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Art. 97—Vendor and purchaser—Sale by alienee from widow to third person with covenant for quiet enjoyment—Declaratory suit by reversioner—Subsequent dispossession by reversioner—Suit for damages for breach of covenant for quiet enjoyment—Cause of action, when arises on decision of reversioner's suit or actual dispossession—Silence after decree in reversioner's suit, whether amounts to acquiescence—Contract to indemnify, effect of.

Two widows sold certain property to S. Some of the reversioners instituted a suit for a declaration that the alienation was not binding upon them. In February, 1898, during the pendency of this suit, S sold the property to the plaintiffs. The sale-deed contained a stipulation that if any other claimant came forward or the property went out of the possession of the vendees, the vendor would be liable to refund the purchase-money with damages. On the same date a separate agreement was executed by S in favour of the vendees in which the suit by the reversioners was referred to and to safeguard the vendees against the consequences of the suit, certain other properties were hypothecated to them. The suit by the reversioners was decreed in their favour by the Privy Council on the 11th May, 1909. The last surviving widow died in January, 1919. In May, 1919, the reversioners sued the plaintiffs for possession and obtained delivery of possession on the 13th August, 1921. The plaintiffs instituted a suit for recovery of the purchase-money and damages against the representatives of S, on the 30th November, 1921:

Held, (1) that the indemnity bond only furnished an additional security to the vendees, but in no way abrogated or modified the terms of the sale-deed which were quite general and independent of the security bond; [p. 806, col. 1.]

(2) that the period of limitation for the suit did not commence to run notwithstanding the decision of the Privy Council in 1909, till the plaintiffs were actually dispossessed in the year 1921 and that the suit was not, consequently, barred by limitation; [p. 807, col. 2.]

First appeal against the decision of the Senior Sub-Judge, Delhi, dated the 19th March, 1923.

JUDGMENT.

Bhide, J.—The material facts of this case may be briefly stated as follows for the purposes of this appeal:—Musammat Sarsuti and Musammat Puran Devi, two widows, sold some property known as Katra Chohan in Delhi City to Shambhu Nath and two other persons on the 1st July, 1888. Shambhu Nath subsequently purchased the shares of the latter and became sole owner. On the 14th June, 1897, two reversioners, named Jai Narain and Rup Narain, instituted a suit for a declaration to the effect that the sale by the widows should not affect their reversionary rights. The case went up to the Privy Council and was eventually decreed on the 11th May, 1909*. During the pendency of the suit by Jai Narain and Rup Narain, Shambhu Nath sold a portion of the property to Dhanna Mal and Sanwal Das, the present plaintiffs, for Rs. 18,560 on the 14th February, 1898*. In the sale-deed it was stipulated that if any other claimant came forward or the property went out of possession of the vendees, the vendor would be liable to refund the purchase-money with damages. On the same date a separate agreement was executed by Shambhu Nath in favour of the vendees, in which the suit by Jai Narain and Rup Narain was specifically mentioned, and to safeguard the vendees against the consequences of that or any other suit certain other property was hypothecated. Musammât Sarsuti, the last surviving widow, died on the 9th January, 1919. On the 3rd May, 1919, Rup Narain instituted a suit for possession of the property sold by Shambhu Nath to the plaintiffs. On the 30th July, 1921, this suit was decreed on payment of Rs. 38,144 as compensation. Rup Narain deposited the amount and obtained possession of the property on the 13th August, 1921. The present suit was then instituted by the plaintiffs against Musammât Gopal Devi, widow of Shambhu Nath, on the 30th November, 1921, on the basis of the stipulation as regards quiet possession and enjoyment in the sale-deed and the agreement referred to above, for recovery of the purchase-money, arrears of rent and damages, amounting in all to Rs. 20,119-14-0. The defendant put forward various pleas including limitation and acquiescence. The learned Senior Subordinate Judge who tried the case held the suit to be within time and granted the plaintiffs a decree for Rs. 18,891. Further interest at 6 per cent. per annum from the date of suit till realization was also allowed on the purchase-money, i. e., Rs. 18,560. From this decision the defendant has appealed.

The main point argued in the case was that of limitation. It was urged for the appellant that the suit was governed by Art. 97, Sch. I, Indian Limitation Act, and that the starting point for limitation was the date of the Privy Council judgment of 1909 in the suit by the reversioners Jai Narain and Rup Narain, inasmuch as that judgment negatived the vendee's title and thus resulted in failure of consideration. It was further contended that, even if loss of possession furnished a fresh cause of action subsequently, the earlier cause of action must prevail, inasmuch as limitation, once it has begun to run, cannot be subsequently interrupted. Gaya Din v. Jhuma Lal (1) and Shib Dayal v. Meharban (2) were relied upon in support of the latter contention.

The present suit, as already stated, is based on the covenant as regards quiet possession and enjoyment embodied in the sale-deed and also on the terms of the agreement which was executed along with the sale-deed with special reference to the suit by Jai Narain and Rup Narain. This agreement was really in the nature of an indemnity bond and provided that if the whole or part of the property went out of the possession of the vendees on a suit being brought by anybody or if the vendees were impleaded in any suit as defendants and had to pay the value of the property, the vendor was to be liable to them for re-payment of the value of the property together with costs of the suit. There can be no doubt, that according to the terms of both the documents, the vendees were entitled to a refund of the purchase-money in the event of loss of possession. This fact was not disputed on behalf of the appellant, but it was contended as regards the indemnity bond that it was to enure only for a limited period, namely, up to the date of the decision of the Privy Council judgment of 1909, and that it was null and void after that date. This interpretation of the document, however, leads to an obviously absurd position. The material portion of the indemnity bond bearing on this point is as follows : aur ba'd faisla muqaddama mazkura balz badalat akhiri yih zamanat nama babut zar zamanat kaladam wabe asarsamjha jawega aur man muzhir wapas lunga (and after the decision of the above-mentioned suit by the final Court, this security bond with regard to the security money shall be considered null and void and ineffectual, and I will take it back). The words "above-mentioned suit" occurring in the above passage are ambiguous; for there are, at least, three different suits mentioned in the preceding portion of the document, namely, first, the suit of Jai Narain and Rup Narain which was pending; secondly, a suit resulting in dispossession of the vendees from the property; and thirdly, a suit requiring them to re-pay the purchase-money a second time to another person. The intention of the parties evidently was to safeguard the vendees against the consequence of an adverse decision in these suits. Whichever suit may be taken to be referred to by the words "above-mentioned suit," it seems obvious that the object of the indemnity bond would have been frustrated altogether if the bond ceased to be in force as soon as the suit was finally decided; for dispossession or double payment, for which the vendees were to be indemnified according to the terms of the bond, would in the ordinary course take place after and not before the final decision of the suit. It seems to me that the intention of the parties probably was that the indemnity bond should become null and void if the suits referred to above were finally decided in favour of the vendor, but the intention has not been properly expressed owing to bad drafting. The interpretation sought by the appellant to be placed upon the terms of the document would defeat its object altogether, and I think it must be rejected on that account.

However, even if the interpretation of the appellant is accepted for the sake of argument and it is held that the indemnity bond ceased to have any effect after the Privy Council decision of the year 1909, the plaintiffs can still fall back upon the covenant of quiet possession included in the sale-deed itself. The indemnity bond only furnished an additional security to the vendees, but in no way abrogated or modified the terms of the sale-deed which were quite general and independent of the security bond. According to the terms of the sale-deed, the vendor undertook to refund the purchase-money "if by chance anyone comes forward as a claimant or objector in respect of the property sold, or if the whole or a part thereof goes out of the possession of the vendees on action being brought by anybody."

Now, the first part is obviously inapplicable to the suit of the reversioners, Jai Narain and Rup Narain, which was actually pending at the time. The second part is, however, quite general and would apply to dispossession resulting from that suit or any other suit. The vendees were not dispossessed till 1921, and if limitation is reckoned from the date of dispossession, the suit would admittedly be within time.

It was, however contended on behalf of the appellant that the Privy Council judgment of 1909 in any case resulted in negation of the plaintiffs' title and, in consequence, failure of consideration, and that there arose thus a cause of action for which the limitation period is prescribed by Art. 97, Sch. I, Indian Limitation Act. The following rulings were cited in support of this contention: Bassu Kuar v. Dhum Singh (3), Amma Bibi v. Udit Narain Misra (4), Hukam Chand Boid v. Pirthichand Lal Chowdhury (5) and Tapasi Mal v. Jhandoo (6). Now, in the first place, it cannot be properly said that the vendees' title was negated or that the consideration failed entirely on the date of the Privy Council decision. The suit decided by the Privy Council was merely for a declaration. The alienation was declared to be voidable at the option of the reversioners on the death of the widows. The last surviving widow did not die till the year 1919 and the vendees were certainly entitled to retain possession of the property till then. The property had, moreover, been improved and the reversioners could not have recovered possession without paying heavy compensation. There was thus a possibility of the reversioners not being able to take advantage at all of the declaratory decree. It was also likely that the vendor who had guaranteed quiet possession and enjoyment to the vendees might have come to terms with the reversioners. It is thus clear that the chances of the vendees losing possession of the property were remote and uncertain when the declaratory suit was decided by the Privy Council in the year 1909. Possession was certainly an important element of the consideration for the sale and this portion of the consideration did not fail till the year 1921. The learned Counsel for the appellant has relied upon Bassu Kaur v. Dhum Singh (3) and Amma Bibi v. Udit Narain Misra (4), but the facts of these cases were quite different because no question of possession was involved therein. In both these cases there was only an agreement to sell, and when specific performance on the basis of the agreement was refused by Courts, failure of consideration was held to have taken place. In Hukum Chand Boid v. Pirthichand Lal Chowdhury (5), which has also been relied upon, the decision proceeded on the special facts of the case which were somewhat peculiar. The suit was one for recovery of purchase-money on the sale of a Patni Taluq being set aside under the Bengal Patni Taluq Regulation of 1819. Owing to the particular course which litigation had taken in that case, the applicability of Art. 97, Sch. I, Limitation Act, was assumed for the purposes of the appeal but without affirming its correctness. The argument that the starting point of limitation should be taken as loss of possession was advanced, but the plea was treated as belated. Their Lordships, however, distinctly recognized that "there may be circumstances in which a failure to get or retain possession may justly be regarded as the time from which the limitation period should run" (ibid. at page 679*). Their Lordships thus do not appear to have laid down any general rule governing cases of this description, and the ruling in Hukum Chand Boid v. Pirthichand Lal Chowdhury (5) has been distinguished on this ground by the Madras High Court and held to be inapplicable where a vendee has been put in physical possession and subsequently dispossessed: vide Hariharamangalath Kizhoor Variyath Sankara Variyar v. Thaiparambil Kalathil Ummar (1) and Vangali Venkatanna v. Polamansethi China Appalaswami (8).

Some stress has also been laid on Tapasi Mal v. Jhandoo (6), a Single Bench ruling of this Court, which prima facie seems to be in the appellants' favour. The facts are, however, to some extent distinguishable as the vendees themselves had in that case sued for a declaration that they were owners of certain land belonging to a minor which had been sold to them and the suit had been dismissed on the ground that the sale was void. In the present case the vendees were not even parties to the suit decided by the Privy Council and the sale was not void but only voidable at the option of the rever-sioners on the death of the two widows who had effected the sale. The Single Bench decision purports to follow Hukum Chand Boid v. Pirthichand Lal Chowdhury (5), but does not discuss it in detail, and the reservation that their Lordships make in respect of the circumstances in which limitation may run from loss of possession has not been noticed. The case, moreover, has not been published in any authorized report, and with all respect for the view of the learned Judge who decided the case, I do not think it can be accepted as an authority in the circumstances of the present case. I would accordingly hold that limitation did not commence to run till the vendees were actually dispossessed in the year 1921, and from the date of dispossession the suit is admittedly within time, as already noted.

The other grounds of appeal were not much pressed. It was urged that the plaintiffs had already realized large profits from the property during the period they have been in possession and that their silence after the Privy Council decision should be held to amount to acquiescence disentitling them to any relief. This contention has obviously no force. The vendees had paid a substantial sum for the property and were clearly entitled to its profits so long, at any rate, as they were entitled to retain possession. But for the suit of the reversioners they might have enjoyed the profits of the property in perpetuity. Their silence after the Privy Council decision also cannot be construed as tantamount to acquiescence. They were not only not bound to take any action immediately after that decision, but could not have, in fact, even sued for any relief until they were actually dispossessed.

Lastly, it was urged that the plaintiffs should not have been, at any rate, allowed any interest; but the lower Court has allowed interest at the moderate rate of 6 per cent. per annum on the purchase-money only from the date of the suit up to realization, and this seems reasonable enough in the circumstances. On the above findings I would reject the appeal with costs.

MISCELLANEOUS FIRST CIVIL APPEAL.

No. 1580 of 1927.

KANSHI RAM—DEFENDANT—APPELLANT
*versusHINDUSTAN NATIONAL BANK, LTD.,*THROUGH MADAN GOPAL, OFFICIAL*LIQUIDATOR—PLAINTIFF—RESPONDENT.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V. of 1908), s. 141, O. XXXVIII, rr. 5, 6—Winding up of Company—Attachment before judgment by Liquidation Court, validity of—Attachment before judgment of property in another District—Procedure for attachment before judgment—Defendant likely to dispose of property, whether ground for attachment—Companies Act (VII of 1913), s. 164—"Court", meaning of—District Judge's powers, extent of.

Proceedings under the Companies Act are proceedings in a Court of civil jurisdiction within the meaning of s. 141, Civil Procedure Code, and a Liquidation Court has, therefore, in a proper case power to make an order of attachment before judgment in accordance with the provisions of O. XXXVIII, r. 5, Civil Procedure Code. [p. 809, col. 1.]

Under the Civil Procedure Code as amended in 1908 the jurisdiction of Courts to act under O. XXXVIII, rr. 5 and 6 has been very much extended and a Court can now attach before judgment property situate beyond its local limits. [p. 809, col. 2.]

The jurisdiction of Courts in attaching property before judgment is of an extraordinary nature and must be very sparingly exercised. In such cases the Court proceeds to attach the property of the defendant before the respective rights of the parties are determined and it is absolutely necessary that in exercising these powers Courts should strictly adhere to the procedure laid down in the Code. Before an order of attachment of property before judgment is passed the Court should issue notice to the opposite party calling upon him to furnish security for satisfying any decree that may eventually be passed against him or to show cause why he should not furnish security and it is only when he has appeared and failed to furnish security or show cause, that the Court can pass an order under O. XXXVIII, r. 6 of the Code attaching his property. [p. 809, col. 2; p. 810, col. 1.]

The provisions of O. XXXVIII, r. 5 of the Code can only be invoked if the Court is satisfied that the respondent is about to dispose of the whole or any part of his property. A vague and an indefinite allegation that he is likely to dispose of his property is wholly insufficient to justify an order for attachment of property before judgment. [p. 810, col. 1.]

Under s. 164, Companies Act, the District Judge is for the purpose of winding up a Company deemed to be the "Court" within the meaning of the Act and has for the purposes of such winding up all the jurisdiction and powers of the High Court. [p. 809, col. 2.]

Miscellaneous first appeal from the order of the District Judge, in charge of liquidation work, at Lahore, dated the 12th March, 1927.

Lala Mool Chand, R. S., for the Appellant.

Mr. Madan Gopal, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—By an order of this Court the Hindustan National Bank, Ltd., was ordered to be wound up and Mr. Madan Gopal, Advocate, was appointed as the Official Liquidator. It was also directed that all subsequent proceedings in winding up be had in the Court of the District Judge, Lahore.

On the 6th January, 1927, the Official Liquidator presented to the District Judge an application under s. 235 of the Indian Companies Act praying that an enquiry be made into the conduct of 16 persons who were named in the petition and who were alleged to have committed acts of malfeasance and misfeasance with respect to the property of the Company and that all, or such, of these persons as may be found guilty of having committed such acts, may be directed to compensate the Company for the loss so caused. One of these 16 persons was Kanshi Ram, Assistant Engineer, Sukkur, (No. 8). In the application nothing was stated to indicate the position that he held in the Company, nor were any acts of misfeasance or malfeasance specified which he was supposed to have done. Mr. Madan Gopal points out that this was a mere slip of the pen and that really it was intended to proceed against him as one of the promoters of the Company, his son Kanwar Sain being the Managing Director of the Company. He also says that subsequently on the 21st of May, 1927, he applied for leave to amend the application to make this point clear and this amendment was allowed. It may, therefore, be assumed that the liquidator intended to proceed against Kanshi Ram as one of the promoters of the Company.

On the same day, i.e., the 6th of January, 1927, an application under O. XXXVIII, r. 5, Civil Procedure Code, was presented by the liquidator supported by an affidavit praying for the attachment before judgment of a garden situate at Kunjah, District Gujrat, it being alleged that the liquidator had been informed and verily believed it to be true, that the aforesaid Kanshi Ram "was likely to dispose of the property with a view to defraud his creditors". The learned District Judge without issuing any notice to Kanshi Ram or following the procedure prescribed in r. 5, directed that the "attachment order as prayed may issue". On the 11th February, 1927, Kanshi Ram appeared and raised various objections to the attachment of the garden. These objections were rejected by the District Judge on the 12th March, 1927. Against this order a miscellaneous appeal under O. XLIII, r. 1 (a), Civil Procedure Code, and s. 202 of the Indian Companies Act has been preferred to this Court by Kanshi Ram and I have heard Mr. Mool Chand on his behalf and Mr. Madan Gopal Liquidator who has appeared to support the order.

Mr. Mool Chand has argued that the order of the learned District Judge is wrong for the following reasons:

(1) That O. XXXVIII, r. 5, Civil Procedure Code, is inapplicable to proceedings under s. 235 of the Indian Companies Act.

(2) That the District Judge of Lahore had no jurisdiction to attach immoveable property situate in the Gujrat District.

(3) That the proper procedure as laid down in O. VIII, r. 5, Civil Procedure Code, was not followed by the District Judge, and

(4) That on the affidavit of the liquidator and other materials on the record no case had been made out for attaching the property before judgment.

In addition to this Mr. Mool Chand also urged that his client was not one of the officers or promoters of the Company and, therefore, no proceedings under s. 235 could be legally taken against him. As to this last point, however, no decision has yet been given by the lower Court and the matter is still under enquiry. I, therefore, did not allow Mr. Mool Chand to argue this point.

In my opinion there is no force in points Nos. 1 and 2 taken by Mr. Mool Chand under s. 141, Civil Procedure Code, the procedure provided in the Civil Procedure Code in regard to suits is to be followed, as far as it can be made applicable, to all proceedings in all Courts of civil jurisdiction. Now it cannot be denied that proceedings under the Indian Companies Act are proceedings in a Court of civil jurisdiction. A Liquidation Court has, therefore, in a proper case, power to make an order of attachment before judgment in accordance with the provisions of O. XXXVIII, r. 5, Civil Procedure Code.

Nor do I see any force in the second objection, viz., that the learned District Judge had no jurisdiction to attach immoveable property situate in the Gujrat District.

Apart from the fact that under the Code as amended in 1908 the jurisdiction of Courts to act under O. XXXVIII, rr. 5 and 6 has been very much extended and a Court can now attach before judgment property situate beyond its local limits, there is in the present case the further circumstances, that under s. 164 of the Indian Companies Act, the District Judge is for the purpose of winding up a Company deemed to be the "Court" within the meaning of Act and had for purposes of such winding up all the jurisdiction and powers of the High Court. It cannot be denied that the High Court would have the power to attach immoveable property in Gujrat. Therefore, the order of the District Judge in attaching the property at Gujrat is not without jurisdiction. Accordingly I overrule this objection also.

I am, however, of opinion, that the appeal must succeed on objection Nos. 3 and 4. The jurisdiction of Courts in attaching property before judgment is of an extraordinary nature and must be very sparingly exercised. In such cases the Court proceeds to attach the property of the defendant before the respective rights of the parties are determined and it is absolutely necessary, that in exercising these powers, Courts should strictly adhere to the procedure prescribed by the Code. Rule 5, of O. XXXVIII, Civil Procedure Code, lays down that if the "Court is satisfied by affidavit or otherwise, that the defendant with intent to obstruct or delay the execution of any decree, that may be passed against him, is about to dispose of the whole or any part of his property the Court may direct the defendant, within a time to be fixed by it, either to furnish security in such sum as may be specified in the order and to produce and place at the disposal of the Court when required, the said property or the value of the same or such portion thereof as may be sufficient to satisfy the decree or to appear to show cause why he should not furnish security".

It is clear that before an order of attachment of property before judgment is passed, the Court should issue notice to the opposite party calling upon him to furnish security for satisfying any decree that may eventually be passed against him or to show cause why he should not furnish security and it is only when he had appeared and failed to furnish the security or, show cause that the Court can under r. 6 pass an order attaching his property. It is conceded that in this case this procedure was not followed. No doubt, in cases of emergency, the Code empowers the Court under cl. 3 of r. 5 to pass an interim order directing the conditional attachment of the property, but in this case the Court did not act under that section, nor did it subsequently say in its order of the 12th of March that it intended to act under that clause. Further the provisions of r. 5 can only be invoked if the Court is satisfied that the respondent is about to dispose of the whole or any part of the property. The affidavit filed by the liquidation on which the Court acted in this case did not make any such allegation. All that was stated was that the appellant was likely to dispose of the garden. Now it is quite clear that a vague and indefinite allegation of this kind is wholly insufficient to justify proceedings being taken under rr. 5 and 6. It is conceded that beyond this allegation in the affidavit there were no materials before the Court either on the 6th of January, 1927, when the attachment order was issued, or on the 12th of March, 1927, when the Court overruled the appellant's objections against this attachment, to justify a reasonable apprehension that the appellant was about to dispose of the whole or any part of his property with intent to obstruct or delay the execution of an order or decree that might be passed against him. I, therefore, hold that the learned Judge acted illegally in passing the order for attachment before judgment of the garden in question.

Accordingly I accept the appeal and set aside the orders of the lower Court dated the 6th of January and 12th of March, 1927, and direct that the property be released from attachment. I direct that the costs of the appeal be borne by the parties.

Mr. E. Vinayaka Rao, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—These miscellaneous appeals arise out of a preliminary judgment and decree passed by the Subordinate Judge of Sivaganga in O. S. No. 19 of 1917. That suit was for dissolution of a partnership, for taking accounts and for the appointment of a Receiver. The suit was originally disposed of by the Subordinate Judge on the 31st March, 1919, on the ground that it was barred by limitation. The plaintiff appealed to the High Court and the High Court reversing the judgment of the Subordinate Judge held that the suit was not barred by limitation and remanded the suit for the passing of a proper preliminary decree. This was on the 7th of October, 1921. Leave was granted to the defendants to appeal to His Majesty in Council and that appeal terminated only very recently on the 14th February, 1927, in which the judgment of the High Court was confirmed. But long before the decision by the Privy Council the Subordinate Judge passed a preliminary judgment and a preliminary decree on the 13th December, 1921. On that occasion, only the plaintiff's Vakil was present. Neither the defendants nor their Vakil was present in Court. The defendants then presented an application on the 21st June, 1925, for setting aside the ex parte preliminary judgment and decree on the ground that they were not aware of the decree and that they thought that as the subject matter was under appeal to His Majesty in Council the Subordinate Judge would not deal with it. The Subordinate Judge now finds that it is true they were not aware of the preliminary decree passed on the 13th December, 1921. He further finds that there is no excuse for the defendants' non-appearance on that day and refused to set aside the ex parte order and dismissed the petition. C. M. A. No. 49 of 1926 was filed by the 1st defendant and C. M. A. No. 50 of 1926 by the 3rd and 6th defendants the points arising in both being the same.

The only object in filing these appeals seems to be that the defendants have an apprehension that on account of the form of the preliminary decree certain points originally arising in the case and which were the subject-matter of issues Nos. 13-16 would be excluded from future consideration. These issues raise the question on plaintiff's liability in respect of some matters connected with the partnership and they were not considered by the original Subordinate Judge who disposed of the case as being barred by limitation. For a proper disposal of the case they have to be considered. In the revised preliminary judgment the Subordinate Judge says:—"following the direction of the High Court I pass a preliminary decree to the following effect." He declares that a partnership existed, that accounts were regularly kept and that the plaintiffs were entitled to have the said partnership dissolved and that the partnership do stand dissolved as from the said date 20th December, 1926. Then comes the decretal portion consisting of six clauses, to the effect that the partnership should stand dissolved from the 20th December, 1926, that accounts should be taken of the amount due to the suit partnership from defendants Nos. 3 and 4 by reason of mistakes, etc., alleged to have been committed by 3rd defendant during his agency in the same partnership firm, and the amount due to the plaintiff's firm. Paragraph 3 directs the plaintiff to file a statement of charges against the 3rd defendant. Paragraph 4 states that defendants Nos. 3 and 4 do within one month from the date on which the plaintiff files into Court his statement of charges, file their answer and explanations thereto. Paragraph 5 refers to the appointment of a Commissioner for the above purpose with power to record evidence and do all lawful acts in the matter and para. 6 refers to his remuneration. Then "we have got this sentence, "the further consideration of the suit be adjourned to 20th January, 1922." It is apprehended that his decree may be construed as dealing with all the matters which form the subject-matter of the suit and that they will be precluded from raising the subject-matter of issues Nos. 13-16 hereafter. The last sentence of the decree, that the suit is adjourned to the 20th January, 1922, shows that the Subordinate Judge himself considered the suit as having been partially disposed of and that something more remained to be considered.

There is no express statement in the preliminary judgment or decree that no other matter remains to be considered. The direction was that the plaintiff should file his statement of charges within one month from the date of the order and from that date the defendant is given another month to file his answers. Thus these two matters take up nearly two months (i. e.), upto February, and the fixing of the 20th January, 1922 would not have been for the purpose of considering these charges and answers. Obviously it could not have been for a consideration of the Commissioner's accounts. The only possible inference that can be drawn from the Subordinate Judge's order is that he adjourned the case to the 20th January, 1922, for a consideration of other matters, arising in the suit not covered by the direction in cl. 2 about accounts being taken of two items. These and other matters apparently require evidence. He took this course probably because he thought that the defendants were misled by the fact that the proceedings were still pending in the Privy Council and if their Vakil was present the matter could surely be fully dealt with. It is admitted by both the parties that after this preliminary decree of the 13th December, 1921, nothing further has happened. No fee was paid into Court by the plaintiff for the purpose of paying the Commissioner and no Commissioner took the accounts, and on or within the 31st January, 1922, no statement was filed. Apparently the parties thought that they should await the Privy Council decision for further attention to be paid to the case.

This seems to be the proper interpretation of the order of the Subordinate Judge. In these circumstances it is unnecessary for us to interfere with the order of the lower Court or to consider the further question whether any excuse was made out for the non-appearance of the defendants on the 13th December.

In these circumstances we make no order as to costs.

Limitation Act (IX of 1908), s. 14—Bona fide mistake as to nature of suit—Appeal filed in wrong Court—Exclusion of time spent in wrong Court—Land, change in character—Unclassed suit.

Where a party under a bona fide, though mistaken, belief as to the nature of the suit files an appeal in a wrong Court, but on its being returned for presentation to the proper Court, presents it in the proper Court without any delay he is entitled to the benefit of s. 14, Limitation Act. [p. 813, col. 1.]

The plaintiff brought a suit for redemption of an area of 2 kanals 14 marlas of agricultural land. In 1924 the defendants had built a kotha on 2 marlas of the land and in kharif 1924 the land was not cultivated and the suit was instituted on 1st July, 1924:

Held, that the character of the land had not been so changed as to make a suit relating thereto an unclassified suit. [p. 812, col. 2.]

Second appeal from the decree of the District Judge, Rawalpindi, dated the 10th March, 1927, affirming that of the Additional Subordinate Judge, Fourth Class, Gujar Khan, District, Rawalpindi, dated the 25th May, 1926.

Mr. Hargopal, for the Appellant.

Mr. Ghulam Rasul Khan for Mr. Aziz Ahmed, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This judgment will dispose of Appeal No. 1451 of 1927 and Civil Revision No. 252 of 1927. They both arise out of the same case.

A suit for redemption was filed by the contesting respondents against Maula Bakhsh appellant in one case and the petitioner in the other and was decreed. The value for the purposes of jurisdiction was Rs. 99. The defendants being dissatisfied with the decree of the Subordinate Judge presented an appeal in the Court of the Senior Subordinate Judge. On the hearing of the appeal an objection was taken by the respondent that the suit being in respect of the land as defined in the Punjab Tenancy Act and the Land Revenue Act was a land suit and consequently that no appeal lay to the Senior Subordinate Judge who is competent to hear appeals in Small Cause and unclassified suits. The Senior Subordinate Judge after enquiry held that the suit was for possession by redemption of land as the property in suit was initially land and its character had not been changed by anything alleged to have been done thereon by the defendant. He, therefore, returned the memorandum of appeal, on the 23rd of February, 1927, for presentation to the proper Court. On the 24th February, 1927, i. e. the next day, the appellant filed the appeal in the Court of the District Judge at Rawalpindi. Admittedly on that date the ordinary period for appeal to the Court of the District Judge had expired. The appellant, however, claimed reduction of the time spent by him in prosecuting his appeal in the Court of the Senior Subordinate Judge, under s. 14 of the Indian Limitation Act, but the learned District Judge declined to give the appellant advantage of that provision of law holding that there was no scope for doubt about the Court which was competent to hear the appeal from the decree of the Subordinate Judge and that it could not be held that the appellant filed the appeal in the Senior Subordinate Judge's Court in good faith.

Maula Bakhsh has, therefore, presented a petition for revision against the order of the Subordinate Judge, returning his memorandum of appeal for presentation to the proper Court and an appeal against the order of the District Judge dismissing his appeal as barred by time. On the finding of the Senior Subordinate Judge there is no doubt that the suit is a land suit. It related to an area of 2 kanals and 14 marlas. In 1924 the defendant built a kotha on two marlas of this land. It is true that in the kharif of 1924 the land was not cultivated and the suit was instituted on the 1st of July, 1924. It is not, however, possible on that account alone to hold that at the time of the institution of the suit the character of the land had been changed in such a way as to make a suit relating thereto an unclassified suit. The petition for revision, therefore, is dismissed with costs.

With regard to the appeal, I hold that it must be succeeded. The reasons given by the appellant in support of his contention that the property in suit had changed its character were not such as could summarily be rejected. They needed consideration. It has not been shown that the appellant had any motive for filing the appeal in the Court of the Senior Subordinate Judge. On the other hand, it appears that he honestly believed that the appeal lay to that Court. Under these circumstances I hold that this was a fit case in which the provisions of s. 14 of the Indian Limitation Act should have been applied specially because the appellant filed his appeal in the Court of the District Judge the day after the Senior Subordinate Judge decided against him. Accepting the appeal I set aside the order of the District Judge and holding the appeal to be within time, I remand it to him for decision on the merits. There will be no order as to the costs of this appeal.

A notice of enhancement given to an annual tenant by a certificated holder and manager of a Jagir village is not invalid simply because some of his co-sharers do not agree that such a notice should be given. [p. 814, col. 1.]

The mere issue of a notice of enhancement does not bar an action for ejectment if that remedy is otherwise legally open to the landlord especially when the tenant after receiving the notice of enhancement not only refuses to pay the enhanced rent but contests the landlord's title. [ibid.]

JUDGMENT.—The judgment in this appeal will also govern the connected

Second Appeals Nos. 36, 37, 38 and 39-B of 1926, the facts of which are, to all intents and purposes, similar.

The facts of the case are sufficiently clear from the detailed judgments of the Additional District Judge in Civil Appeals Nos. 13 and 14 of 1925 in his Court and I find it unnecessary to repeat them here. Each of the defendants has now come up on second appeal against the judgment and decree of the lower Appellate Court ordering him to give up possession of the survey number, or part of the survey number, concerned as the case may be.

It has not been disputed in this Court that the defendants are annual tenants, and only two points have been pressed out of the various grounds of appeal. The notice for enhancement of rent in the present case was given on the 28th of August, 1922, and the notice of ejectment was given on the 5th of December of the same year. The first point for decision is whether the plaintiff-respondent No. 1, Amrullasha, could himself validly give such notice. It is urged in this connection that he cannot, by himself, represent the landlord and that, as a matter of fact, the other co-sharers are opposed to his claim. The lower Appellate Court has not dealt in detail with the finding of the first Court, which is to be found in para. 7 of its judgment in Suit No. 182 of 1923 and in para. 12 of its judgment in Suit No. 197 of 1923, in which reasons are given for holding that the plaintiff and his predecessors have been solely managing the village. The krarnama to this effect has also been proved and it is impossible to find any reason for disturbing this finding of fact which has been arrived at by the first Court, nor has, indeed, any such reason been alleged. On this ground alone, therefore, the first contention urged in appeal was bound to fail.

Apart from the two cases quoted by the lower Appellate Court, on which it relies for its finding that a notice from the certificated holder Syed Amrullasha alone was a valid one, I find myself in full agreement with the remarks of Mittra, A. J. C., in Narayan v. Syed Bahadur (1), decided on March 17, 1917, on this point. It is important, moreover, to remember that an estate like the present one is, in reality, impartible and the persons beneficially interested in it cannot ordinarily demand more than the share of income they are entitled to. Whether or not they are entitled to revise or cancel any agreement for management, which was come to amongst themselves, is a matter I am not called upon to decide, but it is certainly not open to the present appellant, merely because some of such persons may desire that he should be retained in the land, to claim that this difference of opinion amongst the co sharers would render invalid an ordinary act of management done by the certificated holder who has, moreover, by agreement and by long practice, been recognised as the manager of the estate. I find, myself, therefore, in full agreement with the Additional District Judge in his finding that the notices in question were valid, although signed by Syed Amrullasha alone.

The second point urged on behalf of the appellant seems to me to have even less substance. This is that having issued notice for enhancement of rent under s. 78 of the Berar Land Revenue Code, 1896, it was not open to Syed Amrullasha to issue notice of ejectment under s. 79 idem. These tenants are annual tenants only and, in the absence of an express provision contained in s. 79 (2) that it was to be subject to the provision contained in s. 78, it is preposterous to suggest that the more drastic remedy afforded by s. 79 is, or could be abrogated by action under s. 78. Moreover, at any time, the landlord has a right to ask for the rent of the holding to be enhanced under s. 78 entirely irrespective of the tenant who may hold it during the following year for which enhancement is asked. In view of the absolute provision contained in s. 79 (2), it is impossible to my mind to suggest that the mere issue of a notice of enhancement bars the landlord's resort to action for ejectment if that is otherwise legally open to him. Moreover, in the present instance, the notice in question was apparently not sent through a Revenue Officer as is required by sub-s. (8) of s. 78. It has been proved also that each of the appellants declined to pay the enhanced rate, evidence on which point was properly admitted in the lower Appellate Court and whose finding thereon I agree with. The replies of the appellants, in which they not only declined to pay the enhanced rent but also, in effect, contested their landlord's title, speak for themselves.

These replies were received before notice of ejectment was given and, in those circumstances, it seems to me futile to suggest that the landlord was debarred from having recourse to his remedy under s. 79 (2). The second contention in the appeal, therefore, fails and I am unable to see any reason for interference with the judgment and decree of the lower Appellate Court.

The appeal is accordingly dismissed. The appellant must bear the respondents' costs. Costs in the lower Courts as already ordered.

Mr. Niaz Muhammad, for the Appellants.

Mr. J. L. Kapur, for Lala Badri Das, R. B., for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—Plaintiffs brought this suit for possession of 10 kanals 18 marlas of land now situate within the abadi of their village and formerly agricultural land. The only issue in the case was whether the plot belonged to the plaintiffs and had been in their possession within the last twelve years. Both these points were decided in their favour by the District Judge and a decree was given.

On second appeal Counsel does not contest the title of the plaintiffs beyond saying that his clients have acquired an adverse title, which is indefeasible that the plaintiffs had not been in possession within twelve years. He relies upon an overt act committed by his clients in the year 1909, when they attempted to build a wall on this land, and in a criminal case, which followed thereon, admitted the title of the plaintiffs. Such an admission cancels the effect of any previous act that they had committed and it cannot be inferred or presumed that that admission carried with it an assertion of adverse title. No overt act since 1909 is alleged and the appeal must, therefore, fail and is dismissed with costs.

TANJORE—DEFENDANT—RESPONDENT.Contract—Breach by one party entitling other to cancel contract—Notice of cancellation, absence of—Breach, whether condoned.

When a party to a contract is entitled to cancel it by reason of the breach by the other, notice of cancellation should be given to the other party. If no notice is given, it must be deemed that the breach has been condoned and that the contract is allowed to continue.

Petition, under s. 25 of Act IX of 1887, to revise the decree of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Tanjore, in S. O. S. No. 196 of 1925.

Mr. K. B. Ranganatha Iyer, for the Petitioner.

Sir K. V. Reddi, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application, to revise the decree of the Subordinate Judge of Tanjore. The decree was for a small portion of the plaintiff's claim. The plaintiff is the petitioner herein. He sued for damages for breach of contract by the defendant, the District Board of Tanjore. The agreement between the parties is embodied in Ex. III. Under the agreement the chatram manager had to supply paddy for being husked. The plaintiff was to husk the paddy and deliver it. There is no dispute as to quantities. The Subordinate Judge found that both the parties broke the contract and the plaintiff was not entitled to damages. The contention of Mr. Ranganadha Iyer for the petitioner is that his act did not amount to a breach of contract. Sir K. V. Reddi for the respondent contends that inasmuch as the plaintiff did not deliver 286 measures of husked rice, he must be deemed to have broken the contract and under cl. 5 of the contract, if the plaintiff failed to take paddy to be husked or failed to measure the entire rice due for the paddy taken by him within a week thereof or withheld some quantity of paddy then the defendant was entitled to cancel the contract and that this clause applied to this case and that the District Board was entitled to cancel the contract inasmuch as the plaintiff failed to deliver 286 measures of rice. Strange enough Ex. III was executed some four months after the contract was actually entered into. The breach, if any, was before the date of Ex. III. There is nothing to show that on the date of Ex. III the plaintiff was called upon to deliver the paddy yet to be delivered. If there was a breach the defendant did not avail himself of it and if he wanted to avail himself of it he should have given notice of cancellation of the contract to the plaintiff on the ground that he did not deliver the full measure of paddy. That he did not choose to do. It is contended that the chatram manager gave paddy to others for husking. That is no ground for holding that District Board gave notice of cancellation of the contract to plaintiff. When a party to a contract is entitled to cancel the contract by reason of the breach by the other, notice of cancellation should be given to the other party. If no notice is given then it must be deemed that the breach was condoned and that the contract was allowed to continue. In this case the District Board not having given notice of breach of contract the contract must be held to be subsisting. In this view of the law, I set aside the decree of the Subordinate Judge only so far as the question of damages to plaintiff is concerned. As regards the value of the paddy to be delivered, the defendant must be given credit for Rs. 114-6-5. This amount will be deducted from any amount that may be due to the plaintiff. I set aside the decree of the Subordinate Judge and direct him to hold an enquiry into the amount of damages suffered by the plaintiff by reason of the breach of contract by the defendant and after ascertaining the amount, he will give a decree to the plaintiff for the damages and the deposit amount, namely, Rs. 200 minus the amount of Rs. 114-6-5. The plaintiff will be entitled to interest from the date of suit notice, Ex. XXI. The petitioner is entitled to costs of this application.

Hindu Law—Alienation—Father's alienation, whether void—Mortgage by father containing indemnity clause—Suit on mortgage—Limitation—Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Arts. 97, 116.

An alienation by a Hindu father not supported by legal necessity is not void ab initio but is voidable at the instance of his sons or reversioners.

A mortgage executed by a Hindu father in 1914 contained an indemnity clause that if any objection or claim arose the mortgagor would be personally liable. The mortgagee instituted a suit against the mortgagor's sons on the mortgage in 1922. The guardian of the sons contended that the land was ancestral and that the alienation was not supported by necessity. A decree was passed against the mortgagor's properties and the mortgaged property was held not liable. In a suit by the sons to set aside this decree on the ground that the suit was barred by limitation and the guardian had negligently failed to take this plea.

Held, that as soon as the decree was passed in favour of his sons that the property was not liable under the mortgage, the indemnity clause came into action and the mortgagor became personally liable to recoup the mortgagee and, therefore, whether Art. 97 or Art. 116 of the First Schedule to the Limitation Act was applicable, the suit was within limitation.

Second appeal from the decree of the Additional District Judge, Jullundur, dated the 14th April, 1927, reversing that of the Additional Subordinate Judge, Third Class, Jullundur, dated the 30th November, 1926.

Lala Badri Das, R. B., for the Appellant.

JUDGMENT.—On the 21st December, 1914, the father of the present plaintiffs executed a registered mortgage deed in favour of the defendant. The mortgagor died and the present defendant brought a suit against the present plaintiffs, as representatives of the mortgagor, on the 23rd

May, 1922, for the recovery of the principal and interest on the mortgage amount and further prayed for a decree that if the whole decretal amount could not be realized by sale of the mortgaged property, he might be given the right to apply for its recovery from the other property of the deceased mortgagor. The mother of the minors acting as guardian ad litem defended the suit pleading that the land mortgaged was ancestral and there was no valid necessity and, therefore, the land under mortgage was not liable for payment of the mortgage debt. She did not raise the plea of limitation. The Court held that the property was ancestral and that there was no necessity for the mortgage and gave a decree against the property of the deceased mortgagor in the possession of his sons on the 22nd May, 1923. It also held that the mortgaged property was not liable in execution for the debt of the father.

On the 15th March, 1926, the plaintiffs brought the present suit for declaration that this decree of 22nd May, 1923, was not binding on them on the ground that the plaintiff's mother, as their guardian ad litem, had acted with negligence in not pleading limitation. The learned District Judge held that the mortgage was void ab initio and that, therefore, neither Art. 97 nor Art. 116 brought the suit within limitation. He, therefore, accepted the appeal and reversing the decree of the lower Court decreed the suit with costs.

Counsel for the appellant (mortgagee) has contended that in so holding the learned District Judge was wrong. It seems to me that no authority is necessary for the proposition that an alienation by a Hindu father is not void ab initio but is voidable at the instance of his sons or reversioners. As the present mortgage contained an indemnity clause that if any objection or claimant arose then the mortgagor would be personally liable as soon as the decree was passed in favour of his sons that the property was not liable under the mortgage, the indemnity clause came into action and the mortgagor became personally liable to recoup the mortgagee and, therefore, whether Art. 97 or Art. 116 was applicable the suit was within limitation.

I, therefore, accept the appeal and restore the decree of the trial Court dismissing the suit with costs throughout.

SECOND CIVIL APPEAL NO. 1485 OF 1927.

November 7, 1927.

Present:—Mr. Justice Jai Lal.

Musammât JANTAN AND OTHERS—DEFEND-ANTS—APPELLANTSversusAHMAD AND ANOTHER—PLAINTIFFS—*RESPONDENTS.

Court Fees Act (VII of 1870), ss. 12, 23, Sch. II, Arts. 17, 22—Court-fee, question of, when appealable—Suit to set aside alienation by female.—Requisite Court-fee—Ancestral land, meaning of—Insufficiently stamped plaint, acceptance of—Further proceedings, whether void—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. VII, r. 11.

The term "ancestral land" in Art. 22 of Sch. II of the Court Fees Act means land in respect of which in order to enable the plaintiff to succeed, it is necessary for him to prove that the land is ancestral. A suit by the next heir to set aside an alienation by a female holder who has the customary life-interest in the estate is not within the purview of Art. 22 as it is not ordinarily necessary for the plaintiff in such a suit to aver or to prove that the land is ancestral. [p. 819, col. 1.]

In the case of a plaint insufficiently stamped the Court is bound to give the party concerned an opportunity to pay the proper stamp and it is on his failure to do so that the Court can decline to look at the document. But the fact that a Court has accepted an insufficiently stamped plaint does not render the proceedings which follow thereon void. [ibid.]

Section 12, Court Fees Act, bars an appeal only where the dispute is about the proper valuation of the subject-matter of the suit and not when the question is which of the several articles of the Court Fees Act applies to the facts stated in the plaint. [p. 818, col. 2.]

Where an order directing the payment of additional Court-fee is incorporated in the decree, it becomes an essential part of the decree and is appealable as such. [ibid.]

Second appeal against an order of the District Judge, Mianwali, dated the 8th of February, 1927, reversing that of the Senior Subordinate Judge, Mianwali, dated the 5th/20th October, 1926.

Mr. S. R. Lail, for the Appellants.

JUDGMENT.—The respondents instituted a suit in the Court of the Senior Subordinate Judge, Mianwali, for a declaration that a sale by Musammât Jantan of land inherited by her from Muhammada, her son, was without consideration and necessity and, therefore, void against the rights of the plaintiffs who alleged that they were the next heirs of Muhammada after the expiry of the life-interest of Musammât Jantan. An objection was raised by the defendants that proper Court-fee on the plaint had not been paid and it was pleaded that the sale was for consideration and necessity. On the merits the Senior

Subordinate Judge held in favour of the plaintiffs, but on the question of Court-fee he was of opinion that a Court-fee stamp of Rs. 10 paid by the plaintiffs was insufficient and that the proper Court-fee was Rs. 20 under Art. 22, Sch. II of the Indian Court Fees Act which provides that a plaint or memorandum of appeal in a suit by a reversioner under the Customary Law for a declaration in respect of an alienation of ancestral land shall bear a Court-fee stamp of Rs. 20. The plaintiffs' contention was that their suit was not for a declaration in respect of an alienation of ancestral land and, therefore, under Art. 17 (3) of the Second Schedule of the Court Fees Act, stamp payable was an in an ordinary suit for declaration. The learned Judge, decided all the issues framed in the case together and passed the following decree on 5th of October, 1927:—

"I accordingly come to the conclusion that the alienation was without necessity and I grant the plaintiffs a decree with costs against the defendants declaring that the sale in dispute shall not affect the rights of the plaintiffs after the death of Musammât Jantan. The decree shall not take effect until the Court-fee has been made good. The requisite Court-fee should be put in on or before the 20th of October, 1926."

This order was pronounced in the presence of the Counsel for both parties. The deficiency in the Court-fee as determined by the Senior Subordinate Judge not having been made good by the 20th of October the following note was made by the learned Judge below the decree:—

"Note.—Court-fee not paid as ordered. Decree shall not take effect."

Against the decree of the 5th October the plaintiffs filed an appeal in the Court of the District Judge who held that an appeal lay to this Court because the order under appeal amounted to an order rejecting the plaint and that in either case an appeal lay to him. He held that the proper stamp on the plaint was Rs. 10 which amount having been already paid the order of the trial Court directing payment of additional Court-fee was illegal. He, therefore, accepted the appeal, "set aside the order of the 20th October, and ordered that proper decree-sheet be prepared in accordance with law." It appears, however, that the respondents before him had filed cross-objections. These the learned Judge declined to consider on the ground that the stage for filing cross-objections had not yet reached, that they (respondents) "can appeal against the order when a proper decree-sheet is prepared." The defendants have filed this second appeal, but the plaintiffs did not appear before me, nor were they represented by Counsel and consequently I had to hear the appeal ex parte against them.

The first contention of the learned Counsel, who appeared on behalf of the appellants, is that no appeal lay to the Court of the learned District Judge from the order dated the 5th October, 1926, and that the plaintiffs not having appealed from the order of 20th October were precluded from appealing against the previous order which had in effect been superseded by the later order. I may note that the plaintiffs' appeal was expressly against the order of the 5th October, but the learned District Judge has set aside the order of the 20th October. Still I do not see any force in the contention of the appellants. The decree of the Senior Subordinate Judge was conditional, that is the way in which the learned Judge himself interpreted it and the condition not having been performed as directed, the decree ipso facto became inoperative. There was really no fresh order made on the 20th of October, but merely a note was made of the fact that the condition had not been performed, and the further note that the decree shall not come into operation under the circumstances was merely a surplusage. It was not, therefore, necessary for the plaintiffs to appeal against any order of the 20th October, because the note made by the Judge on that date ceased to have any effect when the District Judge accepted the plaintiffs' appeal and set aside the order of the 5th October, 1926. Though the learned Judge has not expressly set aside that order, the whole of the judgment is to the effect that the finding of the Senior Subordinate Judge, that the Court-fee paid on the plaint was insufficient, was erroneous.

The learned Counsel then relied on s. 12 of the Court Fees Act in support of his argument that no appeal lay to the District Judge. The section provides that every question relating to valuation for the purpose of determining the amount of any fee chargeable under this Chapter on a plaint or memorandum of appeal shall be decided by the Court in which such plaint or memorandum as the case may be, is filed and such decision shall be final as between the parties to the suit. But a proviso is added that where such question has been wrongly decided to the detriment of the revenue, a superior Court before whom such suit may come on appeal, reference or revision shall require the party concerned to pay the additional fee. In my opinion s. 12 does not apply to the present case. My view is that that section merely bars an appeal where the dispute is about the proper valuation of the subject matter of the suit and not where the question is which of the several articles of the Court Fees Act applies to the facts stated in the plaint. In the first case it is more or less a question of fact that has to be determined by the Court and the Legislature has laid it down that the decision of the Court in such matters shall be final. In the second case different considerations arise and the matter being purely one of law is capable of being examined by superior Courts at the instance of either party.

There is an other aspect of this question.

The order directing the payment of the additional Court-fee was incorporated in the decree. It was, therefore, an essential part of the decree and admittedly the decree was appealable to the District Judge. In other words, the decree being conditional on the performance of certain acts by the plaintiffs on the non-performance whereof it was to become void and the direction relating to the performance of such acts being illegal as held by the District Judge; the learned Judge had jurisdiction to adjudicate upon the legality or otherwise of the condition imposed.

At this stage it will be convenient to dispose of another argument that was put forward on behalf of the appellants. It was based on s. 28 of the Court Fees Act which provides that no document which ought to bear a stamp under that Act shall be of any validity, unless and until it is properly stamped. The contention of the learned Counsel was that the plaint being insufficiently stamped the decree passed thereon was void and consequently no appeal lay at the instance of the plaintiff. I confess I am unable to follow this argument. Order VII, r. 11, Civil Procedure Code, clearly provides that if the plaint is written on paper insufficiently stamped, and the plaintiff on being required by the Court to supply the requisite stamp paper within a fixed time, fails to do so then the Court shall reject the plaint. This provision of the law read with s. 28 of the Court Fees Act clearly implies that opportunity has to be given to the party concerned to pay the proper stamp and it is on his failure to do so that the Court is entitled to decline to look at the document. But I am unable to see that if the Court accepts an insufficiently stamped plaint the proceedings which follow thereon are void. Clause (2) of s. 12 of the Court Fees Act also supports the view.

The real question that is to be considered in this appeal is whether the suit in this case was in respect of an alienation of ancestral land or whether it was one in which a mere declaration under Art. 17 (3) of the Court Fees Act was prayed for. The question presents some difficulty, but after careful consideration I have arrived at the conclusion that the view of the learned District Judge is correct. In a suit by the next heir to set aside an alienation by a female holder who has the customary life-interest in the estate it is not ordinarily necessary for the plaintiff to aver or to prove that the land was ancestral. All that he has to prove in order to establish his locus standi to maintain such a suit, is that he is the next heir to the estate, in other words, that if the female holder, the alienor, had not existed, he would have inherited the property. He would, under the circumstances, be entitled to sue to set aside an alienation even of land which is the self-acquired property of last male owner and, therefore it is not necessary for the success of the suit that such property should have been held by the common ancestor of the plaintiff and last male owner. In this sense the present suit is not to set aside the sale of ancestral land.

The trial Court, and before me the learned Counsel for the appellants, laid great stress on the fact that the plaintiffs' Counsel when examined in Court stated that the land in suit was ancestral. I have examined that statement and find that the learned Counsel was careful to add that it was immaterial whether the land was ancestral or not. The term "ancestral land," therefore, in Art. 22 of the Second Schedule of the Court-Fees Act means land in respect of which, in order to enable the plaintiff to succeed, it is necessary for him to prove that the land was ancestral; in other words, that it was held by the common ancestor of himself and the last male owner. This was not necessary in the present case and I must hold, therefore, that the present suit is not in respect of the alienation of ancestral land,

The consequence is that the learned District Judge was right in holding that the view of the Senior Subordinate Judge, that proper Court-fee on the plaint had not been paid, was erroneous. It may be mentioned that great inconvenience and confusion has been caused in this case owing to the fact that the Senior Subordinate Judge did not follow the usual practice of deciding the issue relating to the sufficiency or otherwise of the Court-fee before proceeding with the trial of the suit on its merits. I have grave doubts if he could pass a conditional decree under the circumstances.

In view of what I have stated it is not necessary for me to consider whether the plaintiffs had, as alleged by them, reasonable excuse for not paying the Court-fee within the time fixed by the trial Court. At the same time I consider that it was not necessary for the District Judge to order that a proper decree be prepared and that he could not decline to entertain the cross-objections of the respondents. Order XLI, r. 22 of the Civil Procedure Code, gives a right to a respondent to attack any decree which is passed against him by the lower Court by filing a cross-objection, and the learned District Judge could not take away such rights in the manner he has done. In his judgment the view of the trial Court with regard to the Court-fee was erroneous and, therefore, the order directing payment of the additional Court-fee became inoperative. There was under the circumstances no occasion to remand the case for the preparation of a proper decree. The plaintiffs were entitled to claim that subject to the decision of the cross-objections their suit should be decreed unconditionally and the respondents were entitled to an adjudication of their cross-objections.

I accept this appeal to this extent that I remand the case to the District Judge with a direction to hear the cross-objections and then to pass a decree in favour of the plaintiffs or the defendants as the case may be after due consideration of the grounds taken by the respondents in their cross-objections. As the appellants have failed in the main grounds of appeal and the respondents have not appeared before me there will be no order as to costs of this appeal.

Under the provisions of s. 26 of the U. P. Town Areas Act, although the District Magistrate has power to make an order prohibiting any body from depositing or storing manure, refuse or other offensive matter in a manner prejudicial to public health, comfort or convenience, he has no power to make an order directing that collections of such matter belonging to other persons may be made by the town-area authorities, whether they do or do not return a portion of their sale-proceeds to the rightful owner. Mr. Ali Zaheer for Mr. M. Wasim, for the Appellant.

Mr. H. K. Ghose, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—These four appeals can be decided together. They have arisen in the following way. The villages of Pahladpur, Bankat, Tanda Salar and Shah Qulipur have been included under the provisions of Local Act II of 1914 (The United Provinces Town Areas Act) in the town area of Laharpur. Laharpur is a small town. The villages in question stand outside it. The plaintiffs in the suits out of which these appeals arise are persons who are admittedly entitled to the sweepings and refuse of the villages of Pahladpur, Bankat, Tanda Salar and Shah Qulipur. The panchayet of Laharpur town area has, however, asserted a right to collect such sweeping and refuse in those places. In the assertion of this right they have made collections. They have sold the refuse and credited the proceeds to the town fund. When the plaintiffs took exception to this action of the panchayet the panchayet admitted the plaintiff's rights in part, and offered to settle the matter by making to them a money payment to be taken from the sale-proceeds. The plaintiffs refused to accept this offer. The panchayet refused to cease making collections, and the result has been the filing of these suits. The relief sought in each case was for a declaration that the plaintiffs possessed the rights in question, and for an order restraining the panchayet in perpetuity from making such collections and selling the refuse. The trial Courts in each instance decreed the suits. The learned District Judge on appeal has dismissed the suits. The plaintiffs come here in second appeal. We are unable to find that the town area authorities have any justification for making these collections. It is not denied that before the Act came into existence the plaintiffs possessed the rights to make these collections. There is nothing in the Act or anywhere else which has taken their rights away. The District Magistrate can, under the provisions of s. 26 of the Act, make an order in writing prohibiting the plaintiffs or anybody else from depositing or storing manure, refuse or other offensive matter in a manner prejudicial to the public health, comfort or convenience, but under that section he certainly cannot make an order directing that collections of property of other persons are to be made by the town area authorities, whether they do or do not return a portion of the sale-proceeds to the rightful owner. It is true that under the provisions of s. 22(e) of the same Act the sale-proceeds of all dust, dirt, dung, or refuse including the dead bodies of animals collected by the town servants are credited to the town fund. But even if those words stood alone this section can only mean that where the town area authorities are entitled to such things they then have the power to collect them, and to sell them, and to enjoy the sale-proceeds. But the words do not stand alone. The Legislature has been careful to explain in this section that such sale-proceeds do not include sale-proceeds of things of this nature to which a private person is entitled. So the town area authorities can found nothing on the provisions of that section. The case then stands that the action of the town area authorities is without any justification. An attempt was made to show that the Court had no jurisdiction because orders under s. 26 cannot be questioned at all if passed by the District Magistrate, and if passed by a town

Magistrate can only be questioned by appeal to the District Magistrate. But the order in question is not an order under s. 25. It is not an order under any section of the Act. It is most extraordinary assumption of authority for which there is no justification whatever. It was further argued that the plaintiffs in one case were estopped by the admission of their servant. We do not find that there was any admission of any value. As a result we set aside the decrees of the learned District Judge and restore the decrees of the trial Courts in all cases. The defendant the town area authority will pay his own costs and those of all the appellants in all Courts.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V. of 1908), O. IX, r. 9—Application for restoration of suit—Court's duty to give opportunity to applicant to adduce evidence.

An application for restoration of a suit dismissed in default should not be dismissed in limine without giving an opportunity to the applicant to substantiate his allegations in the application by evidence, even though there is reason to suspect that the application is not made bona fide.

Miscellaneous first appeal from an order of the Subordinate Judge, First Class, Shahpur at Sargodha, dated the 22nd January, 1927.

Lala Badri Das, R. B., for the Appellant.

Mr. Mukand Lal Puri, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—One Lakhmi Chand, describing himself as the sole owner of certain property sold it by two sale-deeds to Naunit Ram and Tahla Ram for Rs. 12,000 and Rs. 20,000 respectively. His younger brother Amir Chand instituted two suits in the Court of the Senior Subordinate Judge, Shahpur, claiming (a) one-half of the property comprised in each sale as belonging to him and having been sold by Lakhmi Chand without any authority, and (b) the other half (which admittedly belonged to Lakhmi Chand) by way of pre-emption. Both suits were set down for hearing for the 4th January, 1927, on which date the plaintiff was ordered to deposit 1-5th of the sale price in each suit on or before the 4th of January, 1927, and it was also ordered that the next hearing of case would be on the 20th January. On the 14th of January, 1927, the Pleader for the plaintiff appeared and stated that his client lived in the Ferozepore District, that he was ill there and that it was not possible to communicate with him and to get the money within 10 days. He accordingly prayed for further time. The Court ordered that the deposit might be made on the 20th which had already been fixed as the date of hearing. On the 20th, the cases were called at 11 o'clock when the plaintiff's Pleader Lala Gobind Lal was present but his client was absent. At the request of Lala Gobind Lal the Court decided to wait for an hour or so to see that the plaintiff might arrive with the money. The case was called again at 2 o'clock when neither the plaintiff nor his Pleader appeared and accordingly the Court passed an order dismissing the claim relating to pre-emption of half the property in each suit under s. 22 (4) of the Pre-emption Act for failure to make the deposit and the claim relating to the other half in default under O. IX, r. 8, Civil Procedure Code. The same day applications under O. IX, r. 9 (wrongly described as under O. IX, r. 139) were presented by Lala Gobind Lal for having the two suits restored. These applications were directed to be put up before the learned Senior Subordinate Judge on the 22nd with the usual office report and on the 22nd they were summarily dismissed without any enquiry, he being of opinion that the absence of the plaintiff was intentional.

Against this order of dismissal two miscellaneous appeals have been preferred to this Court and affidavits have been filed by Amir Chand plaintiff and Lala Gobind Lal Pleader stating that on the 14th Lala Gobind Lal sent a telegram to the plaintiff at Ferozepore informing him that the 1/5th should be deposited in Court on the 20th of January, but that by an oversight of the writer or by a mistake of the Telegraph Department the telegram which was actually handed over to the plaintiff stated that the money could be paid by the 30th instead of the 20th and that it was owing to this mistake that the plaintiff did not go to Sargodha on the 20th or send the money to his Pleader for deposit in Court on that date. Several other points were also mentioned in these affidavits which, it is not necessary to recite here. The original telegram alleged to have been received by the plaintiff on the 14th of January, has been filed with the affidavits and the date mentioned in it is the 30th and not the 20th.

It seems to me that the learned Senior Subordinate Judge ought not to have summarily dismissed the application for restoration of the suits without enquiry. Even if his suspicions were correct that the applications had not been made bona fide but had been presented with a view to gain further time in order to procure money for deposit in Court, he should not have thrown out the applications in limine, but should have given the plaintiff proper opportunity to place his evidence before the Court. In view of the affidavits now put in it is very necessary to make full enquiry into the reasons for the plaintiff's absence on the 20th. I, therefore, accept the appeals, set aside the order of the lower Court dismissing the applications for restoration and remand both the cases to it for disposal in accordance with law. Costs will follow the event.

I wish to make it clear that I express no opinion as to the correctness or otherwise of the allegation made in the affidavits, that the date mentioned in the telegram as 30th January was the result of a bona fide mistake on the part of the sender or the Telegraph Department. This is one of the matters for enquiry in the trial Court.

Muhammadan Law—Guardianship—Mother's rights—Marriage not within prohibited degrees, effect of—Grandmother's right to guardianship—Guardians and Wards Act (VIII of 1890), s. 17—Court, whether entitled to disregard law in minor's interest.

Under the Muhammadan Law a mother is disqualified from guardianship even of her minor daughter if she is married to a man who is not related to the minor within the prohibited degrees. [p. 822, col. 2.]

Where the law definitely lays down that an appointment cannot be made, the Court cannot disregard the law even in the interests of the minor.

Under the Muhammadan Law maternal grandmother comes next to the mother in the order of priority among females who are entitled to be appointed guardians. [p. 822, col. 2; p. 823 col. 1.]

Miscellaneous appeal against an order of the District Judge, Fyzabad, dated the 15th July, 1927.

Mr. Ghulam Hasan, for the Appellant.

Mr. Ali Zaheer, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal from an order of the learned District Judge of Fyzabad appointing Musammat Samidan to be the guardian of her minor daughter in preference to the appellant Ansar Ahmad who is the father's brother of the minor. The learned District Judge has appointed the mother although he appears to be aware that her appointment is contrary to Muhammadan Law, because he considers that the child should not be given over to the care of her uncle who is understood by the Judge to have denied her right to her paternal inheritance. It is not altogether clear what the appellant has done in this matter, but I understand from Counsel that in an application for mutation of names in the Revenue Courts, he has supported an entry in the wajib-ul-arz which excludes females in this family from inheritance to landed property. There is nothing to show that he himself has any adverse interest to the minor. But it is not so much the disability of the appellant which must be considered in this case as the disability of the mother, and to that there seems to be no answer. All the authorities on Muhammadan Law are agreed that the mother is disqualified from the guardianship even of her minor daughter if she is married to a man who is not related to the minor within the prohibited degrees. In this case Musammat Samidan has married a man who is a stranger, and, under s. 17 of the Guardians and Wards Act, a Court in appointing a guardian must make an appointment "consistently with the law to which the minor is subject." Where the law definitely lays down that an appointment cannot be made, it is not proper for the Court to disregard the law even in the interests of the minor. In this case it may be that it is not in the interests of the minor that the uncle should be the guardian, but it is nowhere suggested that these are the only persons who under the Muhammadan Law could become the guardian of the minor. As a matter of fact I am told that in the mutation proceedings the maternal grandmother is actually acting as the guardian of the child and under the Muhammadan Law, the mother's mother comes next to the mother in the order of priority among females who are entitled to be appointed guardians (see s. 107 of Wilson's Anglo-Muhammadan Law, 5th Edition, page 182). Under the circumstances I think it would be better if the lower Court should reconsider this question in view of the fact that the guardian appointed by the lower Court is one who is disqualified under the Muhammadan Law, and I, therefore, set aside the order of the District Judge and return the case to him in order that he may re-consider the claim of the appellant along with those of any other persons who may be found willing to accept the guardianship. The appellant will get his costs in this Court.

Contract Act (IX of 1872), ss. 23, 51—Reciprocal agreements—Agreement of one party void—Enforceability of the other agreement.

Where parties enter into reciprocal agreements one of them cannot be enforced if the other is void and unenforceable.

Second appeal from a decree of the District Judge, Dera Ghazi Khan, dated the 11th of March, 1927, affirming that of the Subordinate Judge, Fourth Class, Dera Ghazi Khan, dated the 4th of August, 1926.

Mr. Sain Das, for the Appellant.

Mr. Anant Ram Khosla, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This litigation arose out of a triangular contract among three parties viz., (1) Manghu Ram plaintiff, (2) his debtors Imam Bakhsh and Haidar who owed him Rs. 717 and (3) Nur Muhammad, who took upon himself to pay to Manghu Ram the money owing to him by Imam Bakhsh and Haidar, and gave a bond to him in consideration for Imam Bakhsh and Haidar having mortgaged certain lands to him and Manghu Ram having executed an agreement in his favour to the effect that he (Manghu Ram) would not realise either the principal or interest payable under the bond, but would content himself with a certain share of the produce of the land. Contrary to that agreement Manghu Ram sued Nur Muhammad on the bond to recover the principal and interest. Imam Bakhsh and Haidar were not impleaded as defendants. Nur Muhammad's answer was that Manghu Ram was precluded by his own agreement from suing to recover the principal and interest. The Courts below having accepted the defendant's plea dismissed his suit. He comes up to this Court in second appeal, and his learned Counsel repeats the argument that was advanced in the Courts below that the agreement being contrary to the provisions of the Punjab Alienation of Land Act, was void and could not be enforced, and that this being so the defendant could not succeed on a plea that was based upon that void agreement. But the agreements between the parties were reciprocal and one of them could not be enforced if the other was void and unenforceable. Whether the plaintiff's agreement is void or not, he cannot avoid it if he should wish to enforce the bond.

The appeal, therefore, fails and I dismiss it with costs.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. VI, r. 17—Amendment of plaint—Discretion of trial Court—

Interference in appeal—Duty of plaintiff to include whole claim—Omission to include part of claim—Amendment at late stage—Good cause.

Order VI, r. 17 of the Civil Procedure Code allows a wide discretion to the Court in permitting an amendment, but the discretion is with the Court, and when that discretion has been exercised on materials which have been admitted legally and for judicial reasons it should not be lightly interfered with in appeal. [p. 825, col. 1.]

It is the duty of a plaintiff to frame his plaint properly before he brings it into Court. It is for him to see that it includes the whole of the claim which he is entitled to make in respect of the cause of action unless he wishes to relinquish some portion of the claim, and where he has omitted to do so the Court will not at a late stage permit an amendment of the plaint so as to include the omitted claim also, unless very good cause is shown for the previous omission. [p. 825, cols. 1 & 2.]

First appeal against a decree of the Additional Subordinate Judge, Fyzabad, dated the 13th January, 1927.

Mr. Niamat Ullah, for the Appellant.

JUDGMENT.—This is a plaintiffs' appeal. Rai Sri Ram Bahadur C. I. E., was a Vakil, who practised in the Lucknow Courts. He was a resident of Fyzabad, where he possessed extensive property. He died on the 26th August, 1914, leaving three sons Babu Sitapat Ram, Babu Ramapat Ram and Babu Tulshipat Ram. He executed on the 22nd May, 1911, a registered Will by which he devised his property to his sons and their heirs. His eldest son Babu Sitapat Ram died on the 3rd November, 1925. He was predeceased by his younger brother Babu Ramapat Ram. The plaintiffs in the suit out of which this appeal arises are Babu Tulshipat Ram and Babu Ambika Dat Ram son of the deceased Babu Ramapat Ram. Their case was that a simple money decree was passed against Babu Sitapat Ram in favour of Jagjiwan Das and that Jagjiwan Das in execution of this decree brought to sale as the property of Babu Sitapat Ram the village of Miranpur Sadar Ali in the Fyzabad District and that the whole village was sold in execution of this decree to Lala Kishan Narain. The allegations in the plaint were to the effect that under the Will of the late Rai Sri Ram Bahadur the village in question had been devised in three equal shares to Babu Sitapat Ram, Babu Ramapat Ram and Babu Tulshipat Ram and that in consequence the sale in execution, in so far as it exceeded the sale of the one-third share belonging to Babu Sitapat Ram, was invalid as against the plaintiffs. The date of the sale is not mentioned in the plaint but it admittedly took place on the 27th October, 1925. The plaintiffs arrayed as defendants the heirs of Babu Sitapat Ram, Lala Jagjiwan Das the decree holder and Lala Kishan Narain the auction-purchaser. The plaint was filed on the 25th of August, 1926. The heirs of Babu Sitapat Ram and the decree-holder Jagjiwan Das did not enter an appearance and proceedings against them were ex parte. Lala Kishan Narain did not defend the suit as it stood originally. He admitted that a mistake had been made and that he had only acquired by virtue of his purchase in the Court sale, one-third in the village of Miranpur Sadar Ali. In so far as he was concerned the suit came to an end by confession of judgment, but the trial Judge adjourned the hearing to the 30th November, 1926, in order to record evidence as against the defendants who had not entered an appearance. Upon that date the plaintiffs made an application for leave to amend the plaint. This application does not state accurately the relief which they sought. That relief is, however, stated accurately by the learned Counsel who has appeared for them in the present appeal. It appears that Rai Sri Ram Bahadur was the holder of an usufructuary mortgage of what is known as the Ilaqa Jaipur. Included in the Ilaqa Jaipur is one village known as Salahpur Rajao. In the sale in execution of Jagjiwan Das's decree, which took place on the 27th October, 1925, not only was the village of Miranpur Sadar Ali sold, but the mortgagee rights possessed by Rai Sri Ram Bahadur in Salahpur Rajao only out of the mortgagee rights in the whole Ilaqa Jaipur (which consists of a large number of villages) were brought to sale and purchased by Lala Kishan Narain. The plaintiffs sought to amend the plaint by seeking in addition a relief in respect of two-thirds of the mortgagee rights in Salahpur Rajao and they put this application for amendment on the 30th November, 1926. Lala Kishan Narain opposed the application for amendment. The learned trial Judge then proceeded to decide it. He decided it in a lengthy order in which he refused to allow the amendment. He then proceeded to decide the suit in respect of Miranpur Sadar Ali and he decreed that suit in favour of the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs appeal here solely against the refusal to permit them to amend their plaint. The respondents have not appeared and the hearing of this appeal has been ex parte.

The portion of the rules under the Code of Civil Procedure which deals with alteration of amendment of pleadings is contained in O. VI, r. 17. The Rule is as follows:—

“The Court may at any stage of the proceedings allow either party to alter or amend his pleadings in such manner and on such terms as may be just, and all such amendments shall be made as may be necessary for the purpose of determining the real questions in controversy between the parties.”

This rule allows a wide discretion to the Court in permitting an amendment, but the discretion is with the Court, and where that discretion has been exercised on materials which have been admitted legally and for judicial reasons, that discretion should not be lightly interfered with. The question for decision has been somewhat complicated by the fact that Lala Kishan Narain pressed certain objections which in our opinion had little force. The learned trial Judge has not always arrived at the conclusions at which we should have arrived upon these objections. For example Lala Kishan Narain put forward that the claim of the plaintiffs to two-thirds of the mortgagee rights in Salahpur Rajao was obviously barred by limitation. The learned trial Judge found that it was obviously barred by limitation. We do not agree there. That claim may be barred by limitation or it may not be barred, but on the materials before the learned trial Judge it was impossible to decide one way or another. The trial Judge has however based his decision, amongst other grounds, upon the ground that the plaintiffs had not been able to show that they had made a bona fide mistake and this carried him to the point as to whether they had made out a case for the indulgence which they sought; and here we consider that he was on firm ground when he decided that they had not shown that they had made a bona fide mistake and that consequentially they had made out no claim for indulgence. The principles which, in our opinion, should apply in a matter such as this are these. It is the duty of a plaintiff to frame his plaint properly before he brings it into Court. It is for him to see that it includes the whole of the claim which he is entitled to make in respect of the cause of action unless he wishes to relinquish some portion of the claim. Relaxations can be made, and may be made, to meet the case of an ignorant plaintiff who has not had the advantage of proper legal advice. The plaintiffs in this case, however, are not ignorant people. They are men of position and standing, and admittedly have engaged on more than one occasion in litigation. They were presented by legal advisers who were in a position to know the law and to apply it. In preparing the plaint it was necessary for them to look at the sale of the 27th October, 1925. According to the learned Counsel for the appellants there can be no doubt as to the fact that that sale, not only covered the proprietary rights in Miranpur Sadar Ali but that it also covered the mortgagee rights in Salahpur Rajao. We can find no excuse for the omission to include the mortgagee rights in Salahpur Rajao in the plaint if the plaintiffs wished to bring a suit in respect of them. What have the plaintiffs done? They filed this plaint on the 25th August, 1926. Various proceedings took place. Lala Kishan Narain admitted their claim as it stood. Nothing was left except the final recording of evidence against those persons who were absent and at the very end they asked on the 30th November, 1926, for permission to amend the plaint.

It is to be noted that by the proposed amendment they brought into contest matters which were foreign to the matters previously in contest. We have referred already to the Will which was executed by Rai Sri Ram Bahadur on the 22nd May, 1911. In this Will he divided his property partially by lists. He left villages in one list to one son; villages in another list to another son and so on. Miranpur Sadar Ali was included in list 2 and by the eleventh clause of the Will the list 2 property was clearly divided in equal shares amongst his three sons, but the mortgagee rights in Salahpur Rajao are mentioned in none of the lists and Salahpur Rajao is not itself mentioned anywhere in the Will, although in the eleventh clause the mortgagee rights in Ilaga Jaipur are mentioned. The division of certain of the property amongst the three sons was subject to certain preliminaries, and it was necessary to prove exactly what had happened before it could be determined with any certainty whether Ramapat Ram and Tulshipat Ram had acquired any interests in the mortgagee rights in Salahpur Rajao. Those mortgagee rights might have been divided according to villages. Many points of contest could arise in respect of the mortgagee rights. The determination of the rights in Miranpur Sadar Ali was comparatively simple and provoked no contest. As we have seen Lala Kishan Narain admitted the claim in respect of Miranpur Sadar Ali. We thus have it that after Lala Kishan Narain had, as far as he knew, terminated his connection with the case the plaintiffs some months after they had filed their original plaint applied to amend the plaint and introduce into it matter of a much more contentious nature than the matter which it previously contained. No Court would have any right to permit an amendment of this kind unless very good cause was shown for the previous omission. But so far from good cause being shown for the previous omission, no cause of any kind was shown. The plaintiffs came forward with a statement that they had made a mistake for which they were very sorry and gave no explanation as to how their legal advisers, while reading the account of the sale of the 27th October, 1925, had left out half the relief which they could have claimed as a result of that sale. In these circumstances we do not consider that we should be justified in interfering with the discretion of the learned trial Judge in refusing to permit the amendment. Our reasons have not been stated exactly as he has stated his reasons, but he had good grounds upon which he could exercise his discretion judicially and we consider that he did exercise his discretion judicially and correctly. The learned Counsel for the appellants has urged that as an effect of our refusing to grant this appeal his clients may be debarred from claiming any relief in respect of the mortgagee rights in Salahpur Rajao. We do not express any opinion as to whether they are or are not so debarred. It is true that O II, r. 2, directs that every suit shall include the whole of the claim which the plaintiff is entitled to make in respect of the cause of action and that when a plaintiff omits to sue in respect of any portion of his claim he shall not afterwards sue in respect of the portion so omitted. But the question, as far as we are concerned, is open as to whether the claim for the mortgagee rights in Salahpur Rajao should be included in the claim for the proprietary rights in Miranpur Sadar Ali as having arisen out of the same cause of action. We do not consider we should be justified at this stage in deciding the point one way or another. It is certainly open to the plaintiffs, should they so desire, to bring a fresh suit for a portion of the mortgagee rights in Salahpur Rajao and should they do so, the Court will then decide whether such a suit is or is not barred under the provisions of O. II, r. 2. At this stage we do not wish to express an opinion upon the latter point. We, therefore, dismiss this appeal. The appellants will pay their own costs. The respondents incurred no costs.

Miscellaneous first appeal from an order of the Senior Subordinate Judge, Karnal, dated the 19th January, 1926.

Mr. H. C. Kumar, for Mr. J. G. Sethi, for the Appellants.

Mr. Shamair Chand, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is a miscellaneous first appeal against an order of the Senior Subordinate Judge of Karnal allowing in part an objection to an attachment in execution of a decree. The property attached was a ginning factory and the judgment-debtors were Nathu Ram and his two brothers. They are residents of Karnal and the factory is also situate in that very town. There were two decrees against them and the decree-holders being (1) the firm of Sheo Singh-Nihal Singh of Delhi, (2) the firm of Magni Ram-Ganeshi Lal of Lahore. The objection petition was filed as against one of these decree-holders only, namely, the firm of Sheo Singh-Nihal Singh of Delhi. In the suit brought by that firm an order was made on 2nd of July, 1920, for attachment of the factory before judgment and the warrant of attachment issued was duly served on Nathu Ram's two brothers but not on him. Nathu Ram, however, eventually made a compromise with the firm of Sheo Singh-Nihal Singh and a consent-decree which was ex parte against the brothers was accordingly passed on the 5th December, 1923. The decree was for Rs. 12,100 which amount was made payable by two instalments and recoverable from the property already attached before judgment by order of the Court and the judgment-debtors were not to alienate that property before satisfaction of the decree. In the other suit also attachment before judgment was ordered but the order of attachment was not duly communicated to any one of the defendants. A similar consent-decree for Rs. 6,500 was, however, passed on the 13th December, 1923, on the basis of a compromise filed by Nathu Ram and the plaintiffs of Lahore. The latter not having been impleaded as respondents in the objection petition now in question, the order made on that petition cannot affect them.

The objectors' claim was that half the factory was sold to them by Nathu Ram for Rs. 19,000, on the 15th January, 1924. The learned Senior Subordinate Judge had found that the objectors paid, as a matter of fact, Rs. 15,000 only and ordered that they had a valid charge on half the factory to the extent of Rs. 15,000. The objectors appeal.

Mr. Shamair Chand who appears on behalf of the decree-holders of Delhi raised three preliminary objections. The first is that the appeal does not lie as the objectors were no parties to the suit in which the decree was passed. To this, the reply of the appellants' Counsel is, that the objectors being the transferees of the rights of the judgment-debtors were their representatives and were as such competent to appeal under s. 47 of the Code of Civil Procedure as held in Ishar Das v. Parma Nand (1). Mr. Shamair Chand in view of that ruling withdrew this objection.

His second objection is that the decree-holders of Lahore who were no parties to the objection case could not be impleaded as respondents in the appeal. The appellants' Counsel has nothing to say against this objection and this must prevail.

His third objection is that the appeal was barred by limitation inasmuch as a copy of the order of the Court below on a preliminary issue was not filed along with the copy of the final order and that when it was filed the period of limitation had expired. He relies upon Abdullah v. Behari Lal (2) and Bhiwani Cotton Spinning & Weaving Mill Co., Ltd. v. Firm Bishen Sahai-Bhagwan Das (3). There can be no doubt that the copy of the order on the preliminary issue as well as that of the final order should both have been filed along with the memorandum of appeal but in the circumstances of the present case when the preliminary order was not contested it will be but fair to condone the delay and I accordingly extend the time under s. 5 of the Limitation Act.

But the objectors' appeal must fail on the merits. The question whether they paid Rs. 19,000 or Rs. 15,000 only was decided on the testimony of Lala Ram Chandra, Pleader, who was the mortgagee of half of the factory, and had obtained a decree to recover his mortgage-money by sale of the property. He realised his money and gave a receipt to the objectors (purchasers) for Rs. 18,100 on the 5th February, 1924. His evidence, however, was that this sum included (1) Rs. 1,500 and (2) Rs. 1,000, which he had previously received from the mortgagors themselves on the 20th November, 1923, and 17th November, 1922, respectively and (3) Rs. 593-13-0 which he had remitted in favour of the mortgagors. The learned Senior Subordinate Judge has expressed in respect of this witness the opinion that he is a gentleman of probity and he has believed his evidence on this point. There appears to me no adequate reason for discrediting his testimony and I, therefore, consider that the finding of the Court below that Rs. 15,000 only was paid by the objectors to this witness is correct.

The next point is whether the decree created a valid charge on the factory to the extent of the amount decreed. That the decree does create a charge on the property that was attached before judgment is clear from the decree itself. Whether the attachment was valid or not is of no consequence because of the phrase 'the property that was attached' was used in the decree only to describe that property. Further as the judgment debtors are bound by that decree so are the objectors, who stand in their shoes and are their representatives.

Lastly, it was urged that the compromise requires registration, but it did not, because its terms were embodied in the decree and it is the decree that is to be enforced.

The appeal fails and I dismiss it with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Mr. Ko Ko, for the Appellants.

Mr. Loo Ni, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff-respondents, Maung Tok Pyu and Ma Me Ma, are the grandchildren of one U Kadoot, deceased by his first wife Ma Gya U. Their parents are dead. Ma Gya U died many years ago and U Kadoot then married one Ma Su. By Ma Su he had three children and he died about 25 years before the present suit was brought. The respondents filed a suit for partition of his estate. They joined as defendants, Ma Su and her children or grandchildren and others who are or have been in possession of the estate property. The suit was contested by Maung Po Sein a son of Ma Su and by other defendants. The trial Court gave the plaintiffs a decree and Ma Su, Maung Po Sein and the present two appellants appealed to the District Court but were unsuccessful. The original defendants who are descendants of Ma Su have not appealed in this Court this appeal having been filed by Maung Shwe An and Ma Zin, who are in possession of a major part of the property, a piece of paddy land. The main objection taken to the suit in the lower Courts was that the suit was barred by limitation. Both the lower Courts have found in favour of the plaintiffs on this point, but, unfortunately, neither Court seems to have appreciated fully what the Law of Limitation on the point is.

It was held in the case of Maung Po Kin v. Maung Shwe Bya (1), that the appropriate article for suits instituted by co-heirs for a share in the corpus of an inheritance was Art. 123 of the Limitation Act. This was based on a previous decision by their Lordships of the Privy Council in the case of Maung Tun Tha v. Ma Thit (2), and the ruling has been followed in the case of Ma Tok v. Ma Yin (3). It may therefore, be taken as settled law that ordinarily such a suit as the present is governed by the provisions of Art. 123 of the Limitation Act.

As pointed out by Lentaigne, J., in Maung Po Kin's case (1), however, there is an exception in a case where the co-heirs including the plaintiff claiming a share have gone into possession and the plaintiff is subsequently ousted and refused his share. Similarly, if the heirs agreed amongst themselves that one of the heirs should hold the whole estate on behalf of them all, they might then sue for a distribution of the estate and claim that the provisions of Art. 142 or Art. 144 of the Limitation Act applied. But, unless it can be shown that whoever holds the property is holding it with the consent, express or implied of all the heirs on behalf of them all then the Article applicable is Art. 123. The Courts below have found that the defendants did not establish the 12 years' adverse possession of the land; but they assumed that the Article applicable was Art. 144. If Art. 123 is applicable then it is quite clear that the suit has long been barred by limitation. The question for decision, therefore, is whether after the death of U Kadoot the land has been held by Ma Su or anyone else jointly on behalf of all the heirs recognising their claims as heirs. The descendants of Kadoot by his former wife undoubtedly had a right to claim partition as heirs of U Kadoot against Ma Su and the surviving children by her on U Kadoot's death.

[His Lordship then discussed the evidence and held that Art. 123 applied to the facts of the case and that the suit was barred].

"Gold manufactured or unmanufactured," whether includes sweepings from goldsmith's shop—Punjab Courts Act (VI of 1918), s. 44—Error of law—Revision—Interference.

Sweepings and gatherings from a goldsmith's shop from which gold is separated do not come within Sch. II, cl. (a) of the Railways Act [p. 830, col. 1.]

A mere error of law is no ground for revision. [ibid.]

Petition for revision of the decree of the Senior Subordinate Judge, Gujrat, dated the 19th February, 1927, reversing that of the Subordinate Judge, Fourth Class, Gujrat, dated the 22nd December, 1926.

Mr. Azim Ullah, for the Petitioners.

Mr. C. H. Carden Nood, Government Advocate, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiffs consigned three bags of niara at Ludhiana for Gujrat. Two bags were duly delivered, the third is alleged to be lost through the negligence of the defendant, the North Western Railway. The plaintiffs claimed the price of the bag. The only plea of the Railway that need concern us in this revision is the question whether niara comes within the excepted articles given in Sch. II, cl. (a) of the Railways Act. If it does then the plaintiffs' suit must fail as held by the learned Senior Subordinate Judge in appeal. If it does not the plaintiffs' claim succeeds as held by the learned trial Court originally. Niara has been stated by both Courts to be sweepings and gatherings from a goldsmith's shop from which gold is separated by Niaras who make a profession of this kind of thing. There can be no doubt that niara ordinarily contains some gold mixed with a good deal of rubbish such as dust etc. The question is whether it can be said to be gold manufactured or unmanufactured. The rulings cited by the learned Senior Subordinate Judge have admittedly no bearing on the point. Firm Kidar Nath Rajnarain v. East Indian Ry. Co. (1), Saminadha Mudali v. South Indian Ry. Co. (2) and Lakhmidas Hirachand v. Great Indian Peninsula Ry. Co. (3) have been cited before me to show that whether niara is or is not gold etc. depends on the proportionate value of the gold and silver in it. The argument is that as all the rest of the rubbish is of no value and only value of the niara is due to the presence of the gold and silver in it the mere fact that gold and silver is mixed with a lot of rubbish does not mean that the article ceases to be gold and silver. The form of s. 75 of the Railways Act is also referred to in this connection. East Indian Ry. Co. v. Changa Khan (4) is cited by way of preliminary objection that the finding is a finding of fact and, therefore, is not open to revision.

I have given much thought to the matter which does not seem to me to be free from difficulty. One way of looking at it is that the mere concealment or placing of pieces of gold and silver in a mass of rubbish does not take the complete parcel out of the provisions of s. 75. The other way of looking at it is that when a mass of material is collected which may contain some gold and silver which could only be extracted by an elaborate process whether physical or chemical it can hardly be said that the complete parcel is gold and silver. As regards the preliminary objection as to whether this is a question of fact or not, no doubt if the proper test is applied then the mere fact that the Court errs in applying the proper test would not make the point a question of law or a ground of revision but the difficulty comes in deciding whether the Court has or has not applied the proper test. It is not very clear what test the learned Senior Subordinate Judge applied but as far as can be made out, he seems to have accepted the first view that I have put forward. Each case, however, has to be judged on its own circumstances and on the whole I am of opinion that niara does not come within the meaning of Sch. II, cl. (a). At the same time at best this could only be held to be an error of law on the part of the learned Senior Subordinate Judge and I do not see that I can interfere in revision on this ground. I, therefore, dismiss the revision but I make no order as to costs which parties will bear themselves throughout.

Provincial Small Cause Courts Act (IX of 1887), s. 17—Setting aside ex parte decree without deposit or security, legality of—Dismissal of suit on date on which case is not fixed for hearing, legality of.

The provisions of s. 17 of the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act are imperative and it is not competent to a Court to set aside an ex parte decree in a Small Cause suit if the defendant fails either to deposit the amount under the decree or give security for its due performance.

An order dismissing a suit for non-appearance of the plaintiff on a date to which the case was not posted for hearing is ultra vires and illegal.

Petition for revision of the order of the Subordinate Judge, First Class, Ohunian, District Lahore, dated the 10th May, 1926.

Mr. Harcharan Das Kumar, for the Petitioners.

Mr. Asghar Beg, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The facts that need be stated in connection with this application in revision are briefly as below:—

The plaintiff-petitioner having obtained an ex parte decree the defendant applied to have the decree set aside but he did not deposit with the application the amount due from him under the decree, nor gave security for the performance of the decree as he was bound to do under s. 17 of the Small Cause Courts Act, the suit having been decided by a Judge of the Court of Small Causes. The Judge, however, did not notice this omission and issued a notice to the plaintiff. A copy of the notice was affixed on his door on the 11th March, 1926, when he was absent from home but his wife was at home. He did not turn up and eventually the application was accepted and the ex parte decree was set aside and at the same time the suit was dismissed because the plaintiff had not appeared. It is clear that the order dismissing the suit was ultra vires as the date on which it was dismissed was not the date fixed for hearing it. Secondly, the proceedings on the application for setting aside the ex parte decree were also ultra vires because the defendant-applicant had not complied with the provisions of s. 17 of the Small Cause Courts Act.

I, therefore, accept this application for revision and set aside both the orders and restore the original order granting the plaintiff and ex parte decree. No order as to costs in this Court.

Messrs. A. P. Sen, M. H. Qidwai and S. C. Das, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is a plaintiffs' appeal against a decree of the Subordinate Judge of Kheri, dated 28th February, 1927, dismissing the plaintiffs' suit. The facts of the suit out of which this appeal arises are comparatively simple. The plaintiffs together with their deceased brother Janki Prasad, to whose property they have succeeded by survivorship, were originally the owners of a 10-biswas share in the village of Pasgawan together with 19·12 acres of under-proprietary land. They had borrowed money on security of their landed property. Amongst other liabilities there were two liabilities to a certain Musammat Bilasa Kalwarin of Tarwar. They had executed in her favour on the 29th June, 1914, a registered deed of mortgage by conditional sale of the whole of this share of 10-biswas and the whole of 19·12 acres of under-proprietary land in consideration of Rs. 6,000. That deed bore interest. On the 6th January, 1917, they borrowed a further sum of Rs. 300 from the same mortgagee on interest, and executed a deed of further charge for which the same property stood security. In the year 1918, the present plaintiffs (Janki Prasad having died) entered into a transaction under which they were to clear off their liabilities and receive a substantial amount in cash by selling half the property in question. They entered into this transaction with Lallu Ram, the father of the defendants-respondents. On the 22nd February, 1918, a registered deed of sale was executed, by which they transferred to Lallu Ram a share of 5 biswas, and half of the 19·12 acres of under-proprietary land in lieu of the following consideration. Lallu Ram agreed, that he would satisfy the deed of mortgage by conditional sale registered on the 7th July, 1914, and the deed of further charge registered on the 8th of January, 1917, which were held by Musammat Bilasa. In his deed it was calculated that the amount due in respect of these two liabilities was on the date of the execution of the deed Rs. 7,685-6. It is clear to us upon our construction of the deed that it was not intended simply to write off Rs. 7,685-6 in respect of this portion of the transaction, but that Lallu Ram agreed that he would satisfy the amount due on these two deeds. If he paid up the money at once, Rs. 7,685-6 alone were due, but if he delayed in the payment of the amount necessary to discharge these liabilities they increased daily by the addition of interest. This is the first liability which Lallu Ram undertook—the liability to satisfy the deeds in favour of Musammat Bilasa and to clear the whole of the 10-biswas share and 19·12 acres of under-proprietary land which were encumbered by these deeds. It is to be noted at the beginning, that neither Lallu Ram, nor his sons after his death ever carried out the undertaking to satisfy those claims. There was further an amount due to Jagdamba Prasad of Rs. 1,515-10 upon a deed of the 12th of August, 1915, and an amount due to Kirpa Dayal of Rs. 472 on a deed of the 12th July, 1926. Lallu Ram undertook to satisfy those amounts. He did so satisfy them and cleared off the liability in respect of those deeds. In addition Lallu Ram paid the vendor Rs 500 before the date of registration. Rs. 7,827 were paid by him at the time of registration. Lallu Ram agreed to pay Rs. 2,000 to the vendors after registration. It is admitted that he paid that amount. Thus in actual payment of cash and in paying off Jagdamba Prasad and Kirpa Dayal Lallu Ram expended Rs. 12,314-10. He should have paid Rs. 7,685-6 as soon as the deed was executed to Musammât Bilasa, but he did not do so. If he had paid that Rs. 7,685-6 to Musammât Bilasa on the day that the deed was registered he would have expended Rs. 20,000 in all, which was the price fixed for the sale of the 5 biswas share and half the 19-12 acres of under-proprietary land. We should note here that it was to the obvious advantage of Lallu Ram to pay off Musammât Bilasa as soon as possible, for by paying her off he not only cleared the 5 biswas share and the under-proprietary land which the vendors had retained, but the 5 biswas share and the under-proprietary land which he had purchased. For reasons which have not been explained, and which are very difficult to surmise, although he had expended a considerable amount of money in the purchase, he omitted to pay a little more than a half of what he had originally expended in order to make his title secure. He died about February 1920, having done nothing to satisfy the amounts due to Musammât Bilasa. In 1924, Musammât Bilasa instituted a suit on the deeds already mentioned for the foreclosure of the whole of the 10 biswas share and the 19-12 acres of under-proprietary land. She joined as parties both the plaintiffs-appellants as representing the original mortgagors, and the defendants-respondents as representing the vendees of the half share. She obtained on the 21st of November, 1925, a final decree for foreclosure. This decree could have been satisfied by the payment of Rs. 12,611-11-5, but none of the judgment-debtors under the decree took steps towards satisfying it. The decree became final, and the whole of this property has now passed into the possession and ownership of Musammât Bilasa. The plaintiffs-appellants then filed the suit out of which this present appeal has arisen against the defendants-respondents demanding compensation from them owing to the failure to satisfy the liabilities to Musammât Bilasa which had been undertaken for good consideration by their father Lallu Ram. The defendants-respondents in their written statement asserted that the sale-deed in favour of their father contained many mis-statements and falsehoods. They stated that it was the real intention of the parties that the liability to satisfy Musammât Bilasa should remain with the vendors, that Lallu Ram had never undertaken this liability but that it had been falsely stated in his deed that he would undertake it, in order that the amount of Rs. 7,685-6 should be added fictitiously to the purchase-money so that intending pre-emptors might be defeated. The Court below has rightly held that oral evidence could not be produced to vary the terms of this written agreement and it has also rightly held that there is nothing to justify a conclusion that the sale-deed of the 22nd February, 1918, contains other than a genuine statement of what occurred at the period. These conclusions have not been contested by the learned Counsel who has represented the defendants-respondents. We thus have it that Lallu Ram actually paid Rs. 10,327 in cash to the vendors, that he paid off liabilities due from the vendors amounting to Rs. 1,987-10 and we find, on our construction of the document, that he agreed to pay off everything due to Musammât Bilasa in respect of the amounts due on the deed of mortgage by conditional sale and the deed of further charge. His undertaking in the last respect was a contract to pay these amounts. The figure of Rs. 7,685-6 set aside for the purpose was an estimate (and probably a correct estimate) of the amount that was necessary for the satisfaction of those liabilities, if the payment had been made at once. We have no hesitation in finding that Lallu Ram undertook to satisfy Musammât Bilasa and that his undertaking to satisfy Musammât Bilasa formed a portion of the consideration for which the transfer by sale was made in his favour. We can now approach the decision of the learned trial Judge. He has arrived at the conclusion that the plaintiffs-appellants are entitled to nothing. He bases this conclusion on the following reasoning. He says that the defendants-respondents' father had parted with a considerable amount of money amounting to Rs. 12,314-10 and now that the whole of the property has been foreclosed they have got nothing for that money. He considers that it will be most unjust and inequitable, if in those circumstances they have to pay anything more. He considers further that the plaintiffs-appellants were guilty of contributory negligence, because after the foreclosure decree had been passed against them and the respondents jointly they did not themselves satisfy it. We are unable to accept the reasons which appealed to the learned trial Judge. He has completely ignored the facts that Lallu Ram had contracted to pay off Musammatt Bilasa in full, and that if Lallu Ram had observed his contract, the plaintiffs-appellants would have retained the 5-biswas share and the moiety of the under-proprietary land which they had not sold free of all incumbrances. As a result of Lallu Ram's breach of contract the plaintiffs appellants have lost that property. The learned Counsel for the defendants-respondents did not attempt to support the decision of the learned trial Judge upon the reasons advanced by him. He has further admitted that Lallu Ram committed a breach of contract. He has admitted that Lallu Ram made a contract and that that contract has been broken; but he has argued upon a point, which was not previously raised, that his clients, as the sons of Lallu Ram, are not liable to pay damages in respect of the breach of the contract which their father made. We must decide against him upon that point. The promise made by Lallu Ram bound his sons when Lallu Ram died before performing it. No contrary intention appeared from the contract. The law on the subject is well-known. It is contained in India in the provisions of s. 37 of the Indian Contract Act (IX of 1872). This much is clear. Lallu Ram undertook to satisfy the claims of Musammatt Bilasa, and because he had undertaken this liability in addition to satisfying other liabilities and paying certain sums of money he obtained certain property. The defendant-respondents, as his heirs, continued to hold and enjoy that property. At the time that their father died, Musammatt Bilasa's claims could still have been settled. They remained open to settlement until the enforcement of the final foreclosure decree. The defendants-respondents are clearly liable for damages now that the contract has been finally broken by the passing of the property into the hands of Musammatt Bilasa under her decree.

The only question which remains for us now to decide is the question of damages. We are satisfied that there has been a breach of contract and that the defendants-respondents are responsible for paying damages on that breach of contract to the plaintiffs-appellants. The learned Counsel for the defendants-respondents has pointed out to us that the learned trial Judge had formed the view that the plaintiffs appellants had deliberately avoided satisfying the foreclosure decree because they had formed a sinister plan, that after the decree was passed they would put up a claimant fictitiously to recover the property by means of a pre-emption suit, and that, having at the same time recovered large damages from the defendants-respondents they would be in a better position, than if they had satisfied the foreclosure decree themselves. The learned trial Judge based this conclusion upon the evidence of a school master of Pasgawan called Bangsopal. This man calls himself a "decree-holder" in addition to being a school master. He apparently means by this that he has obtained certain under-proprietary rights in land under a Settlement Court decree. He is a neighbour of the defendants-respondents and a great friend of theirs. He pays a portion of his rent to them and is distantly connected with one of them by marriage. His statement upon the point is vague to a degree. It refers to a conversation which he alleges had taken place two years before in Pasgawan. According to the note of evidence of this conversation the defendant No. 1 told the plaintiff No. 2 to try to manage for money for the foreclosure suit. The plaintiff No. 2 said in reply that he could not get money although he tried for it. The plaintiff No. 2 also said that he would take property by means of a pre-emption suit through his relation. That is all. Although the learned trial Judge heard the evidence and we have not had that advantage, the evidence in question is so scanty and so flimsy that we are not disposed to attach the slightest value to it. The scheme which the learned trial Judge believes existed appears to us fantastic. According to this scheme the plaintiffs-appellants were in hopes of extracting large sums of money from the defendants-respondents (who on this witness's own showing could not find Rs. 12,611-11-5 with which to satisfy the foreclosure decree) and then hoped subsequently to get the property back by a fictitious pre-emption suit filed through one of their relations. If the plaintiffs-appellants had had such financial dreams it would appear to have been easier for them to exchange those dreams for the solid reality of selling in conjunction with the defendants respondents a portion of the mortgaged property in order to pay off the foreclosure decree. What appears to us to have happened was this. The plaintiffs-appellants and the defendants-respondents were alike singularly lacking in business sense and in business capacity. They have allowed a valuable property to go out of their hands owing to their inaction and incapacity. But the fact remains that the defendants-respondents were under the liability to pay off Musammam Bilasa. They were bound by a contract so to pay her off. They did not pay her off. However foolish the plaintiffs-appellants may have been, the defendants-respondents committed a breach of contract and are liable for damages. What should be these damages? Clearly by their omissions they have deprived the plaintiffs-appellants of a 5-biswas share and a certain amount of under-proprietary land. For an exactly similar share their father paid Rs. 20,000. Arguments have been addressed to us to show that as the land revenue upon the share was only Rs. 90 the property could not possibly have been worth Rs. 20,000; but those arguments have little, if any, force. The land revenue as fixed at the last Kheri Settlement was sometimes very low, and even the recorded figure of rentals is not always reliable. This much we know. Lallu Ram valued the share at Rs. 20,000. The defendants-respondents have produced no evidence worth consideration to show that it is worthless. In these circumstances we consider that the plaintiffs-appellants are entitled to Rs. 20,000. We accordingly allow this appeal and grant the plaintiffs-appellants a decree against the defendants-respondents for Rs. 20,000 with full costs of this Court and the Court below. We see no reason to allow future interest.

Miscellaneous first appeal from an order of the Senior Subordinate Judge, Rawalpindi, dated the 23rd March, 1927.

Mr. Amar Nath Chona for Sardar Mehtab Singh, S. B., for the Appellants.

Mr. Ram Lal Anand, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal under s. 47 of the Guardians and Wards Act, preferred by one Sant Singh against an order passed by the Senior Subordinate Judge, Rawalpindi, under s. 25 of the Guardians and Wards Act, directing the appellant to make over Musammam Harnam Kaur, minor, to Lal Chand respondent, who has been duly appointed guardian of the person and property of the aforesaid minor by order, dated the 15th August, 1925. The relevant facts are these:—

One Atma Singh, who was a Brahmin by caste and a garanthi by profession, died many years ago leaving him surviving a widow Musammam Harbans Kaur and a minor daughter from Musammam Harbans Kuar, named Musammam Harnam Kuar and also two sons Mohan Singh and Sohan Singh, minors, from a predeceased wife. In March, 1923, Musammam Harbans Kuar died and on the 19th of April, 1923, Lal Chand, respondent, filed an application for appointment as guardian of the person and property of Sohan Singh, Mohan Singh and Musammam Harnam Kaur. This application was resisted by Savaya Singh, Narain Singh, Kartar Singh and Harnam Singh, who described themselves as members of the panchayat of the village and who were alleged to be in possession of a portion of the property of the minors. After a lengthy enquiry the application of Lal Chand was granted on the 8th of December, 1923, and he was appointed guardian of the person and property of all the three minors.

The present application was filed in August, 1925, by Lal Chand under s. 25 stating that the minor girl was in possession of one Sant Singh, Khatri, who keeps a halwai's shop and is in no way connected with the minor. In defence Sant Singh propounded a Will purporting to have been executed by Musammât Harbans Kaur on the 24th of March, 1923, a few days before her death, whereby she appointed Sant Singh as the guardian of the person and property of her minor girl. The respondent did not admit the genuineness of this Will.

It is significant that this Will was not mentioned in the proceedings, which took place in 1923, relating to the appointment of Lal Chand as guardian, though among the witnesses, who have now appeared in support of its due execution by Musammât Harbans Kaur, are Savaya Singh, etc., who had opposed the application of Lal Chand at that time. The Will which purports to bear the thumb-impression of Musammât Harbans Kaur, was sent to Phillaur for comparison with certain other thumb-impressions alleged to have been affixed by her in her lifetime, but the report of the Expert was that the two thumb-impressions did not tally. This report, however, is not admissible in evidence as the Expert was not examined in Court or on commission and must, therefore, be left out of consideration. The oral evidence of the scribe and the witnesses who stated that Musammât Harbans Kaur had affixed her thumb-impression on the document in their presence, is interested and has been rightly rejected by the learned Subordinate Judge. There is no doubt that the members of the so-called panchayat having failed in their attempt to oppose Lal Chand's application for appointment as guardian, have in collusion with Sant Singh subsequently prepared the Will with a view to retain the girl in their possession. I agree with the lower Court in holding that the appellant has failed to prove the Will as having been executed by Musammât Harbans Kaur.

Mr. Amar Nath Chona for the appellants concedes that even if this Will were genuine, Sant Singh would not be a testamentary guardian of Musammât Harnam Kaur, as under Hindu Law the mother has got no power to appoint a guardian of her children by means of a Will. The appointment of the respondent as guardian was, therefore, not contrary to s. 7 of the Act.

Mr. Chona contends that the appointment of Lal Chand was improper and was made without proper enquiry. Lal Chand was, however, appointed guardian as far back as December, 1923, and no appeal against that order was lodged. Nor has Sant Singh or any other person taken any steps to have Lal Chand removed from his office as guardian under s. 39. I cannot, therefore, re-open that matter in these proceedings.

The sole point before me is whether any valid reason has been shown by Sant Singh against the order of the lower Court directing him to make over the girl to the duly appointed guardian, Lal Chand. Mr. Chona is unable to suggest any such reason and I see no reason why the ordinary rule should not be followed in this case and the minor allowed to remain with an irresponsible stranger like Sant Singh.

The appeal is devoid of all force and I dismiss it with costs.

JUDGMENT.

Das, J.—These analogous appeals arise out of certain rent suits. Second Appeal No. 398 of 1925, Second Appeal No. 421 of 1925 and Second Appeal No. 454 of 1925 are on behalf of the tenants: Second Appeal No. 420 of 1925, Second Appeal No. 460 of 1925 and Second Appeal No. 461 of 1925 are on behalf of the landlords. In my opinion the appeals on behalf of the tenants must succeed.

The plaintiffs are co-sharer-landlords; the other co-sharer-landlords have not been made parties to these suits either as plaintiffs or as defendants. It is not alleged in the plaint that there was a contract, express or implied, by which the tenants undertook to pay the plaintiff his share of the rent separately. It has been held that in the absence of such a contract a co-sharer is not entitled to maintain a suit for his share of rent unless he makes the co-sharer-landlords parties to the suit. The learned Judges in the Court below have taken the view that as Ram Das Singh, one of the co-sharer-landlords, who is also a tenant, made up his mind to keep his collection separate, the plaintiff was entitled to maintain a suit for his share of the rent. But this is an erroneous view. It was necessary for the plaintiff to establish that the tenants agreed to pay rent separately to the co-sharer-landlords.

I would allow Appeals Nos. 398, 421 and 454 of 1925, and dismiss the rent suits with costs in all the Courts. It follows that Appeals Nos. 420, 460 and 461 of 1925 must be dismissed with costs. There will be three sets of costs payable to each set of tenants.

Wort, J.—I agree.

RESPONDENT.

Bengal Tenancy Act (VIII of 1885), s. 105 (1)—Application for settlement of fair rent—Impleading of parties after two months from date of publication of Record of Rights, legality of—Application against some of co-tenants—Remand for impleading all, propriety of.

It is not necessary for the landlord or the tenant in making an application under s. 105 (1) of the Bengal Tenancy Act to name any person. It is only necessary to indicate the holdings in the record in respect of which a settlement of fair and equitable rent is sought. An application under the section which is filed within two months of the final publication of the Record of Rights is not, therefore, barred even though a person interested in the tenancy is added only after the expiry of two months. [p. 837, col. 1.]

Birendra Kishore Manikyā Bahadur v. Ambika Charan Dutta Mazumdar (1), followed.

But where a landlord fights out the matter in the presence of one only of several co-tenants and his application is ultimately dismissed on the ground that such an application must be brought against all the joint tenants, it is not right to remand the case in order that the other joint tenants may also be impleaded as parties. [p. 837, col. 2.]

The heirs of a deceased recorded tenant can be impleaded as parties to such an application even after the expiry of two months from the date of the final publication of the Record of Rights. [ibid.]

JUDGMENT.

Rankin, C. J.—These are three appeals from a decision of the District Judge of Nadia sitting as a Special Judge affirming a decision of the Assistant Settlement Officer of Krishnagar.

In each of these cases the landlord-appellant made an application to the Settlement Officer for a settlement of fair and equitable rent. The application appears to be in a printed form and it is somewhat difficult to make sure of the nature and exact scope of the claim intended to be conveyed by it. The body of the document appears to raise every possible claim including questions of excess area of lands. However, taking the document as a whole, we are not satisfied that the only matter dealt with by that application is settlement of rent within the meaning of those words in s. 109-A and we are not prepared to say that in these cases there is no right of second appeal. Accordingly it becomes necessary to examine into the particular facts.

In S. A. No. 1159 it appears that an application was made within two months of the final publication of the Record of Rights. It would seem that the Record of Rights recorded the tenancy in the name of a lady Bhussani. The Record of Rights was finally published in November, 1922. On the 14th of April, 1923, the defendant Doshi Ghosain was added as a party. It then turned out that while she was added as being the heiress of Bhussani she was not the heiress of but a purchaser from Bhussani. In these circumstances she set up a defence to say that she purchased a jama bearing a rental of Rs. 9-12-9 pies. The learned Special Judge said that it was unnecessary to decide the question of fact whether the land appertained to the jama of Rs. 9-12-9 pies. The Assistant Settlement Officer having found the point in favour of the defendants and the landlord being desirous of contesting it before the Court the learned Special Judge proceeded upon the footing that as Doshi Ghosain was brought on the record on the 14th of April, 1923, the proceedings against her were out of time because she was not impleaded until after two months from the final publication of the Record of Rights. It does not seem to me that that view is consistent with the decision of this Court in the case of Birendra Kishore Manikya Bahadur v. Ambika Charan Dutta Mazumdar (1). There three Judges of this Court laid it down that when s. 105 (1) of the Bengal Tenancy Act speaks of an application it is not necessary for the landlord or the tenant in making the application to name any person. It is only necessary to indicate the holdings in the record in respect of which a settlement of fair and equitable rent is sought. Accordingly there was a perfectly good application in this matter brought within the two months and, on the doctrine of that case, it appears to me that this matter ought to go back to the learned Special Judge, the preliminary objection as to time being overruled, in order that he may decide the case upon its merits. The appellant is entitled to her costs of this appeal.

The next Appeal is No. 1161 and in this case it seems that the original defendant or tenant recorded in the Record of Rights was Danej Mia. One Jogendra Nath Ghosal was brought on the record by a petition filed after two months from the date of the final publication, namely, on the 16th of April, 1923. It turned out that Danej Mia's interest had been sold at auction, the sale certificate being in May, 1922, and possession is said to have been taken in April, 1923. In this case, however, it appears that although Jogendra Nath Ghosal's name had been substituted for Danej Mia on the application of the plaintiff, Jogendra was only one of several persons interested in the tenancy. Now, the matter was fought out to a finish in his presence and ultimately the application was dismissed on the ground that such an application must be brought against all the joint tenants. It does not seem to me to be right that in these circumstances this matter should be sent back in order that the other joint tenants should be impleaded. If the landlord went on against one only, then his advantage such as it is in being able to proceed under s. 105 must come to an end. She must be left to take such steps by way of suits in Civil Courts as she may be advised. In these circumstances, I think, this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

As regards Appeal No. 1160 there it appears that the recorded tenant was one Nagendra Nath Mukerjee but that by the time the final publication took place in November, 1922, this man was dead for about two years. Then an application was made on the 18th of July, 1923, to bring the present defendant on the record and that was refused because it was more than two months from the date of the final publication. The case seems to me to be governed by the decision of the case of Birendra Kishore Manikya Bahadur v. Ambika Charan Dutta Mazumdar (1) to which I have already referred. As regards this matter I think the appeal should be allowed, the decree of the lower Appellate Court should be set aside and the case should be sent back to the Assistant Settlement Officer to proceed with the application against the proper parties. The appellant is entitled to her costs of this appeal.

We assess the hearing fee in each case at one gold mohur.

Mitter, J.—I agree.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. I, r. 3, O. XXXIV, r. 1—Mortgage suit—Person claiming paramount title already party in another capacity—Question of title bound up with other questions—Adjudication of title, legality of—Amendment.

To a mortgage suit a person claiming an adverse or paramount title is not ordinarily a necessary or proper party; but this rule is not absolute or inflexible, and in certain circumstances, it may not only be proper, but even desirable to implead him as a party. [p. 840, col. 1.]

[Case-law considered.]

The object of O. XXXIV, r. 1, Civil Procedure Code is to define the scope of a mortgage suit as such, that is of a mortgage suit pure and simple but this rule is not directed to the question whether any cause of action may or may not be joined to a claim on a mortgage, and, if it may be joined, in what circumstances. [ibid.]

Where in a suit to enforce an equitable mortgage by one defendant by deposit of title-deeds standing in the name of another defendant, it was alleged that the deposit was made on behalf of both, but that other person denied such right and authority to deposit, and the plaintiff thereupon applied to amend the plaint so as to include the allegation that the properties belonged to the defendant who deposited the title-deeds and were purchased by him benami in the name of the other defendant:

Held, that, inasmuch as the alleged benamidar had already been impleaded as a party to the suit, and since the question of ownership as a question of fact was bound up with the other questions in the case, the issue relating to the title of the alleged benamidar should be allowed to be raised and the amendment prayed for permitted. [p. 840, col. 2.]

Application by the plaintiff to amend the plaint.

Messrs. D. Adinarayana, N. Babu Rao and K. Krishna Swami Ayyangar, for the Defendants.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application made by the plaintiff for permission to amend his plaint. The amendment proposed affects the 3rd defendant who opposes the application. The question I have to decide is, can the proposed amendment be allowed?

I shall refer to such allegations in the plaint as are relevant to the present purpose. The suit is brought to enforce an equitable mortgage created by the 1st defendant by his depositing certain title-deeds. There were dealings between the plaintiffs' firm and the 1st defendant's firm and in the course of those dealings the latter executed promissory notes in favour of the former. About the month of December, 1925, there was a sum of a little over Rs. 12,000 due to the plaintiffs and it is alleged that the 1st defendant then deposited with them title-deeds of properties mentioned in Schs. B, C and D to the plaintiff with a view to create an equitable mortgage over them. Although the deeds were deposited by the 1st defendant it is alleged that he represented that he was making the deposit both on his own behalf and on behalf of the 3rd defendant who was described as his adoptive mother. The properties mentioned in Sch. B stood in the name of the 3rd defendant and the plaintiff alleges that the 1st defendant represented at the time that he was duly authorised by the 3rd defendant to deposit the title-deeds of those properties. There is a further allegation in the plaint that the 3rd defendant is bound in respect of the last mentioned properties for the additional reason that she allowed the 1st defendant to be in possession of the title-deeds relating to them and is, therefore, estopped from disputing the plaintiffs' right thereto.

The first point to note is, that the plaintiffs seek to enforce the mortgage both against the 1st and the 3rd defendants. Although in this respect the plaint is lacking in clearness, there can be no reasonable doubt, on a reading of the whole plaint, that this is what is intended. In para. 9 it is stated that the 1st defendant agreed that when called upon, he and the 3rd defendant would execute a deed of mortgage in due form and get it registered. It is then alleged that the plaintiffs got prepared a draft deed of mortgage but that neither did the 1st defendant nor the 3rd execute it in spite of demands. Then again the first prayer in the plaint is that a mortgage-decree may be passed against both the 1st and the 3rd defendants. The suit must be, therefore, regarded as one to enforce a mortgage against both the 1st and the 3rd defendants alike.

The 3rd defendant has filed a written statement denying

(a) that the 1st defendant is her adopted son;

(b) that she authorised the mortgage;

(c) that she empowered the 1st defendant to make the deposit of the title-deeds of the properties in Sch. B; or

(d) that she is estopped by her conduct from questioning the plaintiffs' right to the last mentioned properties.

On these pleadings issues were raised on the 19th of July and the Judge's summons for the amendment in question was taken out on the 19th of August. The plaintiffs seek to amend the plaint by alleging that, as a matter of fact, the properties in Sch. B belong to the 1st defendant by whom they were acquired benami in the name of the 3rd defendant; in other words, the plaintiffs desire to raise the question of ownership in regard to these properties. The 3rd defendant's objection is that her paramount title cannot be litigated in the plaintiffs' mortgage suit and that as the object of the amendment is to obtain a decision on this adverse right, the same ought not to be allowed.

The question I have to decide is, therefore, one of law; can the title of a person claiming adverse to the mortgagor and the mortgagee, be adjudicated on in a mortgage suit?

In Bhuban Mohan Ghose v. Co-operative Hindustan Bank Ltd. (1), which was a suit on a mortgage, those that were impleaded as defendants were the mortgagors as well as a lady by name Susila, the wife of one of them. She was made a defendant on the ground that she was the benamidar in respect of the premises mortgaged, the true owner being her husband. The point was raised whether she was a proper party and whether her adverse claim could be investigated in the mortgage suit. The Court held that she was not only a proper party, but, in the circumstances, it was desirable that there should be an adjudication in regard to her title in the suit itself. Sanderson, C. J., expresses the opinion that the question is one of misjoinder and inconvenience and not one of jurisdiction and that at the most the joinder is an irregularity. Rankin, J., who discusses the point at some length points out that mortgage suits with reference to multifariousness do not stand on a footing different from other classes of suits and holds that there is nothing to prevent a question of this kind being litigated in the mortgage action itself. The learned Judge traces the history of the English and Indian procedure and shows that the course objected to is not opposed to the present law on the point as contained in O. I, r. 3, of Civil Procedure Code.

The same question in a somewhat different form arose in Zakir Raza v. Madhusudan Dass (2). The property was mortgaged, inter alia, by the mother of the 2nd defendant. She died before the suit and the 2nd defendant was impleaded as a party as being one of her heirs who inherited the property. He pleaded that he was entitled to the mortgage property by reason of a deed of gift executed in his favour by his mother long prior to the mortgage-deed. An issue was raised in regard to his title based upon the gift and the trial Court decided the same against the 2nd defendant and in the appeal to the High Court it was urged at a late stage that it was improper to raise an issue as regards title in such a suit and that an ordinary mortgage-decree should have been passed without determining the question of ownership. This contention was overruled. Sir Dawson Miller, C. J., observes that to grant a decree without deciding the matter raised would be to encourage fresh litigation. Jwala Prasad, J., points out that although the general principle is that questions relating to titles paramount should, as far as possible, be excluded from the trial of a mortgage suit, this was not an absolute or inflexible rule to be applied without regard to circumstances. The learned Judge adds

"Where the leaving of such an issue undetermined would lead to inconvenience or hardship, it is proper that it should be tried in a mortgage suit."

In In re Obalampalli Ramalakshman (3), Sadasiva Aiyar, J., holds that there is no prohibition in the Code against impleading as a defendant in a mortgage suit a party who sets up a paramount or adverse title.

Jaggaswar Dutt v. Bhuban Mohan Mitra (4) is generally treated as the leading case on the point. The main judgment is that of Mukerjee, J., who himself points out in a later case that the rule against joinder which he adopted in the earlier one is not inflexible. See Gokul Chandra Roy v. Rasheswari Chowdhurani (5).

(4) 33 C. 425; 3 C. L. J. 205.

(5) 11 Ind. Cas. 826; 14 C. L. J. 108.

The observation of the Judicial Committee in Radha Kunwar v. Reoti Singh (6) does not militate against the view that has been taken in the decisions I have cited. In that case a person who set up an adverse claim was made a party to a mortgage suit and in the course of the judgment there is an obiter dictum that such joinder is irregular and tends to confusion. Generally, it is undoubtedly so; but the question remains, are there circumstances in which such a joinder is proper or even desirable?

I may also refer to Yennamani Ramanna v. Masunari Venkatanarayana (7) where Devadoss, J., while dealing with a question of res judicata notices some of the rulings on the point.

What is the result of the authorities? To a mortgage suit a person claiming an adverse or paramount title is not ordinarily a necessary or proper party; this rule is not absolute or inflexible, for, in certain circumstances, it may not only be proper but even desirable to implead him as a party. Is O. XXXIV, r. 1, Civil Procedure Code, inconsistent with this conclusion. It says:

"Subject to the provisions of this Code, all persons having an interest either in the mortgage-security or in the right of redemption shall be joined as parties to any suit relating to the mortgage."

As Rankin, J., points out in Bhuban Ghose v. Co-operative Hindustan Bank Ltd. (1) to which I have already referred, the object of this rule is to define the scope of a mortgage suit as such, that is of a mortgage suit pure and simple but this rule is not directed to the question whether any cause of action may or may not be joined to a claim on a mortgage, and, if it may be joined, in what circumstances.

Let me now examine the facts of this case to ascertain whether it will be convenient or desirable to raise an issue regarding the title of the 3rd defendant. Both the 1st and the 3rd defendants distinctly allege that the property belongs not to the former but to the latter. The form in which the question generally arises is, is the party setting up an adverse or paramount title a necessary or proper party? It is important to note that in the present case the question does not arise in that form. The 3rd defendant has been made a party on grounds which are independent of, adverse or paramount, title. The form in which this question, therefore, arises is, whether, she being already on the record as a necessary party, the issue relating to title should be permitted to be raised or not. There is an issue raised in the case, namely, did the 3rd defendant authorise the mortgage? There is a further issue to the effect, was her conduct such as to have misled the plaintiff into believing that the 1st defendant was the owner? In deciding these questions as questions of fact, the Court, while weighing the evidence, will, in all probability, be obliged to treat the fact of the 3rd defendant being or not being the owner, as an important element, rendering the case of either party either probable or improbable. Why should then this question be left over to be decided in another suit? The mere opinion of the Court as such will not be binding upon the 3rd defendant, but if the issue is raised and tried the Court's decision will be binding. It is certainly not desirable that the Court should express an opinion in this case which may happen to be opposed to its decision in the next. The question of ownership as a question of fact is bound up with the other questions that necessarily arise in the case and it seems to me that this is a strong reason for holding that the issue should be tried and decided in this action itself.

Moreover, the 3rd defendant is already before the Court in another character. Supposing the Court holds that she authorised the mortgage, or, by reason of the rule of estoppel, she is bound by the mortgage and passes a mortgage-decree against her, of what practical use is this decree to the plaintiff if it turns out that she is not the owner? Supposing again the Court holds that the 3rd defendant is not bound by the mortgage on the grounds taken and the question of her title is left open, is not the result very unsatisfactory seeing that at the sale a proper price will not be obtained and the purchaser himself may get no title? There is another important consideration; whether the 3rd defendant having been rightly made a party she is bound to assert her title in this case at the risk of the question becoming res judicata, is a matter of some doubt. See Yennamani Rammanna v. Masunari Venkatanarayana (7) already referred to and the Letters Patent Appeal therefrom, In re Musumuri Venkatanarayana (8).

Having regard to these various circumstances, I am clearly of opinion that the issue must be raised and tried in this case. As the point was not originally taken in the plaint, I direct, while allowing the amendment, that the applicant shall pay the 3rd defendant her costs which I fix at Rs. 150. The 3rd defendant's Vakil says that he intends to raise a point of jurisdiction if the amendment is allowed. He will have liberty to file a fresh written statement and he may take this point. Plaint shall be amended within one week, the 1st, the 3rd and the 4th defendants shall file their further written statements within two weeks, and the case shall be posted for further issues one week thereafter.

Where both sides proceeded in the trial Court to rely on the evidence of witnesses taken before the Court as well as before a Commissioner, it is not open to the Appellate Court to discard the evidence taken before the Commissioner on the ground that the Commissioner's report does not strictly comply with the requirements of O. XXVI, r. 10 of the Civil Procedure Code. [p. 842, col. 1.]

JUDGMENT.

Mitter, J.—This is an appeal from a judgment and decree of the Subordinate Judge of Murshidabad, dated the 9th of January, 1925, which reversed a judgment and decree of the Munsif of Berhampur, dated the 30th April, 1923.

The appeal arises out of a suit commenced by the plaintiff for rent for the last kist of 1325 and for the years 1326 to 1328 B. S. in respect of a tenure which was held by the defendant respondent under the plaintiff-appellant. Defendant's plea was that he was dispossessed from a portion of the land which he purchased at a rent sale in February, 1920, and which he got possession in May, 1920. His case is that after he had purchased the disputed tenure at a sale held at the instance of the plaintiff he was dispossessed from plots Nos. 1 and 5 of the sale certificate in June 1921. The rent was a consolidated rent.

A local investigation was directed at the instance of the defendant for the purpose of determining as to whether the land from which he alleged he had been dispossessed by the landlord was really covered by the sale certificate. The local investigation proceeded to some extent. Evidence of certain witnesses was recorded on both sides. The costs payable to the Commissioner fell short and the defendant was directed to pay the balance of the costs of the Commissioner in order to enable him to complete his report. The defendant failed to pay that sum. The Munsif then directed the Commissioner to return all the papers. Subsequently at the instance of the plaintiff the Commissioner completed the map of the lands measured by him for which he was paid by the plaintiff and he submitted a letter forwarding the map and the evidence to the Munsif.

Upon the result of the local investigation such as it was and upon the other evidence in the case the Munsif came to the conclusion that the defendant had failed to establish his defence, and he granted a modified decree to the plaintiff for the amounts claimed for the years 1326 to 1328 B. S. with damages thereon at 25 per cent. and proportionate costs.

An appeal was taken by the defendant to the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Murshidabad and the learned Subordinate Judge discarded the report of the Commissioner such as it was and the evidence which was taken before him and after discarding the evidence which was taken by the Commissioner he proceeded to deal with the appeal on the other evidence in the case and came to the conclusion that the defendant had been dispossessed from plots Nos. 1 and 5 of the plaint, and, as it was a tenancy in which the rent was a lump rent, he held that the entire rent should be suspended. He accordingly allowed the appeal and dismissed the suit of the plaintiff.

A second appeal has been taken to this Court by the plaintiff No. 1 and it is contended on his behalf that the lower Appellate Court was clearly in error in discarding the proceedings before the Commissioner and the evidence taken before him as the lower Appellate Court seems erroneously to think that there was no report of the Commissioner. We have looked into the report and we find that there was a letter which was filed along with the map and the evidence taken before the Commissioner. As to whether there was a report as is required strictly under O. XXVI, r. 10 of the Code of Civil Procedure it appears that in this case both sides proceeded in the trial Court to rely on the evidence of witnesses taken before the Commissioner. As will appear from some of the observations made by the Munsif in the trial before him, the defendant-respondent relied on the evidence of one Jatu Pramanik who was examined before the Commissioner as the strongest piece of evidence in his favour. Both sides having agreed to proceed not only on the evidence taken before the Munsif but before Commissioner also, it seems little hard that the plaintiff-appellant was told in the lower Appellate Court that the case should proceed after discarding the evidence that was taken before the Commissioner.

There has been a defect of procedure in the trial of the appeal before the lower Appellate Court such as calls for our interference under s. 100 of the Civil Procedure Code and I think that this defect has affected the merits of the case. The defendant raised the plea of dispossession and it was essential for him to establish the plea to defeat the plaintiff's suit for rent which was justly due to him.

In these circumstances I think that the judgment and decree of the lower Appellate Court dismissing the suit should be set aside and the case should be sent back to that Court for a re-trial of the appeal on the evidence which was taken before the Munsif and also on the evidence which was taken before the Commissioner. Costs will abide the result.

Rankin, C. J.—I agree.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 151, O. XLI, rr. 23, 25—Remand under s. 151, when permissible—Nature of remand, determination of—Order for refund of Court-fee, presumption from—Case not decided on preliminary point—Remand, legality of.

A remand is permissible under s. 151, Civil Procedure Code, but recourse should be had to this section only in very exceptional cases. [p. 843, col. 1.]

A remand cannot be construed to be one under s. 151, Civil Procedure Code, simply because the Court has failed to express that the remand is under r. 23 or r. 25 of O. XLI of the Civil Procedure Code. [ibid.]

Where a remand order is accompanied by an order for refund of Court-fee, the remand should be considered to be one under r. 23, O. XLI, Civil Procedure Code. [p. 843, col. 2.]

Where a suit has not been disposed of by the trial Court on a preliminary point but has been decreed after recording and considering the evidence produced by both the parties, a remand under O. XLI, r. 23, Civil Procedure Code, is incompetent. [ibid.]

Second appeal from the decree of the District Judge, Rawalpindi, dated the 21st February, 1927, reversing that of the Senior Sub-Judge, Rawalpindi, dated the 22nd December, 1926.

Mr. Shamair Chand, for the Appellant.

Mr. N. C. Pandit, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal by the plaintiff against an order of remand made by the District Judge of Rawalpindi on the 21st of February, 1927. The final portion of the judgment of the learned District Judge is as follows:—

“As has been remarked, the question of title and dispossession has not been properly inquired into and I am of opinion that the case should be re-heard and decided afresh on its merits. I accordingly accept the appeal and remand the case for fresh trial and decision. Stamp on appeal to be refunded. Costs to follow event.”

A preliminary objection is taken on behalf of the respondent that no appeal lies from the order mentioned above because, it is contended, that the remand is under s. 151 of the Civil Procedure Code. Admittedly no appeal lies from such an order of remand but the Counsel for the appellant contends that the remand is under O. XLI, r. 23 and admittedly an appeal lies from an order of remand under that rule. It is to be noted that the learned District Judge has not mentioned the law under which the remand has been made. This should have been done but in the absence of an express indication as to the law under which the remand had been made it becomes necessary for me to determine under what law it was made. There is no doubt that a remand is permissible under s. 151, Civil Procedure Code but it has often been laid down that a recourse should be had to s. 151 only in very exceptional cases. The question is whether when the District Judge made this remand he intended to do so under s. 151. I am unable to hold that he did. If, as contended by the Counsel for the respondent, I were to construe every remand illegally made by the lower Appellate Court to be one under s. 151 in the absence of an express mention of O. XLI, r. 23 or r. 25 the result would be that it would be impossible for this Court to interfere, in exercise of its appellate powers with the illegal orders of remand passed by the lower Appellate Court. There is an indication in the case before me as to the law under which the learned District Judge intended to make the remand. He has ordered the stamp on appeal to be refunded. This under s. 13 of the Indian Courts Fees Act could be done only in the case of a remand under O. XLI, r. 23. I hold, therefore, that the remand in this case was intended to be one under O. XLI, r. 23 and, therefore, an appeal lies to this Court.

On the merits it is quite clear that an order of remand under O. XLI, r. 23 was incompetent under the circumstances of this case. The trial Court had not disposed of the case on a preliminary point. On the other hand it had decreed the plaintiff's suit after recording and considering the evidence produced by both the parties in support of their respective cases. I accept this appeal, set aside the order of the District Judge and remand the case to him under O. XLI, r. 23 with directions to hear and decide the appeal on its merits. The lower Court may, if it considers such a course necessary, pass a proper order of remand after hearing the parties. The Court-fee paid on the memorandum of appeal in this Court shall be refunded. Other costs will abide the result.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff and defendants Nos. 6 to 8 in the first suit who are defendants Nos. 2 to 4 in the second suit were partners in a business. They fell out and the present suits were brought by the plaintiff. The first suit which we will call the money suit was for recovery of a sum of money, being one-third share of the plaintiff in certain ornaments and cash which were in the iron safe of the firm and were wrongly taken away by the defendants. Her case against the first defendant was that he, in collusion with the partners, misappropriated the ornaments and cash taken out of the iron safe. There were four more defendants the neighbouring shopkeepers who were said to have helped the other defendants in the taking out of the money and articles. The defence was that the plaintiff's brother Bama Charan was at one time acting as the Manager of the firm and he was dismissed because of his defalcations and defendant No. 1 was requested by the other partners to help them in the payment of creditors and for that purpose money was taken out of the safe and applied in the payment of the debts of the firm. As regards the ornaments, the defendants were willing to produce them in Court and to abide by the order of the Court with regard to their disposal. The Munsif who tried the case found that the defendants' version of the story was true and the suit for money was dismissed and it was decreed in respect of the one-third share of the plaintiff in the ornaments. The lower Appellate Court upheld the decree of the trial Court and hence this appeal by the plaintiff. At the hearing the suit was withdrawn as against defendants Nos. 6 to 8 (partners) who were dismissed from the suit. On the findings of the trial Court which were endorsed by the lower Appellate Court we do not think that there is any question in this case which entitles us to interfere with the decree. The finding is that defendant No. 1 who is a highly respectable man under the authority of the other partners took out the money and paid the debts of the firm with great advantage to the firm, the debts being paid off at 55 per cent. That there was no misappropriation by defendant No. 1 and that the present suit was instituted apparently at the instigation of Bama Charan—the brother of the plaintiff. On these findings no question of law arises and the suit was rightly dismissed. The Appeal No. 84 is dismissed with costs.

The other suit which may be called the title suit was brought by the plaintiff for recovery of one third share in the sale-proceeds of the stock-in-trade. Defendant No. 1 is Brojendra Lal Das Chowdhury who was defendant No. 1 in the other suit and his defence is that he acted bona fide under instructions from the other partners. On the findings there can be no question that the suit was rightly dismissed against him. As regards the claim against the partners the Munsif found that the amount of debt paid off by the other partners far exceeded the value of the stock-in-trade as put by the plaintiff. He also held that the suit was not maintainable without a general suit for accounts as between partners. In this view the suit was dismissed. The Subordinate Judge in appeal did not discuss the merits of the case but dismissed the appeal on the ground that the suit in the form against the partners was not maintainable. The learned Vakif for the appellant argues that the view of the lower Appellate Court on law is wrong as the suit was maintainable. There can be no question that the general rule of law is that a suit by a partner after the dissolution of the partnership must be for a general account unless special circumstances exist which entitle one partner to bring a suit against another or others for a particular item. But if the suit relates to the loss and profits of the partnership business or to the stock-in-trade or capital employed in the business in respect of which all partners have equal rights, it must be one for a general account of the partnership business. But maintains the learned Vakil for the appellant that an action for a specific sum as for the price of the plaintiff's share in the sale-proceeds of the stock-in-trade is maintainable without a suit for accounts. He also contends that if in order to give proper relief it is necessary to take accounts from the defendants the Court should take such accounts. With reference to the second branch of the argument it may be said that the first Court did go into the question and found that the other partners used the proceeds of the sale of the stock-in-trade in paying off the debts and they will not, therefore, be liable. As to the first contention our attention has been drawn to the decision in the case of Durga Prosonno Bose v. Raghū Nath Dās (1). In that case one partner under arrangement amongst the partners borrowed a sum of money and put it into the partnership till. Subsequently the creditor by a suit against that partner realised the amount. Thereupon the partner sued his other partners for contribution of the money which he had to pay under the decree of his creditor. The learned Judges held that such a suit was maintainable without a general suit for accounts on the ground that the money secured by the promissory note for which the suit was brought against the plaintiff did not become an item of the partnership accounts. On the facts of that particular case the decision seems to be perfectly justifiable. One partner had to contribute to the capital of the firm out of which profit was received by all the partners in equal shares and if that partner had to pay the money which he had so employed in the partnership business, there does not seem to be any reason why he could not recover by way of contribution the share of the debt payable by the other partners. The suit had nothing to do with the partnership business or with reference to the assets of the partnership. The learned Judges in that case went thoroughly into the law as to the rights of partners amongst themselves. But on the facts of that particular case it was evident that the general rule that a suit between partners relating to the partnership business must be a suit for general accounts of the dissolution did not apply. Moreover, the rule has been stated in Lindley on Partnership, 9th Edition, page 663, in answer to a question formulated by the learned author "When can an action be maintained between partners without taking a general account of all the partnership dealings and transactions?" This question, according to the learned author, "can only be answered generally by saying that each case must depend upon its own circumstances and upon whether justice can really be done without taking such account." In the present case it must be admitted that the plaintiff cannot sue for a specific sum without calling upon the other partners to show how the price of the stock-in-trade was applied by them, in other words, she cannot bring a suit for a specific sum without a general suit for accounts for the purpose of ascertaining if she is entitled to a share in the assets of the firm. In Ram Chandra Pal v. Krishna Lal Pal (2) a suit was brought in the Small Causes Court by one of the partners for a sum of money alleged to be due by the other partners. The question before the Court was whether the suit was maintainable in the Court of Small Causes. The learned Judges held that a dispute between partners whose business has come to an end regarding the division of the assets can only be finally settled in a proper suit for adjustment of accounts; and it is not proper that each of the parties should proceed by separate suits in order to recover from the others any sums due to the partnership business which they may have realised. We have also been referred to the case of Karri Venkatareddi v. Kollu Narasayya (3) but we do not see what bearing that case has on the facts of the present case. There under the terms of the contracts between the partners the working partner was to make over all the cheques and moneys received by him to the capitalist partner. He had omitted to do so and a suit was brought by the partner supplying the capital for the recovery of the cheques. It was held that a suit did lie. There is no special contract in this case and, in our opinion, the general law must prevail, namely, that the plaintiff cannot maintain a suit for her share in the assets of the partnership without bringing a suit for a general account. We further do not think that in the present case it was the duty of the Court to take accounts from the defendants and give proper relief to the plaintiff. As has been held in Kshetra Nath Bhuiya v. Kali Dasi Dasi (4) a suit for recovery of a specific sum of money does not assume the character of a suit for accounts merely because in the determination of the question in controversy accounts may have to be examined. Though the question before the Court then was whether the suit was maintainable in the Small Causes Court the general principle that a suit for a specific sum of money cannot be converted into a suit for accounts is sound. To the same effect is the case of Konduru Runga Reddi v. Subbiah Setty (5) in which it is stated that a suit for an account is a special form of suit in which a special process is required for the purpose of taking accounts and that every case in which accounts have to be looked into to ascertain the amount due to the plaintiff cannot be said to be a suit for accounts. In our judgment the suit as brought by the plaintiff is not maintainable and the plaintiff is entitled to no relief. It would not have been necessary on the findings of fact arrived at by the trial Court to go into the question of law but for the extremely unsatisfactory judgment of the lower Appellate Court which gave sufficient indication that the learned Subordinate Judge did not fulfil his function as presiding over the Appellate Court. This appeal is accordingly dismissed with separate costs to respondent No. 1 and to respondents Nos. 2 to 4.

JUDGMENT.

Zafar Ali, J.—The last male owner of the land in suit was Khuda Bakhsh, a Musalman Naru Rajput of village Harta in the Hoshiarpur District. On his death there was a contest as to succession between his daughter Musammat Mamon and his collaterals in the sixth degree; but the suit brought against her by the collaterals ended in dismissal. Musammat Mamon enjoyed possession of the estate all her life and died some four years before the present suit leaving her surviving a daughter named Charagh Bibi. On the death of Musammat Mamon the collaterals again laid claim to the estate of her father and took possession of it. But the Revenue Authorities sanctioned mutation in favour of Musammat Charagh Bibi. The collaterals, therefore, sued for a declaration that by the Customary Law of Inheritance the estate reverted to them on the death of Musammat Mamon and that they were entitled to oust Musammat Charagh Bibi. The latter contested their claim and pleaded that the estate should descend to her. So the sole question on which the parties joined issue was whether, where the daughter of the last male owner had succeeded to his ancestral estate excluding his collaterals in the sixth degree the latter were entitled to succeed on her death in the presence of her daughter. The suit was tried by the learned Senior Subordinate Judge of Hoshiarpur who granted the plaintiffs the declaration that they sought, holding that a daughter's daughter had no right to succeed. Musammam Charagh Bibi appeals.

In arriving at the above finding the learned Judge of the Court below has given effect to the general rule of the Customary Law of the Province that a daughter like any other female successor is a limited owner and that she inherits the estate of her father to transmit it eventually to his agnates or to her own sons but not to her daughter. He failed to realise that the real question for determination was one of a special custom which might obtain in a particular tribe in spite of the general custom being to the contrary. Almost every general rule has exceptions to it, and no person is precluded from establishing a special custom at variance with the general one.

In the present case the appellant's claim was that she was by custom entitled to succeed to the exclusion of the distant collaterals of her maternal grandfather. One thing is quite clear, viz., that among Naru Muhammadan Rajputs of Hoshiarpur daughters are by custom entitled to succeed in presence of collaterals more remote than the descendants of the great-grandfather of the deceased proprietors. This was ruled so far back as 1889: v. de Ranjhi Khan v. Kamum (1). The appellant goes a step further and claims her right of succession by custom on the death of her mother. This claim should not have been thrown out merely because it was opposed to the general custom. The question is whether the special custom set up by the daughter was proved or not. For an answer to a question of this description one naturally looks first of all to the Riwaj-i am of the District, but the Riwaj-i am was unfortunately not consulted by the learned Senior Subordinate Judge, presumably because his attention had not been drawn to it. But Ilahi Bakhsh v. Budhi (2) was brought to his notice in which a Division Bench of the Punjab Chief Court had held that "among Muhammadan Rajputs of Hoshiarpur (an endogamous tribe) where daughters have succeeded to their father's land as heirs, excluding his collaterals, their daughters are entitled to succeed to their mothers' estate in the absence of the direct male heirs....."

The Court below refused to follow the above ruling on the ground that "the weight of authority was against the defendant."

It may be observed here that the plaintiffs examined no less than ten witnesses but every one of them made a very brief statement each to the effect that among Muhammadan Naru Rajputs where a daughter succeeded to the ancestral estate of a sonless proprietor the collaterals of the latter, howsoever remote, excluded from succession the daughter's daughter. None of them could, however, give even one instance of the exclusion of a daughter's daughter by the collaterals. The Riwaj-i am being, however, clearly against the plaintiffs on this point, the onus of establishing the alleged custom lay heavily upon them. The defendants produced only two witnesses who cited a judicial instance. This was no other than that of Ilahi Bakhsh v. Budhi (2). We could not decide the case without taking into consideration the Riwaj-i am and we, therefore, allowed the appellant's Counsel to refer to it. We did not consider it necessary to remand the case because the plaintiffs were not in a position to supplement their evidence in order to rebut the Riwaj-i am when confronted with it.

The questions and answers of the Riwaj-i am that are in point are Nos. 45 and 47. To question No. 45: "Under what circumstances can daughters inherit?" the answer of Rajputs and several other tribes was that "daughters can succeed in the absence of descendants of a great-grandfather." To the further question No. 47: "What is the nature of the daughter's interest in property that she inherits?" the answer was: "Where a daughter succeeds by inheritance as is related in answer to question No. 45, if she has children, she succeeds as full owner, if she is childless she succeeds to a limited life-estate the same as that of a widow 'without rights of alienation'". The word 'children' (aulad) applies to sons as well as to daughters, and it was held in Chiragh Bibi v. Hassan (3) that "in places where the right of females to succeed is widely recognised the word 'aulad' should be construed as including both male and female issue." The answer to question No. 47, therefore, is to the effect that a daughter becomes full owner if she has sons or daughters.

In Ilahi Bakhsh v. Budhi (2) Counsel for the plaintiff's collaterals contended that as the daughter left only daughters and no sons, the daughter's daughter could not succeed in the presence of the collaterals. In respect to this contention the learned Judges observed as below:—

"Now this is a proposition (i.e., daughter's daughter cannot succeed and the collaterals are entitled to come in) which we are unable to accept. We have considered the rulings quoted to us for the appellant, Lehna v. Thakari (4), inter alia, Roe's Tribal Law, page 61, s. 13, etc. We do not think that there is sufficient authority for saying that when a daughter has been allowed to succeed as heir to her father's estate, that her daughter again cannot succeed to her. We admit that in dealing with Customary Law, logic is often apt to lead us astray, but we can see no logic in the proposition—Why is the succession to be limited to one female step?"

The learned Senior Subordinate Judge chose for his guidance Lehna v. Thakari (4) and certain other rulings to the same effect based generally on the principles laid down in Roe and Rattigan's Tribal Law, at page 61, s. 13. Now, all that was decided in Lehna v. Thakari (4) was that the ancestral estate of a sonless proprietor does not cease to be ancestral when it devolves upon his daughter or descends from her to her sons, etc. There can be no quarrel with this proposition in the present case. In Roe and Rattigan's Tribal Law, s. 13, general principles are stated relating to the rights of female successors but exceptions to the general custom are also noted and it is mentioned that in Multan and Dera Ismail Khan where a daughter succeeds at all she succeeds absolutely with a full power of disposing, as she pleases, of the property. Thus the right to succeed as full owner is given to daughters by some tribes and there can be no wonder if Naru Rajputs did the same. In Ilahi Bakhsh v. Budhi (2) Roe and Rattigan's Tribal Law, s. 13 and Lehna v. Thakari (4) were taken into consideration and these authorities do not in any way militate against the finding arrived at in Ilahi Bakhsh v. Budhi (2).

Another case relied upon by the Court below was Sharfo v. Ramzan (5). The parties to that case were Gujars of the Gujrat District and it was found that among Gujars of that District a daughter's daughter had by custom no right to succeed. Obviously it does not follow that Naru Rajputs of Hoshiarpur follow the same custom.

The Riwaj-i-am being in favour of the daughter's daughter and Ilahi Bakhsh v. Budhi (2) being in accordance with the Riwaj-i-am the plaintiffs' claim to the contrary must fail. This appeal is accordingly accepted and the plaintiffs' suit dismissed with costs throughout.

Appeal against the decree of Mr. Justice Pearson, dated the 6th December, 1926, in Original Suit No. 1844 of 1926.

Mr. S. C. Roy, for the Appellant.

Mr. S. M. Bose, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

C. C. Ghose, J.—This is an appeal from an order made by my learned brother Mr. Justice Pearson on the 6th December, 1926, on an application made by the plaintiff Company under Chap. XIII-A of the Rules of this Court for summary judgment.

The facts shortly stated are as follows:—The defendant Shyam Sundar Chakravarty who is the appellant before us was on all material dates the Editor of the "Servant" newspaper and Managing Director of the defendant Company, namely, the Servant Publishing Company, Limited. It appears that the plaintiff Company supplied paper from time to time for the use of the defendant Company and as and when the goods were delivered, the appellant Shyam Sundar Chakravarty executed certain promissory notes for the value thereof. The promissory notes were eight in number. The plaintiff Company made attempts to realise the monies due but did not succeed. There was on the date of the application a sum of Rs. 8,910-2-6 due to the plaintiff Company for principal and a sum of Rs. 463-4-4 on account of interest. The promissory notes were all alike and one of them which is printed at page 13 of the paper-book may be quoted herein as a sample: "On demand I, Sham Sundar Chakravarty Esqr. Editor and Managing Director 'The Servant,' promise to pay the Titaghar Paper Mills Co., Ltd., or order, the sum of rupees nine hundred twenty-two and annas four only together with interest thereon at the rate of twelve per cent. per annum from the 10th February, 1925, being the value of one hundred and thirty-six reams of paper sold and delivered to me from their godown as per their Delivery Order No. L 788." The appellant filed an affidavit in answer to the application of the plaintiff Company in which he contended that he did not sign the said promissory notes in his personal capacity in consideration of the paper being supplied to the defendant Company and that, under the circumstance, the Servant Publishing Company, Ltd., were alone liable for the price of the paper supplied and that there was no personal liability undertaken by the appellant. The matter came on before my learned brother, Mr. Justice Pearson on the 6th December, 1926, when he made an order in terms of the plaintiff Company's summons for summary judgment. He held that, having regard to the terms of the promissory notes, it could not be contended that the appellant had not undertaken any personal liability in respect of the sums mentioned in the said promissory notes.

On appeal it is argued on behalf of the appellant by Mr. S. C. Roy, firstly, that there was a triable issue raised by the appellant and that no summary judgment should have been passed; and, in the second place, that on the construction of the promissory notes themselves there was no personal liability undertaken by the appellant and that, therefore, no decree should have been made against him.

As regards the first point, it is sufficient to observe that, on the materials before us, it is clear that there was no triable issue dependent on facts which were to be investigated, but there was a question of law raised by the appellant, namely, whether, having regard to the terms of the promissory notes, any personal liability had been undertaken by the appellant. That question did not, in my opinion, involve the taking of evidence. It was a pure question of law and had to be decided with reference to the terms of the promissory notes. On the decision of that question depended as to whether there should be a summary judgment in favour of the plaintiff Company or whether leave to defend the suit should be given to the appellant. Mr. Justice Pearson held on the construction of the promissory notes that the appellant had undertaken a personal liability and passed summary judgment in favour of the plaintiff Company. That amounted to saying that, in the circumstances disclosed, no leave should be given to the defendant to put in a defence in the ordinary way. That disposes of the first point raised by Mr. Roy.

As regards the second point, it is sufficient to observe that, having regard to the cases, some of which are referred to in my judgment—In the matter of Jajodia Cotton Mills Ltd. (1), it cannot be contended on the documents in this case that the appellant had not undertaken and did not undertake any personal liability. The appellant's description as Managing Director in the body of the promissory notes had not the effect of excluding his personal liability. It is noteworthy that the appellant when he put his signature on the promissory notes, signed his name without any qualification whatsoever and did not take any steps whatsoever to indicate that he was signing the document not in his personal capacity but for and on behalf of the Servant Publishing Company Ltd., and as their Managing Director. Under these circumstances, there could only have been one answer to the question raised by the appellant, and, in my opinion, Mr. Justice Pearson rightly negated the contention raised by the appellant.

Mr. Roy has drawn our attention to the case of Elliott v. Bax-Ironside (2). That case, as I read it, is entirely against Mr. Roy's contention. What happened in that case is this:—The action was against two defendants as indorsers of a Bill of Exchange. Those defendants were the Directors of a Company called the Fashions Fair Exhibitions Ltd., and one of the defendants was a person named Mason who was the Managing Director. The Company accepted two Bills of Exchange for 1,000 pounds each, but inasmuch as the capital of the Company was not more than 400 pounds it was suggested that the two Bills of Exchange should be indorsed by the two Directors, namely, Sir Henry Bax-Ironside and Mr. R. A. Mason. They accordingly indorsed the two Bills of Exchange and the contention that was sought to be canvassed on their behalf before the Judge in the Court of first instance and in the Court of Appeal was that they had not accepted any personal liability. It was held that having regard to the facts, although they had described themselves as Directors, they were really guaranteeing a debt due by the Fashions Fair Exhibitions Ltd., and that they accordingly could not avoid liability as guarantors. Both on law and on facts, this case, as I read it, is against the contention put forward before us by Mr. Roy.

On all these grounds, I am of opinion that this appeal should stand dismissed with costs.

RESPONDENT.

Contract Act (IX of 1872), s. 18—Bond providing for payment of interest by work—Very low wages—No provision for re-payment of loan—Legality of contract—Slavery bond.

Where a bond executed by a servant in favour of his master provided for the payment of interest in the shape of work, but the work was to be paid at a certain definite rate which was very low and the work included that of the executant as well as that of his wife and no provision was made for the re-payment of the loan:

Held, that the bond was a slavery bond and was, therefore, not enforceable.

Ponnusami v. Palayathan (3), distinguished.

Petition under s. 25 of Act IX of 1887, praying the High Court to revise the decree of the Court of the District Munsif, Nannilam, in S. O. S. No. 456 of 1925.

FACTS.—A bond executed by a servant to his master provided as follows:—"As I have to day taken Rs. 25 in cash agreeing to do pannayal service under you in respect of 15 mahs of land of yours, I shall, in lieu of interest, plough the land by using your bull, attend to cultivation, take wages for myself at 2½ measures and for my wife at 1½ measures a day. Further, at the time of harvest, I shall receive kalandai at 2 measures per kalam. For other work, I shall receive ¼ marakal a day. I shall attend to local channel digging without payment. Binding myself to the above conditions both myself and my wife being bound to do aforesaid pannai work, I have executed aulsurandi. Should I fail to do work as per condition or if I commit fraud, I hereby agree to render myself criminally liable." In a suit on the bond, relying on Ram Sarup Bhagat v. Bansi Mandar (1) and Scari Ayyangar v. Subbarayar (2) the learned District Munsif held that the bond was a slavery bond and, therefore, unenforceable and accordingly dismissed the suit. The plaintiff applied to the High Court for revision of the said decree.

JUDGMENT.—The District Munsif dismissed the suit on the ground that the bond sued on was a slavery bond and its terms are not enforceable. The bond provides for the payment of interest in the shape of work, but the work is to be paid at a certain definite rate which appears to be very low and the work includes that of the executant as well as that of his wife. No provision is made for the re-payment and although, of course, a debtor can in law always re-pay his debt, still in the case of these pannayals it is quite likely that they do not realise this right. The case relied upon by the petitioner which was decided by myself in Ponnusami v. Falayathan (3) can be differentiated on the ground that in that case the ordinary wages were to be paid for the man's work and that the period was restricted to five years. The Munsif, on the other hand, relied on Ram Sarup Bhagat v. Bansi Mandar (1) and I am certainly not prepared to say that he is wrong in this case.

The petition is dismissed.

JUDGMENT.

S. A. No. 1805 of 1925.

Mitter, J.—This appeal arises out of a suit by the respondent for recovery of the balance of Road and Public Works Cesses from the appellant payable for 4 years, viz., 1326 to 1329 B. S., with damages at 25 per cent.

The defendant in this suit, now appellant, is the patnidar under the plaintiff, now respondent, who is the zemindar of the mahal in suit and the terms of the patni are to be found in a kabuliyat to some of the terms of which reference will be made later.

The plaintiff alleges that out of the cesses payable by the defendant only a smaller sum has been realised and the plaintiff consequently sues for the excess cesses.

The defence of the defendant substantially was (i) that the plaintiff was realising cesses at the legal rate without adverting to a clause in the kabuliyat which runs to the following effect:—

“If there be any demand from the state on the zemindari for any new amount on account of rent or revenue payable to the King or if any order is passed, I shall abide by it and pay my rent along with it without any objection”, (ii) that the plaintiff's claim for recovery of cesses for the year 1926 was barred by limitation.

The Munsif granted a decree to the plaintiff for the excess cess. An appeal was taken by the defendant to the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Murshidabad who affirmed the decision of the Munsif.

A second appeal has been taken to this Court by the defendant and three points have been raised before us by the learned Advocate for the appellant. It is argued in the first place as that the covenant in the kabuliyat that the defendant would pay rajaswa would not include the excess cess claimed, i. e., the cess in excess of the legal rate. It is contended in the second place that the excess cess claimed does not fall within the definition of rent as given in the Bengal Tenancy Act, for unders 3, cl. (b) of the Act “rent includes also money recoverable under any enactment for the time being in force as if it was rent" and as the excess cess was recoverable not under the Cess Act but under the covenant in the kabuliyat the excess cess could not be regarded as rent within the meaning of the Bengal Tenancy Act and that the suit for excess cess was not a suit to which the provisions of Art. 2 of Sch. III, cl. (iii)(b) of the Bengal Tenancy Act would apply and consequently the claim for 1326 B. S. is barred by limitation. It is contended in the third place that in any view the plaintiff is not entitled to damage at 25 per cent. on the excess cess having regard to the provision of s. 68, cl. (2) of the Bengal Tenancy Act which applies only to a suit for rent.

Basing his argument on the ground taken by the appellant that the sum claimed in the suit cannot be regarded as rent, the learned Vakil for the respondent has taken a preliminary objection to the hearing of this appeal. He contends that according to the appellant's argument the present suit would be a suit not for rent but for money and as the suit is valued at less than Rs. 500 there would be no second appeal to this Court by reason of s. 102 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The appellant is in the horns of a dilemma for if his argument is accepted that the present suit is not a suit for rent then he has no right of second appeal. If, on the other hand, his argument is not accepted and the suit is regarded as a suit for rent then there is no substance in any of the three grounds taken. The learned Advocate for the appellant is prepared to accept the position that this is a suit for money and not for rent; consequently he is met by the preliminary objection which must prevail and the appeal is dismissed with costs.

It is next argued in reply that this petition of appeal should be treated as a petition for revision and this Court should interfere under s. 115 of the Civil Procedure Code. With reference to the second and third grounds raised on behalf of the appellant it is said that the lower Appellate Court has applied the law to a case to which it does not apply and has thus exercised his jurisdiction with material irregularity. Reliance has been placed in this connection on the decisions of this Court in Brajabala Debi v. Gurudas Mandal (1) and Mohini Mohan Roy v. Ramdas (1) 3 C. L. J. 293 at p. 201; 33 C. 437.

Paramhansa (2). All that these cases lay down is that in a proper case where there has been an error of jurisdiction the High Court may treat a petition of appeal as a petition for revision and interfere under s. 115 of the Code. But we do not think that s. 115 applies in the present case for in deciding the three points raised by the appellant against him the lower Appellate Court has merely arrived at conclusions of law contrary to the contention of the appellant. It has been observed by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the recent case of Balakrishna Udayar v. Vasudeva Aiyar (3) that s. 115 applies to jurisdiction alone, the "irregular exercise, or non-exercise of it, or the illegal assumption of it. The section is not directed against conclusions of law or fact in which the question of jurisdiction is not involved."

I think, therefore, that this is not a case which calls for our interference under s. 115.

S. A. No. 42 of 1906.

With regard to this appeal which arises out of a suit between the same parties as in Appeal No. 1805 of 1925 which I have just dealt with, it has been frankly admitted by the learned Advocate for the appellant that the case is governed by a previous decision of the High Court dated the 1st of June 1922 which has been marked as Ex. 3 in the suit and that that decision is against him.

I think that the decision of this Court referred to concludes this second appeal which must be dismissed with costs.

Letters patent appeal against the judgment of Mr. Justice Mya Bu, in S. A. No. 589 of 1925, dated the 10th August, 1926, and reported as 99 Ind. Cas. 309.

Mr. Thein Maung, for the Appellants.

Mr. P. S. Chari, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The second respondent Maung Myo obtained a money decree against one Mg. Po Hlaing. This decree was attached by the first respondent S. V. K. V. Raman Chettiar in execution of a decree against Maung Myo. After obtaining the attachment the Chettiar applied to the Court under the provisions of r. 53 of O. XXI of the Code of Civil Procedure and was allowed to execute the decree against Po Hlaing. A sum of Rs. 2,700 had been deposited in Court towards the satisfaction of the decree against Mg. Po Hlaing and the respondent Chettiar withdrew this sum in execution of that decree. The plaintiffs appellants, the Co-operative Town Bank of Padigon, claimed that, prior to the attachment of the decrees by the Chettiar, Maung Myo had transferred the decree to them. They say that the Chettiar executed his decree and the decree against Mg. Po Hlaing without their knowledge, the transfer having been made to them before the attachment. The Chettiar had no right in that decree, and they, therefore, claim to recover Rs. 2,700. The Chettiar did not admit the assignment to the Bank, and pleaded that in any case the plaintiffs were estopped from making this claim for this money now. These questions have not yet, however, been adjudicated upon. The suit was dismissed on the ground that, the respondent Chettiar having executed the decrees in accordance with the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, the mere fact that the Bank had a previous assignment of the decrees would not give them any right to follow the money in the hands of the Chettiar. The suit was dismissed by the trial Court and by the District Judge in appeal, and these decisions were affirmed on second appeal by a Single Judge of this Court.

The point raised is a difficult point of law, on which we have been unable to find any clear judicial pronouncement, and has, in our opinion, been quite rightly certified as a fit case for appeal under cl. 13 of the Letters Patent. A number of cases have been cited in favour of the respondents to the effect that the only person entitled to execute a decree is the person who has followed the procedure laid down in O. XXI of the Code of Civil Procedure. We do not, however, think that these decisions necessarily conclude the matter. The Code of Civil Procedure, as the term implies, regulates procedure, and does not ordinarily affect substantive rights, and although the Executing Court was bound to allow the Chettiar to execute his decree, it does not necessarily follow that the Chettiar was entitled to retain the benefit of that decree for his own purpose. The holder of a money decree acquires no right, title or interest in the property of his judgment-debtor merely by virtue of that decree, and he has no right to execute this decree against any property that is not the property of his judgment-debtor at the time of attachment. If then at the time of the attachment of the decree in this case the Chettiar's judgment-debtor had no longer any rights in the decree attached, the Chettiar could obtain no rights in that decree and could not utilize that decree for the purpose of satisfying his debt. Rule 16 of O. XXI provides for the application by the assignee of a decree to the Court to be allowed to execute the decree. The rule does not however say, and we know of no other provision of law to that effect, that the assignment has no legal force until the assignee is brought on the record under the provisions of r. 16. It was held in the case of Puthiandi Mammed

v. Avalil Moidin (1) that all that the transferee of a decree gets in law for the money paid by him to the decree-holder for the transfer of his decree is an agreement to transfer it, not a complete transfer until recognised by the Court. If this decision is sound law, then we think this appeal is bound to fail. But this decision has been dissented from by another Bench of the same Court in the case of Sadagopachariar v. Ragunadachariar (2). The learned Judges who decided that case remarked in their judgment: "There is nothing in s. 232, Civil Procedure Code, to suggest anything of the kind. On the other hand it can be gathered, from the section itself, that the completion of the transfer does not depend upon any recognition by the Court for it begins by saying: 'If a decree be transferred by assignment in writing,' thus assuming that there has been a complete transfer." With these remarks we agree. We see no reason why the transfer by a decree holder of his rights in the decree should not operate on the date of transfer any more than in the case of the transfer of any other kind of property. The Code of Civil Procedure lays down the method by which the rights can be enforced, but does not itself confer the rights, and it seems to us that the transferee of a decree purporting to contract should put in an application under r. 53 of O. XXI of the Code of Civil Procedure to remove an attachment of the decree made subsequently to this transfer whether he has himself taken steps to be entered on the record in place of the original decree-holder or not.

It is suggested on behalf of the respondents that the rights of a transferee of a decree are set forth in r. 16 of O. XXI and the rights of an attaching decree-holder in r. 53, and that whichever party enforces his rights to his decree is entitled to the benefit of those rights. It has been pointed out that cl. (3) of r. 53 lays down that the holder of a decree sought to be executed by the attachment of another decree of the nature specified in sub-r. (1) shall be deemed to be the representative of the holder of that decree, and that no such words occur in r. 16, dealing with the transferee by assignment. It is clear that so far as the Executing Court is concerned the provisions of rr. 16 and 53 must be followed. But we are unable to agree that it further follows that, when the attaching decree-holder has executed the decree, he is necessarily entitled personally to the beneficial interest of his execution if in fact at the time of the execution he had no legal right to execute it on his own account. In such circumstances it seems to us that he must be regarded as the trustee of the person beneficially entitled to the profit of the decree. In this view of the law the order dismissing the suit in the present case cannot be confirmed. The Chettiar raised in his written statement, amongst others, the defence that the appellants were estopped from claiming the money now. That may or may not be so, but that will depend on the facts of the present case which have not yet been tried.

(1) 20 M. 157; 7 Ind. Dec. (N.S.) 110.

(2) 3 Ind. Cas. 938; 33 M. 62; 6 M. L. T. 73.

We accordingly set aside the decrees of the lower Courts dismissing the suit, and direct that the suit of the plaintiffs-appellants be re-admitted and heard on its merits. The costs of this appeal and of the appeals before the District Judge and the Single Judge of this Court will be borne by the respondents. The appellants will be entitled to a refund of the Court-fees paid by them in the three appeals.

The word 'person' in O. I, r. 11 of the Civil Procedure Code means a party to the suit, and a person who is a stranger to the suit cannot be given the conduct of the suit within the meaning of the rule. [p. 857, col. 1.]

Civil revision against a decision of the Subordinate Judge, Third Court at Alipore, dated the 12th April, 1927.

Sir Provas Chandra Mitter, Mr. Bimala Charan Deb and Babu Indu Prokash Chatterjee, for the Petitioner.

Mr. Gunada Charan Sen and Babu Ramendra Chandra Roy, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.

Suhrawardy, J.—This Rule has been obtained by the plaintiff against an order of the Subordinate Judge of 24 Parganas, dated the 12th April, 1927, permitting the wife of the defendant to conduct the defence on his behalf under the following circumstances. The defendant Protap Chandra Basu was the Cashier and Collecting Agent for a number of years working under the plaintiff. The plaintiff's case is that on one morning he found the defendant absconding with the key of the iron safe in his charge. A criminal case was brought against him but he is still absconding. The present suit has been instituted for accounts against Protap Chandra Basu and the plaintiff also applied for attachment before judgment of certain sums of money. Thereafter, the opposite party No. 2, Bagala Sundari Dasi, applied for permission to conduct the case on behalf of her husband on the ground that her husband was either murdered by the plaintiff or was being kept in solitary confinement at the plaintiff's instance. The learned Subordinate Judge has been unable to find whether the version of the plaintiff was true or the defendant's wife's version relating to the disappearance of the defendant was true and permitted the wife to conduct the case on behalf of her absent husband. The order passed by the Subordinate Judge is based on two grounds. His interpretation of O. I, r. 11 gave him enough jurisdiction to entrust the defence to the wife though she was not a party to the suit. The other ground is that if O. I, r. 11 does not apply the Civil Procedure Code is silent and there is no express provision to meet the contingency that has arisen in the present case and, therefore, in the exercise of inherent jurisdiction vested in the Court he can give the conduct of the suit to the opposite party No. 2.

It has been argued before us that O. I, r. 11 does not authorise the Court to give the permission as above stated and that as there is no provision in the Code for allowing a third party to conduct a suit on behalf of an absent party without special authorisation the Court has no power to give such permission. As regards the first ground, it is contended on behalf of the opposite party that the word 'person' in O. I, r. 11 includes any person—be he a party to the suit or not—and the Court has jurisdiction to give such permission to the wife in the present case to conduct the defence on behalf of her husband. As this is a case of first impression and no authorities are available either for or against, I have given my very careful consideration to the contentions raised on both sides and I find myself unable to agree with the interpretation put upon the rule by the Court below and urgently pressed before us by the learned Advocate appearing for the opposite party. The main argument upon which this view is supported is that O. I, r. 11, reproduces the provision of the last paragraph of s. 32 of the Code of 1882 which was as follows: "The Court may give the conduct of the suit to such plaintiff as it deems proper." The present Code has in O. I, r. 11 reproduced all the words of the repealed section except that the word 'plaintiff' has been changed into 'person'. It is accordingly argued that this change is instructive and gives an inkling into the mind of Legislature as to what was really meant by the change and it is said that the Legislature intended by the alteration of the words to invest the Court with power to give the conduct of the suit to any person whom it deems proper—be such person a party to the suit or a stranger to it. I do not think that the idea with which this alteration was made was as has been suggested by the opposite party. The alteration has been made in order to assimilate the wording of the rule of the Code to the corresponding rule of the Supreme Court in England. Order XVI, r. 39 of the Rules of the Supreme Court is, so far as is relevant for our present purpose, in these words: "The Court or a Judge may require any person to be made a party to any action or proceeding, and may give the conduct of the action or proceeding to such person as he may think fit." Under the English Law the few cases which have been decided under this rule show that the Court has as much power to give the conduct of the suit to one of the plaintiffs as the conduct of the defence to one of the defendants. See the case of Peek v. Ray (1). The further reason for the alteration seems to be that under the law as it stood under the repealed Code of Civil Procedure the Court had power to entrust one of the plaintiffs with the prosecution of the suit. As it was deemed to be desirable that the power of the Court to put one of the parties in charge of the suit should be extended to the conduct of the defence, a general word was used to include both the plaintiff and the defendant. As I have said, there is no case in support of the view pressed by the opposite party or that which I feel disposed to adopt; but the commentators of the Civil Procedure Code have put an interpretation on this rule which accords with my reading on the law. I only refer to their opinion in support of the view which I take in this matter independently of what they have stated. Sir John Woodroffe in his well known Edition of the Civil Procedure Code observes, commenting on O. I, r. 11, as follows: "The word 'suit' does not ordinarily include defence, but, according to the English practice, the conduct of the defence also is often given to one of the defendants..... Apparently with a view to adopt that practice, the 'person' has been substituted for the plaintiff." This view has been accepted and adopted by another commentator Mr. Nandlal in his useful Edition of the Civil Procedure Code. There is a decision in the Madras Court which shows how this rule has been understood. In Saminatha Pillay v. Rajagopala Mudaliar (2) the learned Judges held that it was permissible under O. I, r. 11 to transpose a defendant as a plaintiff and give him the conduct of the suit. The order within which r. 11 appears is described in the heading as relating to parties to suit, which lends strength to the view I have adopted. The word 'person' has been used in several rules under that Order. Though I do not think that the meaning which may be given to that word in any rule will necessarily govern the meaning of the word used in r. 11, a reference to the various rules in O. I may be made to show that the word 'person' was not used in any particular sense by the Legislature and that it should be interpreted according to context. Rule 1 says that all persons may be joined in one suit.....if such persons brought separate suits, any common question of law or fact would arise. Rule 3 says that all persons may be joined as defendants.....where if separate suits were brought against such persons any common question of law or fact would arise. There can be no doubt that the word 'person' used in these rules means persons who are parties to the suits. Rule 6 empowers the plaintiff to join as parties to the same suit all or any of the persons severally or jointly and severally liable. Rule 7 says "Where the plaintiff is in doubt as to the person from whom he is entitled to obtain redress, he may join two or more defendants....." In these two rules the word 'person' has been used to indicate a person who is or may be a party to the suit. Some stress has been laid upon the use of the word in r. 8. It says "Where there are numerous persons having the same interest in one suit, one or more of such persons may...sue or be sued." The second clause of the rule says: "Any person on whose behalf or for whose benefit a suit is instituted.....may apply to the Court to be made a party to such suit." It is argued that the word 'person' in this rule means a person who is not a party to the suit and the use of the two words 'person' and 'party' in the second clause indicates that the Legislature intended to mark some distinction between the two classes of persons described as 'person' and 'party.' I do not think that there is much substance in this contention. The word 'person' has been used in the rule in the ordinary sense and it cannot be suggested that any other word could have been used. The rule deals with cases in which various persons are interested and it authorises one of such persons to sue or defend on behalf of the others. As I have said the rule opens with the words 'one or more of such persons may sue or be sued'; the word 'persons' there must mean those who are virtually parties to the suit. The second clause makes no distinction between 'person' and 'party' but only says that any person may apply to be made a party. In r. 10 the word 'person' has been similarly used without bearing any special significance. The rule says: "Where a suit has been instituted in the name of the wrong person as plaintiff.....the Court may order any other person to be substituted or added as plaintiff upon such terms as the Court thinks just." Here the word 'person' has been used for the plaintiff on the record as also for a person who may be substituted or added as plaintiff. In cl. (2) it is laid down that if a party is improperly joined or the name of any other person ought to have been joined whether as plaintiff or defendant, the Court may pass order as authorised by the rule. Here the person who has been improperly joined has been described as a 'party'.

(2) 62 Ind. Cas. 360; 40 M. L. J. 208; 13 L. W. 148; (1921) M. W. N. 108; 29 M. L. T. 151

because he is a party to the suit and any one whom the Court thinks should be added as a party to the suit has been described as a person because he was not a party at the stage. The third clause of the rule says that no person shall be added as a plaintiff or as the next friend without his consent. This use of the word 'person' does not give us much help in interpreting the word in r. 11. It is contended on behalf of the opposite party that the word 'person' in r. 11 must be taken in its ordinary sense meaning anyone including a person who is not a party to the suit. But one of the canons of construction of a Statute is that reasonable interpretation should be given to each word. It seems unreasonable to hold that the Legislature by the use of the word in r. 11 has intended that the Court may authorise anyone to appear on behalf of a party to the suit and have the conduct of the suit except under special provisions contained in the Code itself. The result of adopting the view which has been pressed upon us will be that no party to a suit may appear and the Court may give power to any one to conduct the suit or defend it on behalf of a party. Of course there is the safeguard that the Court will exercise judicial discretion but the investing of the Court with such general authority seems to be unreasonable. A reference to r. 12 may be made. There it is laid down that where there are more plaintiffs or defendants than one, they may authorise one of them to conduct or defend the suit. If it was intended that any one who is not a party to the suit may be entrusted with the conduct of the suit it was not necessary under r. 12 that one of the parties should be empowered for the purpose. On all these considerations I am of opinion that the word 'person' in O. I, r. 11 means a party to the suit and that a person who is a stranger to the suit cannot be given the conduct of the suit within the meaning of that rule. In this view this Rule is made absolute with costs and the order of the lower Court empowering the opposite party No. 2 Bagala Sundari Lasi to conduct the defence on behalf of the defendant Pratap Chandra Basu is set aside. We assess the hearing fee at four gold mohurs.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 39—Execution of decree—Transmission of decree—Ministerial act—Power of Court transmitting decree to add legal representatives and leave question of limitation to be decided by Executing Court.

An order in execution which determines the question of the right of a judgment-debtor to have the decision of the Court on the contentions raised by him is appealable. [p. 858, col. 2.]

An order transmitting a decree for execution to another Court is a ministerial act and could rightly be made ex parte. The transmitting Court has also power to allow execution against the legal representatives of a judgment-debtor and transfer the decree for execution without giving any notice to them leaving them to raise the objections on the score of limitation in that Court; and the mere fact that notice was given and objections were raised cannot affect the power of the Court to act in the same way. [p. 859 col. 2.]

Banku Behary Chatterji v. Naraindas Dutt (1), relied on.

Mr. Cowasjee (with him Mr. B. K. B. Naidu), for the Appellant.

Mr. Paget, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—In Suit No 308 of 1909 of the Chief Court of Lower Burma the respondent, Subramonian Chetty, obtained a simple money decree against five defendants, of whom the fifth was K. M. P. R. S. Palaniappa Chetty of Karakudi, in the Madras Presidency. The decree was passed on the 3rd of June, 1910, and in July of that year it was transmitted to the District Court of Ramnad, in Madras, for execution. There it remained until the 25th February, 1922, when the Ramnad Court returned it to this Court with a letter stating that it was returned "so as to enable the decree-holder to bring in the legal representatives of the deceased defendants on record" and that no satisfaction had been obtained by execution in that Court.

Nothing was done in this Court until on the 20th April, 1923, the decree-holder (respondent) applied to have the appellant Nachimai Achi brought on the record as the heir and legal representative of K. M. P. R. S. Palaniappa Chetty, deceased. On this petition notice was issued to the appellant. This was held to have been duly served and as the appellant did not appear an ex parte order was passed directing that the appellant be brought on the record as the legal representative of the fifth defendant. This was done by adding her name as legal representative in the plaint and decree in the suit. The formal propriety of this procedure is at least questionable, since the Civil Procedure Code does not provide for it on the lines of the provisions of O. XXII in respect of suits. The only actual provision in the Code is s. 50, which says that the decree-holder may apply to the Court which passed the decree to execute it against the legal representatives. The point, however, is not now of material importance.

This order was passed on the 4th July, 1923, and on the 9th of August the respondent applied for re-transmission of the decree to the Ramnad Court for execution. This was granted and the amended decree was so transmitted.

On the 24th of November, 1923, the appellant applied to have these two ex parte orders vacated. Notice was issued to the respondent, who contested the application. After much delay it was decided on the 19th of January, 1926, when the learned Judge on the Original Side allowed it and set aside the ex parte orders. His order came before this Bench in Civil Miscellaneous Appeal No. 43 of 1926, which appeal we dismissed on the ground that the order was not a judgment within the meaning of cl. 13 of the Letters Patent of this Court and was, therefore, not appealable.

The matter then went before another Judge on the Original Side, whose order on it is now appealed from.

The contention of the appellant was that the decree was no longer executable, being time-barred under s. 48 of the Civil Procedure Code, and that the application to bring her on the record, or to execute the decree against her, was also time-barred under Art. 181 of the Schedule to the Limitation Act. The respondent contends that there is no bar in either case because of the various proceedings in execution in the Ramnad Court.

The learned Judge has refused to decide between these two contentions. The view he has taken is that the questions raised are questions which ordinarily should be decided by this Court, but that in the peculiar circumstances of this case they ought to be decided by the District Court of Ramnad, because the decision will involve the construction of the previous order in execution of that Court.

The appellant urges before us that she is entitled to have these questions decided by this Court. The respondent supports the order under appeal and contends further that there is no right of appeal against that order.

On this last question we are of opinion that an appeal does lie because the order finally determines so far as this Court is concerned the question of the right of the appellant to have the decision of this Court on the contentions raised by her. In this respect it differs from the order in question in Civil Miscellaneous Appeal No. 43 of 1926, which merely set aside certain ex parte orders and left the questions raised for decision on contest.

As regards the first contention this case is strikingly similar to Banku Behary Chatterji v. Naraindas Dutt (1) which was decided by the Privy Council. The facts of that case are somewhat more fully stated in the judgment of the Calcutta High Court in Narain Dass Dutt v. Banku Behary Chattopadhyaya (2). From the last-mentioned report it appears that more than twelve years after the passing of a mortgage decree by the Calcutta High Court the decree holder "applied to the High Court praying that the (deceased) mortgagor's widow and his two sons.....be substituted on the record in his place; and that.....the decree be transmitted to the Hoogly Court for execution." This was done without notice to the widow and sons. The Hoogly Court issued notice to them under O. XXI, r. 22 of the Civil Procedure Code and they then filed objections not in the Hoogly Court, but in the High Court itself. The principal objections were that the widow was not a legal representative of the mortgagor, and that execution was barred by the Law of Limitation. These objections were heard by a Judge of the High Court and a consent order was passed. Of this order Mr. Justice Richardson says in his judgment "as it seems to me, its only appreciable effect was to amend..... the order for the transmission of the decree by striking out the name of the mortgagor's widow." Later he says "As

(2) 78 Ind. Cas. 1001; A. I. R. 1925 Cal. 213.

I regard the matter, the parties or their legal advisers recognised when they came before Pearson, J., that what I may call the substantial objections of the appellants to the execution of the decree fell to be decided not by the learned Judge but by the Hoogly Court to which the decree had been transmitted. The agreement arrived at related merely to the form of the order for the transmission of the decree and not to its substance. When the original order, made without notice to the appellants, gave liberty to the respondent to execute the decree against them, such liberty was merely a liberty to the respondent to proceed in execution subject to all just exceptions on the part of the appellants and it would, perhaps, have obviated misunderstanding if some such words had been introduced."

Again he says "Under the scheme of the Code, the Court transmitting a decree is not the Court to decide objections on the part of the judgment-debtor that the decree is incapable of execution or that execution is barred by limitation. Such objections should be taken before and heard and determined by the Court to which the decree is transmitted as the Court of Execution."

This judgment was passed on an appeal from the Hoogly Court before which the legal representatives had urged the objections that execution of the decree was time-barred under Art. 183 of the Limitation Act. The Hoogly Court held that the original ex parte order of the High Court, coupled with the subsequent consent order and as amended thereby, constituted a revivor of the decree. In the appeal the High Court held that it did not and that execution of the decree was in fact time-barred.

The decree-holder appealed to the Privy Council, which upheld the judgment of the High Court. The judgment of their Lordships was delivered only on the 22nd February in this year, that is, after the order now under appeal had been passed. They say expressly that the order of transmission would be rightly made ex parte and as a ministerial act. And although they do not expressly say so it follows by necessary implication from their judgment, in view of the facts before them, that the order permitting execution against the legal representatives would also rightly be made ex parte. On this point we ourselves expressed a contrary opinion in our judgment in Civil Miscellaneous Appeal No. 43 of 1926, but in the face of this judgment of their Lordships we can no longer sustain that opinion.

There are, of course, differences of detail between the cases now before us and that dealt with by their Lordships, but as far as at present concerns us the essential features of the two are the same. The effect of the judgment is to show that this Court could rightly have allowed execution against the legal representative, and have transferred the decree to the Ramnad Court for execution, without giving any notice to the appellant and leaving her to raise her objections on the score of limitation in that Court. We do not think that the fact that notice has been given to her and that she has raised the objections in this Court can affect the power of the Court to act in the same way, which is what the learned Judge has done in the order under appeal.

We think also that in the circumstances of the case he was right in adopting that course, although we regret that one result must necessarily be to prolong further this already protracted litigation. The materials on the record are not, in our opinion, sufficient for a satisfactory decision of the question. They appear to be far from complete. On the other hand, the whole of the previous proceedings in execution have been taken in the Ramnad Court and all necessary materials for a decision are, therefore, available to that Court.

We, therefore, dismiss this appeal with costs, ten gold mohurs. A copy of this judgment will be sent to the Ramnad Court.

Provincial Small Cause Courts Act (IX of 1837); Sch. II, Art. 35 (ii)—Suit by landlord for value of trees illegally cut by tenant—Jurisdiction of Small Cause Court—Small Cause suit tried as regular suit—Appeal.

A suit by a landlord for value of trees illegally cut by a tenant is not exempted from the jurisdiction of a Small Cause Court by reason of the provisions of Art. 35 (ii) of the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act where it does not appear from the allegations in the plaint that the act of the tenant constitutes an offence under Chap. XVII of the Penal Code.

No appeal lies from a decree passed in a suit which is really of a Small Cause nature even though it is erroneously tried as a regular suit.

Mohini Mohan Roy v. Ramdas Paramhansa (1), followed.

Civil revision against an order of the Officiating Subordinate Judge, Fourth Court, Dacca, dated 17th February, 1927 reversing that of the Munsif, Fifth Court, Dacca, dated the 30th September, 1926.

Babu Jatindra Nath Sanyal, for the Petitioner.

Babu Bankim Chandra Banerjee, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—This Rule was issued on the opposite party to show cause why the order of the Subordinate Judge of Dacca, dated the 17th of February, 1927, entertaining and allowing an appeal preferred by the opposite party from a decision of the Munsif of Dacca, dated the 30th of September, 1926, should not be set aside.

It appears that the plaintiff, who is the petitioner before this Court, instituted a suit in the Court of the Munsif of Dacca for recovery of a certain sum as the price of trees which had been cut by the defendant. The defendant is plaintiff's tenant, and the plaint alleged that the defendant had, as such tenant no right to cut away and misappropriate any tree without the permission of the plaintiff either under the local custom or under the law, and as the defendant wrongfully and illegally cut away two hijal trees from the land he was liable to pay compensation. The Munsif decreed the plaintiff's suit and ordered that "the suit be decreed in part for Rs. 5-2-6 with proportionate costs." The suit was valued at less than Rs. 100 and it is admitted that the Munsif who tried the suit was vested with powers of a Small Cause Court Judge to try cases up to the value of Rs. 100.

It is argued that the present suit was a suit of a Small Cause Court nature and although the Munsif tried it under his ordinary jurisdiction no appeal lay from the decision of the Munsif to the Subordinate Judge; and, in support of this contention, reliance is placed on a decision of the learned Chief Justice in the case of Mohini Mohan Roy v. Ramdas Paramhansa (1). This position is not controverted by the learned Wakil for the opposite party. The question, therefore, on which this Rule turns is this, namely, whether on a true reading of the plaint it can be said that the suit was one which was exempted from the jurisdiction of the Court of Small Causes by reason of the provisions in Art. 35, cl. (ii) of the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act which excludes cases which fall under Chap. XVII of the Indian Penal Code from the cognizance of a Small Cause Court.

It appears to me from the allegations in the plaint that the allegations do not constitute mischief within the meaning of s. 426 which falls under Chap. XVII of the Indian Penal Code. The dispute is between the landlord and a tenant and the question as to whom the right to the trees or the right to the timber when the trees are felled belongs is often a question of considerable difficulty. The tenant for aught one knows might bona fide believe that he was entitled to cut the trees and if under such bona fide belief he cut the trees the provisions of Chap. XVII of the Indian Penal Code would not be applicable to his acts. I think, therefore, that the suit was one which was not excluded from the cognizance of the Court of Small Causes. That being so, no appeal lay to the Subordinate Judge.

The result is that the order of the Subordinate Judge is set aside and the decree of the Munsif is restored but, in the circumstances of the present case, as no objection was taken to the competency of the appeal before the Subordinate Judge by the petitioner, he is not entitled to costs in this Court.

In the case of a mortgage which is invalid for want of a registered instrument evidencing it, it is open to the mortgagor to bring a suit for possession solely based on title; but in such a case the Court should on equitable grounds order the mortgagor to repay the amount borrowed.

Maung San Min v. Maung Po Hlaing (1), relied on.

Mr. Paw Tun, for the Appellant.

Mr. P. K. B. Basu, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—There is no dispute that Ma Hlay was the original owner of the suit property. That property was attached in execution of a decree against her and the respondent Maung Po Tha bought it. The property was at the time of attachment in the possession of Maung Po Hla; the appellant Maung Po Tha consequently brought a suit out of which this appeal has arisen, for the recovery of possession. His suit was resisted on the ground that Maung Po Hla was in possession as a mortgagee. It has been proved that the alleged mortgage was not evidenced by any registered document. If there had been a valid mortgage what Maung Po Tha had actually purchased would only be the right of equity of redemption. Since there was no valid marriage, he had purchased the legal title to the property. But it has been proved that this property formed one third share of the entire piece, which had been mortgaged to Maung Po Hla for Rs. 450. In these circumstances the trial Judge rightly decreed the suit and ordered the plaintiff to pay compensation to Maung Po Hla as an equitable relief. On appeal the learned Additional District Judge modified the lower Court's decree by omitting the payment of compensation. He has done so on the ground that the alleged mortgage was invalid.

His action is not correct. There is a dictum in the Full Bench case of Maung San Min v. Maung Po Hlaing (1) that in the case of an abortive mortgage, it may be open to the mortgagor to bring a suit

His title was denied by the defendant and the question was decided against him. He subsequently sued for possession of the house site on the basis of the same sale-deed.

Appeal from the decree of the Additional District Judge, Nagpur, dated the 14th July, 1927, in Civil Appeal No. 34 of 1927.

FACTS.—On 12th August, 1908, the appellant obtained a sale-deed of a house. In 1925 he brought a suit against the respondent's deceased husband for recovery of damages for removal of the materials of the house. The defence was that there was no house on the site in question for a long time, that the site was in possession of the respondent and her husband for about 20 years, that no materials were removed by the respondent's husband and that the cause of action did not survive against the respondent. The lower Court found in favour of the respondent on all these points and the suit was dismissed. The appellant did not appeal against that decision but filed the suit out of which this appeal has arisen for recovery of possession of the same site, alleging that the respondent's husband dispossessed him from it in December, 1925. The defence was that the decision in the former suit on the question of title to the site operated as res judicata. This defence prevailed in the lower Court and the suit was dismissed. The plaintiff has appealed.

In appeal it is contended that it was not necessary in the former suit to decide the question of title to the site and the decision thereon does not operate as res judicata. The learned Pleader for the respondent does not dispute the correctness of the proposition that if that question was not necessary to be decided in the former suit, the decision thereon would not operate as res judicata, but he urges that it was necessary to decide it in the former suit. The only question for determination in this appeal, therefore, is whether the said question was necessary to be decided in the former suit.

Mr. S. Y. Deshmukh, for the Appellant.

JUDGMENT.—I have heard Counsel for the plaintiff-appellant in this case but find myself in full agreement with both the lower Courts in their finding that the judgment in Suit No. 275 of 1925 was necessarily res judicata in the present case, for there cannot be the slightest doubt but that in that suit the present plaintiff could and should have joined the relief which he now claims. It is equally clear to me that a decision on the question of the appellant's title to the house had necessarily to be made in that suit, as the then defendant directly raised the question of title, and that was found against the present plaintiff. The facts in Gopala v. Ania (1) were very different. In it, in a previous suit the decision in which the lower Courts had held to operate as res judicata, the question of title was neither put in issue nor adjudicated upon. In the case quoted, the cause of action in the previous suit on a lease arose ex contractu; here, on the other hand, the causes of action, although relating to different details, viz., in the previous suit the materials of the house, and in this suit the site of the house, both arose out of precisely the same title, viz., the plaintiff's claim was that he had acquired the property under the sale-deed of 12th August, 1908. The question of alleged res judicata discussed in Govind Baba Gujar v. Shrimant Jijibai Saheb (2) was an entirely different one, nor is the decision in Ramaswami Ayyar v. Vythinatha Ayyar (3) which has been quoted by Counsel for the appellant, at all apposite to the facts of, or the principles involved in, the present case.

I am in full agreement with the decisions of the Judges of the two lower Courts and dismiss the present appeal without notice to the respondent.

Punjab Courts Act (VI of 1918), s. 41—Finding of fact based on erroneous assumptions—Second appeal—Interference.

A finding of fact based on erroneous assumptions and unwarranted conjectures is liable to be set aside in second appeal. [p. 863, col. 2.]

Second appeal from a decree of the Additional District Judge, Lahore, dated the 3rd January, 1927, affirming that of the Subordinate Judge, Third Class, Kasur, District Lahore, dated the 24th of August 1926.

Mr. Charan Singh, for the Appellant

Mr. Amar Nath Chopra, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The parties to this case are joint owners of certain agricultural land. The plaintiff sued for a declaration that the land in dispute, which is part of a large area of land jointly held by him and the defendant, had been made fit for cultivation by him alone at his own expense, that he was in exclusive possession thereof and that the defendant had no right to disturb such exclusive possession. The defendant admitted that both parties were joint owners of the land, but, denied that the plaintiff was in exclusive possession of the land in suit. His contention was that the land had been made fit for cultivation by both the parties at their joint expense. The Subordinate Judge decreed the suit and this decree was upheld by the learned District Judge on appeal. The defendant has come up to this Court in second appeal.

The learned District Judge has found that the land was broken from waste by the plaintiff at his exclusive expense and that he had been in exclusive possession since long. It appears, however, that his finding is vitiated by a number of erroneous assumptions made by him. He states that in the khasra gir-dwaris of 1920-21 and 22, the plaintiff's name alone is mentioned in the cultivation column. It is clear, however, from the record, and indeed it is admitted by the respondent's Counsel, that this is incorrect. The khasra gir-dwaris show that in 1920-21, 1921-22 and 23-24 the land was cultivated by both the plaintiff and the defendant jointly. It is only in the jamabandi of 1922-23 that Beli Ram alone is shown as in cultivating possession.

The learned District Judge while dealing with the entry of 1923-24 has stated that this entry was suspicious and had been made by Gandu Ram Patwari in collusion with the defendant and that "this Gandu Ram had been dismissed from service." The appellant has filed an affidavit that this statement was wrong, that there is nothing on the record to indicate that Gandu Ram Patwari made any such entry or indeed that there has ever been a Patwari in this village of the name of Gandu Ram or that he was dismissed from service. This affidavit has not been contradicted by the respondent and Mr. Amar Nath Chopra had admitted that he is unable to point out anything on the record in support of the learned District Judge's remarks.

Further in deciding whether a certain entry had been signed by the plaintiff or not the lower Court has relied upon the evidence of Amar Nath (P. W. No. 14), who appeared as an expert to identify the respondents' signatures. This Amar Nath, however, is in no sense of the term expert and respondent's Counsel has conceded that his evidence was not admissible as that of expert under the Evidence Act. It also appears that the learned District Judge has misread the evidence of Maghi Ram Patwari on points, which have an important bearing on the case. Various other mistakes in the judgment of the learned District Judge have also been pointed out to me by both Counsel. Having regard to all these circumstances am of opinion that the finding of the learned District Judge is vitiated by erroneous assumptions and unwarranted conjectures and that the appeal must be heard de novo .

I, therefore, accept the appeal, set aside the judgment and decree of the District Judge and send back the case to him for re-hearing and disposal in accordance with law. The Court-fee paid on this appeal will be refunded. Other costs will be costs in the cause.

In the case of an alienation by a guardian of members of a joint Hindu family, who are minors, if the eldest brother, who is naturally the managing member of the family on attaining majority, does not bring a suit within time to set aside the alienation, any suit by the younger brothers, thereafter would be barred inasmuch as the suit would be barred against the elder brother.

Under the Hindu Law, in the absence of the father and the mother, the paternal grandmother is the natural guardian of the grand-children and is entitled to act as such.

Second appeal against a decree of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Rajamundry, in A. S. No. 175 of 1923, preferred against that of the Court of the Additional District Munsif of Rajamundry in O. S. No. 440 of 1918.

Mr. Ch. Raghava Rao, for the Appellants.
Mr. Viyanna, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The first point urged in the second appeal is that the suit is not barred by limitation so far as the plaintiffs are concerned, even though it might be barred so far as the first defendant is concerned. The eldest brother who had attained ed majority did not sue in time to set aside the sale made by the second defendant, the paternal grandmother and guardian of the plaintiffs and the first defendant during their minority. The point is clearly covered by the decision in Doraisami Sirumadan v. Nondisami Saluvan (1), wherein it was held that if the eldest brother, who is naturally the managing member of the family, does not bring a suit within time to set aside an alienation, any suit by a younger brother would be barred inasmuch as the suit is barred against the elder brother. Mr. Raghava Rao, who appears for the appellants, contends that the authority of Doraisami Sirumadan v. Nondisami Saluvan (1) is considerably shaken by the decision of the Privy Council in Jawahir Singh v. Udai Parkash (2). In that case, their Lordships did not deal specifically with the case in Doraisami Sirumadan v. Nondisami Saluvan (1). They simply say that they agree with the High Court of Allahabad as regards the question of limitation, but unfortunately the judgment of the Allahabad High Court is not before us and we do not know on what grounds the learned Judges who decided that case distinguished that case from the case in Doraisami Sirumadan v. Nondisami Saluvan (1). The authority of Doraisami Sirumadan v. Nondisami Saluvan (1) has not been challenged so far as it has been brought to our notice by any decision of this Court. We are, therefore, bound to accept the authority of Doraisami Sirumadan v. Nondisami Saluvan (1) as binding upon us. The point urged by the appellants cannot, therefore, be sustained in view of the decision in Doraisami Sirumadan v. Nondisami Saluvan (1).

The next point urged is that the paternal grandmother is not the natural guardian of the plaintiffs and, therefore, the shorter period of limitation is not applicable to the case. There is an observation of Sadasiva Aiyar, J., in Thayammal v. Kuppanna Koundan (3) that "nobody else than the father and the mother of a minor (with probable exceptions in favour of the elder brother and the direct male and female ancestors of the minor) is entitled as a matter of natural right to be and to act as guardian of a minor's person and properties." This observation of the learned Judge is relied upon by Mr. Trevelyan in his well-known book "on Minors". There is also an observation of Mr. Justice Banerjee in Mohanund Mondal v. Nafur Mondul (4) that "it is not questioned and it cannot be very well questioned, that the de facto manager answers to the description of natural guardian in this case." In that case, the paternal grandmother acted as the guardian of the person and property of the minor. There is no direct authority for the contention that the paternal grandmother is not the natural guardian of her grand-children in the absence of their father and mother. Considering the habits and customs of the people of this part of the country, there is no reason why the paternal grandmother should not be considered as the natural guardian of her grand-children in the absence of their father and their mother. We think that, in the absence of the father and the mother, the paternal grandmother is the natural guardian of her grand-children. We find this point against the appellants and, in the result, the second appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Custom—Succession—Widow of pre-deceased son, right of, to husband's share—Onus of proof.

Under the general agricultural custom the widow of a pre-deceased son is entitled only to maintenance. But in some tribes in which the right of representation is recognised, she is entitled to succeed to the share which her husband would have taken if he had been alive when such succession opened out. The burden of proving such a special custom is on the person who asserts it.

Second appeal from the decree of the District Judge, Jullundur, dated the 27th of January, 1927, affirming that of the Subordinate Judge, Third Class, Jullundur, dated the 21st of April, 1926.

Mr. N. C. Mehra, for the Appellants.

Mr. Anant Ram, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—One Sawan Singh, grandfather of plaintiffs Nos. 1 and 2 and great grandfather of plaintiffs Nos. 3 and 4, sold certain land in 1902. Plaintiffs Nos. 1 and 2 and the father of plaintiffs Nos. 3 and 4 instituted the usual declaratory suit in 1913 to contest this alienation. That suit was ultimately decided by the Chief Court on the 4th of June, 1918, when a decree was passed in favour of the plaintiffs declaring that they would be entitled to possession of the land after the death of Sawan Singh vendor, on payment of Rs. 320. Some years later, Sawan Singh died and the plaintiffs instituted a suit for possession of the land on payment of Rs. 320 against the vendees but this suit was dismissed on the ground that Sawan Singh's widow was still alive and that in her lifetime the reversioners were not entitled to oust the vendees.

The widow having since died the present suit was instituted by the plaintiffs to recover possession of the land. The vendees urged in defence that Musammatt Dhan Kaur, the widow of Natha Singh, a pre-deceased son of Sawan Singh, vendor, was still alive and according to the custom of the tribe of the parties she was entitled to succeed to Sawan Singh's property and in her life-time the suit for possession was not maintainable. The first Court held that the vendees had failed to establish that by custom she was one of the heirs of Sawan Singh's estate and passed a decree in favour of the plaintiffs. On appeal by the vendees the learned District Judge held that as Mussammatt Dhan Kaur had not been made a party to the suit it was not necessary to decide whether she was or was not entitled to succeed to the estate of Sawan Singh. He was of opinion that according to the terms of the decree of the Chief Court dated the 4th of June, 1918, the plaintiffs were entitled to a decree for possession. He accordingly dismissed the defendants' appeal.

On second appeal Mr. Mehra has urged that the learned District Judge ought not to have decided the case without determining the rights of Musammatt Dhan Kaur in Natha Singh's estate. I do not, however, see how the suit of the plaintiffs can be dismissed in entirety, even if Musammatt Dhan Kaur is entitled to succeed to a share in the estate of her father-in-law. Under the general agricultural custom the widow of a predeceased son is entitled only to maintenance, but in some tribes in which the right of representation is recognised, she is entitled to succeed to the share which her husband would have taken if he had been alive when succession opened out. Even if it be presumed that such a custom exists in the tribe of the parties Musammatt Dhan Kaur would be entitled to succeed to one-third of the land only and the vendees (defendants) cannot refuse to surrender the remaining two-thirds of the land to the plaintiffs. Mr. Mehra is unable to suggest any grounds to support his clients' case qua this two-thirds share and I must hold that the suit has been rightly decreed qua it.

As to the remaining one-third it seems to me necessary that before the plaintiffs could succeed they ought to show that they have a right to get immediate possession of it and in order to decide this matter it would be necessary to determine what Musammatt Dhan Kaur's rights are even though she is not a party to the litigation. As the learned District Judge had given no finding on it and as the question had been put in issue I allowed the Counsel for both parties to address me on the evidence. The two instances on which the defendants rely are vague and indefinite and it is not clear in what circumstances the widows in those cases succeeded. The evidence is very meagre and inconclusive and is, in my opinion, wholly insufficient to discharge the onus which lay on the defendants to prove a special custom. The defendants cannot, therefore, resist the plaintiffs' claim for possession of this part of the land also.

The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

The covenant under s. 55 (1) (g), Transfer of Property Act, imposing liability on a vendor of immoveable property to discharge all encumbrances in the property existing at the time of sale except where the property is sold subject to encumbrances does not run with the land.

Mr. S. Muthiah Mudaliar, for the Petitioners.

Mr. T. Nallasivam Pillai, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—It is argued for petitioner that the covenant set out in Transfer of Property Act, s. 55 (1) (g), is not one which runs with the land and the difference in language between (1) (g) and the proviso to sub-s. (2) supports that view. It is also supported by the remarks in a case reported as Venkatarama Iyer v. Ramaswami Iyer (1) which relies on Renga Srinivasa Chari v. Gnanaprakasa Mudaliar (2) a ruling under the corresponding s. 65 as regards the mortgages. The view of the lower Court that the proviso in sub-s. (2) covers sub-s. (1) (g) also cannot be upheld. Exhibit A-1 only purports to sell such interest as the vendor had and not an absolute freehold free of all encumbrances. Sub-s. 2, therefore, does not import the sale of any such freehold.

Plaintiff's claim under s. 55 (1) (g) is limited to a claim against his vendor, i. e., 2nd defendant, and he is not entitled to a decree against 1st defendant.

I modify the decree of the lower Court and direct that the name of the 1st defendant be struck out of the decree. First defendant will get her own costs

Mr. D. C. Ralli for Mr. Abdul Rashid, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—In this case the appellant has appealed against an order of the Executing Court accepting certain persons as surety for restitution pursuant of the order of this Court, dated the 9th December, 1926. No copy of the order of the Executing Court was filed along with the application. An affidavit was put in that this copy was not available though applied for. It appears that the copy was given about two days afterwards, after the affidavit, i. e., sometime in March, 1927. Up till now, however, the copy has not been filed and the Counsel's only excuse is that he forgot all about it.

A preliminary objection was taken that no appeal lies against an order of a Court accepting security on the ground of insufficiency. Saraswati Barmonya v. Moti Barmonya (1) is cited in support of this. In the present case the Court was satisfied with the personal security of the surety offered and never demanded hypothecation of his property. The ground, therefore, of absence of registration does not arise and as regards the other grounds I respectfully Appeal to Privy Council—Jurisdiction of High Court to order appellant to put guardian ad litem of minor respondent in possession of funds after admission of appeal—Practice of Calcutta High Court.

A High Court has no power, after an appeal to the Privy Council has been finally admitted and the record has been despatched to England to make an order directing the appellant to put the guardian ad litem of the minor respondents in funds to have the appeal conducted on their behalf. [p. 868, col. 1.]

JUDGMENT.

Rankin, C. J.—This is an application in connection with a batch of 47 appeals now pending before His Majesty in Council. The Privy Council numbers are 118 to 164 of 1923. The appeals arise out of certain settlement proceedings under the Bengal Tenancy Act and they raise a question between the appellant to England and various tenants of his as to the right of the appellant to an enhancement of rent. The High Court decided against the appellant and his application for leave to appeal to His Majesty in Council was filed on the 10th of December, 1923.

It appears that when the cases were before this Court the Deputy Registrar was representing the interest of certain minors among the tenants and for the purpose of the application for leave to appeal to the Privy Council there was an order made on the 24th of February, 1924, that the Deputy Registrar should continue to represent the minors whom he represented on the High Court appeals, and certain provision was made for his costs. A certificate that the cases were fit to be taken on appeal was granted by this Court on the 8th of June, 1925, and the appeals were finally admitted on the 27th of July, 1925; since that time the record has been printed in India and has lately been forwarded to England.

Now, the practice of this Court with reference to minors in cases of appeals to the Privy Council is as follows:—By rr. 41 and 42 of Chap. VI of the High Court Rules on the Appellate Side it is provided that "all applications by, or on behalf of, an infant shall be made in the name of the infant by the person whose name is on the record as his next friend or guardian; and whenever any application is consented to, or opposed by, an infant the infant shall in like manner be represented by the person who appears on the record as his next friend or guardian." Rule 42 says: "In cases there is no next friend or guardian upon the record, a separate application for appointment of a next friend or guardian must be made."

Now, while it is in accordance with the practice that in default of any more suitable next friend or guardian the Deputy Registrar should be appointed for the purpose of the proceedings in this Court for obtaining leave to appeal and so forth, upon the final admission of the appeal, the Deputy Registrar ceases to act any further as guardian for the minors. It is not our practice that the Deputy Registrar of the Court should act any further on behalf of the minors in cases which go to the Privy Council. Accordingly on the 26th of August, 1925, an application for appointment of a guardian having been made, the gentleman, whose application is now before us, Babu Jatindra Nath Sanyal, was appointed guardian ad litem for the minor respondents to England. It appears that out of these 47 appeals there are 10 in which this gentleman man has been appointed guardian for minor respondents. The numbers of the 10 appeals are as follows : 127, 131, 132, 141, 148, 152, 155, 156, 158 and 163.

We are now concerned with an application made by Mr. Sanyal as guardian asking us to order the appellant to put him in funds to have these cases argued on behalf of the minors by a Solicitor and junior Counsel before the Judicial Committee. Some estimate has been obtained from the agent in England as to the amount of money which would be required for this purpose and it appears that £300 or £400 would apparently be necessary, considering that the paper-book is very large and that there would be a good deal of work connected with the case. In these circumstances I find that no such order in connection with Privy Council appeals has ever been made by this Court hitherto. I am not sure whether any such order has ever been asked for hitherto, and it is necessary very carefully to consider by what right and on what principle such an order could be made by this Court. No doubt in ordinary cases before the Courts in India under the Civil Procedure Code, it would be quite an ordinary practice to direct that the plaintiff in a suit should put the guardian ad litem in funds to a certain extent for the defence of the minor defendants; but we are here exercising a jurisdiction of a very special character. Certain rules have been made under statutory powers by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Under those rules certain duties are cast upon the Courts in India in connection with appeals to His Majesty in Council. The Indian Legislature by O. XLV, has commissioned the Courts in India to carry out the duties that are imposed by the rules made by the Judicial Committee but unless we can find that there is express authority given to this Court to make such order as is now asked in connection with an appeal to His Majesty in Council which has been finally admitted and is before His Majesty in Council at the present moment, it is not plain to me that we can have any right to do so. It may or may not be that such an order could be obtained from the Judicial Committee, but our right to make such an order must be granted by an express provision. I have been through the relevant sections of the Civil Procedure Code, O. XLV. I have been through the rules made by the Judicial Committee called the Judicial Committee Rules of 1908 and also through the Order in Council which came into operation in January, 1921, and was made on the 9th day of February, 1920, I have failed to find in any of these rules a provision that would entitle us to take upon ourselves to make such an order as is asked for. The question is no longer one of the proceedings before this Court. Proceedings before this Court have terminated and the whole matter is before the Judicial Committee. In this connection it is noticeable that under r. 13 of the provisions made by the Privy Council for Indian appeals, where at any time between the admission of an appeal and the despatch of the record to England the record becomes defective by reason of the death or change of status of a party to the appeal, the Court, on an application, may grant a certificate showing who, in the opinion of the Court, is the proper person to be substituted or entered on the record in place of, or in addition to, the party who has died or undergone a change of status; so that in such a case all that this Court can do is to grant a certificate. In that case the name of such person shall be deemed to be so substituted or entered on the record without express order of His Majesty in Council. On the other hand, by r. 14 where an appeal becomes defective subsequently to the despatch of the record to England the Court may cause a certificate to be transmitted to the Registrar of the Privy Council showing who, in the opinion of the Court, is the proper person to be substituted; and there the matter stops so far as this Court is concerned. In my opinion any order such as is herein asked for would be assuming a jurisdiction of a character which is materially different from anything that can be justified by the rules which govern Courts in India. It is, however, right to say that in the present case it does not appear to me that the order asked for would be an order which it would be either reasonable or in the interest of the minors to make. As I understand the matter, the minors in the ten appeals in question are concerned in resisting the claim of the landlord to a certain enhancement of rent. It appears in the present case that out of all the respondents who are sui juris no one appears to be entering appearance or defending the case upon appeal to His Majesty in Council. No doubt, that attitude is adopted with a quite intelligent appreciation of the interest of the parties. It is quite clear that if we were to make an order upon the appellant directing him to put the applicant in funds of £ 400, apart from any question of hardship upon the appellant who has given Rs. 6,000 security for costs for all these appeals already the result upon the interest of the minors might well be disastrous. If by any chance the appeals were to succeed with the result that the minor respondents became chargeable for such a large sum as their own costs in the appeals the result would probably be that the whole of their interest in the tenancies would be sold and they would be deprived probably of their means of life. On the other hand, if the appeals should succeed ex parte the result would be presumably that there would be a certain enhancement of rent and it by no means follows that the Privy Council would direct them to pay any costs which in all the circumstances it would be inequitable or unjust that they should pay. I am not in the least satisfied that even if this Court had the power to make such an order as is asked for it would be in the interest of the minor respondents that the order should be made. On the contrary it appears to me that on the question of interest the common sense of the matter is that the attitude adopted by those respondents who are sui juris is an indication of the fact that it is better that the appeals should be heard ex parte on points of law and that the order asked for should not be made. This is a matter of first impression and I have thought it necessary to explain in detail the position.

The applications, therefore, must be refused. There will be no order as to costs.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), ss. 22, 23, 151.
Transfer of case—Plaintiff's right to choose forum.
Grounds for transfer.

The plaintiff has a right to choose the forum for his action and a very strong case must be made out by the defendant before the plaintiff can be deprived of that right. In deciding whether a suit should or should not be transferred it is not merely the convenience of the defendant that has to be considered but the plaintiff's convenience should also be borne in mind. [p. 870, col. 1.]

Application under ss. 22, 23 and 151 of the Civil Procedure Code on behalf of the Petitioner.

Lala Badri Das, R. B., and Dr. G. C. Narang, for the Petitioner.

Lala Moti Sagar, R. B., and Messrs. Shamair Chand and Qabul Chand, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application under ss. 22, 23 and 151 of the Civil Procedure Code made by the defendant Ruchi Ram, Khattar, for the transfer of a civil suit for the recovery of Rs. 1,08,974-8-3 instituted in the Court of the Sub-Judge of Rawalpindi to the Dera Ismail Khan District in the North-Western Frontier Province. The suit is based on a promissory note admittedly executed by the petitioner in favour of one Sundar Das. Sundar Das, it is alleged, endorsed the promissory note in favour of Sarab Narain Shah, plaintiff. The promissory note was admittedly executed in Dera Ismail Khan where the petitioner resides, but it is alleged that Sundar Das, who also is a defendant in the suit and is a resident of Rawalpindi, endorsed it to Sarab Narain Shah in Rawalpindi. Sarab Narain Shah himself is a resident of the Jhelum District. He does not carry on any business in Dera Ismail Khan.

The application, for transfer is made on the ground that there was a dispute between Ruchi Ram and Sundar Das with regard to certain contracts alleged to have been jointly taken by them which was referred to arbitration. The award of the arbitrator was that Sundar Das should pay Rs. 1,25,000 to Ruchi Ram. An application was, therefore, made in the Court of the District Judge at Dera Ismail Khan to file the award and it appears that during the pendency of that application Ruchi Ram attempted to attach before judgment the amount due from him to Sundar Das on the basis of the promissory note, but for some reason or other he did not succeed to attach the amount. It is alleged by the petitioner that in order to prevent the attachment of the amount due on the promissory note Sundar Das fictitiously endorsed the promissory note to Sarab Narain Shah, a relation of his. It is alleged that a good portion of the amount originally due on the promissory note has been paid by the petitioner and that this will be the main defence in the case. It is, therefore contended that it will be very inconvenient for the petitioner (the defendant) if the suit is tried in Rawalpindi as he will have to bring his witnesses all the way from Dera Ismail Khan, or it will be necessary to issue commissions for their examination as the Court is not competent to procure their attendance in Rawalpindi, a course which it is contended will be unsatisfactory. It will thus be observed that the sole ground for the transfer of the suit is the convenience of the defendant.

The petition is strenuously opposed both by Sarab Narain Shah and Sundar Das. Sarab Narain Shah, as I have already stated, has no connection with Dera Ismail Khan and naturally it will be very inconvenient to him if he is made to go to that District to prosecute his case. A large number of judicial authorities were cited by Counsel on both sides in support of their respective contentions. I do not propose to discuss them in this judgment as an examination thereof shows that each depended on its peculiar facts which influenced the learned Judges to transfer or not to transfer the cases before them. The principle, however, is well-established that it is the right of the plaintiff to choose the forum for his action and that in deciding whether the plaintiff should be deprived of that right a very strong case must be made out by the defendant, and further that in deciding whether a suit should or should not be transferred it is not merely the convenience of the defendant, that has to be considered but the plaintiff's convenience should also be borne in mind.

Now, in the present case, while it is true that it suits the petitioner (the defendant) that the case should be tried in Dera Ismail Khan where he resides and carries on business, it is equally clear that it will be very inconvenient to the plaintiff if he is ordered to prosecute his suit in the Dera Ismail Khan District. It also appears from the allegations made by the petitioner in the petition for transfer that the right of the plaintiff to maintain the suit is likely to be questioned on the alleged ground that the transfer was fictitious and mala fide. I express no opinion whether such a plea is open to the defendant or not, or whether there is any substance in that plea, but if such a plea is raised it may be necessary for the Court to adjudicate on the genuineness of the transfer of the promissory note to the plaintiff. Evidence on that point will be available mostly in Rawalpindi.

After a careful consideration of all the circumstances I am not satisfied that this is a fit case in which I should exercise my discretion by transferring it to the Dera Ismail Khan District. It is obvious that both parties are anxious to look to their own convenience only and to disregard the interests of the other party. But the plaintiff having the primary right to choose the Court for the institution of the suit, I see no reason to deprive him of that right in this case. The consequence is that this petition is dismissed with costs.

ORDER.—This is an application to transfer a suit upon a promissory note which was instituted by the endorsee of the note in the Court of Small Causes, Madras, on 3rd November, 1926. The suit was first decreed ex parte on the 23rd November, 1926, and subsequently restored on the 2nd February, 1927. A preliminary point has been taken under s. 22, Civil Procedure Code that it is incumbent upon the defendant who seeks a transfer of the suit to make his application at the "earliest possible opportunity" and that this condition was not complied with here. It appears that after the setting aside of the decree on the 2nd February an application was made on the 5th for a revocation of the leave granted to file the suit in Madras and that this application was eventually dismissed on the 25th February. The defendant came here with this petition on the 3rd March, 1927. I do not think, it would be reasonable to have expected him to have moved before the 5th February when the suit was formally restored on the 2nd February, although it is true that a conditional order was made for the restoration as early as the 7th January. I do not, therefore, clearly understand the reasoning of the learned Small Cause Court Judge where he finds that the application before him was liable to dismissal on the ground of delay. It is then for consideration whether the time taken by that proceeding may properly be excluded in considering whether there was delay in coming up here. My attention has been directed to Shiv Dutt v. Motiram (1) where an application of this nature was rejected on the ground that defendant instead of coming at the earliest opportunity to the High Court, had challenged the jurisdiction of the lower Court; but that case is distinguishable from the circumstances here, because here there seems to have been no contention that the cause of action did not arise in Madras but the revocation was rather sought because it was just and expedient to try the case elsewhere, which I take to mean that considerations of convenience should be allowed to weigh. When the law provides facilities for obtaining a transfer by proceedings before the trial Court I do not think it can be said that in taking such proceedings a party has been guilty of delay and has not come here at the earliest opportunity. I think, therefore, that in this respect the terms of s. 22 may be deemed to have been observed.

On the merits, the defendant's case is that the note was obtained from him without payment of consideration and that it was assigned for the purpose of being sued upon to the brother-in-law one Srinivasa Iyengar, who negotiated the execution of it, and that the endorsee is not a bona fide holder. It may be the case that the defendant has to examine witnesses to prove these contentions in Tanjore and his accounts which are there in one of the Courts, may have to be produced. I have been shown a number of authorities with regard to the test to be applied as to whether or not a transfer of a suit should be ordered. There is the extreme view taken by Knox, J., in Madho Prasad v. Moti Chand (2), namely, that the mere convenience of the parties is not a good reason for ordering a transfer and that such an order should rather be made in view of the personnel of the Judge than personnel of the parties. I do not think that this view, without more qualification, has been accepted in subsequent decisions as a correct view of the scope of s. 22. But undoubtedly in the cases which have been brought to my attention it has been held that the burden lay very heavily on the defendant to show that considerations of convenience should outweigh the cardinal principle that it is the right of the plaintiff as arbiter lites to choose his own forum. A decision to that effect is to be found in Roop Chand v. Gokal Chand (3).

Two cases were cited for the petitioner in which transfers have been ordered on balance of convenience, namely, Banarsi Das v. Kishori Lal (4) and Herendra Lall Roy v. Sarvamangala Debee (5). It appears to me that in both these cases the balance of convenience for a transfer was almost overwhelming in character. On a consideration of the circumstances of this case, as they are to be gathered from the affidavits, I am not satisfied that this test will succeed here. I have stated what the defendant's case is but I am unable to say whether it is a true or a false case, and it appears to me that one should rather look to the allegations of the plaintiff than those of the defendant in considering an application of this description. The plaintiff who lives in Madras claims to be a bona fide holder in due course and to prove that a certain part of the evidence must come from Madras. Considering all the circumstances, therefore, I am not prepared to transfer the case to Tanjore. The C. M. P. No. 945 of 1927 will, therefore, be dismissed with costs one set.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiffs in this suit and defendant No. 2 are brothers. The latter was appointed guardian of the property of the plaintiffs who were then both minors in Miscellaneous Application No. 12 of 1920 by this Court. About the year 1925 defendant No. 2 as such certificated guardian applied for leave to raise a loan of Rs. 50,000 on mortgage of the plaintiff property belonging jointly to plaintiffs and defendant No. 2. Leave was granted by Kennedy, A. J. C. in his District Court Jurisdiction authorising the guardian (defendant No. 2) to raise a loan of Rs. 50,000 on the mortgage of the property. In pursuance of this authority defendant No. 2 raised a loan of Rs. 25,000 only from defendant No. 1, and executed a mortgage deed mortgaging the property to defendant No. 1 to secure payment of the said amount of Rs. 25,000. The mortgage deed contains a provision authorising the mortgagee to sell the mortgaged property without the intervention of the Court on failure of mortgagors to re-pay the mortgage amount at stipulated time. The period stipulated having expired and interest on the mortgage amount being in arrears, the mortgagee (defendant No. 1) in pursuance of the power of sale conferred by the mortgage deed has advertised the sale of the mortgaged property.

The plaintiffs have instituted the present suit for a declaration, inter alia, that the power of sale contained in the said mortgage deed is invalid and of no effect and for an injunction restraining the defendant No. 1 from selling the property.

The first issue for decision is, whether the power of sale without the intervention of the Court conferred upon the mortgagee (defendant No. 1) by the certificated guardian (defendant No. 2) is valid so far as it affects the interest of the plaintiffs.

It seems to me that the finding on this issue must be in the negative. Under s. 29, cl. (a) of the Guardians and Wards Act VIII of 1890 it is expressly provided that where a person has been appointed by the Court to be guardian of the property of a ward, he shall not, without the previous permission of the Court, mortgage or sell or transfer by sale gift, exchange, or otherwise any part of the immoveable property of a ward. On behalf of the mortgagee (defendant No. 1) it was contended that permission to mortgage granted by this Court in the exercise of its District Court Jurisdiction carried with it permission to sell without the intervention of the Court, because it is an ordinary incident of a mortgage in Karachi under the provisions of s. 69, cl. (c) of the Transfer of Property Act, I am, however, of opinion that the power conferred by the Court upon a certificated guardian to transfer, charge or otherwise encumber any part of the immoveable property of a ward should be strictly construed. Where a guardian raised money on the mortgage of minors' property with the Court's sanction but the order of the Court did not specify the rate of interest at which the guardian was authorised to borrow, although the mortgage-bond provided for 18 per cent., their Lordships of the Privy Council on appeal allowed only 12 per cent. as the reasonable rate of interest. Their Lordships observed that it would certainly seem desirable that a Court which has thrown upon it the responsibility of authorising loans to be raised upon the security of infants' estate should, where possible, specify the rate of interest or the maximum rate of interest at which the loan should be raised. And, where an order which authorises the loan of a principal sum but says nothing about interest, the proper construction is that it authorises a loan at a reasonable rate of interest. Gangapershad Sahu v. Maharani Bibi (1). A fortiori it seems to me that permission to mortgage will not imply a permission to sell unless it is expressly conferred. And even when permission to sell is expressly conferred it is enacted by s. 31 of the Act that the Court may in its discretion attach to the permission any reasonable condition such as that the sale shall not be complete without the sanction of the Court or such other conditions as are enumerated in cl. 3 of that section.

If defendant No. 1 had sued on the mortgage and obtained a decree for sale, I take it that even then the sanction of the Court would have been necessary before the shares of the minor mortgagors could have been validly sold. I, therefore, hold that the absolute power of sale without the intervention of the Court conferred on the mortgagee is invalid and of no effect so far as it affects the shares of the plaintiffs.

The next question arises whether the defendant No. 1 can exercise his power of sale to the extent of the right, title and interest of defendant No. 2. Mr. Dipchand argued that the mortgage security being one and indivisible the mortgagee cannot exercise his mortgage right against a portion only of the mortgaged property.

(1) 11 C. 379; 12 I. A. 47; 4 Sar. P. C. J. 621; 9 Ind. Jur. 158; 5 Ind. Dec. (N. s.) 1012 (P. C.).

He relied upon the analogy of the provision in ss. 60 and 67 cl. (d) of the Transfer of Property Act. The principle underlying those sections is that the mortgage security being one and single its disintegration by allowing partial redemption might be disastrous to the interest of the mortgagee. A mortgagee, observed Morgan, C. J., is entitled to say to each of several persons who may have succeeded to the mortgagor's interest that he shall not be entitled to redeem a part of the property on payment of part of the debt because the whole and every part of the land mortgaged is liable for the whole debt. Mahtab Singh v. Misree Lall (2). And, while s. 82 of the Transfer of Property Act defines the relation of mortgagors inter se, there is nothing in the provisions of Transfer of Property Act to support the conclusion that the mortgagee must distribute his debt in a certain manner or that he is unable to enforce it against each and every part of the property made security for the mortgage. Timaji Krishna Potdar v. Rama Piraji Bhatkhande (3), Raghu Nath Pershad v. Harlal Sadhu (4). The mortgagee's right to be paid the whole of his debt from whatever portion of the mortgaged property he wishes to apply in his suit cannot be questioned. Krishna Ayyar v. Muthukumarasawamiya Pillai (5). There is nothing in the provisions of the Act to support the view that as between a mortgagee and the holders of the equity of redemption the former is bound to distribute his debt rateably upon the mortgaged properties. Hara Kumari Chaudhuran v. Eastern Mortgage and Agency Co. Ltd (6).

In this view of the law it seems to be that there is nothing to prevent the mortgagee (defendant No. 1) from bringing the right, title and interest of defendant No. 2 to sale in exercise of the power of sale without the intervention of the Court conferred upon him by the mortgage-deed.

For these reasons, I declare that the power of sale without the intervention of the Court conferred by the mortgage-deed executed by defendant No. 2 in favour of defendant No. 1 is invalid and of no effect so far as it affects the shares of the plaintiffs in the mortgaged property and I

Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Art. 75—Instalment bond—Default of instalment—Waiver—Acceptance of money by creditor, when constitutes waiver.

In order to constitute waiver of the right to enforce a forfeiture clause in an instalment bond by acceptance of payment, the payment must be made on account of the specific instalments in arrears and not a mere part-payment in redemption of the whole debt, and the creditor must accept it as such.

Second appeal from the decree of the Additional District Judge, Karnal, dated the 21st of February, 1927, reversing that of the Additional Subordinate Judge, Fourth Class, Karnal, dated the 29th of January, 1926.

Mr. Shamair Chand, for the Appellants.

Mr. Fakir Chand, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The suit, out of which this appeal has arisen, was instituted by the plaintiff-respondent for recovery of Rs. 700 alleged to be due to him by the defendant on foot of a balance struck on the 10th February, 1923, it having been agreed that the amount due, would be payable in six monthly instalments of Rs. 50 each beginning with the 2nd of May, 1923, and that if default was made in the payment of any instalment the whole sum would become due. The plaintiff alleged that such default had occurred and deducting Rs. 240 which the defendant had paid on two occasions he sued for the remaining sum of Rs. 700. The suit was dismissed by the Subordinate Judge who held that, though default had occurred, the plaintiff had waived the benefit of the default clause by accepting a payment of Rs. 200 on 3rd October, 1924. The plaintiff appealed to the learned District Judge who came to a contrary conclusion and decreed the suit in full.

On second appeal it is contended by Mr. Shamair Chand on behalf of the defendant-appellant that the lower Appellate Court has not interpreted the agreement rightly and that, accordingly to a correct reading of it, the defendant was not liable to pay the whole debt on failure to pay any instalment. The agreement is contained in a document written in Landa characters and to interpret it, two experts were called. The learned District Judge has accepted the interpretation placed on it by one of them which supported the case of the plaintiff-respondent. I have examined the document and, after hearing Counsel, I agree with the learned District Judge in accepting the interpretation given by the witness Lala Daya Ram. I, therefore, see no force in this contention and reject it.

Mr. Shamair Chand next contends that, even if the whole sum had become payable on default being made in payment of one instalment it must be held that the plaintiff waived his right to enforce the default clause by accepting Rs. 200 on the 3rd of October, 1924. It must be noted, however, that on the date on which this payment was made three instalments had become due and the total sum due was Rs. 150 only. As against this, the defendant paid the sum of Rs. 200. In these circumstances it cannot be said that the payment was made specifically on account of the instalments which were over due or that the plaintiff in accepting this amount can be said to have waived the forfeiture. Mr. Shamair Chand concedes that the law is now settled that in order to constitute waiver the payment must be on account of the specific instalments in arrears and not a mere part-payment in redemption of the whole debt and that the creditor must accept it as such. In the present case there is no doubt that the payment of Rs. 200 was made in account and not for the specific instalments which were overdue. By accepting Rs. 200 the plaintiff-respondents cannot be said to have waived his right to enforce the forfeiture clause and, in my opinion, the learned District Judge came to a correct conclusion in decreeing the suit.

The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Bengal Tenancy Act (VIII of 1885), s. 111—Defendant raising question of status—S. 111, applicability of.

Section 111 of the Bengal Tenancy Act does not mean that in any case in which the defendant-tenant chooses to raise a question as to status the landlord is prevented from taking action under the ordinary law in the Civil Court.

Nasarulla Mia v. Amiruddi (1), relied on.

Rule against an order of the Munsif, Fourth Court, Diamond-Harbour, dated the 16th of March, 1927.

Babu Satindra Nath Roy Chowdhury, for the Petitioner.

Babu Panna Lal Chatterji, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

Rankin, C. J.—In this case a suit in ejectment was brought against the defendant alleging that he was an under-raiyat and that notice had been given under s. 49 of the Bengal Tenancy Act. The defendant by his written statement claimed to be an occupancy raiyat and having claimed to be an occupancy raiyat he contends that by s. 111 of the Bengal Tenancy Act, the proceedings against him should in effect be stayed until three months after the final publication of the Record of Rights.

The Court below has refused this contention and said that the suit is one for recovery of khas possession and s. 111 does not apply to the case.

I am of opinion that the Court below is right in the view it has taken of s. 111. I do not think that it can be imputed to the section as its meaning that in any case in which the defendant chooses to raise a question as to status the landlord is prevented from taking action under the ordinary law in such matters.

We have been referred to a judgment in a Civil Rule (No. 10 of 1925). There are certain passages in that judgment which give colour to the contention of the present petitioner but upon a careful consideration of s. 111 and its real meaning, I am not of opinion that it can be laid down that in any case where the defendant chooses to raise a question of status the plaintiffs are rendered powerless so far as the Civil Court is concerned.

The Rule is discharged with costs, the hearing-fee being assessed at one gold mohur.

Costello, J.—I agree. I only desire to add that, in my opinion, the point raised is amply covered by a decision of Mitra, J., in Nasarulla Mia v. Amiruddi (1). In that case the suit was one for rent and the defendant pleaded non-liability denying the relationship of landlord and tenant. He claimed the status of a jotedar or occupancy raiyat and put forward the Record of Rights and settlement rent-roll published on the 28th October, 1900, as a bar to the plaintiffs' claim. The plaintiffs' contention was that neither s. 104-H nor s. 111-A of the Bengal Tenancy Act applied to the facts of that case and the learned Judge in his judgment said: "We think this contention is sound and the appeal must be allowed." There is also a similar decision in the same volume [see Rajaram Singh v. Sheo Persad Roy (2)] of the Calcutta Law Journal at page 63 of the Notes portion at the end of the volume.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XLI, r. 4—Appeal by one of several defendants—Reversal of decree in favour of all, legality of.

In an appeal by one of several defendants, the Appellate Court cannot reverse the decree in favour of them all where the appealing defendant does not purport to appeal on behalf of all and his defence is different from that of the others. [p. 876, col. 2.]

Petition for revision of the decree of the Senior Subordinate Judge, Multan, dated the 15th November, 1926, reversing that of the Additional Subordinate Judge, Fourth Class, Khanewal, District Multan, dated the 30th April, 1926.

Mr. Ram Lal Anand, for Mr. Ram Chand Manchanda, for the Petitioners.

Messrs. Ghulam Rasul and Din Dayal, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff, Amir Chand, instituted a suit against three persons Kahan Das, Jinda Ram and Hari Chand for recovery of a certain sum of money which was alleged to be due to him on foot of an entry in the bahi made by Hari Chand as the Karinda of a firm working under the name and style of Kahan Das-Jinda Ram. It was alleged that this firm consisted of two partners Kahan Das and Jinda Ram and that Hari Chand as their agent had made the entry in question.

The defence put forward by Jinda Ram was that the partnership had ended long before the entry in question was made that the firm had no previous dealings with the plaintiff and that Hari Chand had authority to raise the debt. Nor was any portion of the money so raised used for any purpose in which he was concerned.

Kahan Das admitted that he was a partner in the firm and that Hari Chand had authority on behalf of the firm to make the entry. He also admitted that as a member of the firm he was liable for the debt, but pleaded that he had paid off his share of the debt and that he was no longer liable to pay anything more to the plaintiff.

Hari Chand's defence was that he was a mere servant of the other two defendants and was not personally liable.

The Subordinate Judge discharged Hari Chand on the ground that he was a servant and not a partner in the firm. He also held that the defence put forward by Kahan Das and Jinda Ram respectively had not been established. He accordingly passed a decree against both Kahan Das and Jinda Ram.

Against this decree Jinda Ram alone appealed to the learned Senior Subordinate Judge raising the same pleas as he had argued in the trial Court. Kahan Das did not appeal and does not appear to have been present at the hearing. The learned Senior Subordinate Judge accepted the contentions put forward on behalf of Jinda Ram and accepted the appeal, but instead of dismissing the suit against him alone, he dismissed it against Kahan Das also.

The plaintiff has come up to this Court on the revision side and on his behalf it is urged that the defence set up by Kahan Das and Jinda Ram was separate, that the findings of trial Court against Kahan Das had not been reversed by the learned Senior Subordinate Judge, that O. XLI, r. 4 is inapplicable and the Senior Subordinate Judge ought not to have dismissed the suit against Kahan Das.

The findings of the lower Appellate Court in favour of Jinda Ram are also attacked but after hearing the petitioner's Counsel I do not find any sufficient ground to interfere with this part of the case in revision. There is no material irregularity committed by the Appellate Court in deciding the point on which the suit was dismissed against Jinda Ram. I, therefore, dismiss the revision as against him.

On behalf of Kahan Das I have heard Mr. Ghulam Rasul but after giving due weight to his contentions I am of opinion that the petition must succeed so far as he is concerned. As pointed out already his defence was wholly different from that of Jinda Ram. He had clearly admitted his membership of the firm at the time when the entry was executed as also the authority of Hari Chand to raise the money on his behalf. He had preferred no appeal himself nor did Jinda Ram purport to appeal on his behalf. The grounds on which the appeal of Jinda Ram was accepted were wholly different from the defence set up by Kahan Das. The learned Senior Subordinate Judge was not, therefore, justified in dismissing the suit as against Kahan Das.

Accordingly I accept the petition for revision to this extent that the suit of the plaintiff-petitioner against Kahan Das defendant-respondent will be decreed in full with costs in the trial Court and in this Court, but the suit as against Jinda Ram and Hari Chand is dismissed.

Jinda Ram will have his costs from the petitioner in all Courts.

Messrs. G. C. Narang and Jai Gopal Sethi, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

Agha Haidar, J.—This is a plaintiff's appeal which arises out of a suit for partition. It was originally instituted by a lady named Musammat Aso. While the appeal was pending in the lower Appellate Court, Musammat Aso died and her son Hira Singh was brought on the record as her legal representative. In order to understand the controversy in suit it is necessary to bear in mind the following narrative of facts.

One Gulab Singh was the husband of Musammat Aso. He died many years ago, leaving him surviving his widow, Musammat Aso and three sons by her, namely, Nikka Singh, Ganesha Singh and Hira Singh. The sons constituted a joint Hindu family governed by the Law of Mitakshara. On the 1st of December, 1884, it appears that Hira Singh separated from the family and a one-fourth share of the family property was allotted to him. He executed a document called farighkhathi. In that document the fact of his separation is mentioned and it is further recited that the family property having been divided into four equal shares, Hira Singh had separated with his one-fourth share and had no concern left with the family property, that the remaining three-fourths share of the property was left with Ganesha Singh, Nikka Singh and their mother Musammat Aso and that it would be competent to them to keep the corpus of the property either whole or in separated shares and that they were owners of their respective shares (aur nam burdgan apne apne hissey ke mukhtar hain). It appears that the family property was not divided by metes and bounds and Ganesha Singh, Nikka Singh and their mother Musammat Aso continued to live together. Nikka Singh died in 1900. In 1917 Ganesha Singh made a Will in favour of defendants Nos. 1 and 2, his daughters. Soon after making this Will, Ganesha Singh died. In 1918 Musammat Aso instituted the present suit in the Court of the learned Senior Subordinate Judge, Amritsar. She claimed two-thirds share in the whole of the family property, one-third as her own share which she got as a result of the partition of 1884 and another one-third as the heir of Nikka Singh, her deceased son.

It is important to note the defence which was set up by the defendants in the present suit. Their main defence was that the suit was barred by limitation, that their father Ganesha Singh was the sole owner of the whole property moveable and immoveable in which neither Nikka Singh nor the plaintiff had any share, that there was no property which jointly belonged to the plaintiff, Nikka Singh and Ganesha Singh and that the farighkhathi of 1884 did not confer any rights upon the plaintiff. The trial Court decreed the plaintiff's claim as regards the immoveable property in suit but as regards the family business it held that the suit was time-barred. The defendant preferred an appeal to the learned District Judge and the plaintiff filed cross-objections. The learned District Judge dismissed the plaintiff's suit in toto on two grounds which shall be discussed later on. Hira Singh, the legal representative of Musammamat Aso, has filed the present second appeal.

It may be stated at the outset that Mr. Badri Das, the learned Counsel for the appellant, intimated to the Court that he was not prepared to press his claim as regards the business carried on by the firm of Ganesha Singh and Gulab Singh.

The first ground for dismissing the plaintiff's suit is contained in the following sentences which is to be found in the judgment of the learned Judge of the lower Appellate Court:—

"The first point urged by defendants' Counsel is that the farighkhathi of 1884 did not affect the joint nature of the rest of the family property. Ganesha Singh in a previous case stated on 15th January, 1916, that by the farighkhathi of 1884 the entire property was divided into four portions, Hira Singh's portion being separated off while portions of the other three, namely, Ganesha Singh, Hira Singh and Musammamat Aso remained joint. This being so, I consider that defendants' Counsel is right in arguing that Musammamat Aso was not justified in suing for partition."

I may observe here that it is difficult to conceive a more confused and unsatisfactory finding. It appears to be a very unsatisfactory finding of fact which proceeds upon an even more unsatisfactory conception of a question of Hindu Law. The farighkhathi, as already stated, while recording the separation of Hira Singh from the joint family, clearly indicates the shares of Ganesha Singh, Nikka Singh and their mother Musammamat Aso. A perusal of this document brings the present case clearly within the principle of law as laid down by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Balkishen Das v. Ram Narain Sahu (1). In that case their Lordships of the Privy Council observe that where an ikrarnama executed by a member of a joint Hindu family stated in clear terms that the defined shares in the whole joint family property had been allotted to the co-parceners and also gave them the liberty either to live together or to separate their own business, the effect of the deed was to cause a separation in estate and interest between all the co-parceners. The clause giving the parties the option of being joint or separate was not inconsistent with a separation in estate.

In this view of the law there cannot be any doubt that there was a separation among all the members of the family and their mother as a result of the farighkhathi transaction. In Balabux Ladhuram v. Rukhmabai (2), their Lordships of the Privy Council laid down that there is no presumption when one co-parcener separates from the others that the latter remain united. They further observed that an agreement amongst the remaining members of a joint family to remain united or to re-unite must be proved like any other question of fact. In Kasam v. Jorawar Singh (3) their Lordships of the Privy Council have summarised the law on the subject in the following words:—

"It is settled law that in the case of a joint Hindu family subject to the law of Mitakshara, a severance of estate is effected by an unequivocal declaration on the part of one of the joint holders of his intention to hold his share separately, even though no actual division takes place."

All the leading Privy Council cases are quoted by their Lordships in support of this proposition. In view of these authorities there cannot be any doubt that after the year 1884 and by virtue of the deed of farighkhathi already mentioned, there was a complete disruption of the joint family and after the separation of Hira Singh's share Ganesha Singh, Nikka Singh and their mother, though living together, were in reality holding their shares in the eye of law separately. The learned Judge of the lower Appellate Court says that Ganesha Singh in a previous suit on the 15th of January, 1916, stated that by the farighkhathi, 1884, the entire property was divided into four portions. Hira Singh's portion being separated off while the portions of the other three, namely, Ganesha Singh, Nikka Singh and Musammamat Aso remained joint. The learned Judge of the trial Court at the bottom of page 5 of the printed paper-book has observed that "in the present case there is no evidence of it (re-union). That it is not a case of survivorship is clearly proved from the facts that it is not pleaded in the present case". Re-union has neither been alleged nor proved by the defendants. It becomes exceedingly difficult to understand what the learned Judge meant by saying that Musammatt Aso remained joint. If he meant that the property was not divided by metes and bounds he is perfectly right because this is the plaintiff's case. If the learned Judge was thinking of re-union and even assuming that such a line of reasoning was open to him on the pleadings, he would be confronted with the elementary principle of Hindu Law of the Mitakshara School that a member of a joint Hindu family once separated can re-unite only with his father, brother or paternal uncle but not with any other relation. And it is hardly necessary to solemnly lay down that a mother is not a member of the co-parcenary body constituting a joint Hindu family. She is only entitled to maintenance while the joint status of the family continues and it is only when one of her sons brings a suit for partition that she is entitled to claim a share in the family property. It comes to this that the finding of the learned Judge that "Musammatt Aso remained joint" if he meant to hold that the family re-united and re-newed its joint status, is a finding based upon an erroneous view of law and does not amount to such a finding of fact as would be binding upon this Court in second appeal.

On behalf of the respondents the attention of the Court was directed to a case reported as Palani Ammal v. Muthuvenkatachala Moniagar (4). This was a suit for partition and the defence of the defendant-appellant was that the members of the family had already separated long ago. In this case their Lordships observed at page 259* : "In the present case there were concurrent judgments of the District Judge and the High Court that the family descended from the propositus never separated, and that the property sought to be partitioned is partible". Their Lordships tested the findings of the Courts below by construing certain documents in order to draw legitimate inferences as to the intentions of the parties to the said documents and in the end accepted the findings of fact arrived at by the Courts in India. As a result of those findings the decree of the High Court was affirmed and the defendant's appeal was dismissed. In this view of the case the observations at pages 257-58* of the Report are more or less in the nature of obiter dicta. It may be noted, however, that Appovier v. Rama Subba Aiyar (5) and Balabux Ladhu-ram v. Rukhmabai (2) are quoted in the judgment of their Lordships.

The learned Judge of the lower Appellate Court has further observed that the plaintiff, in para. 3 of the plaint, states in so many words that after the farighkhati she and Nikka Singh and Ganesha Singh remained joint. I have read the original plaint very carefully and in my humble judgment the plaintiff clearly alleges partition and allotment of shares to Nikka Singh, Ganesha Singh and herself after Hira Singh had gone out of the family with his share. It is true that she speaks of the property being joint (mushtarik) but what she really meant was that though the shares had been divided and specified the corpus of the property had remained whole. I, therefore, find myself unable to agree with the findings of the lower Appellate Court on this part of the case.

The second ground on which the learned Judge of the lower Appellate Court has found against the plaintiff is that she was estopped from putting forward her present claim. He refers to certain statements made by Musammatt Aso as a witness in a previous litigation between Ganesha Singh and his brother Hira Singh. Those statements were found to be false by the Appellate Court in that case. The lady was no party to that suit and the learned Counsel for the respondents totally failed even to formulate his case as to how the lady could be estopped by anything which she might have said as a witness in the previous litigation when she was, apparently, supporting Ganesha Singh, the predecessor of the defendants in his claim against his brother Hira Singh. This finding of the lower Appellate Court also cannot be accepted. The suit having been disposed by the lower Appellate Court on these two points and the other questions arising in the suit not having been disposed of by that Court the case will have to be remanded for trial on the merits.

I would accordingly allow the appeal, set aside the decree of the Court below and remand the case under O. XII, r. 23 of the Civil Procedure Code. Costs here and here-

OPPOSITE PARTY.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 115, O. XXI, rr. 1, 4, 6, 8—Order allowing party to be examined on commission—Revision—Interference with discretion—Evidence on commission, whether should necessarily go in—Procedure where party is able to attend Court on day of hearing—Defendant pleading counter-claim—Examination on commission.

Where a Court is satisfied under r. 1 of O. XXVI of the Civil Procedure Code that a person is sick and unable to attend Court, and has exercised its discretion as to whether in those circumstances a Commission should issue and has issued a Commission, that discretion cannot be revised under s. 115 of the Code even if the judgment of the lower Court is not satisfactory. [p. 881, col. 2.]

The mere fact that a commission has been ordered for the examination of a witness is no reason whatever for any one to look at it unless it is found that at the time of the hearing, sickness or infirmity or other reason prevents the witness from giving his evidence in the ordinary way. [p. 832, col. 1.]

Order XXVI, r. 8 of the Civil Procedure Code is as much a rule of procedure in the Moffusil as anywhere else. [p. 882, col. 2.]

Even although a person's defence consists of an equitable counter-claim it is just that he should be examined on Commission if he is too ill to attend in Court to give his evidence. [ibid.]

JUDGMENT.

Rankin, C. J.—This is a Rule in revision obtained by the plaintiff calling upon the defendant to show cause why an order should not be set aside whereby the defendant was ordered to be examined on Commission at his own request.

It appears that the suit was launched in 1925 for the recovery of some Rs. 49,000 as remuneration due for work done as a managing contractor of a colliery and that the defendant had paid Court-fees on a counter-claim for some two and half lacs, on account of damages alleged to have been caused to the defendant's colliery by the negligence of the plaintiff. The issues which were settled in 1925 contained a great many matters arising out of the counter-claim.

In April, 1927 the defendant put in a petition that he might be examined on Commission on the ground that he was suffering from lumbago which made it impossible for him to remain in the same position for more than ten minutes. He filed a medical certificate to that effect. The plaintiff objected. He says that he took the point that the defendant in respect of the counter-claim was really in the position of a plaintiff. He disputed that the defendant was ill as alleged and that there was any necessity for his examination on Commission, and he attacked the independence of the Doctor who gave the medical certificate. The application was repeated and by the order of the 6th of May, 1927, the Subordinate Judge granted the application. It appears from the order recorded that the main ground of opposition was that "the case may not be taken up at an early date and that the witness even if he is unwell may recover in the meanwhile. The plaintiff does not admit that the witness is really ill. It is not known when the case can be taken up". Having set out these matters the learned Subordinate Judge goes on to say this:— "After hearing the Pleaders I do not think that it is a fit case in which the prayer for the examination of the witness on Commission shall be refused. I should, however, recoup the other party by giving the cost of Pleader for the examination of the said witness." He went on to order that the applicant should deposit Rs. 96 as plaintiff's Pleader's fee for three days and if the examination should last for more than three days the witness would be required to pay at the rate of Rs. 32 per day as the plaintiff's Pleader's fee.

This Rule was obtained by way of challenging that order and reliance has been placed by the learned Advocate who appears for the applicant upon several decisions of this Court. To begin with, it has to be observed that the present case is within O. XXVI, r. 1 of the Civil Procedure Code and that it is not a case under r. 4 to which different considerations may apply. That rule says:—"Any Court may in any suit issue a Commission for the examination on interrogatories or otherwise of any person resident within the local limits of its jurisdiction who is exempted under this Code from attending the Court or who is from sickness or infirmity unable to attend it."

In this class of cases we have not to deal with the case of a plaintiff who has a choice to bring his own suit in a particular forum and then asks to be examined on Commission on the ground that he cannot attend at the place where he has chosen to sue. We are dealing with an application on the ground of sickness or infirmity and, broadly speaking, even although a man's defence consists of an equitable counter-claim it would prima facie be more just that the defendant even if he has a counter-claim—if he really cannot attend to give his evidence in Court—should be examined on Commission. No doubt, it was the duty of the learned Subordinate Judge to satisfy himself very carefully as to the seriousness and reality of the sickness that was alleged and, if I may be allowed to say so, the judgment of the Subordinate Judge is very unhappily phrased. It is phrased in flabby language and it is indefinite to a degree.

The question is not whether this is a fit case in which the prayer for the examination of the witness on Commission should be refused. The question is whether it is a case in which it has been established by reason of the illness of the defendant that the prayer for examination on Commission must in justice be granted. It is, however, in my opinion, an unjust and hypercritical attitude to take to say that the learned Subordinate Judge has not intended to find that the defendant is ill and suffering from lumbago as alleged, and we have, therefore, to consider whether there is any real reason why this order should be interfered with under s. 115 of the Civil Procedure Code. It is quite clear that in a case of this character the whole jurisdiction to make such an order arises out of the fact which has to be found of the sickness of the person in question. When it is found that he is unable to attend Court by reason of sickness or infirmity the rest is a question of discretion. Indeed, it may be said that in such a case it would be a very strong measure to refuse an examination on Commission.

The learned Advocate for the applicant relied upon certain cases of this Court and of the High Court of Patna. These cases proceeded usually under r. 4 of O. XXVI, and they have reference to the question whether a plaintiff choosing his forum should be examined on Commission. So far as these cases are concerned, there appears to be authority for the proposition that if a Court does not think that the discretion given to the Court by r. 4 of O. XXVI is properly exercised it can treat the matter as a material irregularity. Other cases seem to go upon the footing that the Court can treat the matter as a material irregularity unless it appears from the order recorded by the lower Court that the principles of law which may be thought applicable to the subject-matter being disentangled, they were all considered and separately applied. Whether these cases are in the least consistent with the interpretation of the Privy Council from time to time of s. 115 of the Code may be seriously doubted. In the present case it is not necessary for me to discuss that particular question. Given the fact that the Court is satisfied under r. 1 of O. XXVI that the person is sick and unable to attend Court and that the Court has exercised its discretion as to whether in those circumstances a Commission should issue and has issued a Commission, I am clearly of opinion that that discretion cannot be revised under s. 115 of the Civil Procedure Code, whether the judgment of the Court below on this interlocutory application consists of a complete treatise on the subject or an incomplete treatise on the subject.

In the present case, however, it is advisable to call attention to r. 8 of O. XXVI. In a recent case in this Court [Mahim Chandra Guha v. Naba Chandra Chowdhury (1)], before Sir Nalini Ranjan

(1) 98 Ind. Cas. 552; 44 C. L. J. 238; A. I. R. 1927 Cal. 43.

Chatterjea and Mr. Justice Panton it has been pointed out that that rule is to be treated as a reality. That is a case of a man who got himself examined at a time when he was outside the jurisdiction. At the time of the hearing he was within the jurisdiction and the other party wanted him to give his evidence in Court in the ordinary way. The Court, as the man's evidence had been taken on Commission, allowed the Commission evidence to go in and it was pointed out that in those circumstances the evidence taken on Commission could not be read as evidence in the case against the defendant in view of the provisions of O. XXVI, r. 8, there being no material which would ground the exercise of a discretion on the part of the Court to dispense with the proof of the various matters mentioned in that rule. Again, in the case of Satish Chandra Chatterji v. Kumar Satish Kantha Roy (2), Lord Atkinson delivering the judgment of the Judicial Committee commented upon a case where it appears that in December, 1916, a Commissioner was appointed, evidence was given on Commission in January, 1917, and the trial commenced in February, 1917; and the Judicial Committee there pointed out: "Evidence taken on Commission should only be permitted to be used where the witness is proved to be too ill to give his evidence in Court or is absent or for other sufficient reason. If Satish went to the Court he could, and presumably would, have been accommodated with a seat" and so on, "The whole procedure in this matter strongly suggests that it was his aversion to undergo the ordeal of an examination in open Court, in the presence of those who knew him, rather than ill-health, which kept him from the witness-box."

I take this occasion to point out that when this case comes on for trial, the mere fact that this Commission has been ordered now will be no reason whatever by any one to look at it unless it is found that at the time of the hearing, sickness or infirmity or other reason prevents the witness from giving his evidence in the ordinary way. I say that the more emphatically as there is some authority in the books particularly in the case of Dhani Ram Mahtha v.

Murli Lal Mahtha (3) which gives colour to the view that once a Commission has been ordered and executed the Commission evidence goes in ipso facto and without further consideration. I do not say that that proposition was intended to be laid down in the case to which I have referred but the decision and the reasoning lend colour to that view and I am particularly anxious, therefore, that it should be made clear to the lower Court that r. 8 of O. XXVI is as much a rule of procedure in the Mofussil as anywhere else and that what the Privy Council has laid down and this Court has recently laid down in the case to which I have referred is the proper method for conducting the case. It does not seem to me that in this case the question whether the man is shown to be so ill that it was advisable to take his evidence on Commission is a question of such a character that the learned Subordinate Judge is bound to answer it correctly on pain of being guilty of a material irregularity.

In these circumstances I am of opinion that this Rule should be discharged with costs; hearing-fee two gold mohurs.

Punjab District Boards Act (XX of 1883), s. 31—Tax on professions, trades or callings according to income, legality of—Double income-tax—Jurisdiction—Civil Court's power to determine legality of tax.

If the method of assessment of a tax in reality makes the tax one on incomes, it is illegal and ultra vires even though it purports to be a tax on persons practising a profession or carrying on a trade or calling. The tax which can be imposed without the sanction of the Governor-General in Council on professions, trades or callings must be one which is not a second tax on the incomes of such persons, i.e., it must be a flat rate imposed by

JUDGMENT.

Addison, J.—Sixty-two members of the Sialkote Bar sued the District Board of Sialkote for a declaration that a certain tax imposed by that local body was ultra vires and illegal, and for an injunction restraining the Board from recovering the tax from them. The trial Court decreed the suit on the ground that the tax, though it purported to be a tax on trades, professions and callings, was in reality a tax on the incomes of persons carrying on trades or following professions or callings and that as an income-tax could not be imposed without the consent of the Governor-General in Council, it was illegal. On appeal the Senior Subordinate Judge held that it was not a tax on incomes but that it was illegal as the class of persons to be taxed was not defined. Against this decision the District Board has preferred this second appeal.

It is clear that under s. 30 of the Punjab District Boards Act a District Board may impose a tax on trades, professions and callings, and the procedure in imposing a tax of this nature is given in s. 31 of the Act. Under s. 31 (2) it is the duty of the Board to publish a notice defining the class of persons, or descriptions of the property proposed to be taxed, the amount or rate of the tax to be imposed, and the system of assessment to be adopted. This is, of course, prior to imposing the tax. When, however, the imposition has been notified, it is enacted by s. 31 (7) that the notification shall be conclusive evidence that the tax has been imposed in accordance with law.

The tax in question was imposed by Punjab Government Notification No. 14672, dated the 23rd May, 1924. This Notification gave the class of persons to be taxed and the rate of the tax, and runs as follows:—

“Under sub-s. (7) of s. 31 of the Punjab District Boards Act, 1883, the Punjab Government (Ministry of Education) are pleased to notify that with the requisite sanction the District Board of Sialkote has directed that, with effect from the 1st June, 1924, the following tax be imposed within the area, exclusive of Notified Areas, subject to its jurisdiction:—

DESCRIPTION OF TAX.

1. Class of persons to be taxed:—

All persons who carry on any trade or follow any profession or calling within the said area.

2. Rate of Tax.

The tax shall be levied according to the following scale on the total annual income derived by each assessee from any such trade, profession or calling, provided that such annual income shall not include that (a) received by way of wound or disability pensions for service in His Majesty's Naval, Military or Air Forces, (b) received on account of wages in kind by agricultural kamins for sep work done by them, and (c) derived from land subject to local rate or from livestock and agricultural produce owned by persons mainly dependent on agriculture for their livelihood:—

Group.	Annual income.	Amount of Tax payable.
	Rs.	Rs.
1	201—300	2
2	301—400	4
3	401—750	7
4	751—1,000	12
5	1,001—1,500	15
6	1,501—2,000	20
7	2,001 and over	30

The method of assessment was given in a subsequent notification.

It was contended by the learned Counsel who appeared for the appellant that the class of persons to be taxed was sufficiently defined by stating that all persons who carry on any trade or follow any profession or calling were to be taxed. It was further contended by him that in any case the plaintiffs had no cause of action as they undoubtedly are following a profession within the jurisdiction of the District Board of Sialkote. Lastly, it was contended by him that under sub-s. (7) of s. 31 the Notification must be taken to be conclusive evidence that the tax was imposed in accordance with law.

There is no doubt that sub-s. (2) of s. 31 has reference only to the stage when it is proposed to impose the tax and that at that stage no objection seems to have been taken. The Notification, therefore, must be taken to be conclusive evidence that the tax was imposed in accordance with law. In any case, I would hold that the words of the Notification already quoted sufficiently define the class of persons on whom the tax is imposed. All persons carrying on any trade or following any profession or calling come within the definition and that is as good as to give an exhaustive list of all trades, professions or callings. It may be that this definition may give rise to certain suits on the ground that the persons taxed do not carry on a trade or follow a profession or calling and that they are, therefore, not liable to be taxed. But it is clear that the plaintiffs are liable to be taxed under the Notification. In fact, in nearly all cases this will be evident. I, therefore, hold that the tax is not illegal by reason of the want of definition of the class of persons to be taxed, and I further hold that this objection is not open to the plaintiffs who clearly come within the class defined.

It remains to decide whether the tax, though purporting to be a tax on trades, professions or callings, is in reality an income-tax or not. If it is an income-tax, it is conceded that it cannot be imposed under s. 30 of the Punjab District Boards Act without the consent of the Governor-General in Council. This sanction has not been obtained. The Notification makes it clear that the tax is on the incomes of persons, practising any profession or carrying on any trade or calling within the jurisdiction of the District Board. These incomes are already liable to ordinary income-tax. Prima facie the tax under discussion does impose a second tax on the incomes of persons practising professions or carrying on trades or callings. It is argued, however, on behalf of the appellant, that as it is a tax only on persons practising a profession or carrying on a trade or calling, it is legal even though the method of assessment amounts to imposing a tax on the incomes of those persons. This argument appears to me to be fallacious. A second income-tax cannot be imposed though a tax on professions, trades or callings can be imposed. If the method of assessment in reality makes the tax one on incomes, it is illegal and ultra vires even though it purports to be a tax on persons practising a profession or carrying on a trade or calling. The tax which can be imposed without the sanction of the Governor-General in Council, on professions, trades or callings must be one which is not a second tax on the incomes of such persons, i.e., there must be a flat rate imposed by the tax on each profession, trade or calling, or rather on all persons practising a particular profession or carrying on a particular trade or calling. This difficulty seems to have been realised subsequently and I notice that flat rates are given in the case of Punjab Government Notification No. 23447 dated the 16th August, 1926. By this Notification a tax on trades, professions or callings was imposed within the area subject to the jurisdiction of the District Board of Multan.

A tax on animals is another tax which can be imposed by District Boards with the previous sanction of the Local Government only. There are numerous instances of such a tax being imposed and the method adopted is to impose a flat rate on each class of animals. If the present tax, however, is legal, it would also be legal to impose a tax on animals as follows, namely, the tax to be so much on an income of so much and rising or falling in accordance with the incomes of the persons owning the animals. Can it be said that, such a tax is not an income-tax, that is a tax on incomes? In my judgment there is no escape from the conclusions that the tax imposed under Punjab Government Notification No. 14672 dated the 23rd May, 1924, within the area subject to the jurisdiction of the District Board of Sialkote is illegal and ultra vires in that it is a second income-tax on persons practising professions or carrying on trades or callings. There is clear authority of this Court [Pala Ram v. Notified Area Committee, Kot Addu (1) and Committee of Notified Area, Una v. Chatar Behari Narain (2)] that a Civil Court has jurisdiction to determine whether the imposition of a tax is illegal or ultra vires and to give relief if it has been levied from persons who for that reason are not liable to pay the same.

In these circumstances I would dismiss this appeal but leave the parties to bear their own costs in it.

Ornaments acquired by a woman partly as presents before her marriage from the husband's grandmother and partly as presents after her marriage from her husband are ajautuka stridhan. [p. 886, col. 1.]

Jautuka stridhan is not confined to presents given actually before the nuptial fire but the limits within which such presents become jautuka stridhan are somewhat narrow. [ibid.]

In 1905, plaintiff's mother died possessed of valuable ornaments. Her husband was in possession of the ornaments till his death in 1909. They remained after his death in the family safe and the step-brothers of the plaintiff who was an infant at the time, carried on the family concerns. The plaintiff attained majority in 1910. In 1919 disputes arose between the parties as to the ornaments and the plaintiff sued for their recovery from his step-brothers in 1920:

Held, (1) that the cause of action for the suit arose only when the plaintiff demanded the ornaments from the defendants, that the proper Article of the Limitation Act applicable to the case was Art. 49, and that the suit was not barred; [p. 888, col. 1.]

(2) that even assuming that Art. 120 applied to the case the suit was within time. [ibid.]

JUDGMENT.

Rankin, C. J.—In this case the plaintiff Goonendra brought a suit against two defendants originally—his step-brothers Bhupendra and Jnanendra. Jnanendra has since died pending the suit; but I will omit for the sake of simplicity the complications caused by that event. The plaintiff's case is that his father Woopendra Nath Bhosé was married twice, that by his first wife he had two sons, namely, the defendants, and that, after the death of his first wife, he married one Sushila Sundari Dassi and by her he had two children—the elder of the two being a daughter and the younger being the plaintiff. It seems that in the year 1905, Woopendra practically retired from business and his business affairs were managed by Bhupendra and Jnanendra. In the same year, Sushila Sundari died. Woopendra survived her by some four years till 1909, and, in 1910, the plaintiff attained majority. These are the broadest facts of the family history with which we are concerned.

The plaintiff's case is that when his mother Sushila Sundari died in 1905, she died possessed of a good many valuable personal ornaments of which certain descriptions have been given in the course of the evidence. These ornaments, according to the plaintiff, were acquired by his mother in such a way as to be her ajautuka stridhan and the plaintiff undertakes to show that they were ajautuka stridhan because otherwise, if they were jautuka stridhan, they would belong not to the plaintiff but to his sister Srimati Saroj Basini Dassi. That is the first point in the case. The defendants, in addition to putting the plaintiff to proof of the existence of the ornaments and the jewellery and of the fact that they were acquired so as to become Sushila Sundari's ajautuka stridhan, deny altogether that any such property came at any time to their hands. The learned Judge has said that they put forward four different inconsistent cases and he has disbelieved the defendants and has believed the plaintiff. It becomes necessary in this case to state as matters of simple fact what the plaintiff's evidence establishes, because a great difficulty has arisen in this case from the fact that legal interpretations have been somewhat rashly put upon facts without sufficiently considering the distinction between the facts themselves and the legal results of certain facts. I am quite satisfied that the evidence adduced by the plaintiff entitled the learned Judge to hold, and that he meant to hold, the following facts:—First of all, the learned Judge has believed the evidence (which is the only evidence upon the point) given by Kusum Kumari Dassi as regards the way in which the plaintiff's mother came to be possessed of the articles in question and as to the fact that these articles came to the hands of the defendants. The lady explains that Sushila Sundari obtained the articles in question in two ways: First, she says they were presents given by the witness herself, Kusum Kumari, before Sushila's marriage to Woopendra and, secondly, she says they were presents which Sushila got from Woopendra after the marriage. Now, as to that, when the Hindu Law is examined, it turns out that the difference between ajautuka and jautuka stridhan is a matter which requires some little consideration. Jautuka stridhan is not entirely confined, it would appear, to presents given actually before the nuptial fire. But the limits within which such presents become jautuka stridhan are somewhat narrow. Kusum Kumari the grandmother having given her evidence in the manner I have described for the plaintiff is in no way cross-examined with a view to show that the particular facts to which she is speaking bring the case on a careful examination to a case of jautuka stridhan. Her evidence is left exactly as she gives it, a broad statement—gift from herself before the marriage, gift from her husband after the marriage. In my opinion, it either was not in the contemplation of the defendants at the time of the hearing to contest seriously the nature of this stridhan or else they felt themselves wholly unable to cope with this lady and cross-examine her so as to throw doubt upon the evidence which she gave. It has to be remembered that the defendants' case is, that no such ornaments ever came to their hands. So far as I know, they do not admit anywhere that to their own knowledge any such property was in existence at any time. Indeed, their case suffers seriously from the attempt which the defendants made to show that to the best of their knowledge this lady who married a man of some considerable wealth and position had no ornaments at all. In my opinion, therefore, the learned Judge's finding that this was ajautuka stridhan should not be disturbed. The only reason why his finding requires to be considered at all is that, in giving his reasons for supposing that the ornaments possessed by this lady were of substantial value, he does say in his judgment that Woopendra would be unlikely to give his bride cheap or insignificant presents. It does not seem to me that the learned Judge's attention there was being directed to the exact legal distinction in Hindu Law which divides jautuka stridhan and ajautuka stridhan and the fact that he uses the word "bride" does not lead me to suppose that he has come to the conclusion after considering the matter that these presents were given at the exact time of the marriage. In any event, looking to the uncontradicted and simple evidence given in the course of the case, it appears to me that the plaintiff has made out his title by making out that this is property which would come to him and would not go to his sister. I need not say that, in no event, would it come to the defendants.

Now, it is necessary to go again over certain facts in this case in order to deal with the only other contention which has been raised before the Court by Mr. Langford James on behalf of the defendants-appellants, namely, the contention that the plaintiff's case is governed by Art. 120 of the First Schedule to the Limitation Act of 1908, and that, under Art. 120, the plaintiff's case is time-barred because, as I understand the argument, his suit might and could have been brought in 1910, when the plaintiff came of age, and six years from that date would be 1916, whereas the plaintiff was not filed till September, 1920. Here, again, I would try to keep to the facts as distinct from a more or less unsuccessful attempt to interpret the facts. The facts are that before 1905, when Sushila Sundari died, the ornaments in question, according to the plaintiff's evidence, were kept in her own room and that after she died they were kept in an iron-safe in her husband's room. What else was kept in the iron-safe we do not know. What other purpose the iron-safe was used for we do not know. We are told that Bhupendra—one of the defendants—kept the key; but it is quite true, as Mr. James points out, that, however much the management of the family affairs might be left by the father to the plaintiff's step-brothers, the mere existence of the ornaments in the safe would not have involved any management at all. The facts are that they went on in the safe in the father's room and the first defendant had the key. When Woopendra died in 1909, the facts are that the plaintiff had not yet come of age, that his step-brothers were considerably older than he was, and that naturally enough they not only took Probate of the father's Will but carried on the family concerns as they would have done in ninety-nine cases out of hundred in Hindu families of this particular type. The ornaments were in the safe and they went on in the safe. It appears that when the family had occasion to use them they were used. They were used later on at the time of the plaintiff's marriage. Some other relatives seem to have used them on occasions. There is no reason why they should not be used when suitable occasions arose. There is no suggestion in the plaintiff's evidence or in the defendants' evidence that any claim was made by the elder brothers that these ornaments belonged to them. The nature of the ornaments makes it very improbable that there was much doubt as to their not belonging to the step-brothers. What happened is what one would expect so long as the family was living jointly and without trouble. Of course, in the end, trouble did come. It seems that, in 1919, the finances of the defendants being in an unsatisfactory state, there was a question of selling two of the ornaments. It seems that the plaintiff's consent was asked, the two ornaments were valued for the purpose of sale and the plaintiff in the end refused his assent and they were not sold. There was a partition in 1920 and it is in September, 1920, that the plaintiff brings his suit. Those being the facts the matter begins, as most plaints in this Court do, by getting them thoroughly muddled with the pleadings. There were two attempts to fasten these acts with various legal categories in order to put the plaintiff's case straight for the purposes of the Limitation Act and the real difficulty in applying the law to the facts consists entirely in the circumstance that instead of saying that when Woopendra died the defendants took possession of whatever was in the house and that the family went amicably on as before, the plaintiff says this: "The management of the estate and affairs of the said Woopendra Nath Bhose was under the control of the defendants who with the knowledge and concurrence of their father took possession of the said ornaments and jewellery for and on behalf of and as trustees for the plaintiff and continued to hold the same as such till his death." That is the travesty of what happened before Woopendra's death. The travesty of what happened after his death is this. The plaintiff goes on to say: "Upon the death of the said Woopendra Nath Bhose, the defendants as executors and trustees appointed under his Will took possession of the estate left by him as such executors and trustees including the plaintiff's share therein and the said jewellery and ornaments continued to be in their possession, care and control as such executors and trustees and are still in their possession and control." The learned Judge has, it is true, found not merely the fact that these defendants being the elder brothers took possession of the house with the iron-safe and whatever were the contents of the iron-safe; but he also says that they took possession as executors and trustees and Mr. Langford James very properly points out that if this has to be regarded accurately then the plaintiff would have a right to bring his suit the moment he attained majority. If these brothers of his were holding the property as executors of Woopendra, then, of course, they were setting up a hostile title to the plaintiff because according to the plaintiff's case Woopendra was never the owner of these goods at all after Sushila. As a matter of verbal criticism, I entirely agree that, if the correct finding is that these people were claiming to hold the property as property which was Woopendra's and not the plaintiff's and which, therefore, had come down to them, they were holding it under a title which was hostile to the plaintiff and the plaintiff would have six years from 1910 in which he would be obliged to bring his suit. It is necessary therefore, for us to examine the evidence for ourselves and see whether the real facts found do warrant any such conclusion. It is not the effect of the plaintiff's evidence or of any evidence in this case that these defendants ever claimed that these ornaments were ornaments belonging to their father's estate or in which they had a joint interest with the plaintiff as part of their father's estate. As I have already observed, the nature of the ornaments makes it extremely unlikely that these step-brothers would set up any right to the ornaments of a lady who was not their mother at all. There is nothing in the conduct of Woopendra to suggest that he suffered under any impression that the ornaments devolved on him. What has happened is entirely natural and consistent with the plaintiff's case. The ornaments remained after the father's death in the safe when the elder brothers had to carry on the family concerns and the infant lived with them, no question of dispute arising between them. Plaintiff's case is that they were always recognised as belonging to him because everybody knew that they were the ornaments of his mother. In these circumstances, the last thing that is true is to say that they were held by the defendants as executors of Woopendra's estate. So far as I am concerned, I entirely dissent from any such finding because the evidence satisfies me to the contrary. In my opinion, the position is, as the plaintiff's evidence shows, that these goods being there in the safe, the family went on, the elder brothers having no doubt a general direction and control of the family affairs being responsible as natural guardians of the plaintiff and looking after the plaintiff's property. There is no reason to think that any claim or controversy arose until long after the plaintiff attained majority. In the meantime he was living in amity as a member of a joint Hindu household at the old house. The question is whether, in these circumstances, Art. 49 or Art. 120 of the Limitation Act applies and whether, if Art. 120 applies, the suit is time-barred. In my opinion, whichever Article applies the suit is not time-barred but on the facts which I have endeavoured to state, I think the Article applicable is Art. 49. I will deal, first, with the question of the Article applicable. Article 49 has to be read with Art. 48 and having disposed in Art. 48 of all cases of claim for specific moveable property lost, or acquired by theft, or dishonest misappropriation or conversion, or for compensation for wrongfully taking or detaining the same, Art. 49 deals with cases of claim for other specific moveable property, or for compensation for wrongfully taking or injuring or wrongfully detaining the same; and it says that the time is to be three years from the date when the property is wrongfully taken or injured, or when the detainer's possession becomes unlawful. Article 49 is the ordinary Article to apply in a case where the original possession of the defendant is lawful but it becomes unlawful by reason of certain facts. The common case is the case where the demand is made by the plaintiff—the plaintiff having a right to determine the possession of the defendants. Now, it is said that that Article is inapplicable because of the decision of the Privy Council in the case of Mahomed Riasat Ali v. Hasin Banu (1) and it is a little important to see what the Privy Council actually held in that case. That was a case where a Muhammadan died leaving a widow and a brother. In the wajib-ul-arz of the place where he had his immoveable property there was a statement of the local custom governing such people and the local custom evidenced by that record and by certain other records was that the widow would succeed to the whole of her husband's estate for a life-interest. The man died and his brother went into possession of his effects on the basis that there was no such custom and that the property devolved on him and the suit was brought to establish the widow's right under that custom, first of all, to the immoveable property and then to the cash and other things that the man died possessed of. A controversy arose as regards the moveables whether the claim against the brothers was a claim under Art. 49 or under Art. 120; and it is with reference to a case like that that their Lordships said: "This latter Article," that is Art. 49 "does not appear to be applicable to a suit to establish a right to inherit the property of a deceased person." The case there was that the widow was claiming to use Art. 49 by saying "if I establish my right under the custom then you, the defendant, are a person who has wrongfully taken my property. Their Lordships of the Privy Council say that that is not the way to look at a suit to establish a right to succeed to the property of a deceased. In my judgment, that is not the case at all. The plaintiff's case is not that the defendants wrongfully took his property. His case is that the defendants were in rightful possession of the property, in rightful possession so long as he was a minor, in rightful possession so long as he was living with them and let them look after it but in wrongful possession of it since 1919 or 1920 when he claimed that they should make over the property to him; and I am in no way satisfied that there is any valid reason for holding that the plaintiff's claim in this case should be excluded from Art. 49.

The next question is, however, whether the same principle would not apply under the terms of Art. 120. I think it would. If one asks oneself why the plaintiff should bring a suit in 1911 soon after he attained majority against his step-brothers and what his cause of action in such a suit would be, I think that question, too, must be answered against the present appellants. It is quite true that the plaintiff had a right to determine the lawful possession of his elder brothers who were living jointly with him. He had the right to do that. But it is no part of the policy of the Limitation Act to make people determine the lawful possession of others who are looking after their property or who have their property on deposit. The policy of the Limitation Act is that when once that arrangement is stopped the suit should be brought within a limited time. So far as I know, without making a demand upon the brothers for this property, on the facts which the plaintiff's case discloses, the plaintiff would not have had a cause of action against his step-brothers but had first of all to determine their possession, to do something which would render their possession unlawful and then to bring his suit. In my judgment, under Art. 120 just as under Art. 49 the plaintiff in this case has brought his suit within time. It cannot be too strenuously emphasised that everything depends upon the exact facts in a case like this. If it had been the defendants' case at any stage that they had the property, that they knew it came from a different origin, that they claimed that it had belonged to their father or that two-thirds of it belonged to them, then no doubt none of the reasons which I have endeavoured to apply to the facts of this case would have been at all applicable.

Upon the facts of this case, it seems to me that the judgment of the learned Judge should be upheld and this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

A cross-objection is argued in this case on behalf of the plaintiff to the effect, first, that the learned Judge on the evidence of Hrishikesh ought to have found that the value of the jewellery proved to have been received by the plaintiff's mother from her husband was more than Rs. 10,000 and also that the learned Judge has forgotten to take any account of the ornaments said to be 107 tolas in weight which the lady is said to have got from Kusum Kumari. It appears to my mind as regards the first point that the learned Judge was not satisfied having regard to the nature of the articles in question, that he could safely go by the valuation of the witness Hrishikesh Roy, and, being apparently dissatisfied with that evidence in some respect he has really reminded himself of the duty of the Court which is not to give damages for a single penny more than what is quite certainly proved. The learned Judge has, in so doing, certainly discounted the figure given by the jeweller very heavily. He was dealing with articles with reference to which it is very difficult to form a precise opinion and I do not think it would be right on the part of this Court to interfere with his figure seeing that he was entitled to put a conservative figure upon the matter.

As regards the 107 tolas in weight of jewellery which is described by Kusum Kumari, there again the plaintiff is in the unfortunate position that no evidence whatever has been given of the value of these articles. It may be that, if some evidence had been given of the value, it would have been our duty to interfere. But it is very difficult to say that, on this evidence, the learned Judge was obliged to allow the plaintiff any particular figure. The ornaments may have been of standard gold or something containing a great deal of alloy in them or they may have been merely worth the actual weight of the gold they contain or may have been worth more. It is difficult indeed for the Court left as it is without the opinion of a single witness as to the minimum value of such articles to say that the learned Judge was obliged to put any additional figure upon them and that he was wrong to ignore these articles. I think it may be due to the fact that there was no material upon which he could assess the amount. I do not think that in this case it is right and proper that there should be an enquiry as to the value of these ornaments. In these circumstances the only thing we can do—although I quite agree that the plaintiff has probably got less than the value of the articles—is to dismiss this cross objection with costs.

Buckland, J.—I agree.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), ss. 2, 47, 115—Stay of execution—Order for security—Appeal—Security bond, acceptance of, without notice to decree-holder, legality of—Practice—Treating appeal as revision.

An order for security to stay execution is not an order determining any rights of the parties. It is neither an order under s. 47 nor is it a decree within the meaning of s. 2, Civil Procedure Code, and is, therefore, not appealable.

Saraswati Barmonya v. Moti Barmonya (1), followed.

A Court should give notice to the decree-holder of the security bond filed by the judgment-debtor and should not accept it without enquiring into the objections of the decree-holder.

An appeal may be treated as an application for revision where no appeal lies.

Petition for revision of the order of the Senior Subordinate Judge, Kullu, dated the 1st September, 1926.

Mr. Faqir Chand, for the Petitioner.

Mr. Gobind Ram Khanna, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—A decree for Rs. 7,466-8-3 and costs of the suit having been passed against Raja Ram and his brother Radha Lal, they filed against that decree an appeal in the High Court and obtained an order of stay of execution on the usual condition of furnishing security. Then they got a security bond executed by four men on an unstamped paper and had it attested by a Naib-Tahsildar. The Executing Court, namely, the Senior Subordinate Judge of Kulu, accepted that bond in the absence of the decree-holder and released the judgment-debtors' property from attachment. When the decree-holder became aware of it he filed objection to the effect that the sureties were men of no substance. But the learned Senior Subordinate Judge rejected this application summarily. The decree-holder has filed an appeal against this order of the Senior Subordinate Judge. Counsel for the judgment-debtors (respondents) raises a preliminary objection that the order is not appealable and relies on Saraswati Barmonya v. Moti Barmonya (1). In that case it was held by a Division Bench of the Calcutta High Court that "an order for Security to stay execution is not an order determining any rights of the parties. It is neither an order under s. 47, nor is it a 'decree' within the meaning of s. 2, cl. (2) of the Civil Procedure Code of 1908. It is, therefore, not appealable." The decree-holder's Counsel cannot urge anything contrary to this ruling and prays that the appeal may be treated as an application in revision. I agree to do so.

The Senior Subordinate Judge ought to have given notice to the decree-holder of the security-bond filed by the judgment-debtors and should not have accepted it without enquiring into the objections of the decree-holder. I, therefore, set aside the order of the Senior Subordinate Judge accepting the security and dismissing the decree-holder's application and direct him to make an enquiry and determine whether the security-bond is in order, and whether the sureties are men of substance. No order as to costs in this Court.

Inam—Service inam—Grant to institution or to servant for services in institution—Tests—Expressions "devadayam", "mulla", effect of—Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Art. 14—Suit to set aside resumption of personal service inam on ground of non-performance of services—Limitation.

There is a well understood distinction between a grant to a religious institution such as a temple or a mosque and a grant to some person on condition of his rendering services to a religious institution, such as the archaka of a temple. [p. 893, col. 2.]

The word 'devadayam' indicates a grant for religious purposes but does not necessarily connote that the grant is to the religious institution itself. The term is equally applicable to service inams connected with religious institutions. [p. 894, col. 1.]

The description of the grantee as "mulla" does not imply that the grant was made to him as representing a mosque. [p. 900, col. 2.]

A suit to set aside the resumption of a personal service inam by the Government on the ground of non-performance of services is governed by Art. 14, Limitation Act. [p. 899, col. 1.]

Where Government purports to act under powers reserved to them under the terms of a personal service inam grant though they may have acted erroneously in the interpretation of its terms or in finding on facts which justify the resumption, the act is intra vires and not ultra vires and the act of resumption cannot be regarded as a nullity. [p. 898, col. 1.]

Secretary of State for India v. Gulam Mahaboo Khan (15), doubted and distinguished.

Per Ramesam, J.—As the British Government were dealing favourably with inams connected with Hindu and Muhammadan religions, whether grants to temples and mosques, or grants to officials and servants on condition of rendering certain services in such temples and mosques, both were described as "devadayam" and the use of the word is not conclusive in favour of the temple or mosque itself where the question is whether it is a grant to the temple or to a temple servant though it may be some evidence along with other circumstances; but it is of very great weight where the claim of private property is set up. [p. 895, col. 2; p. 896, col. 1.]

Where the grant is made to a person in the capacity of a muttawalli, manager, superintendent, dharma-kartha, or even servant of the mosque or temple, and where it does not appear that there is some other trustee, it may be regarded as a grant to the temple or mosque itself. [p. 896, col. 1.]

Where it appears that a substantial part of the income goes to the benefit of the institution, as for the erection of a building or for its upkeep and repairs, or such other things the grant may be considered as a grant to the institution itself even though some surplus may be used by the trustees for their own maintenance. [ibid.]

Where none of the above indicia appears, that is where the grant does not show that it was granted to a temple or mosque, nor describe the grantee in the capacity of trustee, manager, etc., and where it does not appear that any portion of the income that may be considered as substantial has gone to the benefit of the temple or mosque, then in such a case it must be treated as a grant to the grantee named (persona designata) and, if services are mentioned, it is a grant of service. [ibid.]

Appeal against the decree of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Masulipatam, in O. S. No. 14 of 1920 (O. S. No. 11 of 1919, District Court, Kistna).

The Government Pleader and Mr. Ch. Raghava Rao, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

Ramesam, J.—This appeal arises out of a suit by two members of the Muhammadan community (1) for a declaration that the resumption of the suit inam by the Government and conversion into a ryotwari land is not binding on the plaintiffs and other Muhammadan members of the community and (2) for a declaration that the two mortgages dated 16th March, 1914, which were executed in favour of the 2nd defendant by defendants Nos. 3 to 7 and grandmother of the 8th are invalid and cannot bind the suit property. The 1st defendant is the Secretary of State for India in Council and the 2nd defendant is the mortgagee.

The history of the suit inam may now be briefly stated. The earliest document we have got on record is an extract from Oakes Inam Register, Ex. X prepared in 1797. This was a register of inams probably prepared with a view to the passing of Regulation XXXI of 1802 but whatever it may be, it describes the suit land merely as an inam, fixes a certain amount of kattubadi in kind on it and shows that the inam was granted by one Mustapha Khollikanudu, probably a representative of the Moghul Sovereigns. The date of the grant was Hijri 1108. The grantee is described as Sheik Ibrahim and the person in enjoyment in 1797 as great-grandson Gulam Husain. The next document on record is Ex. A. This is the inam register of the village of Gandram. The suit inam is situated in the village of Ibrahimpalem which is a hamlet of Gandram. Column 2 describes the grant as endowment to a religious institution. Column 8 is "devadayam granted for the performance of certain rites in the mosque. The ceremonies are duly kept up." Column 9 shows that the annual kattubadi was changed to Rs. 32 from 1852. Column 10 describes the inam as hereditary. Column 11 shows that the grant was made in Hijri 1137 or A. D. 1724 by Sidni Etiday Kahan of Mahomed Shah Gazhi Padshah. Mahomed Shah is probably the Emperor of Delhi who reigned from 1719 to 1748 and the other person is his local representative. In column 12 there is a list of documents. The first is the sanad granted by Etida Khan in Hijri 1137 (A. D. 1724). The 3rd is sanad granted by Kuli Khan mentioned in the Oakes Register. The 2nd is another sanad in Persian. The others are dumbalas and checknamas, i. e., orders addressed to village officials. Column 15 refers to the accounts of 1797, i. e., the Oakes Register. Columns 16 to 18 describe the person in enjoyment in 1859 as Haji Sahib of Nagaram, the 5th in descent from the original grantee. Columns 19 and 20 give the detail of his family. Column 21 is the recommendation of the Special Assistant. It says: "This inam is an ancient one having been granted in Hijri 1137 or A. D. 1724 for the purpose of keeping up certain ceremonies in the mosque of Gandram. The original sanad was given to Mulla Sheik Ibrahim in whose family the inam has been all along been enjoyed and the rites fully performed.....It is recommended that the inam be continued for the purpose originally contemplated subject to the payment of the annual kattubadi of rupees thirty-two (Rs. 32)." Column 22 is the order of the Inam Commissioner "continued accordingly." In 1874 Haji's son Dada Sahib rented a cowle of the inam for a period of 22 years to Mirza Mahomed Taki Sahib. That cowle was transferred to one Thadu Sahib in 1884. In 1886 that cowle right was surrendered by him for a sum of Rs. 1,746. For this and some other items of consideration the inam was mortgaged for Rs. 1,926 on 16th July, 1886, to the said Thadu Sahib under Ex. IV. Exhibit IV-a is the surrender of the cowle right. Exhibit V is the deed of mortgage with possession dated 23rd August, 1883, to the same Thadu Sahib. This mortgage right was transferred by Ex. V-a to one Mirza Sahib. It also shows that the title deeds were with a sowcar. Exhibits IX-a, IX-b and IX-d are muchilikas obtained by Shafi son of Mirza. Exhibit VI is a sub-mortgage by Shafi dated 28th June, 1894, in favour of one V. Venkatramayya, husband of the 2nd defendant. Exhibit IX-c is a muchilika taken by him soon after Exhibit IX is another muchilika taken by him in 1897. In December 1897 Shafi transferred his mortgage right to the 2nd defendant. It is also mentioned that the inam patta remained with the sowcar. The sub-mortgage in favour of the 2nd defendant's husband and her right as assignee were apparently consolidated by Ex. VII dated 15th February, 1903. This is also a mortgage with possession. All these documents ranging from 1886 to 1903 described the suit land as ancestral property of Dada Sahib and his sister. Sometime in 1908 the Revenue Officers made enquiries as to whether the service was being done in the mosque. Exhibit III is a statement by the karnam before the Tahsildar in November 1908. Exhibit III-a is a statement of Dada Sahib. The Tahsildar's report to the Collector is Ex. II. The Collector reported to the Board of Revenue on 7th April, 1909. The Board of Revenue sanctioned resumption of the inam by Ex. C dated 30th April and it is acted upon as shown by the subsequent correspondences in June, August, September and November, 1909, (vide Ex. B). Exhibit XII-a is a petition by Dada Shib requesting that the resumption may be cancelled and that the inam may be continued as inam. In the same year the mortgagee obtained a decree for possession on the basis of Ex. VII. Exhibits VII-a and VII-b are the decree and judgment. In about August, 1910 the full assessment of Rs. 461-10-1 was collected from Dada Sahib by Government and the suit notice was issued by Dada's Vakil, vide Ex. XII. In 1912 some Muhammadan residents of Ulavalapudy and Nagavaram, two neighbouring villages having mosques of their own petitioned to the Board of Revenue for the cancellation of the resumption. The Board referred it, to the Collector, by Ex. F. The Tahsildar's report to the Collector is Ex. D and it was referred to the Divisional Officer. His final report in August is Ex. J. The Board of Revenue called for a fresh report, as to whether there was any District or Taluk Committee to whom the inam may be assigned, by Ex. E. There was a report to the Board of Revenue and a further reference (Ex. H). The Board of Revenue finally declines by Ex. G to re-assign the inam in March 1913. In March 1914 Ex. VIII was executed by defendants Nos. 3 to 7 representing 7/8ths share for Rs. 13,670 and another mortgage-deed was executed by the grandmother of the 8th defendant representing 1/8th share in the inam. The present suit was filed on 3rd April, 1919. The Subordinate Judge decreed the suit. The 2nd defendant has filed this appeal. There is no appeal by the 1st defendant who is, herein, arrayed as a respondent.

The first point arising for consideration is what is the nature of the inam. It has been strenuously contended by the appellant that the inam was granted to the original grantee as a service inam, that is as a grant to him burdened only with the condition of rendering certain services, namely, the performing of certain rites, in a mosque. On the other hand, it has been contended by the respondents Nos. 2 and 3 that the grant was to the mosque itself and that the inam belongs to the mosque. Before discussing the documents bearing on this question it will perhaps be convenient to refer to some of the cases cited by both the parties and which may well be a guide in the construction of such grants. These cases show that there is a well understood distinction between a grant to a religious institution such as a temple or a mosque and a grant to some person on condition of his rendering services to a religious institution, such as the archaka of a temple. It may be a nice distinction to find under which class a particular grant falls. An example of such a grant to a servant of the temple is Matte Sarrayya v. Vepparathi Vydyanatham (1). The grant there was to a dancing girl of a temple. There the title-deed was given to the dancing girl in contrast to the other title-deeds which were issued to the manager of the temple, and the title is conditional on the fulfilment of the terms of the grant. "So long as the conditions of the grant are fully fulfilled" is the usual language in all the title-deeds of this kind. Sriranga Chariar v. Pranatharthihara Chariar (2) was a grant to a person performing the service of acharyapurusha in the Tirupathi temple. The title-deed describes the land as 'davadayam' or 'pagoda service inam' for the support of the pagoda called the service of 'acharyapurusha' in the suit temple. It was held that the grant was not to the temple but it was a grant to the temple servant on condition of performing the service of acharyapurusha in the temple, and, as it did not belong to the temple, there was no trust in respect of which a scheme suit under s. 92 can lie. Mohamed Husain Saheb v. Mohamed Abdul Rahim Beg Saheb (3) is the next decision I may refer to. There the holders of the inam divided the inam land between themselves. The suit was for a declaration that the division was illegal and that the land belonged to the mosque. It was held that the grant was not to the mosque but to certain persons on condition of their rendering services in the mosque, namely, the proper upkeep of the mosque and other services. One of the inam registers in that case described the land in column 2 as 'davadayam'. In column 8 it was said to be for the support of the great mosque at Guntur. In the other inam register it was said to be for performing certain services in the mosque. One would say that prima facie, where the grant is for the upkeep of the mosque, it was intended that the income of the land granted should belong to the mosque, and, so far as one of the items there is concerned, one might perhaps say that the land belonged to the mosque but not to other which was given for service; but the District Judge found that both were treated alike throughout. Spencer, J., who delivered the judgment of this Court also held that they were not grants to the mosque. I agree with his judgment. In Sikkandar Rowther v. Secretary of State for India (4) the inams are classified as 'devadayam' and the grant was for the support of the mosque. The grantee was described as the mosque itself. The holders of the inam were described as trustees. In the inam register both the original inamdar and the 'present enjoyer' are given as the mosque and the recommendation was that the inam should continue as long as the mosque existed. The decision was that the land belonged to the mosque. That case illustrates what one should expect if the grant was to the mosque. No doubt, if all the entries indicate that the grant was for the mosque it would be a very clear case; but if not one of such indicia as that in that case is present, and there is a total absence of the indication of the ownership of the mosque, the mere use of the word "devadayam" does not necessarily show that the grant was to the mosque, as the other cases cited by me show. In Sikkandar Rowther v. Secretary of State for India (4), Srinivasa Aiyangar, J., says about devadayam that, by itself, it is said to be prima facie strong proof. It is clear that the word "devadayam" indicates a gift for religious purposes but does not necessarily connote anything more. The reason is clear in that the British Government, when it dealt with inams in 1859, appointed an Inam Commission for enquiring into the genuineness of the inams so that they may be recognised and confirmed or not as the cases require. They dealt with both classes of cases, namely, the grants to temples and mosques and grant to servants on condition of rendering services in temples, and mosques together. From their point of view they were all connected with Hindu or Muhammadan religion and their policy was not to impose quit-rent on them but to recognise and continue the inams so long as the conditions of the grants were being fulfilled, that is, in the case of grants to mosques or temples, as long as the institutions themselves lasted, and, in the case of grants on condition of services, as long as the services continued to be performed. Title-deeds were accordingly issued with the clause "to be held as long as the conditions of the grant were fulfilled." Both being directly or indirectly connected with religion, both classes are indiscriminately described as "devadayam." Therefore, the word "devadayam" does not conclusively show that the grant is a grant to the temple or mosque itself. (Vide r. 3 of the Inam Rules). In Mutteyi Srinivasacharyulu v. Dinavahi Pratyanga Rao (5) it was held that the grant was not to the archaka but to the temple itself. In that case the grant was for nivedyam and deeparathna which are expensive items and expenses were to be met out of the income of the inam. The sanad was in favour of the Swamiluvaru and not in favour of the archaka. The inam register showed that the grantee was Sri Venkateswara Swami and the title-deed was issued to the manager for the time being of the temple. The inam was said to be for the support of the temple. In the face of these unambiguous circumstances the learned Judges held that the conduct of the archaka in appropriating the surplus income could have no weight in the matter and reference was made to Attorney-General v. Master Wardens etc., of the Wax Chandlers' Co. (6). One sanad Ex. D in that case purported to be exclusively for archaka service in contrast to the other sanad which was for the support of the temple. In Sashadu Reddi v. Pichi Reddi (7) Spencer and Devadoss, JJ., held that though the land there was described as 'devadayam' or 'pagoda hand-rigainam' and though the title-deed was granted to the manager for the time being of the pagoda and though the latter documents described the inam as 'devadayam' the land belonged to the original grantee because the sanad stated that he was to enjoy the property and it was a grant to him burdened with an obligation of doing certain services in the temple and all surplus left after the performances of the services belonged to the donee and his heirs. In Muhammad Esuf Sahib v. Abdul Sathar Sahib (8) the learned Judges before whom the case came up Wallis, O. J., and Spencer, J., deferred. The case then came up before a Bench of three Judges. All the three Judges expressed their opinion on the nature of the inam. Ayling, J., says: "In the absence of the parwana, we have to look to the record in the inam register and to the evidence of user." He then points out that the inam was a religious endowment for the establishment and upkeep of a mosque and various services therein. Kumaraswami Sastri, J., points out that the inam was for the purpose of erecting a masjid and for various other services and says: "It does not appear that it was the intention of the grantor that the trustee should obtain any personal benefit or that he should appropriate any portion of the income of the land..... The persons in possession are described as managers of the masjid." He also expressly points out that the words "religious endowment" and "manager of the masjid" though they may be good evidence in favour of the institution are not conclusive. With this statement of his I entirely agree. He then says that the matter is put beyond doubt by the words "usage of the institution" as proved by the evidence in this case. In Dost Muhammad Khan v. Ghulam Ghouse Sahib (9) Odgers and Jackson, JJ., held that the original grant disclosed no trust and that there was no grant to the mosque and that the services were rendered to the durga and mosque out of respect for the founder. They so held in spite of an entry in the inam register "for the support of the durga and mosque." The case in Kolandai Mudali v. Sankara Bharadhi (10) arose under the Pensions Act and it was held that the grant was for the maintenance of a religious endowment although beneficial to the family by whom the endowment was administered. It was the case of a matam service inam held for the support of the grantee's family and of the matam. That case cannot help the respondent. Sathianaraya Bharati v. Saravanabagi Ammal (11) was also a case of a mutt, namely, Sankara Bharathi mutt. One of the parties was performing pūjā or worship in a temple called Sankara Bharathi Swami Koil. It was observed that the evidence did not show that the village was divided subject to the obligation or that any portion of the village was set apart as trust property and the rest as partible property, and that the words "from generation to generation" meant only absolute estate. The last two cases are cases of mutts, these mutts being somewhat different in their nature from temples and mosques. In Muhammad Jafar v. Muhammad Ibrahim (12) it was found that the inam was the source from which the expenses of the mosque had been mainly defrayed and, therefore, it was held that it was an inam belonging to the mosque. In Abdulla Sahib v. Hyder Beg Sahib (13) the grant was for the expenses of lamp oil in the mosque. Wallis, O. J., relied on three circumstances and held that the grant was in favour of the mosque. (1) The grantees were described as servants of the mosque; (2) they were not all one family and it is unlikely that they would hold as tenants-in-common; and (3) all later treatment of the inams was as endowment to the mosque itself. In Mahomed Kadir v. Ghulam Mahomed Ali (14) the order of the Government in 1882 showed that the inams which were endowed to the mosque were to be enjoyed by muttawallis. I do not think it useful to refer to the two Bombay cases cited by Mr. Ganapathy Iyer as they merely show that the use of the words "from generation to generation" does not make the grant a private grant.

In A. S. No. 38 of 1920, neither Judge relied on the word "devadayam" or made any reference to it. Wallis, O. J., pointed out that the inam register shows that the title-deed was to be issued in the name of the pallivasal or mosque.

The result of the discussion of the above cases may be thus stated:—

(1) As the British Government were dealing favourably with inams connected with Hindu and Muhammadan religions, whether grants to temples and mosques, or grants to officials and servants on condition of rendering certain services in such temples and mosques both were described as "devadayam" and the use of the word is not conclusive in favour of the temple or mosque itself where the question is whether it is a grant to the temple or to a temple servant though it may be some evidence along with other circumstances; but it is of very great weight where the claim of private property is set up.

(2) Where the grant is made to a person in the capacity of muttawalli, manager, superintendent, dharmakartha, or even servant of the mosque or temple, and where it does not appear that there is some other trustee, it may be regarded as a grant to the temple or mosque itself.

(3) Where it appears that a substantial part of the income goes to the benefit of the institution, as for the erection of a building or for its upkeep and repairs, or such other things the grant may be considered as a grant to the institution itself even though some surplus may be used by the trustees for their own maintenance.

(4) Where none of the above indicia appears, that is where the grant does not show that it was granted to a temple or mosque, nor describe the grantee in the capacity of trustee manager, etc, and where it does not appear that any portion of the income that may be considered as substantial has gone to the benefit of the temple or mosque, then in such a case it must be treated as a grant to the grantee named (persona designata) and, if, services are mentioned, it is a grant of service.

In the present case we may ignore the Oakes Register which makes no mention of any mosque and which, therefore, is entirely in favour of the appellant. The inam register mentions a mosque but it does not describe the grantee Sheikh Ibrahim as muttawalli, superintendent or manager. All that we have got is the word "mulla" added to his name. "Mulla" is defined in Wilson's Glossary and Maclean's Manual, Vol. III, as a learned man. This obviously is the etymological meaning, being the same as moulvi or moula, but it has also got the secondary meaning of a village school master or a person in charge of a mosque. Mr. Ganapathy Ayyar could not mention to us any case where the word "mulla" is used or considered equivalent to trustee. Even if Sheikh Ibrahim in this case had charge of a mosque of which there is no evidence the language is quite consistent with the grant being made to him as he is a learned man for his maintenance. It is remarkable that though in column 8 of the inam register it was described as for the purpose of certain rites, the nature of these rites was not given and to this day remains vague, indefinite and uncertain. There is some oral evidence in this case that by rites was meant lighting of lamp, feeding of fakirs during Mohurram, etc., but as I will later on show the oral evidence is practically worthless. Most of it relates to recent usage, that is after resumption though one or two old persons purport to give evidence for a longer time. The inam title-deed which remained with the sowcar could not unfortunately be produced by anybody. The Subordinate Judge is wrong in thinking that it must have been taken away by Government from Dada Khan and sent to the Board of Revenue. The heading of column 8 is "if for service to be stated whether the service is continued," and under the column we have got the statement "the ceremonies are duly kept up." This looks as if it is an answer to the heading which requires information—whether the service is continued and as if it implies that the performance of ceremonies is the service. There is nothing in the documents, ignoring the oral evidence as useless, to show that the rites meant benefit to the smallest extent in pecuniary shape to the mosque. For aught we know, the mosque might have been built otherwise than with the funds of the inam and did not get pecuniary benefit even of a pie's worth from the income of this inam. In column 21 we have got "for the purpose of keeping up certain ceremonies in the mosque," not "for the upkeep of the mosque." Lower down we have "in whose family the inam has all along been enjoyed and the rites duly performed." Here again the statement is not that the mosque is being properly kept up but that the family has discharged its obligation by performing the rites in the mosque and are enjoying the lands. Again the inam register being thus not clear in favour of the mosque and the title-deed not being available, it is permissible to look at the usage or user. We have got the fact that from 1874 up to 1909 the land was always described as ancestral property and dealt with as private property without any voice and protest being raised by way of the villagers or anybody else. Even when resumption proceedings were started it was only for the purpose of seeing whether the service was duly performed. Exhibit III, refers to a mosque service inam. Exhibit III-a, statement of Dada Saheb, says: "There is a mosque covered with palmyra leaves. It has no door or door frame.....We are performing names there. The Sahibs of Nagavaram and Valavolpodi do not perform names there. We, i.e., the members of our family are performing. Besides, people passing that way perform names.....I am putting light in it. Though there is no door or door frame, light keeps burning." This statement shows that the semblance of a mosque or a bare shadow of it existed as justification for the enjoyment of the inam and the so called mosque got no benefit from the inam. Exhibit II, Tahsildar's letter, opens by the words "regarding the mosque service inam of Gandram." In para. 2 it says "for the purpose of keeping up certain ceremonies in the mosques at Gandram." In para. 3 it says "It is not known what the ceremonies referred to in the inam fair register are." After resumption Dada Saheb sent a petition Ex. XII-a. Even in this petition not even the faintest suggestion was made that the inam belonged to the mosque itself. On the other hand, the word "service" was used in seven different places. In para. 2 the grant was described as 'service inam'. In para. 3 the service was referred to as lighting only. This is repeated in para. 5 "lighting is the only service." Paragraph 6 also refers to lighting service. Paragraph 10 says: "the service relative to which the petitioner has ever been performing without fail." The suit notice, Ex. XII, opens by the words "There is an ancient service inam attached to the masjid..... The service is only lighting in the masjid." It is clear that the feeding of the fakirs referred to in the oral evidence is a later concoction. In the petition of the members of the community, Ex. I, they say, 'for the performance of certain rites in the mosque and for illuminating it at the time of festivals.....The usual rites are properly performed in the mosque.....There was no complaint.....about the discontinuance of the services in it." In para. 2 they say: "he never said that the services were not either rendered in the mosque....." In para. 3 they say: "The inam was originally granted to perform certain rites and services in a religious institution. If those rites and services are not properly rendered in the institution a notice should have been given to the leading members of the religion..... He has not been pleased to examine even one of the members of the Muhammadan community, who alone can know about the performance of the services or otherwise in the mosque....." In para. 4 they say: "the usual ceremonies and services are properly performed in it....." Thus even after the resumption persons who were anxious to get the resumption cancelled were still describing it as service inam. The Tahsildar who reports in Ex. D in favour of the cancellation of the resumption in 1912 also says that the service is being done. Here I may refer to one document, Ex. B. It is an extract from the B Register of the year 1907. This document purports to reproduce the inam register in column 12. The heading of column 12 is not properly printed. The Telugu is "name of 'the present inamdar' as entered in the inam register," and under it mentions Dharmakartha Haji Saheb. The word dharmakartha is an obvious and unjustified addition to the inam register. A document which is so recent as 1907 is worthless. The Subordinate Judge practically relies upon this document. I think that the inam was only a service inam granted to Sheik Ibrahim and his descendants in consideration of his learning for doing some nominal rites in a mosque but practically for his maintenance. It was confirmed at the inam settlement on condition that the services should be continued and the title-deed must have contained some clauses, as in all such title deeds, "so long as the conditions of the grant are fulfilled." If the services are not properly rendered, the Government have the right to resume. I think the Board rightly resumed it in 1909. After the resumption the Muhammadans of the surrounding villages re-built the mosque which originally had not even a shed but a roof of Palmyra leaves. They put up a tiled roof and began to create officers with technical names in the Muhammadan religion, such as mouzzin, peish inam, khalifa, etc. In the oral evidence we first hear of these names. They are not referred to even in the plaint. The word "mutlawalli" was for the first time used in Ex. XII-a and in spite of its use the word 'service' was mentioned in connection with the inam. This village of Ibrahim Palayam in which the mosque is situated became dilapidated. See Ex. D. It is in the midst of wet fields. There is no direct road leading to it but only a foot path. Looking at these facts it is clear that the oral evidence referring to the feeding of fakirs is a myth. It is not mentioned whether the fakirs were fed in the village or near the site of the mosque. But if lighting is the only service we have nothing to do with the feeding of the fakirs. A four-walled structure without any roof or window or door frame was used as the pretence of a mosque all these years to justify the enjoyment of the inam by Dada's family. We cannot now say how long back this state of things lasted, but for the last 40 or 50 years it must have been so.

Now, when the Government resumed it in 1909 and actually collected the assessment of Rs. 461-10-1 under protest, the cause of action accrued to Dada Sahib and other holders of the inam for cancelling the resumption. In my opinion the period for such a suit is one year under Art. 14. In Secretary of State for India v. Gulam Mahaboob Khan (15) their Lordships held that Art. 14 did not apply to that case, as the resumption in that case was made not on the ground that the services were not performed or the mosque was not kept up but on the ground that the endowed lands were alienated which was not one of the grounds on which the inams could be resumed. There the inams were granted for the maintenance of the mosque itself and, as it was not a service inam, unless the mosque itself was not kept up, there was no ground for resuming the inam. Mere alienation of the endowed lands was not a proper ground for resumption. That being so, it was held that the resumption was illegal and totally ultra vires and Art. 14 did not apply. In the first place, it seems to me that where Government purported to act under powers reserved to them under the terms of the grant though they may have acted erroneously in the interpretation of its terms or in finding on facts which justify the resumption, the act was intra vires and not ultra vires and the act of resumption cannot be regarded as a nullity. On this ground I doubt the correctness of that judgment, but assuming that the case was correctly decided that case is clearly distinguishable from the present one where the non-performance of service is the ground on which resumption was made and it is a correct ground under the terms of the grant. But even if Art. 14 is not the proper Article to apply, certainly Art. 120 applies to a suit for a declaration. This is not denied by the Vakil for the respondent though he would try to get over it by postponing the cause of action up to December, 1914, when the ryotwari patta was said to have been issued to defendants Nos. 3 to 7. Now I do not see what a ryotwari patta has got to do with this business. The inam was resumed in 1909. Ryotwari assessment was imposed upon it and collected in 1910. The party felt aggrieved by it and gave notice of suit in 1910. If this not a suit for a declaration and for cancellation of the resumption based on the cause of action of 1909 and 1910, I am unable to see what else it would be. The suit being brought more than six years after 1910, is obviously barred by limitation and ought to have been dismissed. Mr. Ganapathi Ayyar argues that so far as the 2nd defendant's mortgages are concerned the cause of action against them dates only from the dates of the mortgages, namely, March 1914 and the suit so far as the second declaration is concerned is not barred. If the plaintiffs submit to the resumption but question the mortgages on grounds peculiar to mortgages only and apart from the resumption, this contention is right and is conceded by the learned Vakil for the appellant. If for instance, we hold that the grant was a grant to the mosque itself and that even after resumption the trust re-attached itself to the land in the hands of defendants Nos. 3 to 7, even though it is converted into a ryotwari land on the line of reasoning adopted in Muhammad Esuf Sahib v. Abdul Sathar Sahib (8), it may be that the suit for declaration of the mortgage is not barred. We are not to be understood as agreeing with the line of argument adopted in Muhammad Esuf Sahib v. Abdul Sathar Sahib (8). We feel some difficulty in applying s. 83 of the Trusts Act to a case where after resumption a service inam is re-granted availing himself of his position as trustee. There is also a good deal of force in the observation of Sadasiva Aiyar, J., in Raja Rajeswara Dorai v. Arunachellam

(15) 51 Ind. Cas. 366; 42 M. 673; 9 L. W. 587; 37 M. L. J. 71; (1919) M. W. N. 736.

Chettiar (16), where he had held that an obligation in the nature of a constructive trust cannot attach under ss. 85 to 88 of the Trusts Act unless a declaration is obtained to that effect. It might also be said that where no such declaration is obtained, private persons dealing with the original holders on the footing of the grant are bona fide vendees or mortgagees as the case may be; and if it were necessary in this case to rely on this line of argument a fresh finding on the question whether the 2nd defendant was a bona fide mortgagee for consideration would have to be called for. But it is unnecessary to follow this line of reasoning. We hold that the suit inam was only a service inam and did not belong to the mosque. The services were put an end to by the resumption and there is nothing to re-attach to it after the grant of the ryotwari patta to defendants Nos. 3 to 7. The 2nd defendant merely claims as a mortgagee from them and stands in their shoes to the extent of defending her right as mortgagee. She claims through them the mortgage in question not on some ground peculiar to it but as an interest derived from the defendants Nos. 3 to 8 on the footing that they hold the inam as private property. The 2nd defendant, therefore, defends her mortgage on the ground that the resumption was valid and put an end to obligations of service. The cause of action for any suit for declaration even as against the mortgagee must, therefore, date from 1914 and, therefore, the suit is equally barred as against the 2nd defendant.

There is another ground on which the mortgages in favour of the 2nd defendant must be at least partially upheld. They were in possession of the suit inam for more than 12 years up to 1914 though, no doubt, it was interrupted after the decree in 1909. She has thereby prescribed and obtained by prescription the interest of the usufructuary mortgagee for the principal sum of Rs. 2,935 9 4 and interest thereon (vide Ex. VII) but not for the other amount mentioned in Ex. VII. This is conceded by the respondent, but we are also holding that the mortgages are fully valid on the ground that the resumption was perfectly valid and converted the property into an ordinary ryotwari property.

In the result the appeal is allowed and the plaintiff suit dismissed with costs throughout as against the 2nd defendant. As the Government have not appealed it is unnecessary to award them any costs in either Court. But the decree against them is vacated as the grounds of our judgment are common to the Government, and the appellant.

The injunction against the 2nd defendant restraining her from executing her mortgage decrees, if any, will be dissolved.

Cornish, J.—I have come to the same conclusion. The substantial question in this appeal is whether the suit lands are the subject of a personal service inam, or whether, as the respondents have succeeded in asserting in the lower Court, these lands are the endowment of a local mosque. The original grant is not forthcoming, so the question has to be determined by the construction of the documents produced—Ex. X, being the extract from Mr. Oakes Inam Register dated A. D. 1797; Ex. A the extract from the Inam Commissioner's Register dated 1859; and Ex. B the extract from the Permanent Register of Inams in the Kistna District prepared in 1907. Exhibit X describes the grantee as "Sheikh Ibrahim"; states that the person then in enjoyment was Gulam Hussain, who was, we are told, the great-grandson of the original grantee Shaik Ibrahim; and particularises the property as "inam." In Ex. A under the heading in column 2 "general class to which the inam belongs" it is stated "Endowment to a religious institution." In column 8 under the heading "Description of inam, if for service it is to be stated whether the service is continued", appears this statement, "devadayim granted for the performance of certain rites in the mosque." In column 10 the tenure is described as "Hereditary." In column 13 the "name of the original grantee" is given as "Mulla Sheikh Ibrahim." In the column requiring particulars of the present owner, his name is given as Nagarajam Haji Sahib, and in column 20 appear particulars of his family. Then in column 21 it is stated "This inam is an ancient one having been granted in Hijri 1137 or A. D. 1724 for the purpose of keeping up certain ceremonies in the mosque at Gandram. The original sanad was given to Mulla Shiekh Ibrahim, in whose family the inam has been all along enjoyed and the rites duly performed."

(16) 19 Ind. Cas. 596; 38 M. 321 at p. 334; (913) M. W. N. 453; 13 M. L. T. 469; 24 M. L. J. 592.

In Ex. B the prefix "dharmakartha" has been added to the name of the then inamdar. No explanation is given for the insertion of this word, and as the document is of so recent date, I do not think that it can be taken into serious consideration.

Now, I think it may be taken as established by the cases cited in the argument, and reviewed in my brother's judgment, that, where it appears that the grant was intended primarily for the benefit of the grantee, and only incidentally for the benefit of the religious institution with which the grantee may be associated, the grant may be construed as conferring on the grantee a personal service tenure. On the other hand, it may appear from the terms of the grant, as well as from the purpose for which the grant is made, that the grantee was intended to take the benefit in trust for the religious institution. In the present case the grant is to an individual for the declared purpose of performing rites and ceremonies in a mosque. On the face of it, a grant of this sort must, I think, be deemed to be personal to the grantee, subject to the condition of performing such rites and ceremonies in the mosque as he may think necessary or proper.

But it has been contended that the description of the inam as "devadayam" should be taken as showing that the grant was made to the mosque. The meaning of this word has been discussed in Muham-mad Jafar v. Muhammad Ibrahim (12), Sikkandar Rowther v. Secretary of State for India (4) and Pir Pacha Saheb v. Moham-mad Rahimuddin Sahib (17). These cases certainly support the view that the use of the word "devadayam" is evidence that the property so described constitutes a public endowment, but they establish nothing more. Indeed, the judgments in those cases show that in the particular instances the description of the property as "devadayam" was treated as conclusive because there was no other evidence, either documentary or oral, to displace the prima facie application of the word. Moreover, there is the authority of Seshadu Reddi v. Pichi Reddi (7), that the word "devadayam" is also appropriate to describe a service inam. I think, therefore, that the word "devadayam" must be taken as being equally applicable to endowments and to service inams connected with religious institutions.

It has also been suggested that description of the original grantee as "mulla" in Ex. A indicates that the grant was made to him on behalf of the mosque. "Mulla," according to Wilson's Glossary, may mean a learned man or a village school master in charge of a mosque. It may be remarked that in the earliest of the documents produced, Ex. X, the grantee is not given the title of "mulla". However, that may be, I do not think any special significance attaches to this word. Whether the grant was made because the original grantee was a learned man or a pious man is simply a matter of conjecture. But the description of the grantee as "mulla" does not imply that the grant was made to him as representing the mosque. In my opinion on the construction of Exs. X and A, the grant was of an ordinary service inam.

Then is there any evidence of user or are there any other circumstances of the case which suggest that this view is erroneous? Previous to 1874 there is no evidence one way or the other on the subject. But from that date begins a series of alienations of the inam lands by Dada Sahib, the then representative of the original grantee. I do not attach much importance to these transactions because they appear to be equally consistent with the position of the alienor being a trustee for the mosque as with the lands being simply the subject of a service tenure. Of greater significance are the incidents which attended the Government's resumption of the inam. Enquiry was made sometime in 1908 by the Tahsildar whether the services were being performed. In the course of that enquiry a statement was taken from Dada Sahib (Ex. III-a) in which he stated that he was performing services in the mosque and that he would put a tiled roof on the mosque and fit it with doors and door frames. The Tahsildar reported on 10th December, 1908, (Ex. II) that the services had been discontinued for a long period and that the mosque building was in a neglected condition; but he recommended that the inamdar be given six months wherein to build a substantial mosque and to revive the services. The Board of Revenue by order dated 30th April, 1909, (Ex. C) sanctioned the resumption of the inam. On 12th August, 1909, Dada Sahib petitioned (Ex. XII-a) the Collector of Kistna for a cancellation of the resumption order, and this was followed on 18th August, 1910, (Ex. XII) by a notice from Dada Saheb's Vakil complaining that "the resumption was most unjustly brought about owing to the inimical attitude of the village karnam" to his client, and threatening legal proceedings if no redress was given. This notice stated that "in accordance with the resumption" seri assessment had been collected from Dada Saheb to the extent of Rs. 461-10-1, and paid under protest. On 27th February, 1912, four Muhammadan inhabitants of Ulavalpoodi and Nagavaram, one of whom was P. W. No. 2 in the suit under appeal, petitioned the Board of Revenue (Ex. I) to cancel the resumption of the grant. The burden of all these statements and petitions was that the services had been performed by the inamdars, and that the inam had been resumed upon the insufficient and biased report of the Tahsildar. In not one of these documents is there a trace of a claim that the inam lands were the property of the mosque. It is not till the respondents, purporting to represent the Muhammadan community in the neighbourhood, launched their suit in 1919, six years after the Board of Revenue had on 28th March, 1913, finally resolved (Ex. G) that the resumption must stand, that we find, as we do in para. 4 of the plaint, a definite claim to the inam lands as the property of the mosque. The respondents' claim was palpably an afterthought. There remains the question of limitation. Dada Saheb's cause of action to set aside the resumption arose, at latest, when the Government collected seri assessment from him. A suit by him became barred under Art. 14, Limitation Act, long before the present respondents brought their suit, and as they could not succeed without setting aside the resumption they can stand in no better position than Dada Saheb. If the resumption could be held to be a nullity on the ground that the act of resumption was ultra vires, there would be the authority of Secretary of State for India v. Gulam Mahaboo Khan (15) for holding that Art. 14 had no application. I share the doubt of my brother about the correctness of that decision, for it appears to me difficult to regard the act of an officer of Government in his official capacity any the less an act to which Art. 14 applies because the Court may subsequently hold the official act to be ultra vires. It is not, however, necessary to pursue this matter as we hold that in this case the inam was resumable by the Government for non-performance of the services attached to it.

It follows that the appeal must be allowed and the plaintiffs' suit dismissed.

JUDGMENT.

Addison, J.—Defendant No. 3 gave Rs. 300 to defendant No. 1 for payment to defendant No. 2. This was in 1919. Defendant No. 1 did not pay the amount and defendant No. 3 orally assigned the debt to plaintiff who sued for the amount with interest. The Appellate Court applied the principles of the Transfer of Property Act, which is not in force in the Punjab and held that the oral assignment of the debt was invalid. Against its decree dismissing the suit this revision has been preferred. The learned Judge who admitted the petition doubted whether interference was warranted by the terms of s. 115 of the Civil Procedure Code, but since a similar case, Teja Singh v. Firm Kalyan Das Chet Ram (1) had been reported he admitted the petition and directed it to be heard by a Division Bench.

It was held in Teja Singh v. Firm Kalyan Das Chet Ram (1) that although the equitable principles underlying the Transfer of Property Act are followed in the Punjab, the Act itself with its technicalities does not apply and an oral assignment of a debt for consideration is consequently not invalid. There was practically no discussion of the question whether the order could be revised under s. 115 of the Civil Procedure Code. All that was said by the learned Judge in Chambers was that the Subordinate Judge, committed an irregularity in relying on that Act to dismiss on a purely technical point a claim which he otherwise held to be just and equitable.

Most of the cases cited before us had reference to the refusal of jurisdiction or the assumption of jurisdiction by a Court. These fall within sub-cl. (a) and (b) of s. 115. It was admitted that, if a revision lay in the present case, this would be by virtue of sub-cl. (c) and not sub-cl. (a) or (b). It has, therefore, to be decided whether the Appellate Court acted in the exercise of its jurisdiction illegally or with material irregularity. It was further admitted that where a Court has jurisdiction to determine a question it cannot be said to have acted illegally or with material irregularity because it has come to an erroneous decision either in fact or in law; but it argued that the Appellate Court acted illegally in the exercise of its jurisdiction in relying upon the principles of an Act which was not in force in the Punjab.

The leading case on the subject is Amir Hassan Khan v. Sheo Baksh Singh (2). This was a decision under sub-cl. (c). Their Lordships of the Privy Council said: "The question then is, did the Judges of the lower Courts in this case, in the exercise of their jurisdiction, acted illegally or with material irregularity. It appears that they had perfect jurisdiction to decide the question which was before them (namely, whether the suit was barred as res judicata) and they did decide it. Whether they decided it rightly or wrongly, they had jurisdiction to decide the case; and, even if they decided, wrongly, they did not exercise their jurisdiction illegally or with material irregularity." It is clear from this decision that erroneous decisions in law or fact do not come within the purview of s. 115 of the Civil Procedure Code. Another decision of their Lordships is Malharjun v. Narhari (3) where it was said: "It (the lower Court) made a sad mistake, it is true; but a Court has jurisdiction to decide wrong as well as right." The latter decision was approved by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Rajwant Prasad Pande v. Ram Ratan Gir (4).

There are decisions of the various High Courts on this question which appear to be difficult to reconcile. No useful purpose will be served by referring to them, as the leading authorities of the Privy Council are set out above.

There are numerous decisions of this Court in which different principles of the Transfer of Property Act have been applied although the Act is not in force in the Punjab. The Appellate Court in the present case has distinctly stated that the Act was not in force, but it proceeded to apply the principles of ss. 130 and 131 of the Transfer of Property Act as other principles had been followed in the Punjab. The only question is whether in doing so it acted illegally or with material irregularity in the exercise of its jurisdiction. I do not think so. The Appellate Court was the final authority to decide the question before it and it had jurisdiction to decide it. This is not a case where the Appellate Court deliberately refused to follow a decision of this Court for Teja Singh v. Firm Kalyan Das Chet Ram (1) had not been decided when it gave the decision. It had jurisdiction to decide the question whether the oral assignment of the debt was invalid and, if it erroneously decided it, it cannot be said to have acted illegally or with material irregularity in the exercise of its jurisdiction. It had jurisdiction to decide wrong as well as right and its decision cannot be challenged in revision.

First appeal against a decree of the Sub-Judge, Sitapur, dated the 14th March, 1927.

Messrs. Niamat Ullah, Salig Ram and Narayan Lal, for the Appellants.

Messrs. A. P. Sen, S. C. Das and K. P. Trivedi, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiffs-appellants filed the suit out of which this appeal arises in the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Sitapur, on the following allegations. It was alleged in the plaint that Tirbhuwan Dat, who was one of the plaintiffs, and Someshar Dat the defendant were the sons of Ram Bilas Shukla and that they had succeeded together to certain property. In 1912 Tirbhuwan Dat instituted a suit against Someshar Dat for partition and obtained a decree on the 14th November, 1913. The main allegations then follow. It is alleged that Tirbhuwan Dat has no knowledge of the Urdu character and that he has only sufficient knowledge of the Nagri character to be able to sign his name in Nagri. The plaint continues that on the 15th May, 1914, Tirbhuwan Dat executed a registered deed. This registered deed was admittedly in the Urdu character, and was admittedly signed by Tirbhuwan Dat in Nagri. The allegation is that Tirbhuwan Dat understood that by this deed he was giving his brother Someshar Dat authority to manage his share of the property on his behalf. There follow various allegations as to the manner in which Tirbhuwan Dat was kept in ignorance of what he had actually committed himself to, and finally there comes an allegation that in September, 1923, Tirbhuwan Dat came to know that the deed in question was actually a deed of gift which purported to transfer the whole of his property to Someshar Dat. He sued for possession of the property. The plaint asks for relief by possession of the property in question. It was dated the 12th May, 1926. There were extensive pleadings in the suit and a very large number of issues were framed. No oral evidence was recorded. Certain documents were put in. The learned trial Judge determined two preliminary issues:—

Is the suit barred by time as alleged?

Is the suit as laid not maintainable?

He found that Tirbhuwan Dat had only the right at the best to treat the deed of the 15th May, 1914, as voidable and that inasmuch as he had not instituted a suit to set it aside within the period allowed by Art. 91, Sch. I, Act IX of 1908, the suit was time-barred. He dismissed it accordingly. The plaintiffs file the present appeal. We are unable to concur with the learned trial Judge. We are of opinion that his proceedings have been vitiated by misunderstanding of Art. 91. Assuming for the sake of argument that Tirbhuwan Dat's remedy at the best was to avoid the deed of the 15th of May, 1914, the learned trial Judge had not the materials before him upon which he could possibly decide as to whether the suit was time-barred or not. He should have observed that the time from which the period begins to run in a suit to cancel an instrument is from the date when the facts entitling the plaintiff to have the instrument cancelled become known to him. On the allegations in the plaint the facts entitling the plaintiff to have the instrument cancelled did not become known to Tirbhuwan Dat till September, 1923. It was impossible for the learned trial Judge to determine whether those allegations were or were not correct until he had heard evidence. He did not hear evidence. He satisfied himself with examining the contents of certain documents which were quite insufficient for his decision upon the point, and arrived at a conclusion without hearing any evidence. He may or may not have been misled by the action of the parties to the suit. That fact is immaterial. We have not sufficient materials upon which we can decide the matter and for that reason we do not propose to determine this appeal upon its merits. As the case stands we can in no way maintain or reverse the decision on these two issues. The only course that we can take is to obliterate that decision and treat the case as though the decision did not exist. The trial Court has disposed of the suit on two preliminary points. We are reversing the decree on appeal although we are neither maintaining nor reversing the decision. We are obliterating the decision and reversing the decree. The case must thus be held to be one which falls under O. XLI, r. 23; but in any circumstances if that rule is not sufficient to justify our action we would be justified under the provisions of s. 151. Our order is as follows. The judgment of the trial Judge shall be considered of no effect. The case will go back to him for re-trial from the beginning. The issues shall remain as they are. Such of the documentary evidence as is on the record shall remain on the record. The suit will be re-admitted under its original number. The evidence will be heard out and the suit will be tried de novo. The costs incurred up to the present will follow the result. This decision will be treated for the purposes of our Court as a decision under O. XLI, r. 23 of the First Schedule of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Contract Act (IX of 1872), s. 264—Dissolution of partnership—Notice—New customers, whether entitled to plead want of notice.

Provided a person had knowledge of a partnership, he would not be affected by the dissolution of that partnership in his dealings with the firm unless he had adequate notice of the same as provided in s. 264 of the Contract Act. The expression 'persons dealing with the firm' in s. 264 is not confined to persons who had dealings with the firm prior to dissolution but extends to all persons having dealings, including those dealing for the first time after the dissolution of the partnership. Mr. A. Suryanarayanaiah, for the Appellants.

JUDGMENT.—The only question that has been tried in this suit is whether the 2nd defendant was a partner in the firm of B. P. Sriramulu Chetty & Co. a firm with which the plaintiffs had dealings. Three persons were made defendants with an allegation that they were the partners of B. P. Sriramulu Chetty & Co. Defendants Nos. 1 and 3 admitted partnership and also their liability, but the 2nd defendant contended that he was not a partner in the firm. At the trial it has been found that the 2nd defendant was a partner till 31st March, 1921, and the respondent (2nd defendant) does not appear to impeach that finding here. The plaint transactions took place in June, 1921. The plaintiffs (appellants) now contend that, although the 2nd defendant may not have been a partner of the defendant's firm in June, 1921, yet, inasmuch as he was a partner in that firm up to 31st March, and no notice was given either to customers or to the general public of the dissolution of partnership, the 2nd defendant is liable under s. 264 of th

"Persons dealing with a firm will not be affected by a dissolution of which no public notice has been given, unless they themselves had notice of such dissolution."

This section has been considered in various cases the first of which is Chundee Churn Dutt v. Eduljee Cowasjee Bijnee (1) and there it was held that, when a partner ceased to be a partner in a firm and no notice of such cessation was given to old customers, he was still liable for acts done by the remaining partners. The question which was mainly considered in that case was what form of notice was requisite in order that such liability should cease. A similar view was taken in a recent Calcutta case, Jagat Chandra Bhattacharyya v. Gunny Hajee Ahmed (2) where it was further held that s. 264 referred not only to persons dealing with the firm prior to dissolution but to all persons dealing with that firm. The law in England is similar, and we may refer to Parkins v. Carruthers (3). There is one Court in India which seems to take a different view, and that is the Lahore High Court. In Bichhia Lal v. Munshi Ram (4) it was held that s. 264 did not include persons dealing with a firm for the first time after the dissolution of partnership. That case is based on prior decisions of the Punjab Chief Court and of the Sind Judicial Commissioner's Court. It also relies on a case in Giovani Gorio & Co. v. Vallabh Das Kalianji (5), as another authority. Undoubtedly, in that case Beaman, J., does say that the expression "persons dealing with a firm" in s. 264 of the Indian Contract Act means "persons who have been in the habit of dealing with and at the time of the dissolution were contemplating further dealing with the firm, on the faith of the firm remaining the same as that with which their dealings commenced." The learned Judge was considering a case in which an old customer of a firm was concerned and, although he distinctly says that s. 264 refers to such old customers, he has not considered the converse case of whether s. 264 definitely excludes new customers, and the arguments in his judgment set forth good reasons for treating old and new customers alike. The Calcutta High Court is distinctly of opinion that it includes new customers. In Mahadeva Iyer v. Ramakrishna Reddiar (6), Odgers, J., observes that s. 264 of the Contract Act is clear that, in the absence of such notice, persons dealing with the firm are entitled to assume that the partnership still continues; but the question of this distinction between the old and new customers was not considered. With all respect we agree with the view taken by the Calcutta High Court for the reasons therein given and also because it is clearly in accordance with the English Law on the subject; we must hold that, provided a person had knowledge of a partnership, he would not be affected by the dissolution of that partnership in his dealings with the firm unless he had adequate notice of the same as provided in s. 264 of the Contract Act. In this view and on the learned Judge's finding that the 2nd defendant was a partner up to the 31st March, 1921, we must hold that he is liable to the plaintiffs' claim equally with the other defendants.

The appeal is, therefore, allowed with costs and the lower Court's decree will be modified accordingly.

Land situated in a village founded by and entirely owned by the common ancestor of the plaintiff and the alienor is 'ancestral' land. [ibid.]

First appeal from a decree of the Senior Subordinate Judge, Jhang, dated the 9th July, 1923.

Messrs. Muhammad Munir, Anant Ram and Shiv Charan Das, for Mr. Jagan Nath Aggarwal, for the Appellants.

JUDGMENT.

Broadway, J.—One Naman a Chela of Mauza Chela in the District of Jhang on the 11th of March, 1921, mortgaged 114 kanals 7 marlas of land to Khan Bahadur Nawab Maula Dad Khan, Honorary Magistrate, and one Hidayat. The mortgage was not to be redeemed for 30 years and the charge on the property was to the extent of Rs. 1,000.

On the 30th of March, 1921, Naman executed a sale-deed by which he sold the same land, that had been mortgaged to Lohla, Walli, Pathana and Ghulam Husain for Rs. 3,500. The vendees undertook to redeem the mortgage when it became redeemable, that is, after 30 years. On the 2nd of May, 1922, one Fatta, a first cousin of Naman, instituted a suit against the mortgagees and vendees, challenging both the mortgage and the sale on the ground that the property mortgaged and sold was ancestral, that both the sale and mortgage had been without consideration and for no necessity and praying for a declaration to the effect that the sale and mortgage would not affect his reversionary rights on the death of Nawan. The alienees joined, in contesting the suit. They denied that the property was ancestral, pleaded full consideration and valid necessity and also urged that inasmuch as the tribal bond in this village had been broken Naman had an unrestricted right to alienate his property.

The trial Court held that the property was ancestral, that the tribal bond had indeed been broken, nevertheless, on the evidence Naman was governed by custom and that he being a sonless proprietor his right to alienate was restricted. On the question of consideration it was found that only Rs. 600 of the mortgage consideration appeared to have passed and there was no necessity for that or any other amount. The plaintiff was accordingly granted a decree.

Against this decree the mortgagees and vendees have preferred this joint appeal and Mr. Muhammad Munir has taken us through the relevant portions of the record with meticulous care. It has been urged that the evidence on the record did not warrant the conclusion that the property was ancestral; further, that inasmuch as it had been found that the tribal bond had been broken, the unrestricted right to alienate should have been recognised. Finally, it was urged that at least Rs. 600 out of the Rs. 1,000 which formed the consideration for the mortgage should have been allowed as being for necessity on the ground that it at any rate was a previous debt.

Now the evidence with regard to the ancestral nature of the property appears to me to be conclusive. The history of the village shows that it was founded by one Chela and that the village was called after his name. It is true that the case was not very well-handled in the Court below by the various Counsel concerned with the result that it became necessary to examine the Kanungo more than once. Taking his evidence as a whole, as Mr. Muhammad Munir says we ought to do, the impression left on my mind is that according to the revenue-papers Chela is undoubtedly the ancestor of the plaintiff Fatta and the alienor Naman and as Chela owned the entire village I see no reason to differ from the conclusion arrived at by the Senior Subordinate Judge that the property in suit is ancestral qua the plaintiff.

Next it was urged that as the tribal bond had been broken the presumption of a restricted right to alienate had been rebutted. That appears to have been fully recognised by the learned Senior Subordinate Judge who has clearly come to his conclusion in this part of the case on the evidence led by the plaintiff. A large number of sales and mortgages nearly 300 in all appear to have been effected within the last 35 years and it is these sales and mortgages which account to a large extent for the heterogeneous state of the village. The learned Senior Subordinate Judge points out in his judgment that none of these sales and mortgages were shown to have been effected by sonless proprietors in the presence of any collaterals. I have asked Mr. Muhammad Munir to select out of the long list of alienations one which could be said to have been effected by a sonless proprietor but Mr. Muhammad Munir very frankly and very properly admitted that it was impossible for him to do so. On the other hand, the plaintiff has led oral evidence consisting of members of the same tribe, and, in some instances, family, who agree in asserting that they, Chelas and Sials, in this village are governed by the ordinary custom prevailing in the Province and that a sonless proprietor can only alienate his property for necessity. After an examination of this evidence which includes two instances proved up to this Court in 1900 and 1917 I find myself in agreement with the learned Senior Subordinate Judge and hold that these Chela Sials are not allowed to alienate their ancestral property except for necessity. It should, of course, be understood that I am confining my finding to sonless proprietors.

As to the question of the allowance of Rs. 600 it appears that Rs. 600 were claimed by Lohla to whom this amount was to be paid by the Nawab Sahib when he executed the mortgage. Curiously enough, it is this very Lohla who is one of the vendees when the sale of deed was executed 20 days later. Having regard to all these circumstances, I am afraid I must agree with the learned Senior Subordinate Judge in thinking that the whole of this transaction, mortgage and sale included, is a highly suspicious one. Lohla's debt, in my opinion, cannot be traced as a just antecedent debt, and as it has not been proved to be separately for necessity, I do not think we can interfere with the decision of the Court below. I would, therefore, dismiss this appeal, but, as there has been no representation on the other side, without costs.

Jai Lal, J.—I agree.

Oudh Rent Act (XXII of 1886), s. 127—Suit for rent—Defendant in possession of land—Duty of landlord to prove that defendant's possession is without title.

A landlord has no right to sue a person in possession of land for a reasonable rent under s. 127 of the Oudh Rent Act, unless he can show that the defendant is retaining possession without being entitled to such possession.

Appeal against a judgment of the District Judge, Fyzabad, dated the 10th August, 1927, upholding that of the Assistant Collector, First Class, dated the 14th May, 1927.

Messrs. R. D. Sinha and G. C. Sinha, for the Appellant.

Mr. Naim Ullah, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is a second appeal from an order of the learned District Judge of Fyzabad. The plaintiff sued under s. 127 of the Oudh Rent Act read with s. 108, cl. (2) of the same Act to recover a reasonable rent in respect of a certain plot. Section 127 provides that a person taking or retaining possession of land without being entitled to such possession may, at the option of the person entitled to eject him as a trespasser, be treated as a tenant. In order to bring a suit under this section the landlord must show first that the defendant is retaining possession of the land without being entitled to such possession and secondly that he himself has the option of ejecting him as a trespasser. There have been conflicting decisions both of this Court and of the Revenue Courts as to the circumstances under which a suit under s. 127 can be brought but there is no decision to which I have been referred which meets the present case. In this case there are two decisions of the year 1883, one by an Assistant Collector and one by a Civil Court between these parties as to this land. In both cases it was held that the present defendants had a title in the land. It is not necessary to state here what their title is but it was then stated to be that of mortgagees. From that time till this they have continued in possession and only once that is in 1895 has any dispute arisen. At that time there were settlement proceedings and this land was entered as being in the tenancy of the defendants bila tasfia. An application was made to amend this entry but apparently was not pressed and no order was passed. The entry, therefore, remains. But that is not sufficient cause for the plaintiff to plead that the title acknowledged in the year 1883 has ceased to have effect, still less that these are persons whom he, as landlord, can eject as trespassers. In my opinion the suit was rightly dismissed by the Courts below and I dismiss this appeal with costs.

Two sonless proprietors sold certain lands. Their collaterals instituted suits for declaration that the sales effected by the vendors were inoperative against their reversionary rights. After framing of issues but before evidence these suits were compromised. In pursuance of these compromises the vendees re-sold the lands to the reversioners for certain sums somewhat less than they had paid to their vendors and the reversioners mortgaged the same to them for the same amounts. Two suits for pre-emption were instituted, one by a son of one of the original vendees and the other by a collateral of another vendee:

Held, that the suits for pre-emption were not competent inasmuch as besides the money that the reversioners had agreed to pay there was an additional consideration for the sales, namely, the withdrawal of the suits, and this part of the consideration was incapable of valuation in money. [p. 909, col. 1.]

Second appeal from a decree of the District Judge, Hoshiarpore, dated the 7th January, 1927, affirming that of the Subordinate Judge, Fourth Class, Una, District Hoshiarpore, dated the 25th June, 1926.

Mr. N. C. Pandit, for the Appellants.

Mr. H. C. Kumar, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The three Second Appeals Nos. 1332, 1333 and 1334 of 1927 arise out of two identical pre-emption suits, and the only question involved in all of them is whether the sales on which the suits were based gave the plaintiff a right of pre-emption; and if they did, what was the consideration for each sale and could it be paid. The plaintiff succeeded in both the Courts below. The facts that need be stated to determine the above questions are as follows:—

Two sonless proprietors named Nikka and Naraina having sold certain lands individually by three separate deeds, their collaterals, Hamira and others, instituted the two suits, one against each vendor and his vendee or vendees for a declaration that the sale or sales effected by him would be inoperative as against their reversionary rights. After issues had been framed but before evidence, these suits were compromised. The vendees re-sold the lands to the reversioners for certain sums somewhat less than they had paid to their vendors and the reversioners mortgaged the same to them for the same amounts. The deeds of sale as well as of mortgage were executed and registered together, and the suits were then withdrawn.

One of the pre-emptors is a son of one of the original vendees and one is a collateral of another.

Now, there can be no manner of doubt that the transactions as evidenced by the registered sale-deeds were sales, but at the same time it is clear that the sales were effected in pursuance of a compromise based on the principle of give and take. The reversioners gave up their claim as put forward in their plaints and the original vendees gave up the lands. As the reversioners had not got the purchase money to pay up at once, they left the lands in mortgage with the vendees for that money. If instead of executing sale-deeds the parties had executed a deed of compromise embodying the same terms, a decree would have followed on that compromise and that would not have given rise to a claim for pre-emption. The deeds, however, give effect to the terms settled for compromising the suits and were executed as a matter of fact to create evidence of that compromise.

Even if it were decided that the transactions were sales pure and simple, then the question is what was the consideration for each sale. It was not only the money which the reversioners contracted to pay, but also the abandonment of their rights to secure which they had instituted the suits. It is obvious that the vendees one and all would not have agreed to re-sell the lands to the reversioners if they had not been apprehensive of the results of the litigation. Thus the reversioners got the lands not as ordinary purchasers, nor in pursuance of a bargain in open market but as reversioners. It follows, therefore, that besides the money that they agreed to pay there was the additional consideration for the sales that the suits were withdrawn. This additional consideration cannot be valued in money, but the pre-emptors must pay the whole of the consideration before they can get the lands. As they cannot possibly do this, they cannot succeed in their suits. They cannot deprive the reversioners of what the latter have got as such.

For all these reasons I am of opinion that the suits for pre-emption must fail.

Before concluding the judgment a preliminary objection raised by the respondents' Counsel must be noted. This was that the appeal was barred by time because according to the office note it was returned to the appellants' Counsel to be re-filed within a week but it was actually re-filed long after the expiration of that week. Along with the memorandum of appeal in each case copy of the judgment of the trial Court was attached, but the office wanted that copy of the detailed judgment of the trial Court, which was filed in one case, should also be filed in the other case. It was not necessary for purposes of the appeal to file that copy but the appellants' Counsel obtained an additional copy of that judgment and it was for that reason that the re-filing of the appeal was delayed. The appeal did not become barred by time on account of that delay.

On the merits I accept the appeals and reversing the orders of the Courts below dismiss the plaintiff's suits with costs throughout.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA IN COUNCIL, THROUGH THE COLLECTOR, AMRITSAR—RESPONDENT.

Land acquisition—Acquisition injuriously affecting income of claimants—Damages—Award—Onus of proving that award is wrong—Claimant's right to interest on compensation money.

The onus of proving that an award made by a land acquisition officer is wrong is on the claimant. [p. 910, col. 1.]

A claimant is entitled to interest on compensation money from the date on which the property acquired is taken possession of by the Collector. [p. 910, col. 2.]

In determining the amount of compensation to be awarded for property acquired under the Land Acquisition Act, the Court must take into consideration the damage, if any, sustained by the person interested at the time of the Collector's taking possession of the land by reason of the acquisition injuriously affecting his earnings. [p. 910, col. 1.]

First appeal from an order of the District Judge, Amritsar, dated the 17th August, 1925.

Lala Badri Das, R. B.; Messrs. Hem Raj and Nawal Kishore, for the Appellants.

Mr. C. H. Carden Noad and Mr. Jagan Nath Bhandari, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—On the 19th of April, 1920, a notification was issued by the Local Government declaring that a house known as Sant Ram's bungalow, with the compound attached thereto, situate at Amritsar, was required for a public purpose; and on the 31st of October, 1920, the Collector took possession of the house. It was not, however, until the 4th of February, 1921, that possession of the land attached to the house was taken by the Collector.

It appears that Messrs. Kirpa Ram-Brij Lal were in occupation of one-half of the estate on a lease of twenty years, and that they had erected an Ice Factory on a portion of the land which formed part of the estate. The Collector has awarded them Rs. 25,000 as the price of the Factory building, and Rs. 3,000 on account of the cost of the removal and re-erection of the machinery. On a reference to the District Judge the compensation was enhanced by Rs. 800, the amount of the rent which the lessees had paid to their landlord for the period during which they could not occupy the premises on account of compulsory acquisition.

The claimants are dissatisfied with the award of the District Judge, and the first contention urged on their behalf in this appeal is that the price of the building awarded by the District Judge is inadequate and that they are entitled to Rs 29,570 the price ascertained by the Municipal Engineer. The Municipal Engineer has not, however, been produced as a witness, and the Municipal Overseer, upon whose evidence reliance has been placed by the appellants, has not furnished any particulars upon which the price estimated by the Municipal Engineer was founded. The onus clearly rested upon the claimants to satisfy the Court that the award made by the Collector was wrong, and this onus they have wholly failed to discharge. The learned Counsel for the appellants has invited our attention to a remark in the order of reference made by Mirza Aslam Beg on behalf of the Collector which is to the effect that the amount estimated by the Municipal Engineer may be accepted. The learned Government Advocate challenges the authority of the Revenue Officer to make any such admission on behalf of the Local Government, and there can be no doubt that s. 19 of the Land Acquisition Act, which prescribes the particulars to be mentioned in the order of reference does not empower him to express any opinion at variance with the award made by the Collector.

Nor do we think that the appellants have succeeded in showing that they are entitled to Rs. 10,000 on account of compensation for the loss of income. It is to be remembered that they removed the machinery of the Ice Factory in the winter months when the Factory was not working, and sold it to a firm of Dera Ismail Khan for a price which is not shown to be inadequate. It is true that, in determining the amount of compensation to be awarded for the property acquired under the Land Acquisition Act, the Court is required to take into consideration the damage (if any) sustained by the person interested, at the time of the Collector's taking possession of the land, by reason of the acquisition injuriously affecting his earnings. There is, however, no evidence on the record to show that the earnings were injuriously affected by reason of the acquisition, or that Rs. 10,000 represented the loss sustained by them.

There is no reliable evidence to show that the claimants could not find any other place in the whole of Amritsar where they could erect an Ice Factory, and we may, therefore, assume that they sold the machinery because they did not wish to carry on the business of manufacturing ice.

The only other point, which has been urged on behalf of the appellants, is that they were entitled to interest on the amount of compensation from the date on which the Collector took possession of the premises up to the date on which compensation was paid or deposited. Now, as stated above, it was on the 31st of October, 1920, that the Collector took possession of the house in which the office of the Ice Factory was situate, and that, though the appellants were not dispossessed of the land until the 4th of February, 1921, there can be no doubt that they could not transact any business thereafter the 31st October, 1920. Mr. Badri Das for the appellants states, and his statement has not been challenged by the learned Government Advocate, that the compensation was paid to his clients on the 11th of May, 1921. It is conceded on behalf of the Collector that under s. 34 of the Land Acquisition Act the claimants are entitled to interest and we accordingly accept the appeal so far as to direct that the Collector shall pay, in addition to Rs. 32,550, the amount awarded by the District Judge by way of compensation, interest on that sum at six per cent. per annum from the 1st of November, 1920, to the 11th of May, 1927. We leave the parties to bear their own costs in this Court.

Landlord and tenant—Lease to karta of joint family—Karta throwing profits into family chest—Tenancy, whether becomes assets of joint family—Hindu Law—Partition—Separation of one co-parcener—No presumption that others remain joint.

Where a zemindar grants a lease of a land to a persona designata who is also the karta of a joint Hindu family, the tenancy does not become the assets of the joint family merely because the latter throws the profits derived from the leasehold into the common family chest, inasmuch as a tenancy is a creature of contract and it is not open to a lessee by his acts to impose upon the zemindar the other members of his family as co-tenants of the leasehold property. [p. 912, col. 2.]

There is no presumption that when one co-parcener separates from the others the latter remain joint. [p. 911, col. 2.]

Second appeal against the decree of the Subordinate Judge, Jaunpur.

Mr. A. Sanyal, for the Appellant.

Mr. A. P. Pande, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is the plaintiff's appeal in a suit for possession of plots Nos. 1021/7, 8, 9 and 10, and for Rs. 20 as mesne profits for 1329 and 1330 Faslis. Plaintiff and defendants are brothers. According to the plaintiff he separated from the family 30 or 35 years ago. After separation he obtained a lease from the Raja of Jaunpur of the land in dispute, and remained in exclusive possession of the land in suit, sometime towards the close of 1921, or the beginning of 1922, the Raja of Jaunpur sued the plaintiff for ejectment. The defendants were no parties to this suit. A compromise was arrived at on the 31st of January, 1922, and a fresh lease was granted to the plaintiff for a term of seven years from 1329 to 1335 Faslis on an enhanced rent. In July 1922 the defendants took forcible possession of the land and sowed paddy crop. Hence the suit for possession and damages.

The defendants deny that the plaintiff separated from the family 30 or 35 years ago. They allege that the separation took place about the year 1914 or 1915, that the original lease was acquired from the Raja of Jaunpur about the year 1908 when the plaintiff was a member of a joint family with the defendants and was indeed the karta of the family, that the lease was taken for the benefit of the joint family, and the profits of the leasehold property were always thrown into the common chest, that notwithstanding separation the defendants remained in possession of portions of the property in dispute in this way that plot No. 1021/8 was allotted to the share of the plaintiff, and the other plots fell to the share of the defendants, that the defendants contributed towards the costs of the ejectment suit against the plaintiff and that the compromise was made and the second lease obtained not for the benefit of the plaintiff alone but of the parties to the present claim, that the defendants were the principal tenants of plots Nos. 1021/7, 8, 9 and 10, that they were in adverse possession of the said plots for more than 12 years and, therefore, the plaintiff's claim was time-barred.

The Munsif decreed the plaintiff's suit. He found that the family was not joint either at the time of the acquisition of the first or the second lease. It is not clear what the exact findings are on questions of fact arising from the pleadings. Possibly he intended to find that the defendants were not in adverse possession. Possibly he intended to base the judgment upon the fact that the defendants having had no community of interest with the plaintiff at the time of the acquisition of the two leases, these could not enure for the benefit of the defendants. The judgment of the Munsif is rather confused and the findings have not been set forth with clearness and precision. The lower Appellate Court reversed the decision of the Munsif and dismissed the plaintiff's suit.

The facts which can be gathered from the judgments of the two Courts are that Sadanand Pathak, the father of the parties to the suit, had seven sons, of whom three sons separated about 25 years ago, but four of them remained in commensality. These four sons were Padarath plaintiff, Salig and Jagardeo defendants; and a fourth man called Kashi, who was no party to the suit. This fact was admitted by the defendant Salig (vide the judgment of the Munsif).

There can be no doubt that the plaintiff's story that he separated from his brother 30 or 35 years ago was not true. The partition took place 25 years back when three of the brothers separated. There is no presumption that when one co-parcener separated from the others the latter remain united. There is no presumption, therefore, that the parties to the suit still constituted members of a joint family along with Kashi after the separation of the three brothers. The defendants have neither alleged nor proved any re-union.

The lower Appellate Court found that the separation took place between the parties some 10 years ago, and that before that they were joint and formed a joint Hindu family. This finding evidently proceeds upon an error of law and is clearly opposed to the decision of the Privy Council in Bala Bai v. Rukhmabai (1). The learned Judge next finds that the plaintiff was the leading member of the joint family, and, therefore, the first lease was obtained in his name alone but was intended to be for the benefit of the joint family. The land formed part of a tank. It was re-claimed by all the members of the family by their labour and joint effort, and that all the members of the family remained in possession of the property and continued in possession even after separation. The zemindar brought the suit for ejectment against the plaintiff alone, because his name figured as lessee of the land. The defendants remained in possession of the property both before and after separation. After separation plaintiff's possession was restricted to plot No. 1021/8. The defendants remained in possession of the three plots for more than 12 years, and the plaintiff's claim is, therefore, time-barred. The compromise cannot affect the rights of the defendants.

(1) 30 O. 735; 7 O. W. N. 642; 5 Bom. L. R. 469; 30 I. A. 130; 8 S. P. C. J. 470 (P. O.).

If the finding of the lower Appellate Court that the family separated some 10 years ago be accepted, it would follow that at the time of the first lease the family was joint and the lease was acquired during the subsistence of the joint family. It does not follow as a matter of law that the lease obtained by the karta of the joint family is really a lease for all the members of the joint family. It would be a question of some importance. Did the zemindar accept a designated person for his tenant, or did he accept the joint family represented by the said person as his tenant? Neither of the Courts below has approached the matter from this point of view. This omission, however, does not seriously affect the trial of the case. The first lease was for seven years and it spent its force upon the expiry of the fixed period. The zemindar instituted the suit for ejectment and in the course of the said suit a compromise was made with the plaintiff alone at a time when the family was admittedly separate and a new lease was granted to the plaintiff at an enhanced rent. This was in the year 1922. The zemindar did not and could not execute a lease in favour of Padarath plaintiff for the benefit of a joint family, because there was no joint family on the date of the compromise and the execution of the second lease.

The second lease was granted in 1922. The present suit was instituted on the 5th of November, 1923. The rights of the lessee under the first lease expired as soon as the term of the said lease had run out. If the defendants remained in possession adversely to the plaintiff from the date of the execution of the second lease right up to the date of the institution of the suit, the time was not long enough to defeat the plaintiff's claim on the ground of limitation, and the lower Appellate Court was clearly wrong in holding that the plaintiff's claim was time-barred.

It can never be seriously disputed that a Hindu joint family as such may be the tenant of a holding in its corporate capacity. But where the zemindar grants the lease of a land to a persona designata, who is also the karta of a joint Hindu family, and the latter throws the profits derived from the leasehold into the common chest, the tenancy does not become the assets of the joint family [Kallu v. Sital (2)]. This is because a tenancy is a creature of contract and it was not open to a lessee by his acts to impose upon the zemindar the other members of his family as co tenants of the leasehold property.

In the present case on the date of the execution of the second lease, Padarath Pathak, plaintiff, was not joint with defendants Nos. 1 and 2. The lease was taken in the name of plaintiff alone. It has not been proved that the zemindar ever recognised the defendants as co-tenants with the plaintiff. It follows that the defendants are not entitled to claim the benefit of the lease. If the plaintiff allowed the defendants to remain in possession in specific portions of the holding, the defendants did not become the sub-tenants of the plaintiff. There was no agreement to pay rent, and no sub-tenancy has either been pleaded or proved. The possession, therefore, of the defendants was by leave and license of the plaintiff. The plaintiff, therefore, was not entitled to claim mesne profits from the defendants.

As the plaintiff came to Court with a number of false allegations, as a mark of censure I would deprive him of his costs throughout. Holding, therefore, that the plaintiff was entitled to the holding comprising the plots, in suit, I decree the plaintiff's claim for possession of plots Nos. 1021/7, 9 and 10; I dismiss his claim as to point No. 1024/8, it having been found by the lower Appellate Court that the plaintiff is already in possession of this plot. I dismiss plaintiff's claim for mesne profits. The parties are to bear their costs throughout, and the decrees of the Courts below be modified to the extent indicated above.

Adverse possession—Admission of title by party in possession, effect of.

An admission by a party in possession, of the title of the true owner cancels the effect of any previous overt act of adverse possession. L MUHAMMAD BAKHS V. NATHU 814

Co-sharer's possession when adverse.

The possession of one co-sharer is the possession of all the co-sharers and in the absence of an ouster or overt act amounting to ouster, time does not run against the co-sharer who is not in actual possession of his share. In order to establish adverse possession, the co-sharer in possession must explicitly deny and repudiate the title of the other co-sharers to their knowledge and at least 12 years must expire from the date of denial and repudiation before his possession matures into ownership. L JAM BUDHA V. DASU RAM, 9 Lah. L. J. 515; 29 P. L. R. 131

Fallow land—Possession follows title.

Until 15th November, 1912, the land in dispute was shamilat land in the possession of the defendant. In July 1913 the land was partitioned and fell to the share of the plaintiff. The defendant did not sow any crop in 1913. After the 15th November 1913 the defendant was again in possession. A suit for possession was brought by the plaintiff on 9th November, 1925:

Held, that the suit was within time as the defendant's adverse possession must be held to have commenced only from 15th November, 1913.

In case of fallow land possession follows title. L SMAIL V. GAJJAN 130 of quarries—Principles.

The period of adverse possession of a quarry cannot be counted from the time when different sorts of minerals are found at different depths of the quarry.

The rule that a stranger cannot ordinarily acquire title to the whole of a mine by working a part of it and only acquires possession of the minerals which he actually digs does not apply where the stranger works the mine in such a manner as to prove possession of the whole of it. C BHUPENDRA NARAYAN SINHA BHADUR V. Agency Rules (Vizagapatam), r. 55—Appeal against order refusing to set aside dismissal of suit for default, whether lies—Improper exercise of discretion—Power of agent to act under r. 55.

Though the Vizagapatam Agency Rules do not provide for an appeal from an order refusing to set aside an order dismissing a suit for default, the agent has power under s. 55 of the Agency Rules, to set aside an order of a special assistant refusing to set aside the dismissal of a suit for default, where the latter has not exercised a judicial discretion in the matter. M VADDIRAJU VENKATA JEGGA RAO V. The Agra Pre-emption Act of 1922 has not abolished the customary right of pre-emption in Municipal areas to which the Act is not applicable. A BOHRA SRI RAM V. JWALA SHANKER SAHAI, 25 A. L. J. 839 192

s. 4, cls. Clauses (1), (2) and (3) of s. 4 of the Agra Pre-emption Act, 1922, are not applicable to a sale-deed executed before the coming into force of the Act.

A contract for pre-emption for a fixed period of settlement would last during that period only and will not bind the representatives of the parties for all time to come.

Where a village which was a single mahal at the time of the preparation of the wajib-ul-arz is subsequently partitioned, the right of the proprietors to pre-emption under the wajib-ul-arz must, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, be confined to each of the mahals newly formed and the proprietors of one mahal cannot claim a right of pre-emption in respect of shares in other mahals.

The heir of a person entitled to pre-emption, who becomes a co-sharer by succession to the latter, is entitled to continue a suit for pre-emption instituted by the latter even though such heir was not a co-sharer when the sale-deed was executed or when the suit was filed.

Where a landlord without forcibly or unlawfully ejecting his tenant enters upon the tenant's land, the tenant is entitled to treat him as a sub-tenant and sue for his ejectment under s. 58 of the Agra Tenancy Act. Appeal to Privy Council.—Jurisdiction of High Court to order appellant to put guardian ad litem of minor respondent in possession of funds after admission of appeal—Practice of Calcutta High Court.

A High Court has no power, after an appeal to the Privy Council has been finally admitted and the record has been despatched to England to make an order directing the appellant to put the guardian ad litem of the minor respondents in funds to have the appeal conducted on their behalf.

Although it is in accordance with the practice of the Calcutta High Court that in default of any more suitable next friend or guardian the Deputy Registrar should be appointed for the purpose of the proceedings in the High Court for obtaining leave to appeal and so forth, upon the final admission of the appeal the Deputy Registrar ceases to act any further as guardian for the minors.

The jurisdiction of a High Court in relation to appeal to the Privy Council is of a very special character. C. BIR BIKRAM KISHORE MANIKYA v. ALI AHAMAD, 32 O. W. N. 140 867

Arbitration.—Reference to arbitration containing implied agreement dispensing with evidence—Omission by arbitrator to give notice, whether renders award void.

The conduct of the proceedings of arbitrators depends upon the order of reference to arbitration.

If in an order of reference there is an implied agreement that further evidence is not to be put forward by the parties and that the parties have sufficiently and completely stated their case, an award passed on the reference cannot be held to be invalid merely because the arbitrators did not give notice that they were prepared to receive evidence. *M YERRA VENKATA REDDI v. Arbitration Act (IX of 1899), s. 19.—Contract note referring to agreement containing submission clause—Signatory of such contract note, whether party to submission—Threat of legal proceedings by defendant prior to suit, effect of—Readiness and willingness to refer, what is—"At the time the proceedings commence" and "taking any steps in proceedings", meanings of—Intimation to Court of intended application for stay, if amounts to taking step.

Where a contract note contained a printed clause at the end to the following effect: "Subject to the terms of our printed agreement which you have read and accepted. Even if you have not signed the agreement you shall be bound by the terms, and this printed agreement contained a submission clause:

Held, that there was a valid and subsisting submission to refer the disputes between the parties to arbitration even though the said printed agreement which contained the submission clause had not been signed or read by the executant of the contract.

An intimation to the Court that the defendant wants to apply for stay of the suit brought against him under s. 19, Arbitration Act, is not taking any steps in the proceedings so as to debar such party from applying for stay. S KHEMCHAND RAMDAS v. UDHAVDAS VARANDMAL 565

Arms Act (XI of 1878), ss. 4, 19 (e).—Clasp knife whether 'arms'—Tests—Definition of arms, whether exhaustive.

The definition of 'arms' in s. 4 of the Arms Act is not exhaustive and there could be arms beyond the list of weapons mentioned in the said definition.

It cannot be laid down as a hard and fast rule that a clasp knife does not fall within the definition of 'arms'.

The purpose for which an implement is primarily intended regulates whether it should be deemed to be 'arms'.

Where a knife had a blade 5½ inches long with a pointed end; was fitted to a long handle and turned over into the handle:

Held, that the knife fell within the definition of arms inasmuch as the primary purpose of such an instrument can only be for stabbing. R. EMPEROR v. NGA LU GALE, 5 R. 710; 29 Cr. L. J. 115; A. I. R. 1928 Rang. 49 707

s. 22.—'Delivery', meaning of—Delivery of arm for merely carrying it to licensed-holder, whether offence.

Delivery into possession contemplated by s. 22 of the Arms Act is such a delivery as to give the person into whose possession arm is delivered control over the arm and authority to use it as an arm.

The licensed-holder of a gun can permit another person who is not so licensed to carry his gun.

A repairer of a gun who, under the directions of its licensed-holder, delivers it after repair to a person who is not licensed, for the purpose of merely carrying it to the licensed-holder is not, therefore, guilty of an offence under s. 22 of the Arms Act. *A MANZUR HUSAIN v. Bengal Patni Taluks Regulation (VIII of 1819), s. 11.—Sale of patni—Occupancy raiyat, whether liable to be ejected by purchaser—'Khudkasht raiyat', definition of—Tenant of jungle land living in contiguous village, whether khudkasht raiyat.

Persons in occupation who have acquired occupancy rights under the tenancy law are not liable to be ejected by a purchaser in a sale under the Bengal Patni Taluks Regulation, VIII of 1819, even though they are not khudkasht raiyats.

Tenure-holders cannot under the provisions of law acquire a right of occupancy as *raiya*s with regard to lands which they had themselves cultivated within their own tenure.

A khudkasht raiyat is a resident and hereditary cultivator in contradistinction to a *paikash*t raiyat or a migratory tenant.

Bengal Patni Regulation—concl'd.

Tenants of waste and uninhabitable jungle lands which do not form part of any village cannot be held to be not khudkasht raiyats merely because they reside only in contiguous villages of the patni. C RASH BEHARI MANDAL v. HEMANTA KUMAR GHOSE, 54 C. 788; A. I. R. 1928 Cal. 52 71

Bengal Tenancy Act (VIII of 1885), ss. 30 (b), 153—Enhancement of rent—Rise of price of staple food crops—Land not used for raising such crops—Rent, whether could be enhanced—Question of right to enhance—Second appeal.

No enhancement of rent can be claimed on the ground of rise in the price of staple food crops, in respect of land which is used, with the acquiescence of the landlord, in such a way that food crops cannot be raised thereon.

In a suit for enhancement of rent, the plea that no enhancement could be decreed in respect of that portion of the land which is covered by trees and buildings, is a question relating to the right to enhance on which a second appeal lies. PAT JEO NATH JHA v. BISHAMBHAR DAS, 8 P. L. T. 495 422

s. 50—Enhancement of rent—Increase in area, proof of—Duty of landlord to show area at inception of tenancy—Confirmatory kabuliyats, value of—Purchase of holding by landlord and re-settlement with same tenant—Transfer of tenancy—Tenancy, whether continues.

In a suit for enhancement of rent a landlord cannot succeed in showing that there has been an increase in area by merely proving that the area under cultivation is in excess of that which is mentioned in a confirmatory kabuliyat; he must show what the area was at the inception of the tenancy.

Where a landlord purchases a holding at a rent sale and re-settles the land with the same tenant, the continuance of the old tenancy is broken and the presumption under s. 50 of the Bengal Tenancy Act does not apply.

A new tenancy is created when a tenant sells or transfers a portion of his holding and the landlord recognises the transferee, and the presumption under s. 50 of the Bengal Tenancy Act, similarly, ceases to apply. C RAMANATH BHATTACHARJEE v. JAGANNATH MONDAL 136

s. 74—Abwabs—'Actual rent' and 'malguzari', meanings of.

The object of the whole series of enactments from the Regulations of 1791 to the Bengal Tenancy Act of 1885 was to prevent exactions from tenants beyond the rent specified in their patta, when there was one, and if there was no written engagement, beyond what was the rent actually payable, whether by verbal agreement or by virtue of custom.

It must depend on the circumstances of each particular case whether the sum claimed is really part of the rent agreed upon to be paid as consideration for the lease.

The words actual rent in the above section of the Bengal Tenancy Act cannot be taken to mean either a fair and equitable rent or rent at customary or Pargana rates.

The word 'malguzari' cannot be rendered as rent, much less as actual rent. It ordinarily means revenue. Quære—Whether the words actual rent in s. 74, Bengal Tenancy Act, 1885, are equivalent to the gaut jama of the old Regulations.

Bengal Tenancy Act—concl'd.

Long use or custom cannot validate abwabs as an addition to the rent. P C CHATTAR KUMARI DEVI v. W. W. BROUCKE, A. I. R. 1927 P. O. 250; 8 P. L. T. 813; I. L. T. 40 Pat. 1; 47 O. L. J. 90; 32 O. W. N. 260; 26 A. L. J. 19; 54 I. A. 432; 54 M. L. J. 293 P. O. 571

s. 105 (1)—Application for settlement of fair rent—Impleading of parties after two months from date of publication of Record of Rights, legality of—Application against some of co-tenants—Remand for impleading all, propriety of.

It is not necessary for the landlord or the tenant in making an application under s. 105 (1) of the Bengal Tenancy Act to name any person. It is only necessary to indicate the holdings in the record in respect of which a settlement of fair and equitable rent is sought. An application under the section which is filed within two months of the final publication of the Record of Rights is not, therefore, barred even though a person interested in the tenancy is added only after the expiry of two months.

But where a landlord fights out the matter in the presence of one only of several co-tenants and his application is ultimately dismissed on the ground that such an application must be brought against all the joint tenants, it is not right to remand the case in order that the other joint tenants may also be impleaded as parties.

The heirs of a deceased recorded tenant can be impleaded as parties to such an application even after the expiry of two months from the date of the final publication of the Record of Rights. C SIBA KUMARI DEVI v. DOSHI GHOSAIN, 46 O. L. J. 555; A. I. R. 1928 Cal. 116 836

s. 111—Defendant raising question of status—S. 111, applicability of.

Section 111 of the Bengal Tenancy Act does not mean that in any case in which the defendant-tenant chooses to raise a question as to status the landlord is prevented from taking action under the ordinary law in the Civil Court. C KSHEMANANDA KUMAR v. RASHMAYA HALDAR, 32 O. W. N. 132 875

s. 173 (3)—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 47—Rent sale set aside—Auction-purchaser, appeal by, whether competent.

No appeal lies at the instance of an auction-purchaser whose sale has been set aside under s. 173, cl. (3) of the Bengal Tenancy Act.

No appeal is allowed against an order under s. 173, cl. (3), Bengal Tenancy Act, by any provision of the Act itself and this section is not included in the list of orders made appealable as such by the Code of Civil Procedure. The only way in which an order under s. 173, cl. (3), Bengal Tenancy Act, may be regarded as an appealable one is by treating it as one made under s. 47 of the Civil Procedure Code and thus satisfying the definition of a "decree" under that Code and being thus appealable as such. C TAMIRANNESSA BIBI v. KACHHIMAN BEWA, 32 O. A notice of enhancement given to an annual tenant by a certificated holder and manager of a Jagir village is not invalid simply because some of his co-sharers do not agree that such a notice should be given.

The mere issue of a notice of enhancement does not bar an action for ejectment if that remedy is otherwise legally open to the landlord especially when the tenant after receiving the notice of enhancement not only refuses to pay the enhanced rent but contests the landlord's title. *N DEWARI KONBI v. Bihar and Orissa Food Adulteration Act (II of 1919), ss. 3 (1), 14 (2)—‘Labelled’, ‘sealed’, meanings of—Sale of sealed tins—Power of Inspector to demand smaller quantities out of open tins—Adulteration of article—Conviction of accused, legality of—Prejudice.

A Sanitary Inspector went to the accused's shop and found 15 tins of mustard oil exposed for sale. He demanded and got 2½ chhataks of oil and found that the oil was highly adulterated. The accused was prosecuted for an offence under s. 3 (1) of the Bihar and Orissa Food Adulteration Act of 1919. The accused pleaded that he had purchased the tins in a sealed condition and used to sell them in the same condition:

Held, that the procedure adopted by the Inspector in not taking a full tin of oil in its unopened condition was illegal and seriously prejudicial to the accused in view of the provisions of cl. (2) of s. 14 of the Act, and that the accused could not under the circumstances be convicted under s. 3 (1) of the Act.

The word ‘labelled’ in s. 14 (2) of the Act denotes a written slip of paper or a metal or any other thing fixed or attached to articles of manufacture for the purpose of describing them or specifying their quality, etc. or the name of the maker. Neither the word ‘labelled’ nor the word ‘sealed’ necessarily means that the article should contain the name of the manufacturer. All that is required is that it must be distinctive from which the maker or manufacturer or the firm could be easily traced. PAT EMPEROR v. SHIB DAS MAHWARI, 29 Cr. L. J. 75 building—Fine, whether leviable with reference to whole area—‘Building site’, meaning of—‘Adjacent’, construction of—Section 148, whether applicable.

The penalty leviable under s. 68 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code where a portion of land assessed or held for purposes of agriculture is used without the permission of the Collector for building purposes, is not to be levied with reference to the whole plot but only with reference to the area actually used for building purposes and it would be a question of fact in each case what area has been used for non-agricultural purposes.

What portion of an area falls within the term ‘building site’ is a question of fact depending upon the circumstances of each case.

The word ‘adjacent’ in the definition of the term ‘building site’ in s. 3, cl. (9) of the Bombay Land Revenue Code must be construed with reasonable limitations.

Section 148 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code is not applicable to fines levied under the provisions of s. 56 of the Code. B SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA, v. ABDUL HUSEN DOSAJI GODWALA, 29 Bom. L. R. 1350; A. I. R. 1927 Bom. 601

(2) (b), 27—Election of new President—Notice of meeting—Circulation of notice by post, sufficiency of—Wrongful dissolution of meeting—Right of members to elect new Chairman—Members retiring before meeting actually breaks, rights of—Decision of Chairman, finality of.

Although it is the duty of a Chairman to preserve order, conduct proceedings regularly, and take care that the sense of the meeting is properly ascertained with regard to any question before it, he has no power to stop or adjourn a meeting at his own will; and if he purports to do so, it is competent for the meeting to resolve to go on with the business for which it has been convened, and to appoint another Chairman for that object.

Where a Chairman wrongfully dissolves a meeting, members who proceed to leave the meeting before it has really broken up and the Chairman has left the chair, do so at their peril and the remaining members are entitled to proceed with the meeting and elect a new Chairman.

The decisions of a Chairman are not necessarily final, and if on any important question he wrongly rules out a particular amendment, then it is open for the Court to revise his decision and to hold if necessary that the resolution passed thereafter was irregular and not binding.

‘Circulation’ of notice of a meeting under s. 35 (2) (b) of the Bombay Local Boards Act may be effected by service through post. It is not necessary that a person should be sent round to serve notice personally on every member.

Where a meeting has been properly convened and notices have been properly given, it is not left to the absolute and final discretion of a Chairman to decide whether in law the meeting has been properly convened or not. *B GOPAL NARAYAN KULKARNI v. On an application by the defendant for transfer of a suit under s. 22, Civil Procedure Code, to another Court, considerations of convenience should not outweigh the cardinal principle that it is the right of the plaintiff as arbiter lites to choose his own forum.

In a suit by an endorsee of a pro-note in the Small Cause Court, Madras, with leave of Court, the time taken by the defendant in proceedings to revoke the leave cannot be taken into account in considering whether a subsequent application by the defendant to transfer the suit to the file of some other Court on the ground of convenience was made "at the earliest possible opportunity." M. A mere declaration in a decree that the property in respect of which a decree is given to the plaintiff is subject to a charge for a named sum in favour of the defendant by itself would not entitle the parties to work out their mortgage rights in execution.

s. 60 (c)--House of agriculturist--Exemption from attachment--Burden of proof--Agriculturist, definition of--Zemindars, whether agriculturists--Presumption.

A person whose main source of income is zemindari land and who does not himself carry on cultivation is not an 'agriculturist' within the meaning of s. 60 (c) of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The party who alleges himself to be an agriculturist must prove that he earns his livelihood wholly or principally by agriculture, or that he ordinarily engages personally in agricultural labour.

An agriculturist whose house is protected from attachment and sale by s. 60 (c) of the Code must be an agriculturist belonging to the class of persons who are ordinarily designated as agriculturists, that is, whose principal source of livelihood is by cultivation. Cultivation to a certain extent may be carried on by most zemindars but their houses cannot on that account be designated as agriculturists' houses.

Even if a person is both an agriculturist and a zemindar, the burden of proving that a house in dispute is strictly of the nature contemplated by s. 60 (c) of the Code is on the person who alleges it.

There is no presumption that a zemindar is an agriculturist. The presumption is just the other way and a zemindar must be taken to be a zemindar unless his main source of income is proved to be from cultivation. A BACHAN SINGH v. BHAIKA SINGH, L. R. 8 A. 229 Rev.; A. I. R. 1927 All. 601 49

— s. 73, O. XXI, r. 52—Partnership action—Assets, distribution of—Procedure—Charging orders, validity of—Rateable distribution.

In the case of a partnership the liability of the partners is unlimited. It cannot be restricted to the partnership assets and there is no reason why in a suit for dissolution of partnership, creditors of the firm should be compelled to await the result of a partnership account between the partners before they are allowed to obtain satisfaction of their decree out of the partnership assets.

In a suit for dissolution of partnership all the liabilities of the partnership should be first paid off in full, the costs of all parties should next be paid off in full and the balance of the assets, if any, should be divided between the partners.

Where notices under O. XXI, r. 52 of the Civil Procedure Code, are served on the Receiver in a partnership action and in pursuance of a garnishee or other order of the Court he pays in the amount in respect of any such notice into the Sheriff's office, all execution creditors whose attachments are registered in the Negative Book of the Prothonotary before the realization of the assets by the Sheriff would be entitled to pro rata distribution. In case the property in the custody Court has been attached at the instance of different Courts the custody Court would seek to satisfy such attachments not pro rata, but in order of time, sending the moneys to the first attaching Court first, the balance to the second and so on.

There is no warrant in the Code of Civil Procedure for the practice introduced in the Bombay High Court of making charging orders at the instance of creditors in a partnership action. The charging orders obtained in these proceedings are not equivalent to notices under O. XXI, r. 52 of the Civil Procedure Code. In such cases the provisions of O. XXI, r. 52, should be given effect to. B NENSUKHGAVRI v. RAJABALLY MULLA ABDUL KADAR, 29 Bom. L. R. 689; A. I. R. 1927 Bom. 405 184

Where an application was made to the Collector for sanction to file a suit under s. 92, Civil Procedure Code and sanction was refused by the Collector but the plaintiffs without bringing this fact to the notice of the Advocate-General obtained an ex parte sanction:

Held, that this would not affect the right of the plaintiffs to sue though it might be taken into account in considering the bona fides of the petitioners.

Held, per *Cuming, J. Proceedings under the Companies Act are proceedings in a Court of civil jurisdiction within the meaning of s. 141, Civil Procedure Code, and a Liquidation Court has, therefore, in a proper case power to make an order of attachment before judgment in accordance with the provisions of O. XXXVIII, r. 5, Civil Procedure Code.

Under the Civil Procedure Code as amended in 1908 the jurisdiction of Courts to act under O. XXXVIII, rr. 5 and 6 has been very much extended and a Court can now attach before judgment property situate beyond its local limits.

The jurisdiction of Courts in attaching property before judgment is of an extraordinary nature and must be very sparingly exercised. In such cases the Court proceeds to attach the property of the defendant before the respective rights of the parties are determined and it is absolutely necessary that in exercising these powers Courts should strictly adhere to the procedure laid down in the Code. Before an order of attachment of property before judgment is passed the Court should issue notice to the opposite party calling upon him to furnish security for satisfying any decree that may eventually be passed against him or to show cause why he should not furnish security and it is only when he has appeared and failed to furnish security or show cause, that the Court can pass an order under O. XXXVIII, r. 6 of the Code attaching his property.

The provisions of O. XXXVIII, r. 5 of the Code can only be invoked if the Court is satisfied that the respondent is about to dispose of the whole or any part of his property. A vague and an indefinite allegation that he is likely to dispose of his property is wholly insufficient to justify an order for attachment of property before judgment. *L. KANSHI RAM v. When a suit has been decided ex parte the remedy by way of appeal from the ex parte decree as well as the remedy by way of application under O. IX, r. 13 of the Civil Procedure Code are both open to the person against whom the decision was passed.

As a broad proposition it is not correct to say that in a case in which an ex parte decree has been passed and the aggrieved party has not availed of the remedy by way of an application under O. IX, r. 13, Civil Procedure Code; he is precluded from raising the question of propriety of the refusal to adjourn his case in the appeal which he prefers from the ex parte decree itself.

An Appellate Court has general powers of remand under s. 151, Civil Procedure Code, and its powers are not restricted to the cases specified in O. XLI, r. 23 of the Code. C. GNANENDRA MOHAN BHADURY v. PRAFULLANANDA GOSWAMI, 32 O. W. N. 101 542

A remand is permissible under s. 151, Civil Procedure Code, but recourse should be had to this section only in very exceptional cases.

A remand cannot be construed to be one under s. 151, Civil Procedure Code, simply because the Court has failed to express that the remand is under r. 23 or r. 25 of O. XLI of the Civil Procedure Code.

Where a remand order is accompanied by an order for refund of Court-fee, the remand should be considered to be one under r. 23, O. XLI, Civil Procedure Code.

XLI, r. 23, Civil Procedure Code, is incompetent. L. SAHIBI v. MOHAMMAD SARWAR KHAN, 9 Lah. L. J. 543; A. I. R. 1928 Lah. 116 842 or paramount title is not ordinarily a necessary or proper party; but this rule is not absolute or inflexible, and in certain circumstances, it may not only be proper, but even desirable to implead him as a party.

The object of O. XXXIV, r. 1, Civil Procedure Code is to define the scope of a mortgage suit as such, that is of a mortgage suit pure and simple but this rule is not directed to the question whether any cause of action may or may not be joined to a claim on a mortgage, and, if it may be joined, in what circumstances.

Where in a suit to enforce an equitable mortgage by one defendant by deposit of title-deeds standing in the name of another defendant, it was alleged that the deposit was made on behalf of both, but that other person denied such right and authority to deposit, and the plaintiff thereupon applied to amend the plaint so as to include the allegation that the properties belonged to the defendant who deposited the title-deeds and were purchased by him benami in the name of the other defendant:

Held, that, inasmuch as the alleged benamidar had already been impleaded as a party to the suit, and since the question of ownership as a question of fact was bound up with the other questions in the case, the issue relating to the title of the alleged benamidar should be allowed to be raised and the amendment prayed for permitted. *M. O. VI, r. 17—Amendment of plaint—Discretion of trial Court—Interference in appeal—Duty of plaintiff to include whole claim—Omission to include part of claim—Amendment at late stage—Good cause.

Order VI, r. 17 of the Civil Procedure Code allows a wide discretion to the Court in permitting an amendment, but the discretion is with the Court, and when that discretion has been exercised on materials which have been admitted legally and for judicial reasons it should not be lightly interfered with in appeal.

It is the duty of a plaintiff to frame his plaint properly before he brings it into Court. It is for him to see that it includes the whole of the claim which he is entitled to make in respect of the cause of action unless he wishes to relinquish some portion of the claim, and where he has omitted to do so the Court will not at a late stage permit an amendment of the plaint so as to include the omitted claim also, unless very good cause is shown for the previous omission. *O. Although it has been the practice on the Original Side of the Calcutta High Court to follow the analogy of O. IX, r. 13 of the Code of Civil Procedure on general principles of justice, and, as a rule, a case decided ex parte will not be restored unless there be sufficient cause for the party not being ready to go on with the case when the case came before the Court, yet the exact words of O. IX, r. 13 are not to be applied on the footing that they are directly applicable and are exhaustive, and it is open to the High Court in its discretion to restore a suit upon proper terms even though there is an element of negligence on the party applying for restoration.

In a suit for damages for defamation on the Original Side of the High Court against the Printer and the Editor of a newspaper the summons was served on the Printer but not on the Editor. The Printer requested the Manager to undertake the defence and the latter agreed to do so. On the day of hearing neither of the defendants appeared and an ex parte decree was passed. The Editor applied for restoration of the suit and the Printer prayed that the decree may be set aside as against him also. The application of the Printer was dismissed on the ground that there was no 'sufficient cause' for his non-appearance and that the case did not fall within the proviso to O. — O. XXII, rr. 3, 4—Death of plaintiff or defendant after preliminary decree—Abatement—Rules 3 and 4, applicability of.

There can be no abatement of a suit under O. XXI, rr. 3 and 4, Civil Procedure Code, after a preliminary decree has been passed.

There can be no question of the surviving of a cause of action in a suit when a judgment has been pronounced in respect of that cause of action. By the effect of the judgment the decree takes the place of the cause of action either by affirming it or by rejecting it. O KALU RAM v. GAYA DIN, 4 O. W. N. 1002 332

A Court has power to amend a memorandum of appeal against a preliminary decree in a mortgage suit so as to make it an appeal both against the final decree as well as against the preliminary decree.

Obiter.—Under the present Civil Procedure Code an appeal may be preferred from a preliminary decree in a mortgage suit even after the passing of the final decree.

A preliminary decree is now an independent decree which is not absorbed by the final decree. The final decree is really dependent upon the preliminary decree, and if there is no appeal from the final decree but the preliminary decree is set aside on appeal, the final decree will necessarily fall to the ground. C MADHU SUDAN KUNDU v. A compromise decree in a mortgage suit provided that the mortgaged properties may be sold if the decree amount was not paid within a certain time and that, if the proceeds of the sale were insufficient, the judgment-debtor was to be personally liable to pay the balance to the decree-holder. After obtaining this decree, thinking that a final decree was necessary in the case, the decree-holder applied on three occasions, for obtaining a final decree. On each of these occasions, his application was dismissed. He then applied for execution of the original decree:

Held, (1) that the decree was a composite one and though it was irregular and was not strictly warranted by the provisions of O. XXXIV of the Civil Procedure Code it was executable;

(2) that the decree in question being a compromise decree and the parties having agreed that the decretal amount should be realised in a particular way, the Court had full jurisdiction to carry out the intentions of the parties whatever was the nature of the decree;

Civil Procedure Code—1908—contd.

(3) that though an application for final decree is not an application for execution, yet the three prior applications were steps-in-aid of execution inasmuch as the plaintiff was asking the Court to make an order which was thought necessary, before taking out actual execution of the decree and the ultimate object of the petitions was to hasten the actual realisation of the decree amount. M PARAMBATH PARKUM v. — O. XXXVIII, r. 5—Attachment before judgment—Defendants promising to file petition undertaking not to transfer—Failure to file petition, whether sufficient ground to order attachment.

A mortgagee applied for attachment before judgment alleging that the defendants were trying to execute certain transfers of their properties in order to avoid payment and to delay and defraud him. The defendants appeared and undertook to file a petition giving an undertaking not to transfer any property before the disposal of the suit. The said petition not having been filed, the Subordinate Judge at once made an order of attachment before judgment:

Held, that before making an order for attachment before judgment the Court had to consider whether the plaintiff had made out a sufficient case according to law in order to entitle him to get an order for attachment of the other properties of the defendants before judgment, and that the order for attachment made on the mere ground that the defendants had failed to file the petition was illegal. PAT RAM-KHELAWAN SINGH v. Where the trial of a case is defective by reason of relevant evidence having been shut out or by refusal of an adjournment which should have been granted to enable a party to adduce all the evidence or for any other reason, the Appellate Court can ask the lower Court to take the evidence so shut out or to give the party, who had not the opportunity to adduce all his evidence, an opportunity to adduce evidence, and to record a finding on the evidence so taken. The mere fact that the Appellate Court has not set aside the decree of the lower Court, does not in any way take away the jurisdiction it has to set aside the judgment and direct the lower Court to take evidence and record fresh findings. M NARAYANASWAMI IYER v. ever wrong, cannot possibly be regarded as constituting an error apparent on the face of the record affording a proper and sufficient ground for granting review of a judgment.

The power of Court to grant review is circumscribed and limited by r. 1 of O. XLVII, Civil Procedure Code. It is only when new material is overlooked by excusable misfortunes, mistake or error apparent on the face of the record that a review can generally be granted and the expression 'other sufficient reason' following in the rule must be construed ejusdem generis and the sufficiency required must be of a kind analogous to the two matters already specified in the rule. M OPPORTI PADHI v. O. XLVII, rr. 4, 7—Appeal against decree passed on review—Party aggrieved whether confined to grounds mentioned in r. 7 Right to go into merits.

Although when a review is granted, and the case is re-opened for consideration, it is open to the party aggrieved to appeal against that order only on grounds which fall under O. XLVII, r. 7, Civil Procedure Code, yet when that stage has passed and on re-hearing, a fresh decree is passed and the final decree or order is appealed against, the Court is not confined to the grounds mentioned in r. 7 but has full power to go into the whole case on the merits and see whether on the evidence the decree passed on review is proper.

Per Ramesam, J.—An appeal against an order granting a review can be filed only on the grounds mentioned in O. XLVII, r. 7. If an appeal is filed against the final judgment and decree after the review, even then if one of the grounds of appeal is that the order granting the review was an erroneous order, it should be attacked only on the same grounds and no other. But this does not mean that the judgment after review cannot be attacked on the merits, while submitting to the order granting the review. M GOVINDA CHETTY v. RANGAMMAL, (1927) M. W. N. 411 172

Sch. II, cl. 1—Reference to arbitration—Compromise agreement.

The words 'arbitration and reference to arbitration' are used in common parlance. The Code of Civil Procedure uses the same expressions but lays down certain forms and steps for a reference to arbitration and for the award made by the arbitrator to be embodied in the decree of the Court, and unless these forms and steps are followed, there cannot be said to be any valid reference to arbitration.

In a suit by the plaintiff for possession, alleging that defendants Nos. 4 and 5 had sold half of certain plots to him but had subsequently colluded with defendants Nos. 1 to 3 the other co-sharers and allowed the latter to take possession, a compromise petition was filed under which the whole lands in the village were to be divided between the plaintiff and his co-sharers on the one hand and the defendants Nos. 1 to 3 on the other proportionately to the admitted shares they had therein on reference to the last Settlement Survey. A gentleman was appointed as arbitrator to equalise possession as far as possible and it was agreed that after the said arbitrator had made the proposed division, the plaintiff would withdraw from the suit and the defendants would withdraw the allegations they had made with respect to the plaintiff's purchase :

Held, that this was not an application for an order of reference to arbitration within cl. 1 of Sch. II of the Civil Procedure Code. C D WARKA NATH CHAKRABARTI CHOWDHURY v. ATUL CHANDRA CHAKRABARTI CHOWDHURY, 46 C. L. J. 353; A. I. R. 1928 Cal. 103. 509

Where a person seeks to set aside a document executed by him to another on the ground of undue influence if there is a relation which gives rise to confidence between the parties and if the person in fiduciary position obtains an advantage—where this alone is established and nothing further—the Court gives relief to the party conferring the benefit, unless the other party shows that he did not avail himself of the confidence which subsisted between the parties. The burden is, therefore, upon him and, if he does not discharge the burden, the plaintiff succeeds.

When there is a third party involved, the position is not dissimilar. If it is shown that such third party was aware of the existence of such confidential or fiduciary relation, he is under the same disability as the party who occupied the position of confidence; that is to say, the Court gives relief to the plaintiff without demanding proof of fraud or imposition, or any specific act of undue influence. It is enough that the third party was aware of the existence of the confidential relation and the Court does not insist on proof that he was further aware of the actual exercise of undue influence.

In such cases the third party is affected not by reason of any active participation in, but by bare knowledge of, undue influence exercised in fact or by the mere knowledge of the situation of the parties which in law gave rise to a presumption of undue influence.

It is not special relations arising from certain situations only such as, parent and child, or guardian and ward, that are jealously watched by the Court; on the other hand, the principle on which equity gives relief is extended and applied to, all the variety of relations in which dominion may be exercised by one person over another. Similarly the Court does not fetter its discretion by a fictitious regard to the age of the person aggrieved. The law looks at the substance of the thing and it is essential that the relationship should have ceased not merely in name but in fact.

When a stranger takes a gift from a person tainted with the undue influence of another person to whom he stands in a fiduciary position, with notice of the circumstances giving rise to the equity, the Court will compel him to give up the benefit.

Where a person 20 years old executed a mortgage of almost the whole of his property in favour of a creditor of his maternal uncle for no personal benefit to himself and it was found that the uncle and nephew stood in the position of trustee and cestui que trust, that the nephew had no independent advice and was not directed to seek the disinterested opinion of his mother and paternal uncle who were alive and yielded to the importunities of the uncle who was in a position of financial bankruptcy and whom he wished to oblige, and the creditor was aware of these circumstances:

Where a contract for sale of goods contemplates the arrival of the goods piece-meal or in one lot as the shippers or the other carriers may be able to deal with them, the fact that the goods contracted for arrived on two different days and the seller gave notice to the buyer of the separate arrivals without waiting for the arrival of the whole of the goods, does not constitute a breach of the condition regarding notice of the arrival of goods, provided the buyer has received notice of the arrival of all the goods contracted for.

A party to a contract who has refused to perform his part of the contract, is not precluded from retracting his refusal before the due date expires and giving notice of his readiness and willingness to perform.

Section 39 of the Contract Act applies to all breaches of contract which occur before the expiry of the last date on which the contract can be performed in whole or in part though it also covers and includes all earlier breaches.

In view of s. 94 of the Contract Act a seller is not bound to offer delivery of the goods at the buyer's place of business, but it is the duty of the buyer to take delivery at the seller's place of business.

The fact that a re-sale advertised for a particular day was continued on subsequent days without fresh notice or proclamation in the hope of getting better price, does not vitiate the re-sale.

The question of reasonable time is one of fact and a buyer cannot be allowed to set up, for the first time in appeal, the plea that a re-sale was not conducted within a reasonable time.

In a suit for recovery of the amount of freight paid by the Government to the Railway Administration from the contractor:

Held, (1) that when the coal was brought to Rajahmundry without paying the freight, it was open to the Executive Engineer to have rejected the coal as under the terms of the contract the delivery was to be free of charges at Rajahmundry; and not having done that, he was not entitled to claim from the defendant the amount of freight which he paid, since his right extended only to rejecting the coal and not to claim any charges that he chose to pay to a third person, namely, the Railway Administration; (2) that the Executive Engineer or the Secretary of State was in no way interested in paying the freight on behalf of the defendant and that neither s. 69 nor s. 70 of the Contract Act applied and the suit was liable to be dismissed. *M. Co-owners—Abadi—Construction of building and transfer by co-owner in sole possession.—Right of other co-owners to sue for joint possession—Transfer, effect of—Sole possession, whether confers title—Custom, validity of.

If co-owners of the abadi under some arrangement remain in separate possession of a certain site, this does not give the other co-owners a right to sue. But if the co-owners in possession construct a building on the site, the other co-owners may sue for demolition of the building and for joint possession, provided that they do so within a reasonable time.

The right of co-owners to sole possession is a right which continues only so long as they possess themselves and such a right is consistent with the other co-sharers' title. If, however, the co-sharers transfer to a stranger, this amounts to a denial of the title of their co-owners and is inconsistent with that title. Such a transfer gives the co-owners a right to sue for a declaration that the transfer is invalid against them. It also gives them a right to sue for joint possession with the transferors and ejectment of the transferee; for the transferee gets no title to possession by the transfer.

A custom whereby a co-owner can by reason of new separate possession claim an absolute title is a custom which would be inconsistent with the very status of co-ownership and as such cannot be recognised. A MOHAMMAD SHER KHAN v. BHARAT INDU, 25 A. L. J. 933; A. I. R. 1928 All. 59 656

Although the prayers in a plaint are worded in the form of mere declarations, yet, where some of them are really of a consequential nature, the plaintiff is bound to pay ad valorem fee on the plaint.

Where a plaint as well as the memorandum of appeal filed by a plaintiff are found to be insufficiently stamped, the proper course to be followed by the Appellate Court is to direct that the appeal be registered on the appellant supplying the deficit Court-fees as regards his memorandum of appeal and after the appeal has been registered and before it has been dealt with under O. XLII, r. 11, Civil Procedure Code, to place the case for orders under s. 12, sub-s. (ii) of the Court Fees Act as regards the deficit Court-fees on the plaint in the lower Court.

It is not necessary for the application of s. 12, sub-s. (ii) of the Court Fees Act that there should have been a formal decision on the question of sufficiency of Court-fees.

Provisions of s. 10 (ii) of the Court Fees Act are mandatory and the power conferred by this provision of law may be exercised at any time so long as the suit remains before the Court on appeal. C BIDHU BHUSAN BAKHSI v. KALA CHAND ROY, 31 C. W. N. 1015; A. I. R. 1927 Cal. 775 335

The term "ancestral land" in Art. 22 of Sch. I of the Court Fees Act means land in respect of which in order to enable the plaintiff to succeed, it is necessary for him to prove that the land is ancestral. A suit by the next heir to set aside an alienation by a female holder who has the customary life-interest in the estate is not within the purview of Court Fees Act—concl.

Art. 22 as it is not ordinarily necessary for the plaintiff in such a suit to aver or to prove that the land is ancestral.

In the case of a plaint insufficiently stamped the Court is bound to give the party concerned an opportunity to pay the proper stamp and it is on his failure to do so that the Court can decline to look at the document. But the fact that a Court has accepted an insufficiently stamped plaint does not render the proceedings which follow thereon void.

Section 12, Court Fees Act, bars an appeal only where the dispute is about the proper valuation of the subject-matter of the suit and not when the question is which of the several articles of the Court Fees Act applies to the facts stated in the plaint.

Where an order directing the payment of additional Court-fee is incorporated in the decree, it becomes an essential part of the decree and is appealable as such. L JANTAN v. AHMAD 817

As an accused sentenced under s. 123, Criminal Procedure Code, is entitled to be released from custody the moment he furnishes security, the Court should not pass an absolute sentence of imprisonment for a particular period, but should sentence the accused for imprisonment for a particular period or until such date within that period as the required security is furnished. M In re IBRAYA ROWTHAN, (1927) M. The terms 'conviction' and 'acquittal' are wholly inapplicable to orders under s. 118 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. An order of a Sessions Judge setting aside an order of a Magistrate directing a person to furnish security for good behaviour is not, consequently, appealable under s. 417 of the Code.

In security proceedings the evidence of Police Officers should not be discarded altogether as of no value to prove bad character, although it has to be received with caution.

Suspicion in the mind of a witness is not admissible evidence in such proceedings although evidence of general repute is admissible.

The allegations in s. 110 of the Criminal Procedure Code can only be proved by direct evidence of people who have knowledge of facts to which they depose with the exception that in regard to all other clauses except cl. (f) of s. 110, a witness may give evidence of general repute.

To all intents and purposes they are on a par with statements made in a departmental enquiry, and the accused is not entitled to copies of such statements.

Similarly, statements recorded by a Magistrate in such a preliminary inquiry at the instance of the Criminal Investigation Officer do not fall within the purview of s. 164 of the Code.

Several accused persons were all charged under s. 121-A of the Penal Code with conspiring to deprive His Majesty the King of the Sovereignty of British India, of conspiring to wage war against the Government and of conspiring to overawe the Government by means of criminal force. Apart from the conspiracy to effect these objects there was disclosed on the evidence a conspiracy to commit dacoities either accompanied by murder or not accompanied by murder and consequently certain of the conspirators were liable to punishment under s. 120-B of the Penal Code for being party to a criminal conspiracy to commit offences punishable with death or transportation for life. The actual participators in these offences were separately charged and the accused were all jointly tried on these charges:

Held, that the joinder of the charges was regular and legal as all the offences formed part of the same transaction.

Where a Magistrate who has conducted the Jail identifications happens to be the Committing Magistrate, ordinarily his evidence should be taken for the first time in the Court of Session by calling him as a Court witness. But the fact that a Magistrate took the unusual course of going into the witness-box during the committal proceedings will not vitiate the committal or the subsequent trial.

Section 10 of the Evidence Act renders admissible in cases of conspiracy much evidence which is not ordinarily admissible. The provisions of the said section are much wider than those of the English Law and under the section anything said or written by any conspirator in reference to the common intention of the conspiracy after the time when such intention was first entertained by any conspirator is a relevant fact as against each of the persons believed to be so conspiring as well for the purposes of proving the existence of the conspiracy as for the purpose of showing that any such person was a party to it.

The evidence of accomplices is always admissible and is always relevant but under a very old practice of the Courts in England such evidence is accepted only with great caution and after the closest scrutiny, and is not usually accepted against any individual person unless it is corroborated. Although it is not illegal to convict on the uncorroborated evidence of an accomplice, there is a consensus of opinion that a conviction on the uncorroborated evidence of an accomplice is rarely justifiable. The practice in India is the same as the practice in England.

Evidence in corroboration must be independent testimony which affects the accused by connecting or tending to connect him with the crime. In other words, it must be evidence which implicates him; that is, which confirms in some material particulars not only the evidence that the crime has been committed, but also that the prisoner committed it, although it is not necessary that there should be confirmation of all the circumstances of the crime.

The corroboration need not be direct evidence that the accused committed the crime; it is sufficient if it is merely circumstantial evidence of his connection with the crime.

When a witness, who has made an identification in Jail is unable to identify in the Court of the Committing Magistrate or of the Sessions Judge or in both, his evidence of identification, though weak, is not inadmissible in evidence. In such cases outside evidence is admissible to prove that the witness did make such identification and the circumstances in which he made it, though the question as to what weight may be given to it will depend on the facts of each case.

A confession of a co-accused in a case of conspiracy is admissible in evidence against all the accused under the provisions of s. 10 of the Evidence Act. It can also be taken into consideration against his co-accused under s. 30 of the Act.

The accused who fought with another in a public place was tried for an offence under s. 160 of the Penal Code and acquitted as it was found that the public peace was not disturbed. He was again charged under s. 61 (o) of the Bombay District Police Act, 1890, on the same facts and same evidence:

Held, that the acquittal in the previous case, operated as a bar to the subsequent prosecution inasmuch as an alternative charge for the latter offence could have been framed in the previous case under s. 236 of the Code.

It is only when the non-direction of a Jury is such that there are grounds for thinking that the Jury by reason of it may have been put on the wrong track and made to arrive at a wrong conclusion that such non-direction can amount to a misdirection.

Section 307 of the Criminal Procedure Code gives a discretion to the Judge in the matter of reference and it is only when he disagrees with the verdict of the Jury and is clearly of opinion that it is necessary for the ends of justice to submit the case to the High Court that he shall so submit it. If he is not clearly of that opinion his failure to submit the case is not a subject for interference by the High Court on appeal.

Where a Judge stated that although he still thought that the conviction of the accused was possibly against the weight of evidence, he had modified his original view and was satisfied that the accused took part in the crime, and that there was thus no reason why a reference should be made and accepted the verdict and convicted the accused:

The words "appear by Pleader", as used in s. 360 (1), Criminal Procedure Code, are nowhere defined. In ordinary acceptance these words mean "represented by Pleader" that is to say, having a Pleader to act and plead.

There is nothing in the provisions of s. 360 (1), Criminal Procedure Code to indicate that the Legislature intended that the reading over in the presence of the Pleader should be a compliance with the provisions of that section only in cases where the personal appearance of the accused is dispensed with by the Court. The natural meaning of the words is that if an accused person has engaged a Pleader, who is in attendance, the reading over of the deposition in the presence of the Pleader will be a full compliance with the provisions of the section, if the accused himself does not happen to be present at the time the deposition is read over.

"Quashing of proceedings" is a term of compendious connotation and the practical result of quashing is the setting aside or reversal of the order initiating the proceedings. This power is vested in the High Court under s. 439 read with cl. (1) of s. 423, Criminal Procedure Code.

The language of s. 561-A, Criminal Procedure Code, is wide and comprehensive and the High Court has jurisdiction to pass an order to set aside proceedings in a subordinate Court if the proceedings constitute an abuse of the process of the Court.

Any Single Judge of the Chief Court can exercise the jurisdiction which is conferred on a High Court by s. 561-A of the Criminal Procedure Code.

Though the limits of the jurisdiction under s. 561-A, Criminal Procedure Code, are very wide, yet as a rule of practice it will be exercised in exceptional cases only.

No party has a right to be heard before any Court exercising its powers of revision under the Criminal Procedure Code although the Court may, if it thinks fit, hear any party either personally or by Pleader.

— s. 476-B—Appellate order directing complaint to be made, whether appealable to High Court—Complaint, what amounts to.

No appeal lies from an order passed by an Appellate Court under s. 476-B of the Criminal Procedure Code, directing a complaint to be made.

Per Rankin, C. J.—The policy of the law as laid down in s. 476-B, Criminal Procedure Code, is this that whenever there is a decision by a Court upon an application that a complaint shall be made—whether that decision be one way or another—there is one appeal from it and no more than one appeal. It matters nothing whatever what the result of the appeal may be. If any particular person is for the first time ordered to be prosecuted by the superior Court his remedy after that is to take his defence before a Jury or a Magistrate according to the nature of the case. Two Courts and only two are to deal with this preliminary question as to whether a person shall be prosecuted or not.

A District Judge, in making a complaint, after giving his reasons for holding that there was a good prima facie case ordered as follows:—"I, therefore, direct the prosecution of A. Let a copy of this order be sent along with the records to the proper Magistrate as a complaint".

— ss. 476, 526—Prosecution of witness for perjury—Transfer of case—Reasonable apprehension—Impartiality of Magistrate

The proper time for taking action against a witness under s. 476, Criminal Procedure Code, is the time of delivering the judgment in the case.

Ordering prosecution of a defence witness under s. 476, Criminal Procedure Code, for an offence under s. 193, Penal Code, at the time his evidence is recorded is bound to strike terror in the heart of defence witnesses and is, therefore, a sufficient ground for transfer of the case.

Where the action of the Magistrate is such as to create a reasonable apprehension in the mind of the accused that the Magistrate has made up his mind against him, the case would be transferred even though the Magistrate may have acted with perfect impartiality. *L. — s. 503—Witness residing in Native State—Issue of commission to examine witness to officer representing British Indian Government—Duty of such officer—Refusal to execute commission, legality of—Court's discretion to examine witness by commission or summons.

Once a commission has been issued by a District Magistrate or other Court mentioned in s. 503, Criminal Procedure Code, to an officer representing the British Indian Government in a Native State it is the duty of the latter either to proceed where the witness is or to summon such witness before him and to take down his evidence or to delegate his functions under the commission to any officer subordinate to him and competent to execute the commission, and in that case such officer must proceed to the place where the witness is or summon the witness before him and take down his evidence. But neither the Criminal Procedure Code nor any other law leaves it to the option of such officer to decline to execute the commission on the ground of inconvenience or some other similar cause. The fact that the powers to execute the commission cannot be delegated to a Magistrate subordinate to a State does not absolve such officer from the duty of executing the commission or of procuring its execution in accordance with law. The provisions of sub-s. (3) of s. 503, Criminal Procedure Code, are mandatory in this respect.

It is for the Magistrate to decide whether he would summon witnesses residing in a Native State in Court to record their statements or whether he would issue a commission and if the Magistrate has decided upon the latter course it is not within the discretion of the Agent to the Governor-General to whom the commission is issued to decline to execute the commission on the ground that there exist other possible means for examining the witnesses. *L. Succession—Daughters' daughters and collaterals; rights of—Muhammadian Naru Rajputs of Hoshiarpur District—Riway-i-am, presumption in favour of—"Aulad," meaning of.

Among Naru Muhammadian Rajputs of Hoshiarpur District daughters are by custom entitled to succeed in the presence of collaterals more remote than the descendants of the great-grandfather of the deceased proprietor; and where daughters have succeeded to their father's land as heirs excluding his collaterals, their daughters are entitled to succeed to their mothers' estate in the absence of direct male heirs.

In places where the right of females to succeed is widely recognised, the word "aulad" should be construed as including both male and female issue.

Where a Riway-i-am of a District sets up a particular custom, there is a presumption in favour of the existence of such custom and the onus of proving the contrary is on the party contesting such custom. L. CHARAGH BIBI v. SULTAN BAKHSI, A. I. R. 1928 Lah. 40 846

Although an action for damages against one of some of several joint wrong-doers is maintainable, in an action in ejectment all persons in possession should be impleaded as defendants, and there is no distinction in principle, for the purpose of this rule, between the cases of trespassers and of tenants.

The principles governing the rule of joinder of defendants in an action for ejectment are mainly two; first, if any of the persons in possession is left out, he remains in possession as not being affected by the decree, and the decree as one in ejectment and for possession becomes infructuous because the persons ejected as being bound by the decree can always come in under the person who remains in possession; and second, there is a certain amount of

The latter pleaded that the plaintiff had agreed to pay him a sum of money in addition to that fixed as the sale price as a preliminary to the execution of the conveyance, and that the amount paid by the plaintiff at the time of the execution of the deed was this additional amount and not part of the price. The plaintiff admitted non-payment of part of the consideration. There was no recital of receipt of consideration in the sale-deed:

Held, (1) that it was open to the defendant to adduce oral evidence to substantiate his plea;

(2) that the plaintiff could be given a decree for possession only on condition of payment of the whole of the consideration remaining due to the defendant.

Section 115, Evidence Act, does not require that a person who by his declarations or conduct induces a belief in the mind of the other, must of a necessity have been aware of his rights.

The English Law or s. 115, Evidence Act, gives no countenance to the doctrine that in order to create estoppel the person whose acts or declarations induced another to act in a particular way must have been under no mistake himself, or must have acted with an intention to mislead or deceive. What is required is that the position of the person who was induced to act should have been altered; and the principle on which the law and the Statute rest is, that it would be most inequitable and unjust to him that if another by a representation made, or by conduct amounting to a representation, has induced him to act as he would not otherwise have done, the person who made the representation should be allowed to deny or repudiate the effect of his former statement, to the loss and injury of the person who acted on it. *A MATA DAYAL LAL v. Fatal Accidents Act—concl'd.

In awarding damages under the Fatal Accidents Act, the Court should take into account the amount of fine realised from the defendant and paid to the plaintiff in criminal proceedings instituted by the latter against the defendant.

In estimating damages under the Act it is settled law that no sentimental considerations are relevant. A plaintiff cannot get higher damages when the deceased had been brutally murdered than where the death had been due to mere error of judgment.

In assessing such damages it is necessary to take into account the probable duration of the life of the deceased. A NATHU RAM v. CHAND KAUR, A. I. R. 1927 All. 684; 26 A. L. J. 60 165 custom to the contrary, validity of—Mere declaration of adoption by adoptive father, effect of—Actual giving and taking, necessity of—Suit for possession against alleged adopted son—Adoption, whether should be set aside—Limitation and adverse possession, effect of.

Kayasthas of Bihar are not Sudras but belong to the Dwija or regenerate classes, and the rule of Hindu Law prohibiting the adoption of a daughter's son, sister's son and mother's sister's son among the regenerate castes is, therefore, applicable to them.

Inasmuch as this rule of prohibition can be varied by a family custom, a plaintiff seeking to challenge an adoption on the ground that it is in contravention of this rule of Hindu Law should raise his legal objection in the plaint so that the defendant may be able to plead the existence of a family custom to the contrary.

A mere declaration of adoption by the adoptive father is not sufficient to create a valid adoption; the actual giving and taking is essential whether the parties belong to the three regenerate classes or are Sudras.

A, claiming that he was the adopted son of his maternal grandfather X, took possession of properties of X to the knowledge of B and C, his brothers. After A's death C who claimed to be the adopted son of A, and A's widow were in joint possession and C continued to be in sole possession after the death of A's widow. After the lapse of many twelve years B's descendants sued for partition against C's descendants;

Held, (1) that the suit was not maintainable inasmuch as the adoptions set up by the defendants' ancestors had not been set aside within time;

(2) that as there was no proof that the plaintiffs' ancestors were in joint possession with A and C the suit was barred by limitation. PATISHWARI PRASAD v. HARI PRASAD LAL, 8 P. L. T. 34; A. I. R. 1927 Pat. 145; 6 Pat. 506 620

Alienation—Father's alienation, whether void—Mortgage by father containing indemnity clause—Suit on mortgage—Limitation—Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Arts. 97, 116.

An alienation by a Hindu father not supported by legal necessity is not void ab initio but is voidable at the instance of his sons or reversioners.

A mortgage executed by a Hindu father in 1914 contained an indemnity clause that if any objection or claim arose the mortgagor would be personally liable. The mortgagee instituted a suit against the mortgagor's sons on the mortgage in 1922. The guardian of the sons contended that the land was ancestral and that the alienation was not supported by necessity. A decree was passed against the mortgagor's properties and the mortgaged property was held not liable. In a suit by the sons to set aside this decree on the ground that the suit was barred by limitation and the guardian had negligently failed to take this plea:

Held, that as soon as the decree was passed in favour of his sons that the property was not liable under the mortgage, the indemnity clause came into action, and the mortgagor became personally liable to recoup the mortgagee and, therefore, whether Art. 97 or Art. 116 of the First Schedule to the Limitation Act was applicable, the suit was within limitation. L. — Alienation—Suit to set aside alienation by guardian—Consideration binding to extent of half—Decree, form of.

In a suit by a minor to set aside an alienation made by his guardian where the amount of consideration which is found not binding upon the plaintiff is large, Courts will not be justified in allowing the vendees to retain a portion of the property purchased by them. In such cases the proper decree would be to give a decree to the plaintiff for possession of the property sold, and give a charge to the defendants for the amount found binding on the plaintiff.

Where out of the consideration of Rs. 1,500 and Rs. 800 for two sales, the binding portions were Rs. 912 and Rs. 407 respectively:

Held, that the sales should be set aside on payment by the plaintiff of the binding amounts. M GANAPATHI AYYAR v. RANGASWAMI IYENGAR, 39 M. L. T. 607; A. I. R. 1928 Mad. 168 370

A debt is an antecedent debt if it is antecedent in fact as well as in time, i. e., truly independent and not a part of the transaction impeached.

A Hindu son cannot escape liability to pay his father's debt by showing that his father led an immoral life but to avoid liability it must be shown that the debt was incurred for an immoral purpose.

A sale of ancestral property by a Hindu father for discharge of his antecedent debts cannot be avoided on the ground that the application of the surplus money, i. e. money in excess of debts has not been accounted for. *L ULFAT KAI v. In a suit by a purchaser of joint family property from a Hindu father to recover possession of such property the onus is upon the purchaser to show in the first instance that there was either necessity or benefit or proper inquiry or an antecedent debt. It is only when the burden has been shifted by some prima facie evidence that the sons can be called upon to show that the transaction was illegal or immoral or otherwise not binding on them.

In such a suit the purchaser will ordinarily be entitled to recover such part of the consideration as has been enjoyed by the sons, even though he is not able to prove legal necessity or antecedent debt in the absence of any special reason disentitling him from such relief.

But the Court will refuse to grant him this equitable relief where he is clearly guilty of laches. PAT JOKHU GOSAIN v. GANESH SINGH, 8 P. L. T. 704; A. I. R. 1928 Pat. 54 189

— Joint family—Debt contracted by father for joint family purpose—Execution of mortgage as sole owner—Sale of father's interest in execution—Son's interest, whether passes.

A Hindu having a son and a minor grandson borrowed money for purposes of the joint family business and executed a mortgage of property belonging to the family representing that he was the exclusive owner of the property. The mortgagee instituted a suit against him on the mortgage without impleading either his son or grandson as a party and sold the right, title and interest whatsoever of the judgment-debtor and purchased it himself. In a suit by the mortgagee purchaser for possession the minor grandson contended that his rights were not affected by the sale:

Held, that the right, title and interest of the minor grandson also passed to the purchaser, in spite of his absence in the mortgage suit and execution proceedings. B VADILAL PURSHOTAM v. KANAILAL INDERLAL, 29 Bom. L. R. 1441; A. I. R. 1927 Bom. 620 46

— Family business—Speculative transaction, debts incurred for—Liability of sons.

In the case of the members of a Hindu family there is a presumption of jointness not only of their properties but even as regards the business which they carry on and the burden lies upon the person who alleges that the business is a separate business and not a family business to prove his allegation.

The manager of a joint Hindu family has an implied authority to contract debts for the ordinary purposes of the business carried on by the family. He has power to incur debts for the business in speculative transactions as such debts cannot be said to be immoral.

The pious obligation of Hindu sons to pay off their father's debts extends to commercial debts. L MAULUK CHAND KISHANJI v. DAYA KISHAN, I. L. T. 40 Lah. 6 183

— Father's powers of alienation—Merely benefit, whether sufficient—Deed tying up management of property after death, validity of—Father's power to appoint testamentary guardian.

A Hindu who had only two minor sons executed a deed in favour of the defendant, his brother's son, by which the defendant was to manage his properties both during his lifetime and after his death during the minority of his sons. The defendant was not willing to accept management with the liability of accounting for profits and another deed was executed which was called a Chalgani for a term of thirteen years fixed, whereby certain annual payments were to be made, certain fixed sums were to be invested for the minors and the defendant was relieved from liability to account. The minors sued after the death of their father for cancellation of the deed:

Held, (1) that whatever be the real nature of the documents, the father had no power to tie up the joint family property in this manner after his death, and that the documents were not binding on the plaintiffs.

A Hindu father has no power to alienate joint family property for anything that may be of general benefit to the family, apart from necessity.

— Separation of one member—Effect on others—Allotment of definite shares to all co-parceners, effect of—Re-union of family—Mother, status of, in joint family.

Where a farighkhali executed by a member of a joint family states in clear terms that defined shares in the whole joint family property have been allotted to the co-parceners and also gives them liberty either to live together or to separate, the effect of the deed is to cause a separation in estate and interest between all the co-parceners. The clause giving the parties the option of being joint or separate is not inconsistent with separation in estate.

It is an elementary principle of Hindu Law of the Mitakshara School that a member of a joint Hindu family once separated can re-unite only with his father, brother or paternal uncle but with no other relation.

A mother is not a member of the co-parcenary body constituting a joint family. She is only entitled to maintenance while the joint status of the family continues and it is only when one of her sons brings a suit for partition that she is entitled to claim a share in the family property. L HIRA SINGH v. Ornaments acquired by a woman partly as presents before her marriage from the husband's grandmother and partly as presents after her marriage from her husband are ajautuka stridhan.

Jautuka stridhan is not confined to presents given actually before the nuptial fire but the limits within which such presents become jautuka stridhan are somewhat narrow.

In 1905, plaintiff's mother died possessed of valuable ornaments. Her husband was in possession of the ornaments till his death in 1909. They remained after his death in the family safe and the step-brothers of the plaintiff who was an infant at the time, carried on the family concerns. The plaintiff attained majority in 1910. In 1919 disputes arose between the parties as to the ornaments and the plaintiff sued for their recovery from his step-brothers in 1920.

Held, (1) that the cause of action for the suit arose only when the plaintiff demanded the ornaments from the defendants, that the proper Article of the Limitation Act applicable to the case was Art. 49, and that the suit was not barred;

(2) that even assuming that Art. 120 applied to the case the suit was within time.

Article 49 of Sch. I of the Limitation Act is the ordinary Article applicable to a case where the original possession of the defendant is lawful but it becomes unlawful by reason of certain facts. C BHUPENDRA NATH BHOSSE v. GOONENDRA NATH BHOSSE, 32 C. W. N. 133 825

In the case of a maintenance grant where the reversion remains with the grantor minerals do not pass to the grantee without words of express grant or by clear implication.

The words 'sab sudha' (including all) in a grant are not sufficient to pass minerals.

In an impartible Raj the junior members of the family have not the ordinary coparcenary rights which members of a joint Hindu family have; and a grant of maintenance by the holder of the Raj to the junior members of the Raj cannot and does not amount to a partition and such grants do not by themselves amount to a conveyance of full proprietary rights including rights to minerals and sub soil rights.

It is not safe to apply the principles of the English Common Law relating to the rights to mineral to India as there is a fundamental difference between land tenures in England and in India and the peculiarities of the feudal system of tenures are not to be found in India. Service inam granted partly for public service—Resumption, legality of—Kattu kalva service; whether public service—Grant by two persons—One alone, whether entitled to revoke.

A service inam granted in part for performance of a public service cannot be resumed merely on the ground that the services are no longer required.

Where two persons having interest in a particular property make a grant of the same for the purpose of securing certain services, it is not competent to one of them alone without the concurrence of the other to cancel or revoke the grant.

A grant for kattu kalva service is a grant of a public nature. M. RAJA of VIJIANAGARAM v. JORREGA-GANGADU, 39 M. L. T. 338; A. I. R. 1927 Mad. 1001 671

Service inam—Grant to institution or to servant for services in institution—Tests—Expressions "devadayam", "mulla", effect of—Limitation

Inam—cont'd.

Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Art. 14—Suit to set aside resumption of personal service inam on ground of non-performance of services—Limitation.

There is a well-understood distinction between a grant to a religious institution such as a temple or a mosque and a grant to some person on condition of his rendering services to a religious institution, such as the archaka of a temple.

The word 'devadayam' indicates a grant for religious purposes but does not necessarily connote that the grant is to the religious institution itself. The term is equally applicable to service inams connected with religious institutions.

The description of the grantee as "mulla" does not imply that the grant was made to him as representing a mosque.

A suit to set aside the resumption of a personal service inam by the Government on the ground of non-performance of services is governed by Art. 14, Limitation Act.

Where Government purports to act under powers reserved to them under the terms of a personal service inam grant though they may have acted erroneously in the interpretation of its terms or in finding on facts which justify the resumption, the act is intra vires and not ultra vires and the act of resumption cannot be regarded as a nullity.

Per Ramesam, J.—As the British Government were dealing favourably with inams connected with Hindu and Muhammadan religions, whether grants to temples and mosques, or grants to officials and servants on condition of rendering certain services in such temples and mosques, both were described as "devadayam" and the use of the word is not conclusive in favour of the temple or mosque itself where the question is whether it is a grant to the temple or to a temple servant though it may be some evidence along with other circumstances; but it is of very great weight where the claim of private property is set up.

Where the grant is made to a person in the capacity of a mutawalli, manager, superintendent, dharmakartha, or even servant of the mosque or temple, and where it does not appear that there is some other trustee, it may be regarded as a grant to the temple or mosque itself.

Where it appears that a substantial part of the income goes to the benefit of the institution, as for the erection of a building or for its upkeep and repairs, or such other things the grant may be considered as a grant to the institution itself even though some surplus may be used by the trustees for their own maintenance.

Where none of the above indicia appears, that is where the grant does not show that it was granted to a temple or mosque, nor describe the grantee in the capacity of trustee, manager, etc., and where it does not appear that any portion of the income that may be considered as substantial has gone to the benefit of the temple or mosque, then in such a case it must be treated as a grant to the grantee named (persona designata) and, if services are mentioned, it is a grant of service. Service inam land—Lease for long term, whether void or voidable—Receipt of rent—Right to repudiate lease—Custom of alienability—Repeated illegal alienations, effect of—Construction of demised—Mortgage and lease, distinction between

Alienations of temple service lands by sale, gift or mortgage are invalid.

Permanent leases or leases of such lands for so long a period as would practically amount to an alienation will be invalid as against the successor-in-office entitled to the rents and other emoluments arising out of the land which goes with the office. A test to find whether a lease for a long period amounts to an alienation for this purpose is whether the rent paid is sufficient to maintain the holder of that office in such a way as not to interfere with the due performance of the duties attached to the office.

Where a lease of such lands is not of this character it is not absolutely void but only voidable at the option of the succeeding office-holder who will be bound by the transaction if he does not repudiate the same but affirms it by receiving rent, after he assumes office.

The holder of the lands attached to an office has by the very nature of his tenure no power to lease the property so as to ensure beyond his lifetime and the fact that the office is hereditary makes no difference.

A custom of alienability of service inam lands cannot be established by repeated illegal alienations.

Where the possession of certain lands was transferred to another under a document described as a kanda bhogiam, on receipt of a premium which was to be worked off by the enjoyment of the produce of the land for 30 years, a portion of the profits being reserved to be paid to the executant of the document, and there was no liability to account for the rent and profits nor was there any question of redemption on payment of any money:

Held, that the document was not a mortgage but only a lease. M SUNDARA RAJU DIKSHATULU v. SESHADRI DIKSHATULU, (1927) M. W. N. 556; 26 L. W. 739; A. I. R. 1928 Mad. 35; 54 M. L. J. 78. 426

Service inam land—Resumption by Government—Suit by grantee for ejectment—Burden of proof of right to eject.

When the right of Government to resume an inam is questioned by a person who was not a party to the resumption proceedings, the Government or its assignees will have to substantiate the right.

There is no presumption that an inam grant is a grant of both the varams. proving that award is wrong—Claimant's right to interest on compensation money.

The onus of proving that an award made by a land acquisition officer is wrong is on the claimant.

A claimant is entitled to interest on compensation money from the date on which the property acquired is taken possession of by the Collector.

In determining the amount of compensation to be awarded for property acquired under the Land Acquisition Act, the Court must take into consideration the damage, if any, sustained by the person interested at the time of the Collector's taking possession of the land by reason of the acquisition injuriously affecting his earnings. L KIRPA RAM-BRIN LAI v. Land Acquisition Act (I of 1894), ss. 11, 23 (2)—Acquisition of toka land—Claimant, whether entitled to 15 per cent. on entire market value or only on his interest—'Market-value,' meaning of.

The expression 'market value of the land' in s. 23, sub-s. (2) of the Land Acquisition Act prima facie means the market value of all interests in the land; but in cases where Government have an interest in the land that expression must mean the claimant's interest alone, that being the only interest acquired by Government.

Where land in which Government have an interest is acquired, the fifteen per cent. awardable under s. 23 (2) of the Act should, therefore, be calculated not upon the entire market value of the land but only upon the value of the claimant's interest after deducting the amount payable to Government. B GOVERNMENT OF BOMBAY v. Landlord and tenant—Abadi—Sale of house by tenant—Absence of sale-deed—Landlord, whether entitled to invoke doctrine of part-performance—Transfer amounting to abandonment—Landlord's right to re-enter—Duty to pay sale price to tenant.

A tenant occupying a house in a village abadi sold his house without the consent of the proprietor. He received part of the consideration, and put his transferee in possession but no sale-deed was executed. In a suit by the proprietor for possession of the house together with the site thereof:

Held, (1) that the plaintiff was not entitled to invoke the doctrine of part performance as he was not privy to the transaction on which the estoppel rested;

(2) that the transfer amounted to an abandonment on the part of the tenant, which entitled the plaintiff to enter into possession;

(3) that the plaintiff must take the abandonment with all its incidents, one of the incidents being the payment of the sale price to the transferor. O MATHURA v. DEVI BHAN SINGH, 4 O. W. N. 913; A. I. R. 1927 Oudh 482 360

Construction of patta—Rent payable partly in kind and partly in cash—Market price of grain fixed—Suit for arrears of rent—Fluctuation of market price—Landlord, whether entitled to value of paddy at current rate or rate fixed in patta—'Unavoidable reason', indefiniteness of.

A patta after stating that rent will be payable in cash and in paddy provided that, if for an unavoidable reason the tenant is unable to pay the paddy, its market-price at the rate of Rs. 4 per pali should be paid. This amount was fixed at Rs. 34-5 and the total price of the paddy together with road and public cesses were to be paid according to certain kists. In a suit for rent the landlord claimed the price of paddy which was not delivered at its market price on the date of suit:

Held, (1) that the landlord was not entitled to claim the value of paddy at its market-price at the date of suit but only its price as stated in the patta;

(2) that the fact that no unavoidable reason was pleaded by the tenant was quite immaterial as it is too vague an expression for any Court of Justice to take cognisance of. C BANGSHTRAM MANDAL v. PRASANNOMOYI DEBI, A. I. R. 1923 Cal. 166 26

Forfeiture of lease—Covenant to repair—Non-payment of rent—Relief against forfeiture—Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), s. 114.

The general rule of law with respect to the construction of covenants to repair is that where the covenant to repair is in general terms to keep the premises in repair, the covenant will attach to new buildings that subsequently are erected upon the demised premises during the currency of the term. On the other hand, where the covenant to repair refers to certain specific property that is demised, such as "the said buildings" or "the said houses", unless the additional buildings in fact became part of the specific buildings which the tenant covenanted to repair, the covenant will not extend to such new and separate erections.

Whether or not a covenant to repair extends to any particular property depends upon the terms of the covenant and the facts proved in the case under consideration.

The test as to whether any particular renovation amounts to repair or not is whether the act to be done is one which in substance is the renewal or re-placement of defective parts, or the renewal or re-placement of substantially the whole.

Under s. 114 of the Transfer of Property Act, the Court is invested with a discretionary power to grant relief against forfeiture for non payment of rent which it may or may not exercise in favour of the tenant.

The Courts in India in exercising the discretion entrusted to them under s. 114 of the Transfer of Property Act, in the absence of any special circumstances, should adopt the rule that prevailed in the old Courts of Chancery, and, subject to any equitable that may have arisen between the date of the forfeiture and the application for relief, e.g., where the landlord during that period has re-let the pre-

Where a zemindar grants a lease of a land to a persona designata who is also the karta of a joint Hindu family, the tenancy does not become the assets of the joint family merely because the latter throws the profits derived from the leasehold into the common family chest, inasmuch as a tenancy is a creature of contract and it is not open to a lessee by his acts to impose upon the zemindar the other members of his family as co-tenants of the leasehold property. *A PADARATH PATHAK v. Occupancy tenancy—Custom of transfer—Evidence—Recognition by landlord after his interest has ceased, whether binding on his successor

In order to prove a custom of transferability of tenancy it is essential for the person setting it up to show that transferees had a right to be recognised by the landlord after purchasing the holdings without the consent of the landlord. Evidence which merely goes to prove that certain purchasers of tenancies were recognised by their landlords is not, therefore, sufficient to establish such a custom in the absence of proof of the circumstances under which the transfers were recognised.

Recognition of a transfer by a landlord after he had parted with his interest though not with his possession and during the pendency of a suit against him for possession by his successor-in-interest is not binding on the latter. PAT FAKIRA SAHU v. ANJOL LAL 330

Two widows sold certain property to S. Some of the reversioners instituted a suit for a declaration that the alienation was not binding upon them. In February, 1898, during the pendency of this suit, S sold the property to the plaintiffs. The sale-deed contained a stipulation that if any other claimant came forward or the property went out of the possession of the vendees, the vendor would be liable to refund the purchase-money with damages. On the same date a separate agreement was executed by S in favour of the vendees in which the suit by the reversioners was referred to and to safeguard the vendees against the consequences of the suit, certain other properties were hypothecated to them. The suit by the reversioners was decreed in their favour by the Privy Council on the 11th May, 1909. The last surviving widow died in January, 1919. In May, 1919, the reversioners sued the plaintiffs for possession and obtained delivery of possession on the 13th August, 1921. The plaintiffs instituted a suit for recovery of the purchase-money and damages against the representatives of S, on the 30th November, 1921:

Held, (1) that the indemnity bond only furnished an additional security to the vendees, but in no way abrogated or modified the terms of the sale-deed

(2)—Rules for conduct of elections—Power of Governor-in-Council to fix date of election—Government of India Act, 1919 (9 & 10 Geo. Under the rules for the conduct of elections under s. 55 of the Madras City Municipal Act, a notification fixing the date of election has to be published by the Governor-in-Council. But a notification published in the Gazette by the order of the Government Ministry of Local Self-Government, is proof under s. 78, Evidence Act, of the order of the Government fixing the election and must be presumed to have been issued in accordance with law and consequently valid. Such a notification does not contravene s. 49, Government of India Act and is not liable to be called in question in any legal proceeding.

Where under r. 6 of the Election Rules framed under s. 55 of the Madras City Municipal Act the Commissioner prepared and published three days before the date fixed for election a schedule of valid nominations, but his order excluding a candidate from the schedule was called in question before the Chief Judge, Small Causes Court, and was ultimately upheld, and the election was ordered to be held on a subsequent date:

Held, that the original schedule of nominations having been published as prescribed by the rules was in force and was available for the election which was ordered to be held on a subsequent date and that a fresh publication of nomination papers was not necessary. M. A firm of merchants were appointed sole "banyans" of a Company for a period of 30 years to sell all goods manufactured or produced by the Company at such prices as shall be approved by, or on behalf of, the Company, and to be responsible to the Company for the due payment by the buyers of the prices of all such goods and merchandise sold by them for and on behalf of the Company, and for the due performance by the buyers of all contracts entered into by them through the said banyans with regard to such goods and merchandise. It was also provided that the price of goods was to be paid to the Company in a period of 1½ months from date of sale and in default the firm was to pay interest. They were also to assist the Company in procuring cotton. In lieu of all this they were to get certain commission from the Company.

Held, that the firm were agents of the Company for the sale of goods on terms of "del credere commission," that there was no relationship of vendor and purchaser between the firm and the Company, and that the firm was, therefore, bound to pay tax under s. 92 of the Madras District Municipalities Act. *M. Suit in Revenue Court for patta—Burden of proof of right to sue in special forum—Kattukuthagai, meaning of—Kattukuthagai village, whether 'estate'—Construction of documents.

In a suit by a tenant in a Revenue Court for issue of patta, the onus of proving that he is entitled to bring the suit in the Special Revenue Court lies on the plaintiff.

"Kattukuthagai" is in essence a lease or grant of land at a favourable rent. There is nothing in the term itself from which it can be inferred that a kattukuthagaidar is merely a renter or farmer of the melwaram.

It is not open to a Court to infer retrospectively from recent documents that an ancient grant was of melwaram alone. M. MEDDAI DELAVOIT v. KARUPPATY AMMAL 505

Engagements arising out of the Inam Settlements are engagements contemplated by the proviso to s. 1 of the Madras Irrigation Cess Act, 1885, just like the Permanent Settlement sanads.

In case of grants of inams at least by the Government, the effect of the Inam Settlement is to vest the channels, with their head sluices and branch and subsidiary channels, and the tanks or reservoirs, in the inamdar through whose inams the same respectively pass or in which they are situate.

A person who lets out his car for hire in a Municipality is not bound to take a license from the District Board for taking the car beyond the Municipal limits and traversing any of the District Board roads, inasmuch as there is no hiring and, therefore, no ‘plying for hire’ in any of the District Board roads. *M LOCAL FUND OVERSEER v. An order of the Local Board merely refusing license to such a person does not come under s. 212 (11) of the Madras Local Boards Act and is illegal and ultra vires, and unless and until a legal order is passed, his application for license cannot be considered to have been properly disposed of and the owner cannot be convicted under s. 175 of the Act.

Per Jackson, J.—A private market is a private property and an Act to consolidate the law relating to Local Boards can hardly be an Act of confiscation.

Where a decree is passed against the karnavan of a Malabar tarwad in his representative capacity, the junior members of the tarwad cannot be held to be parties to the decree within the meaning of s. 47 of the Civil Procedure Code, and a claim by a junior member to property attached in execution of that decree falls within the purview of O. XXI, r. 58 of the Civil Procedure Code and not within s. 47 of the Code.

Per Phillips, Offg. C. J.—Where a person is an actual party to the suit, his rights in any other capacity must be deemed to be rights of a party to the suit and he must, consequently, come under s. 47 of the Civil Procedure Code; but when he is not an actual party, but is merely a constructive party represented by another, he can only be deemed to be a party or representative of a party in the capacity in respect of which he was so represented. In any other capacity, more especially when such capacity is adverse to the person who represented him, he can in no sense be deemed to be a party to a decree or representative of a party.

Per Anantakrishna Ayyar, J.—The circumstance that a decree obtained against the tarwad karnavan as such is binding on all the members of the tarwad does not make the other members parties to the suit.

Prima facie only those are parties to the suit within the meaning of s. 47, Civil Procedure Code, whose names appear in the decree.

Where such members of a tarwad are not eo nomine parties to the decree, and where only the karnavan of the whole tarwad is sued as such, the claims that might be put forward in the course of execution of such decrees by the joint co-owner members or the tarazhi members should not be dealt with as put forward by persons who are parties to the suit.

A decree for money obtained against the karnavan alone as such could not be executed against the junior members. But if the plaintiff instead brings a suit merely for recovery of possession based on title, without alleging the usufructuary mortgage, he would be entitled to succeed if he can show his title, unless the defendant can show that he is in possession under a contract of sale.

The burden of proving such contract of sale would be on the defendant, and on his bringing evidence of such contract of sale, the plaintiff would be entitled to bring rebutting evidence that no such contract was entered into. Such rebutting evidence would in no way contravene the provisions of s. 91 of the Evidence Act. R MAUNG KIN LAY v. MAUNG TUN THAING, 5 R. 679; A. I. R. 1928 Rang. 53 503

The plaintiff's predecessors-in-interest had executed a mortgage to the defendant's predecessors in 1795. There was nothing to show what the terms of the mortgage were. In 1858 there was some dispute between the parties, the matter was referred to arbitration and an award was made by which the defendant's predecessors were held entitled to remain in possession until the amount due to them under the mortgage-bond was paid. In a suit for redemption by the plaintiff:

Held, (1) that the claim to redeem the mortgage of 1795 was barred under s. 37 of Act XIII of 1879 as there was nothing to show that there was any term in the instrument of mortgage and that such term had not expired before the 13th February, 1856;

In a suit by a Lambardar under s. 108, cl. An action by one partner against the other partners for a specific share in the sale-proceeds of the stock-in-trade is not maintainable without a suit for accounts.

The general rule of law is that a suit by a partner after the dissolution of the partnership must be for a general account unless special circumstances exist which entitle one partner to bring a suit against another or others for a particular item. But if the suit relates to the loss and profits of the partnership business or to the stock-in-trade or capital employed in the business in respect of which all partners have equal rights, it must be one for a general account of the partnership business.

A suit for recovery of a specific sum of money cannot be converted into a suit for accounts merely because in the determination of the question in controversy accounts may have to be examined. C MAGNAMOYI RAI v. BROJENDRA LAL DAS, 46 C. L. J. 561; A. I. R. 1928 Cal. 127 843

Where an accused person relies upon s. 84 of the Penal Code to escape the legal consequences of his act, the onus is upon him to prove that he was at the time when the act was committed, by reason of unsoundness of mind, incapable of knowing its nature or that what he was doing was either wrong or contrary to law. That onus may be discharged by producing evidence as to the conduct of the accused shortly prior to the offence and his conduct at the time or immediately afterwards; also by evidence of his mental conditions, his family history and so forth. If contemporaneous acts of his are proved to have been of such a nature as to indicate that he was quite incapable of forming rational views, that would be a strong element to show that at the time of the crime in question he was not capable of knowing that it was a wrongful act.

Although the fact that a murder has been committed in a particularly brutal and purposeless way for no motive whatsoever, is a circumstance which may be taken into consideration together with other material to enable a Court to decide whether or not the crime in question was committed at a time when the accused person was in such a state of mind that he was incapable of knowing the nature of his act, yet in the absence of other evidence mere want of motive for the crime is not sufficient to base an inference of unsoundness of mind for the purposes of defence under s. 84, Penal Code.

To attract the application of s. 84, Penal Code, it is not enough to establish a doubt as to the soundness of the mind of the accused at the time of the commission of the crime. This is not a kind of doubt of which the accused may be given the benefit. To entitle the accused to the benefit of the section the accused must satisfy the Court that his condition of mind was such that he was incapable of knowing the nature of his act or that what he was doing was either wrong or contrary to law.

There is no provision of law in India making it incumbent upon a Committing Magistrate to order a medical enquiry upon a defence of insanity. It is only in cases where the accused appears to be incapable by reason of mental infirmity of taking his trial that this issue of insanity must be tried before the trial for the offence is proceeded with. Where the Magistrate is of opinion that the accused is sane at the time he has no alternative but to proceed in accordance with the provisions of s. 469, Criminal Procedure Code. L EMPEROR v. The onus of proving the defence of insanity afforded by s. 84 of the Penal Code rests upon the accused. Though ordinarily intention is to be inferred from knowledge, there may be cases where intent must be found as a fact and cannot be assumed. It is a question of fact in each case whether having regard to the mental condition of the prisoner, the general inference of intention from knowledge can reasonably be drawn.

An inveterate ganja smoker set fire to the thatched building of a school, by taking a torch from a kitchen and putting it to the thatch, and after throwing the torch on the roof of the kitchen ran away. It was found that as a result of the vicious habit of ganja smoking he was in the habit of beating his wife and children and refusing to take food, but the Medical Officer pronounced that the case was not one of insanity. It also appeared that the accused, who was a teacher in the school had some ground for annoyance in connection with his service:

Held, (1) that the facts of the case were not strong enough to give him exemption from the criminality of his conduct under s. 84 of the Penal Code:

Where there is no means of discriminating between the cases of various persons found at a place of a criminal conspiracy, and the circumstances point to the conclusion that every person found in the house was a member of the conspiracy, absence of proof that a particular person was there innocently leads to the conclusion that no one's presence was innocent.

Per Sukrawardy, J.—When appearances are against the accused in a case, and the prosecution has established prima facie the existence of incriminating circumstances, it is the duty of the defence to rebut the presumption arising from them by some tangible evidence other than by mere criticism and suggestions or untested and uncorroborated statements from the dock. The idea that the defence is not bound to adduce any evidence is dangerous. In Jury trials the last word may have some value but in a trial before three experienced Judges the prosecution and the defence stand on the same footing.

It cannot be said that temporary residence in a house containing explosive articles, even with the

A mere trespasser cannot, by the very act of trespass, immediately and without acquiescence, give himself possession, in the legal sense of the term, against the person whom he ejects, and the latter may, if he does not acquiesce, re-enter and reinstate himself provided he does not use more force than is necessary. Such a re-entry will be viewed only as a resistance to an intrusion upon a possession which had never been lost.

The continuance in possession of the trespasser is a recurring wrong and constitutes a new entry every time that the true owner goes upon the land or as near to it as he dares, to make a claim to it. There is a fresh cause of action each time he is resisted although the point from which limitation will run may depend on the express provisions of the Law of Limitation.

Where an unlawful entry is followed by an unlawful continuance of occupation each time that the true owner goes upon the land or makes a claim under circumstances sufficient in law to constitute re-entry and the trespasser opposes him with the intention required by s. 441 of the Penal Code, a new offence under that section is committed and a new liability arises.

A person who unlawfully enters upon the property of another with the intention specified in s. 441 of the Penal Code can be convicted of the offence of criminal trespass even though he enters with the permission of another trespasser who has already unlawfully entered and occupied the property, where the owner has not acquiesced in the possession of the latter.

The other two beat a person who tried to stop the assault. The proprietor continued shouting to his relations but did not strike any blow himself.

Held, (1) that when at the behest of the proprietor, the four relations arose for the assault, they intended at least to inflict grievous hurt on the goldsmith, and being five in number including the proprietor they all were guilty under ss. 325/149, Penal Code;

(2) that the two relations who struck dangs on the head of the goldsmith were in addition guilty of murder in that their attack on the goldsmith was made either with the intention of causing death or such bodily injury as they knew to be likely to cause death, but that as the elements of preparation and premeditation were absent, the ends of justice would be met by a sentence of transportation for life. *L. — s. 215—Offence, nature of—Taking money to find stolen property—Screening offender—Desire to save oneself from vengeance of thieves.

The primary aim of s. 215, Penal Code, is to punish all trafficking in crime, by which a person knowing that property has been obtained by crime, and knowing the criminal, makes a profit out of the crime, while screening the offender from justice.

It is not an offence to take money from another in order to help him to find stolen property and to convict the thief. It is an offence for one who knew of the commission of the crime, and who could at once have informed upon the offender, to wait till a reward is offered, and then to take money from the owner of the property under colour of getting the property back for him. The section is not intended to apply to the actual thief, but to some one who, being in league with the thief, receives some gratification on account of helping the owner to recover stolen property, without at the same time using all the means in his power to cause the thief to be apprehended and convicted of his offence.

The fact that a person undertaking to recover stolen horses says that he will take them, if recovered, either to the cattle-pound or leave them near some place, does not necessarily show that he knows the criminal and wishes to screen him. It may equally be that he intends to save himself from the vengeance of the people from whom he intends to take away the horses if he discovers their whereabouts. A. EMPEROR v. MANGU, L. R. 8 A. 158 Cr.; 25 A. L. J. 866; A. I. R. 1928 All 22; 29 Cr. L. J. 21; 8 A. I. Cr. R. 551 437 and the girl died. The uncle was convicted for murder. On appeal.

The blow on the head caused fracture of the skull.

Penal Code—contd.

Held, that the accused could not be convicted for murder but was guilty only of culpable homicide not amounting to murder.

A blow on the head with a lathi is certainly likely to cause death and the person who inflicts a lathi blow on the head of another person must be presumed to have the intention of causing such bodily injury as is likely to cause death. But it does not necessarily follow that a lathi blow on the head is always sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death.

Per Kulwant Sahay, J.—The essence of the crime of murder under cl. (2) of s. 300 of the Penal Code is that there must be the intention of causing such bodily injury as the offender knows is likely to cause death, and in order to convict a person of the offence of murder under the said clause, it has to be found that he had the intention of causing the injury and also that he had the knowledge that such injury which he intended to inflict was likely to cause death. For a conviction of an offence under cl. (3) of s. 300 it must be shown that the injury which the person intended to cause was such as to be sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death.

If a person causes death by doing an act with the intention of causing such bodily injury as is likely to cause death, his offence comes under s. 299, and it is only if the intention was to cause bodily injury, which injury was sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, that the offence would come under s. 300, cl. (3).

Although a man is presumed to intend the natural and inevitable consequence of his own act, the presumption of intention must depend upon the facts of each particular case, and 'knowledge' as used in cl. (2) of the section is a word which imports a certainty and not merely a probability.

The difference between culpable homicide and murder is merely a question of different degrees of probability that death would ensue. PAT GANBAS PANDÉ v. EMPEROR, 29 Cr. L. J. 17; L. L. T. 40 Pat. 28. 433

The deceased then caught hold of the accused by the tuft and gave him two blows with the fist. There was a struggle and the deceased held the accused firm by the tuft. The accused then gave a fatal blow to the deceased on the left side with a dagger which he had in his hand.

Held, (Per Wallace and Tiruvengkatachiar, JJ.), that though the first provocation of the deceased in calling out for the accused was not grave and sudden, it was aggressive and the second provocation, i.e., seizing the accused by the tuft was grave, and sudden and the stabbing being directly attributable to it, Exception 1 to s. 300 applied to the — s. 302—Murder—Provocation—Sentence.

A person who was trusted and treated with hospitality by another seduced the latter's wife and persisted in remaining in his house after having been requested to leave. The injured man killed the seducer. There was no evidence to indicate the circumstances which led to the commission of the murder.

Held, that the conduct of the deceased was certainly provoking, and, in the absence of evidence to indicate the circumstances of the crime, it was not a case for the infliction of the extreme penalty of the law, but for a sentence of transportation for life. *L. — ss. 302, 304—Murder and culpable homicide not amounting to murder, distinction between.

Per Hasan J.—If an act which an accused person is said to have committed falls within any of the explanations to s. 300, Penal Code and does not fall within any of the exceptions, the act is murder, but if it does fall under one or other of those explanations and also falls within any of the exceptions enacted in s. 300, the act is one of culpable homicide not amounting to murder. O RAM LAL v. EMPEROR, 1 Luck. Oas 578; 28 Cr. L. J. 1029; A. I. R. 1928 Oudh 15; 9 A. I. Cr. R. 217. 213

— s. 304—Murder—Single blow—Sudden quarrel—Sentence.

In a quarrel between the accused's wife and his brother's wife, the latter abused the accused's daughters, whereupon the accused hit her a single violent blow with a stick which he picked up there and then. The woman died of her injury the following day. There was no feeling of enmity between the accused and the deceased.

Held, that the quarrel being unpremeditated and the blow having been struck in the heat or passion, a severe sentence was not called for, and that a sentence of three years' rigorous imprisonment would meet the ends of justice. L. KARAM ILAHI v. EMPEROR, 29 Cr. L. J. 33. 449 — ss. 304, Part II, 325—Dang blow on head causing death—Skull not fractured—Offence.

In most instances a man who strikes a person on the head with a heavy weapon such as dang must know that such a blow is likely to cause death. But this cannot be said about the case where the blow is not a very violent one and the injured person is able to walk about for a couple of days before he succumbs to the injury. In such a case the offence committed is one under s. 325, Penal Code. L. MEHR SHAH v. EMPEROR, 29 Cr. L. J. 24; 9 A. I. Cr. R. 255. 440

— s. 339—Wrongful restraint, what constitutes—Presence of person abetted, whether necessary.

Penal Code—contd.

—'Any direction', meaning of—Vertical direction, whether included—Offence and mere infringement of property rights, difference between.

The physical presence of the person obstructed at the moment of obstruction is not necessary for the commission of an offence under s. 339 of the Penal Code.

Section 339 of the Penal Code covers the case of obstruction to a person who reasonably wants to go in any direction, even vertically upwards if he has a right to do so.

But the section does not cover cases where there is no ordinary or special reason for a person to proceed in the direction which is obstructed.

During the absence of the complainant the accused constructed a tin projection hanging over the complainant's court-yard at a height of over 6 feet. The projection was such that it did not prevent anybody from moving under it but only caused obstruction to white-washing and repairs:

Held, that the accused was not guilty of an offence under s. 339, Penal Code. B. CHHAGAN VITHAL v. EMPEROR, 29 Bom. L. R. 494; A. I. R. 1927 Bom. 369; 28 Cr. L. J. 1023 111

In the case of a conviction for rape where the girl is 10 years of age, no question of consent arises.

The fact that a person accused of having committed rape is found to be suffering from gonorrhœa but the injured girl is not infected with the disease, is by no means conclusive of the innocence of the accused. PAT EMPEROR v. ASADALI, 29 Cr. L. J. 12, 9 P. L. T. 186 348 —ss. 379, 409, 417, 420, 511—Theft, criminal breach of trust, criminal misappropriation and cheating, distinction between.

The distinction between theft, criminal breach of trust, criminal misappropriation and cheating is that in theft, the original taking is without honesty and without the consent of the owner and in criminal breach of trust it is with both. In obtaining property by cheating, the taking is dishonest but with the consent of the owner and in criminal misappropriation it is honest but without the consent of the owner.

A sentence of one year's rigorous imprisonment and a fine with further rigorous imprisonment for four months in default of payment of it, though legal under s. 420, Penal Code, is illegal, if the finding is altered in the Appellate Court to a conviction of attempting to cheat punishable under ss. 417 and 511 read together, under which the longest term of imprisonment that could be imposed substantively is six months and the longest that could be imposed in default of payment of fine is a month and a half. NARSINGHDAS MARWARI v. Penal Code—contd.

Three known and named persons were charged with dacoity along with two other unknown men. The Jury acquitted one of the three accused and convicted the other two of the offence with which they had been charged:

Held, (1) that it was quite open to the Jury, while holding that one of the accused who was supposed to have been known to the witnesses had not been properly identified, to find that the total number of dacoits was five;

(2) but that the Judge should have asked the Jury definitely whether they had considered the possible result of the acquittal and whether they still found that the number of robbers was five, since it was possible that if the questions had been put, the remaining two accused would have been found guilty only of robbery and received lighter sentences. M. Held, that the accused were guilty of the offence of preparing to commit dacoity under s. 402, Indian Penal Code. L. EMPEROR v. AHMAD, 29 Cr. L. J. 14 350

Petroleum Act (VIII of 1899), ss. 5, 11, 15 (a)— License to transport petroleum, whether includes permission to possess or keep for process of and during transport.

Per Wallace and Madhavan Nair, JJ. (Jackson, J. contra)—A license for the transport of petrol under the Petroleum Act of 1899 includes permission to be in possession of petrol for the purpose of and during the process of transportation, so as to cover a halt over-night, and the possession of petrol during such halt is not 'keeping' of petrol within the meaning of s. 5 (1) of the Act.

Per Madhavan Nair, J.—The keeping of petroleum received under a transport license, for a short period which is incidental to, and necessary for, the distribution of it cannot amount to 'keeping' or 'possession' within the meaning of ss. 5, 11 and 15 (a) of the Petroleum Act. The question whether the period of time is short enough to be considered reasonable or too long to be considered reasonable will have to be decided with reference to the particular facts of each case. *M. Held, that the Court should not dismiss the suit forthwith but should allow the plaintiff to amend it so as to make it a suit for possession.

In case of a house which has fallen down the presumption is always in favour of the continuance of the possession of the person who occupied it before it fell down and the placing of some articles by a stranger in a portion of the house which has not fallen down does not amount to possession of the house by such a person. *L. In pursuance of these compromises the vendors re-sold the lands to the reversioners for certain sums somewhat less than they had paid to their vendors and the reversioners mortgaged the same to them for the same amounts. Two suits for pre-emption were instituted, one by a son of one of the original vendees and the other by a collateral of another vendee.

A person was adjudicated an insolvent by the Registrar in Insolvency in 1920. No assets were recovered and he was unconditionally discharged. He was again adjudicated an insolvent in 1925 and property which he had acquired subsequent to his first discharge vested in the Receiver. Meanwhile the order of discharge in the previous insolvency was cancelled by the Registrar on the ground that the insolvent had misled the Court, and the adjudication was revived. Creditors in the previous insolvency applied for participation of the assets in the later insolvency:

A suit to recover fees payable by a vendor of goods to a Municipality for permission granted to him by the Municipality to sell his goods from a site within the Municipal limits is cognisable by a Small Cause Court. If the method of assessment of a tax in reality makes the tax one on incomes, it is illegal and ultra vires even though it purports to be a tax on persons practising a profession or carrying on a trade or calling. Railway Company—Reserved Accommodation—
Company agreeing to make endeavours to provide reserved carriage—Issue of necessary tickets—Contract, whether complete—Failure to supply carriage—Passengers' right to damages.

The plaintiffs applied to a Railway Administration for a reserved carriage. The Officiating Traffic Manager replied that endeavours will be made to supply the carriage and issued orders to his subordinates that a reserved carriage should be supplied. The necessary tickets were also issued to the plaintiffs by the booking clerk. No reserved carriage was available when the train arrived and the plaintiffs instituted a suit for damages against the Railway Company.

Held, that there was no complete agreement between the plaintiffs and the defendant Company inasmuch as the Company had merely stated that endeavours would be made to provide such a carriage, that the fact that the necessary tickets were issued did not amount to a completion of the contract, and that the plaintiffs were not, therefore, entitled to damages. *A B. If a consignor sends another person to deliver goods to a Railway Administration and that person signs the contract, the contract so signed by that person is binding upon the consignor as though he had signed it himself. It is immaterial whether that person was literate or illiterate, was authorised to sign or not authorised, or signed personally or as agent of the consignor.

If at the time of booking the Railway Company was dissatisfied and the person delivering the goods for carriage agreed that the condition of the packages was not satisfactory, it cannot afterwards be made a matter of objection in a suit upon the contract that the packages were in good condition. *C GREAT INDIAN PENINSULA RY CO. v. s. 72—Risk Note B—Suit for damages for loss of goods—Burden of proving neglect of Railway—Theft from running train, onus of—Admission of theft, effect of.

Before a person who has consigned his goods under Risk Note B is entitled to maintain an action for damages for loss of his goods, he must definitely prove that the loss was caused by reason of the wilful neglect of the Railway Administration or its servants. If and when he has succeeded in proving such neglect it will be open to the Railway Administration to claim immunity by proving that the theft was from a running train. The onus of proving that the Railway was guilty of wilful neglect lies clearly upon the plaintiff.

Where a Railway Company alleges theft from a running train but fails to prove it, the admission is not of theft at large but of a specific form of theft and the onus still lies on the plaintiff to prove neglect or theft by the Railway servants. *L SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA v. s. 72—Risk Note Form B—Suit for damages for non-delivery—Burden of proof of loss—'Loss,' meaning of.

In a suit against a Railway Company for damages for non-delivery of part of a consignment, unless the fact of the loss is admitted by the plaintiff, it is necessary for the Railway Company, to get the benefit of the clause in Risk Note B which exempts it from liability for loss, to show that the goods are lost, or at least to show, in the first instance that the goods are not then and there in the control of the Railway Administration, so that they might have been delivered to the proper consignee.

There may be a 'loss' within the meaning of Risk Note B although the loss is caused by theft of the servants of the Railway Administration or its agents or by wilful neglect of the Railway Administration itself. *C GREAT INDIAN PENINSULAR RAILWAY CO LTD. v. s. 75—Risk Note Form B—Interpretation of note—Onus of proving dealings with consignment—Evidence of Railway servants, value of—Duty of Railway Company.

Under the new Risk Note Form B it is always safe for the plaintiff to give due notice to the Railway to disclose and, if not satisfied with the disclosure, to call upon the Railway to give evidence making this a portion of his pleas. On the other hand, it is desirable for the Railway whether called upon or not to take the precaution of disclosing the dealings in pleadings and to inquire from the Court whether it would require further evidence thereon other than pleadings quoted by such relevant copies of entries from books as the Railway might think fit to put in with its pleadings or at the time of production of documents.

A Court should not disbelieve a Railway servant merely on the ground that he is a Railway servant and that, therefore, he is bound to state that he had done his duty. At the same time where possible the Railway should support the oral evidence of its servants by books which should be proved to have been duly kept. But before the Court can disbelieve the Railway servants the plaintiff must cross-examine those servants or otherwise prove that relevant books could have been forthcoming and that there was no reason for their non-production. If this is done it is, of course, open to the Court to disbelieve the oral evidence on the ground that the corroborative evidence of the books had not been produced in the case. *L. A saranjamdar is not entitled to create in his own favour occupancy rights in lands unoccupied at the time the grant was made, or held by others then but forfeited on one ground or another during the subsistence of the grant. This principle applies not only to grants of the soil itself but also to grants of the land revenue only.

[Incidents and history of saranjam grants considered.]

Although the word 'inam' is sometimes vaguely applied to all grants of revenue-free land without reference to perpetuity or any specified conditions, it would be unsafe to apply to a peculiar grant like the Mahratta Saranjam rules which are held applicable to grants in perpetuity. *P. Section 42 of the Specific Relief Act applies only to vested rights and not to contingent rights like those of a person who has only a chance of succeeding to the estate of a Hindu after the death of a female heir in possession.

A Court will not grant a declaration which is perfectly useless.

Plaintiffs, alleging that they were presumptive heirs of the last male holder, sued for a declaration that the defendant, a Hindu widow, was in possession of certain properties not as heiress to her husband but as mother and heiress of her son, and that the plaintiffs were the future heirs to the property after the defendant's death. A daughter of the defendant and the daughter's son who were in existence and who would be entitled to succeed the defendant in preference to the plaintiffs if she was holding as heiress to her husband were not impleaded as parties:

Held, that the declaration could not be granted inasmuch as the plaintiffs had no legal right but only a mere spes successionis, and inasmuch as the declaration would further be an entirely useless one as it would not bind those persons who may claim the estate upon the death of the defendant. *Pat PRANLACHHI KUR v. The intention of the Legislature under s. 317 of the Succession Act appears to be that the inventory and accounts filed under that section should, so far as the proceedings on the Testamentary Side are concerned, be regarded as final. The protection afforded to parties interested in the Will is that if the inventory and the accounts are intentionally false in any particular, the executor or administrator makes himself liable to punishment under the Penal Code. Another remedy open to the interested parties would be to file an action against the executor or administrator questioning the correctness of the accounts.

The plaintiff and the defendants were dealers in Gold Flake cigarettes. When the plaintiff's goods arrived in Bombay and Calcutta, the defendants who had, up to then, exclusive rights of selling the said cigarettes in India applied to the Collectors of Customs in Bombay and Calcutta for orders for detention of the plaintiff's goods, on the ground among others that the importation of the said cigarettes by the plaintiff infringed their trade mark. The plaintiff's goods were accordingly detained by the Collectors. The defendants then filed two suits, one in Calcutta on the 11th May, 1922, and another in Bombay on the 22nd May, 1922. In the High Court of Calcutta the defendants obtained a temporary injunction against the plaintiff and this injunction was dissolved on the 8th June, 1922, on the plaintiff undertaking to place a certain sum in fixed deposit. In Bombay the defendants gave notice of motion for an injunction on the 23rd May, 1922, but on the plaintiff undertaking not to sell, the injunction was dissolved on the 19th June, 1922. The defendants' suits were finally dismissed by the Privy Council. Thereafter, on the 21st January, 1925, the plaintiff filed a suit against the defendants for damages (a) for wrongfully and maliciously obtaining orders of detention from the Collectors, (b) for wrongfully and maliciously prosecuting the civil suits, (c) for similarly obtaining an injunction against the plaintiff, (d) for having applied for an injunction in the Bombay Court and compelled plaintiff to give an undertaking not to sell, and (e) for publishing various statements slandering the plaintiff's goods:

Held, (1) that the plaintiff was not entitled to any damages for detention by the Collectors as there was no mis-statement or malice on the defendants' part, and as the cause of action for such a claim was further barred by limitation under Art 36 of Sch. I of the Limitation Act;

(2) that the plaintiff was not entitled to damages for the institution of the civil suits inasmuch as the bringing of an ordinary action, however maliciously, and however great the want of reasonable and probable cause will not support a subsequent action for malicious prosecution;

(3) that the plaintiff was not entitled to damages for injunction apart from any special undertaking given by the defendants inasmuch as apart from malice or want of probable cause a plaintiff cannot recover damages in an independent suit upon mere proof that an injunction was granted to restrain him from doing what has since been held to be within his rights;

(4) that the plaintiff was entitled to enforce an express undertaking for damages given by the defendants to the Court in the former suit at the time of the granting of the injunction, even though his proper remedy would have been to have applied to that Court to enforce the undertaking, and not by way of a separate suit;

(5) that the plaintiff could not seek for any relief in the suit, in respect of his damages relating to the injunction proceedings in the Bombay Court in view of the consent order and undertaking in that Court and that this claim also was further barred by limitation;

(6) that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover any damages on account of slander of goods inasmuch as the defendants had stated that their goods were superior to those of the plaintiff, with a view to push their own business and not with the direct object of injuring the plaintiff's business.

Per Rankin, C. J.—An undertaking to the Court in a suit is not such an undertaking as amounts to contract with the other party, nor does it ground any action at Common Law. It is to be enforced by application to the Court to which it was given and in the suit or proceeding in which it was given. The Court ought to be asked to enforce the undertaking within a reasonable time but there is no statutory period of limitation for enforcing the same.

The litigation was then compromised and under the compromise decree half of the properties mortgaged to C was given to A and the other half to B, and it was further provided that B should discharge the whole of the mortgage-debt due to C. In a suit by the representatives of C to enforce the mortgage against the mortgaged properties in the hands of the representatives of A and B:

Held, Per Sulaiman and Mukerji, J.J. (Lindsay, J., dissenting), that the mortgage was enforceable only against the half of the mortgaged properties which was held by A's representatives and was not enforceable against the other half given to B under the compromise decree.

The rule of lis pendens is enacted for the benefit of the 'other party' to the litigation and not for the benefit of the party making the transfer.

Though a transferee pendente lite is a representative of the transferor and bound by the decree so far as it goes against his transferor he cannot for all purposes be treated as if he were a party to the suit.

Per Lindsay, J.—A transferee pendente lite is bound by the decree just as much as if he were a party to the suit and, if he is bound by the decree, he must be bound by the whole decree and is not at liberty to take advantage of one part of the decree and repudiate another part. A SHYAM LAL v.

When the question is whether an alienation was for the purpose of defeating or delaying the creditors, if it is proved satisfactorily that only a small portion of the consideration recited in the document did really pass, it is open to the Court to come to the conclusion that the transaction was intended to defeat or delay creditors. In such a case the proper order of the Court should be to set aside the transaction as a whole, because the transaction which is intended to defeat or delay creditors cannot be good in part and bad in part, and in so setting aside the alienation, the Court cannot allow a charge in favour of the alienee even to the extent of the consideration which actually passed.

When the Revenue Court actually makes the partition both of the land on which houses are situated and of orchards, the Civil Court has no right to interfere with the partition made by the Revenue Court in accordance with the aforesaid sections.

A testator after making dispositions of certain property in favour of his son's widow M, and his grandson's widow P, provided as follows: 'On the death of M or P, the survivor will become the proprietor of the entire property or of that property which exists then (that is, at the time of the death of the lady who dies first) with power of transfer and then she will have all the powers of sale mortgage, gift and bequest; after the death of the last survivor, the property which she will leave without nominating a successor will devolve on the legal heirs of the declarant (that is, the testator), but as against the said Musammats and their successors whom they will nominate no one will have any claim.' In a suit by the heir of the testator against the heirs of P who survived M and died without appointing any successor:

Held, (1) that P took an absolute estate under the Will;

(2) that there was no executory gift in favour of the heirs of the testator, and that even if there was such a gift it was invalid in law;

(3) that the estate taken by P was not an estate defeasible in the event of her not making a Will;

(4) that the testator had by the latter portion of the Will merely endeavoured to lay down a line of succession contrary to the succession known to the law, which he had no power to do;

(5) that the heirs of P were entitled to the estate on P's death in preference to the heir of the testator.

Per Stuart, C. J.—Where a testator has devised what is on the face of it an absolute estate and has subsequently added a clause, which has the appearance of reducing the powers of an owner of an absolute estate, it is necessary to decide what were his real intentions. Did he mean to grant an absolute estate? If he has done so, he cannot reduce the powers of the owner; and an attempt to reduce those powers will be repelled on the ground of the repugnancy of the restraint. But if, on the other hand, it appears that his full intention has been directed towards restriction it will have to be held, if the restriction is good, that the estate is not absolute. This is the law both in England and in India.

Per Wazir Hasan, J.—It is a universal rule of construction that the "grammatical and ordinary sense of the words is to be adhered to, unless that would lead to some absurdity, or some repugnance or inconsistency with the rest of the instrument, in which case the grammatical and ordinary sense of the words may be modified, so as to avoid that absurdity and inconsistency, but no further.

"In construing Wills in all cases the primary duty of a Court is to ascertain from the language of the testator what were his intentions, i. e., to construe the Will. In so doing they are entitled and bound to bear in mind other matters than merely the words used. They must consider the surrounding circumstances, the position of the testator, his family relationships, the probability that he would use words in a particular sense, and many other things which are often summed up in the somewhat picturesque figure. 'The Court is entitled to put itself into the testator's armchair.' But all this is solely as an aid to arriving at a right construction of the Will, and to ascertain the meaning of its language when used by that particular testator in that document. So soon as the construction is settled, the duty of the Court is to carry out the intentions as expressed, and none other. The Court is in no case justified in adding to testamentary dispositions. If they transgress any legal restrictions they must be disregarded. If they leave any eventuality 'unprovided for, the estate must, in case that eventuality arises, be dealt with according to the law which provides for succession of property in the absence of testamentary directions applying thereto. But the Court never adds to a Will anything which needs to be done by testamentary disposition. In all cases it must loyally carry out the Will as properly construed, and this duty is universal, and is true alike of Wills of every nationality and every religion or rank of life. That native testators should be ignorant of the legal phrases proper to express their intentions, or of the legal steps necessary to carry them into effect, is one of the most important of the 'surrounding circumstances' which the Court must bear in mind, and it is justified in refusing to allow defects in expression in these matters to prevent to carry out of the testator's true intentions."

Rules established in English Courts for construing English documents are not as such applicable to transactions between natives of this country.

"A Court cannot speculate upon what the testator may have intended to do or may have thought that he has actually done. It cannot give effect to any intention which is not expressed or plainly implied in the language of the Will.

It is always dangerous to construe the words of one Will by the construction of more or less similar words in a different Will, which was adopted by a Court in another case.

If a testator makes an absolute gift of property to A, any gift over of what may be left undisposed of by A is repugnant and void.

Will—concl.

Per Misra, J.—The word 'malik' when used in a Will or a gift imports full proprietary rights unless there is something in the context to qualify it.

Where clear words have been used in a Will indicating that the donee has been made 'malik' and complete powers of transfer have been conferred upon him, it is not further necessary in order to give effect to the full powers conferred upon the donee that there must also be a provision in the Will to the effect that the estate conferred upon him is a heritable one. *O JAGMOHAN SINGH v. Workmen's Compensation Act (VIII of 1923), ss. 3, 10—Accident to workmen—Employer, Liability of—Notice to employer.

To bring a case under the Workmen's Compensation Act, two conditions must be satisfied; the accident must be one arising out of the employment, and it must also be in the course of the employment.

A Railway coolie was returning by an electric train from some place where he had been sent to do some work. He was standing near a carriage door which was left open by the Company. The train while going up a bridge received a jerk and the coolie fell out of the train and died. In a suit for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act:

Held, that if the carriage with the open door was a dangerous place, it was a dangerous place provided by the masters of the coolie, the Railway Company, and they were liable to pay compensation as the accident was in the course of and arose out of the employment of the coolie.

A notice given by the family of a deceased workman after six days of the accident cannot be said not to have been given as soon as practicable after the accident. B. G. I. P. Ry. v. KASHINATH CHIMNAJI, 29 Bom. L. R. 1544; A. I. R. 1928 Bom. 1
